How Traitors to be puniſhed.

19. ‘For the reſt, he would have him adorn Rome with all Magnificence, and ſet it out with all ſorts of Solemnities, to make it in great reverence and eſteem abroad. No Nation was to have any power in its own hands, nor meet in any publick Aſſemblies of Debate, for that would procure Diſturbance; for which reaſon neither was the Roman People, he ſaid, to be permitted either to come together for paſſing of Judgment, to the Comitia, or any other Council, for the enacting of any thing. No City or People was to be ſuffered to uſe any exceſs in Buildings or in Games: none to uſe any peculiar Coin, Weight, or Meaſure. None were to ſend any peculiar meſſage to him, except the matter required his inſpection, but have recourſe to the Governor of the place, who was therewith to acquaint Cæſar. Ambaſſadors either from Enemies or confederate Kings or States, were to have Audience from the Senate, that the power ſeeming to be in the Senate, they might ſee how many Enemies they ſhould have if the caſe ſo required, and Matters being diſpatched by conſent of the Fathers, the Majeſty of the Empire would be the more eſtabliſhed. All of Senatorian rank he would have impeached before, and judged by the Senate, that Cæſar might eſcape the envy of Condemnation, and others by ſo formal proceedings, might be kept in awe. As for any ſcandalous words againſt himſelf, he told him, he ſhould neither hear any accuſation, nor puniſh them. For it was not good, he ſaid, that he ſhould believe, that any one would injure him, who hurt no body, but did good to all; for, ſaith he, bad Princes only do this, whom their guilty Conſciences make credulous. Neither is it fitting to take thoſe things ill, which if true, ought not to have been done, and if falſe, ſhould be neglected and diſſembled: for that many by puniſhing them, miniſter greater occaſion of worſe diſcourſe. His ſence therefore of ſcandalous words was this: that he ought to be higher than all injury, and neither himſelf to fancy, nor make others believe, that any one durſt be ſo ſawcy, but that the ſame opinion of veneration was had of him, as of the eternal Gods. If any plotted his deſtruction, he would neither have him himſelf to judge, nor ſentence him, but refer him to the Senate, and if he were convicted, to puniſh him as lightly as might be, that his Crime might gain belief. But he here excepted ſuch, as having command of Armies, made open Inſurrections, who were not to be formally Arraigned, but puniſhed as Enemies.

The Senate to be made uſe of.

20. ‘Theſe things, and moſt of the reſt which concerned the Common-wealth, he would have him propound to the Senate, wherein all the Members ſhould have equal power of Voting, except any of them were accuſed. If the party indeed were not as yet a Senator, or but of the rank of a Quæſtor, all might have voices; but it was againſt reaſon that he, who never had been a Tribune of the People, or Ædilis, ſhould paſs Sentence upon him that had born theſe Offices, or that thoſe ſhould do it upon one of Prætorian rank, or ſuch an one upon a Conſular perſon: but it was fitting enough that thoſe of Conſular Dignity might judge all the ſeveral ſorts, and the reſt their Equals or Inferiors: Cæſar himſelf was to be Judge in all Appeals, made from the greater ſorts of Magiſtrates, his Procurators, the Governor of the City, Subcenſor, Præfecti Prætorio, Overſeers of Proviſions or Proveditors, and Maſters of the Watches: for none ought to have ſo abſolute a power, but that appeal ought to lie from him. Of theſe he ought to take Cognizance, as alſo of the cauſes of Equites, Centurions, or prime Officers, when the Controverſie was about Life or Reputation.

In what Caſes Appeals ought to lye to Cæſar.

'For theſe Caſes ought to be referred to him alone, and for the fore-mentioned cauſes none other ought to judge them. Yet to the hearing of them he might nominate ſome of the principal men of Senatorian or Equeſtrian rank, or of Conſular, or Prætorian Dignity, that he and they having had hereby experience one of another, he might imploy them in other matters abroad. In the Caſes of greateſt conſequence he would not have him ask their opinions openly, leſt favouring their friends they might not ſpeak freely their minds; but their opinions were to be written down, and then preſently blotted out, which ſecrecy would procure them to uſe all freedom. He adviſed him in his affairs of Cauſes, Letters, buſineſs of Cities, and Petitions of private men, and in other things of Government, to uſe the aſſiſtance of the Equites. To refuſe to hear no man's advice, and to look at the Will, and not at the Succeſs, both of Councellors and Soldiers; as, neither, to envy the glory of Military Men. For, many fearing the envy of Princes and States, have rather choſen to loſe than gain in the Wars, to provide for their own ſafety. Wherefore he would not have him (whom eſpecially the event, either as to profit or diſprofit would concern) in word others, and in deed, to envy himſelf.

Military men not to be envied.

Rules for Cæſar's General carriage.

Deſerving perſons rather to be rewarded above than below their merits.

21. 'He deſired him to ſpeak and do ſuch things, as he would have his Officers to think and practice, for this would more eaſily teach them their duty, Men being led more by Example than Precept, and the Actions of Princes being eſpecially pried into, and more imitated than their threatnings feared. The lives of others he ſhould look into, but not greatly enquire: what Crimes by others were detected he ought to puniſh, but diſſemble ſuch as had no accuſer, and know how to correct mildly, which in ſome caſes doth more good than rigorous Proceedings. Then as for Rewards, he told him, he was to requite deſerving perſons rather above than below their merits; for this was the way to win upon them, and to make them virtuous. He then adviſed him not to admit of any extraordinary Honours from Senate or others: for this would be needleſs, chargeable, and dangerous. He bade him by virtue ſeek for immortality, not by Temples built unto his name. The gods he told him he was ever, and all over to worſhip, according to the cuſtom of his Countrey, and compel others ſo to do: and to puniſh Authors of ſtrange Religions, not only for reverence to his gods, but alſo becauſe ſuch things draw men to the uſe of foreign Cuſtoms, whence Conſpiracies, and Bandyings ariſe, which are no whit agreeable with the Government of a ſingle perſon. Neither was he to ſuffer any Magicians; and to have a care of Philoſophers alſo, who by their foretellings often raiſed Seditions. He was to be ſtudious of peace, content with preſent enjoyments, and yet to be ready for War upon all occaſions. Though he muſt uſe Intelligencers and Spies; yet he ought not to be too credulous, and not indulge his Servants or Dependents too much; for all their failings would be imputed to him. He was to right inferior and private men, incourage Arts, and profitable Occupations, as to puniſh idle, and vitious perſons; not to ſuffer contentions, or animoſities to grow, nor peculiar names to be aſſumed, nor any other thing whence diſcord might ariſe. He was to keep an equality in his granting requeſts as much as could be; and therefore not to ſuffer any to ask him what he ſhould not grant; but to indeavour that none ſhould petition for any thing forbidden. In ſum, he adviſed him never to abuſe his Power, and not to think this a Diminution of it, if he did not do all that he might: but by how much the more he could do what he would, by ſo much to take care to will all things that became him. He bade him always conſider whether he did well or ill: whether by ſuch an action he procured love or ill will, that he might do and forbear accordingly. He told him, That though he heard no body blame him, yet ought he not to conclude, that therefore he did well; nor to expect that any ſhould be ſo mad as openly to upbraid him. This no man would do, though moſt extremely injured. Nay, many, ſaith he, are conſtrained openly to commend thoſe by whom they have been wronged, leſt they ſhould be thought to blame them. But 'tis the duty of a Prince not to gueſs at the affections of others from their words; but from thoſe things which 'tis moſt probable that they think of.

22. 'Theſe, and other like things he would have him do; for many things he ſaid he paſſed over, becauſe all could not be ſpoken at the ſame time. One thing he would ſay, which was the ſum of all, either ſaid or to be ſaid. If he would do all thoſe things, which if he were a ſubject he would have his Prince do

The ſum of all Mecænas his advice.

‘to him, he ſhould in nothing offend, proſper in all things, and lead both a ſafe,
‘and moſt happy life, For how could not all but look upon him, and love him as ‘a Father, and Preſerver, when they ſhould ſee him modeſt, of unblameable life,
‘and excellent both in Peace and War; when he ſhould neither diſgrace nor in‘jure any one, but carry himſelf humbly: not exact Money from others, whilſt
‘he himſelf flowed with wealth; not afflicting others whilſt he was luxurious;
‘not puniſhing others whilſt he himſelf was looſe and licentious; but in all things
‘as it were ſharing with them? Therefore relying on that defence which would ‘be great in thy ſelf if thou hurteſt no man; Believe me, ſaith he, thou wilt have ‘no body, either hate thee, or deviſe any thing againſt thee, which being ſo, ‘thou muſt needs lead a pleaſant life. For, what can be more ſweet, what more ‘happy, than for one with virtue to enjoy all humane good things, and to be able ‘to confer them upon others? In concluſion, thoſe, and other things heretofore ‘ſpoken being conſidered, he bade him yield to him, and not contemn Fortune,
‘which had preferred him, picked out from amongſt all others, to be chief. Now,
‘if taking in reality to himſelf alone the Soveraign power, he feared the Name
‘of a Kingdom as odious, he might omit that, and order his matters under the ‘other of Cæſar: if he deſired other titles they would give him that of Impe-
‘rator, heretofore given to his Father: they would adorn him alſo with ſome
‘other venerable note of Honour, ſo that he might enjoy all the Privileges of ‘a Kingdom without the envied name thereof.

Cæſar followeth the advice of Mecænas.

23. Mecænas concluded with theſe words, whoſe advice Cæſar followed, though he greatly commended them both for wiſdom, copiouſneſs, and freedom of ſpeech: yet he did not preſently ſet upon all thoſe things which he offered, leſt if on a ſudden he ſhould attempt to change the conſtitution of the State, he might fail in his indeavours: therefore ſome things he changed out of hand, others afterwards: and ſome things he left to be perfected by his Succeſſors, which he thought might be better ſetled through the advantage of time and opportunity. He uſed alſo the induſtry of Agrippa in the proſecution of theſe deſigns no leſs than if he had adviſed him to this courſe. In this ſame year, and his fifth Conſulſhip, he took the name of Imperator; not in that ſence wherein anciently it was wont to be given for Victories obtained (for ſo he had it given him often both before this and after;) but in reſpect of chief Command, or Authority, as it had been decreed to his Father Julius, and his Sons and Poſterity. Then was he made Cenſor with Agrippa, and amongſt other things belonging to that Office, purged the Senate, into which many Equites and unworthy Plebeians had crept during the Civil Wars; and increaſed it to the number of a thouſand. Two perſons, viz. C. Cluilius and C. Furnius he put into the rank of Conſulares; becauſe being deſigned Conſuls they had been prevented by others. He alſo ranked certain Families amongſt the Patricians; becauſe moſt of thoſe had periſhed in the Wars. He commanded that no Senator without his leave ſhould paſs beyond Italy, which is at this day obſerved, ſaith Dio, It being unlawful for any of that rank to travel, except into Sicily, or Gallia Narbonenſis, whither any that had Eſtates in thoſe Provinces might go without leave; becauſe thoſe Countries were in quiet, and deſtitute of Arms. Cæſar alſo conſidering that many Senators and others truſted him not; leſt they ſhould attempt new matters, he gave out that he had burned all the Letters found in Antony his Coffers: and indeed ſome of them were loſt, but moſt of them he very carefully kept, and afterwards made uſe of them as he had occaſion. He ſent for Antiochus Commagenus, who had treacherouſly killed his Brother, ſent on an Embaſſy to Rome, and put him to Death, being condemned by the Senate.

Taketh the title of Imperator, and ordereth ſeveral Matters.

Maketh a Luſtrum.

24. Cæſar in his ſixth Conſulſhip, together with M. Agrippa his Collegue made a Luſtrum 41 years after the laſt Celebration of one (by Cn. Lentulus and L. Gellius) and herein were ceſſed 4063000 Polls of Roman Citizens. He celebrated Games alſo, which had been decreed in memory of his Victory at Actium, and it was ordered they ſhould be renewed every fifth year, four Colleges of Prieſts taking care of them, viz. the Pontifices, Augurs, Septemviri, and Quindecimviri by courſes. He cauſed other ſorts of Games and Exerciſes to be made at his own coſt, borrowing Money; ordered that two perſons of Prætorian rank ſhould yearly overſee the Treaſury, gave to the people four times as much Corn as they were wont to have, to ſome Senators he gave Money, ſome of this rank being ſo poor, that they could not bear Offices belonging to them. All Ingagements and Debts to the Excheque he made void that ſtood good before the Battel at Actium, except what concerned Buildings. He ſuffered no Sacrifice to be offered to Egyptian gods within the Pomærium, took alſo care for repairing of Temples. And becauſe many unjuſt things had been ordained during the late Seditions and Civil Wars, eſpecially in the Triumvirate, he made them all void by one Edict, and cauſed them to ceaſe from his ſixth Conſulſhip. Being in the eyes and mouths of all for theſe things, he conſidered how he might increaſe his reputation, and confirm his ſingle power by the conſent, and without the conſtraint of the people. Being then Conſul the ſeventh time, when he had prepared every Senator before-hand, whom he knew to be well affected towards him, he came to the Senate-houſe, and there read a ſet Speech which he had written down fitly for this purpoſe.

Pretending in a ſet Speech to the Senate, a deſire to lay down his Power.

25. 'Herein he firſt exceedingly magnified with much affected Art, the things 'he was about to do, and then ſignified, That though he had ſuch opportunity to 'eſtabliſh himſelf as no man ever had more, yet did he now deveſt himſelf of all 'power, and reſtore all unto them, Arms, Laws, and Provinces: and not only ſuch 'things as he had been intruſted with, but he gave them beſides what he himſelf had 'further acquired. This then his gift he much illuſtrated by his ſelf-denial, ſhewn 'as well formerly as at preſent, being very ſorry that ever there had been occaſion 'for the Commonwealth to uſe him. He ſpake of the Juſtice and Prudence of 'this Reſignation, and boaſted of the glory of it, which he avowed to exceed 'the Conqueſts of Gall, Myſia, Egypt, or Pannonia, the Victories over Pharnaces, 'Juba, or Phraates, the expedition into Britain or the paſſage of the Rhine, and 'all the difficulties of the Civil Wars. He demanded if any could be found that 'excelled him in greatneſs of mind, who had ſo many Cities, Nations, and Soldiers at his back, and whom none durſt oppoſe? Horatius, Mucius, Curtius, Regulus, and the Decii, who ventured their lives for glory, were not comparable 'to him, for as much as by this Reſignation he exceeded both them, and all others 'in glory. And ſhewed hence that the gallantry of Spirit found in the ancient 'Romans was not extinct. Having diſcourſed much in this vein, he concluded 'with his advice to the Senate how to manage Publick Affairs, telling them, 'That if they followed it, they would be happy and thankful to him, who reſcuing them from Seditions, had brought them into that eſtate: but if they did not 'punctually obſerve it, they would make him repent of what he had done, and 'caſt themſelves again into manifold Wars, and great Dangers.

26. Cæſar having read his writing, the Minds of the Senators were marvelouſly affected. Some there were who knew his deſign, and therefore agreed with him; the reſt either ſuſpected his intent, or believed him. Of theſe ſome admired his craft in concealing his purpoſes; others were troubled at his deſign: ſome at his cunning; and others at his refuſal of the Government. For there were ſome who hated the Popular form as turbulent, and approving of the change, were well pleaſed with Cæſar's adminiſtration. Yet the product of theſe ſeveral affections was the ſame; for neither they that believed he ſpake as he thought, could rejoyce; thoſe that wiſhed he were reduced to a private condition, being yet fearful how things would go; and they that deſired he might keep his power, being ſorry for the loſs of their hopes. Neither could they that believed him not reprehend him, becauſe to ſome will, and to others courage was wanting. No man yet, whether he believed him, or believed him not, durſt commend his Speech, for that ſome liked it not, and others feared to do it. Wherefore having often interrupted him whilſt ſpeaking, when he had done, they all beſought him with many words, that he would alone undertake the Government, and by many Arguments compelled him at length to accept of the Soveraignty. Then that his Perſon might be preſerved, they preſently decreed the pay of his Guard to be double to that of other Soldiers.

Thereby confirmeth it.

27. Cæſar by this Artifice pretending that he would lay down his Power, effected that it was confirmed to him, by Senate and People. Yet that he might ſeem to be Popular, he ſaid, He would not govern all the Provinces, nor obtain perpetual Power over ſuch as he ſhould take care of; therefore the weaker, becauſe they were more quiet, he left to others: the moſt powerful which had appearance of moſt danger (having an Enemy near at hand, or likely to be turbulent) he kept himſelf, under pretence that the Fathers might enjoy their Power ſafely, and he himſelf undergo labour and dangers; but by this device he rendred the Senate really helpleſs, and weak, and engroſſed to himſelf the Militia. To the Senate and People was left Africk, Numidia, Aſia, Greece, with Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Sicily, Crete, Libya called Cyrenaica, Bithynia, with the neighbouring Pontus, Sardinia, Divideth the Provinces betwixt the Senate and himſelf.

dinia, and that part of Spain called Hiſpania Bætica. Cæſar kept the reſt of Spain, all Gall and Germany, as alſo Cœleſyria, Phœnicia, Cyprus, and Ægypt. Over theſe Provinces he aſſumed the Government but for ten years, within which time he undertook to reduce them into order, adding with a certain juvenile kind of boaſting, that as ſoon as ever he could quiet them, he would quit his Power. Then did he ſet over the Provinces of both ſorts, men of Patrician Dignity, but over Ægypt one of Equeſtrian rank only, for the cauſes above rehearſed. To Senators he allotted by themſelves Africk and Aſia, and the reſt of the Provinces to Prætorians. He forbad either to take this employment within five years after they had born Offices in the City. They held their Governments but for a year. And as ſoon as Succeſſors were ſent them, they were preſently to depart the Provinces, and not loiter in their return, but come to Rome within three months. The diſtribution of the Provinces was made on the Ides of January, as may be gathered from Ovid, who thought alſo that Cæſar Octavianus had the Sirname of Auguſtus given him the ſame day, which indeed was the fourth day after, as appeareth from Cenſorinus.

Sirnamed Auguſtus.

28. For, the Provinces being divided, and all things ſetled, it was debated in the Senate, whether he ought not to be called Romulus, becauſe he had founded the Empire; but the other more venerable name of Auguſtus, propounded by Munacius Plancus, at length ſeemed beſt; for, Sacred Places and Temples conſecrated by Augurs, the Romans termed Auguſta. Cæſar though he much deſired that of Romulus (ſaith Dio) yet perceiving he ſhould be ſuſpected of affecting the Kingdom, omitted it, and was ſirnamed Auguſtus, as greater than the Nature of Man could make him. For thoſe things are called Auguſta, which are moſt worthy of Honour, and moſt Sacred; wherefore the Greeks expreſs it by Σέϐαϛος, as if thou ſhouldeſt ſay Venerable. Thus Cæſar alone got the whole Power into his hands, having both Money (for though he had his own ſeparate from the Treaſury, yet did he uſe this at his pleaſure) and the Militia in his own hands. When his ten years were out other five, and when they were expired five more, and theſe ended, ten more, and ten more after them were added; ſo that he had his Authority ſtill continued for his life; for which cauſe his Succeſſors, though they had the Power ſetled on them for life, yet at the end of every ten years ſolemnized as it were the renewing of it. As ſoon as Cæſar had but made his Oration about reſigning his Command, and diſtributing the Provinces, many Honours were conferred on him, as that Laurel ſhould be planted before his Gates in the Palatium, and upon thoſe trees Oaken Garlands hung, as for him who was a perpetual Conqueror of Enemies, and Preſerver of Citizens. The Houſe of the Emperor alſo was wont afterwards to be called the Palatium or Palace; not for that it was ever ſo decreed; but becauſe Cæſar lived in the Palatium or Palatine hill, and there was his Prætorium; his Houſe alſo received ſome Dignity from the Mount it ſelf, becauſe Romulus there lived: therefore though the Emperor, ſaith the Hiſtorian, live elſewhere, yet is his Houſe called the Palatium or Palace. But after he had done thoſe things which he promiſed, then was he called Auguſtus by the Senate and People. From this day forward began the ſoveraign Power and Authority to be in the hands of one man, which the Greeks called Monarchy. Yet the Romans derived the Epoche of their Auguſti from the Kalends of January of this year, as Cenſorinus writeth, who compareth with the 265 year of this Æra, the 283 of the Julian ordination. This ſeventh Conſulſhip of Auguſtus Cæſar, and the beginning of his Monarchy, fell out in the 727 year of the City, the ſecond of the 188 Olympiad, the thirteenth of Herod the Great, 25 before the Birth of Chriſt, A. M. 3978, he himſelf, as it's ſaid, the ſeventh, and M. Vipſanius Agrippa the third time being Conſuls.

All Power of Senate and People transferred upon him.

Lib. 55. p. 517
A. M. 3978.
Ol. 188. an. 2.
V. C. 727.
Herodis 13.

29. On this manner all the power of the People and Senate was transferred upon Auguſtus, ſaith Dio. For this notable tranſlation and change in the Government there was a Law made, which is famous by the name of Lex Regia, after which it's convenient to make a little enquiry, for the better information of Students in this great affair. A Law may be ſo (and is ſo) called, either for that a King made, or preferred it, or becauſe it was made and enacted concerning a King or Kingly power. In the firſt ſence, ſuch Laws as were made by Romulus and his Succeſſors the ancient Kings of Rome, are by Lawyers called Leges Regiæ, whereof Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus hath recorded many, and of which ſeveral have been already mentioned in their due places; and in the (a) Code is yet extant a Law called Lex Regia, concerning the Burial of a woman with Child, ſo called, becauſe enacted by ſome ancient King. But in the later acceptation is to be underſtood this Law, whereby Regal (and that abſolute) Power was conferred upon Auguſtus by the Roman People. The Law it ſelf is not now extant in terms, nor exemplified in any Author ſtill remaining, yet it is mentioned by Juſtinian in his (b) Inſtitutions of Law, who there writeth (ſpeaking of ſeveral ſorts of Law) that what pleaſeth the Prince, hath the vigour of a Law; foraſmuch as by the Lex Regia, which was made concerning his Power, the People granted to him all its Command and Authority. In the (c) Pandects he alſo mentioneth it, well-nigh in theſe very words; in a third (d) place alſo expreſſing it to the ſame purpoſe, that by an ancient Law called Lex Regia, all the Right and all the Power of the Roman People was tranſlated into the Emperor's Authority: therefore it is otherwiſe called Lex Imperii, and Auguſtum privilegium. As for Commentators upon both Inſtitutions and Pandects, with other parts of the Civil Law, nothing is more acknowledged by them all, as they have occaſion.

(a) Tit. de mortuo inferendo l. 2.

By a Law called Lex Regia.

(b) Lib. 1. Tit. 2. de Jure Nat. &c.

(c) L. 1. Tit. de Conſtit. Principum.

(d) L. 1. ſect. cum itaque C. tit. de Vet. Jure Enucleando.

30. But as for the interpretation of this Law, ſome difference there hath been amongſt Expoſitors, who lived ſince the Civil Law was reſtored in the Weſt. For ſome there have been ever ſince that time, who rightly underſtood all manner of Power and Authority, to be ſo by the Roman People transferred upon the Prince by that Law, that they affirmed the People thereby deprived and made deſtitute of all Power and Authority. Others thought Power and Authority indeed was given to the Prince to make Laws, but ſo that by this conceſſion the power of the People was in no ſort diminiſhed, and the force of Plebiſcitum's and Senatuſconſultum's, as well future as paſt, was the ſame as formerly; ſo that Prince, People, Senate, and Commons, had equal Authority in this Matter: both theſe Opinions being held, as appeareth from Accurſius, Hoſtienſis, and others. But the later of them ſeemeth thence to have riſen, that they miſtook this Lex Regia (called alſo corruptly Lex Remnia) for the Hortenſian Law, or rather thence, as a late (a) learned Man judgeth, that the Profeſſors and Students of the Civil Law, which was newly reſtored, were fearful, leſt by aſſerting the true Power of the Emperors, they ſhould give offence to ſuch People and Cities, as then lived in a courſe contrary to ſuch a Prerogative, and thereby injure their newly reſtored Profeſſion. And hence might that moſt known Controverſie ariſe, concerning the Power of the Prince, from this Law, betwixt the Martinians and Bulgarians. But as for that conceit about the Hortenſian Law, it was enacted by Q. Hortenſius the Dictator, in the 468 year of the City (not the 422, as that ſame learned Man hath it) and the 284 (not the 330) before the Birth of Chriſt, upon the third ſeparation of the Commons, and 259 before the enacting of the Regal Law. The purport of it was, that all Quirites or Romans ſhould be bound by the Plebiſcita, or the Decrees of the People. Hence, as we formerly obſerved out of Pomponius, concerning the Original of the Roman Laws, the Authority of making Laws was the ſame, though the faſhions differed, although the ſame thing in effect, was done long before the Hortenſian Law, viz. by L. Valerius and * M. Horatius the Conſuls, who got it enacted by a Law in the Centuriata Comitia, that what the Commons reſolved on in their Tribes, or Tributa Comitia, ſaith Livy, but in their Curiæ or Curiata Comitia, ſaith Dionyſius, ſhould bind the whole People; which thing we having formerly omitted in its own place, here ſupply, having yet * obſerved, that a Law was alſo preferred by Q. Publius Philo the Dictator, 111 years after the other, to the ſame purpoſe, and 211 before the Lex Regia.

A different manner of expounding it.

The Reaſon.

(a) Joh. Seldenus in Fletam Diſſert. cap. 3. ſect. 3.

* V. C. 305.

* Lib. 2. c. 4. ſect. 2. par. 46.

31. Now ſtrange it is, that Accurſius and others, ſhould wreſt any thing of the Hortenſian Law, and apply it to the Lex Regia, or rather make them all one, as he doth, expounding the Regia thus; ſcil. lata ab Hortenſio mirabili Oratore, although he acknowledgeth, as neceſſarily he muſt, that the Hortenſian Law made only expreſs mention of the Power of Senate and Commons. It's not eaſie to gueſs what he meant by ſo ſtrange a conceit; but this interpretation is made of it by * one as able to judge as any, that as the Hortenſian Law concerning Regal Right, that is, the Right of Regiment or Government, gave to the People and Senate (of which two orders or eſtates then the Roman Body politick conſiſted) equal Power and Authority; ſo when the Prince came to be joyned as a third party, in like manner an equal Power ſhould be granted to him, as to the other two, and that from the ſence of the ſame Law. And thoſe of this opinion interpret Juſtinian (who ſaith concerning the Plebiſcita, that from the Hortenſian Law they began to be of no leſs value than Laws, and alſo the ſame of the Senatuſconſulta, that becauſe the People was ſo increaſed, that it could not eaſily meet together gether for making of Laws, that therefore the Senate was conſulted) as though the ſame Power remained to Senate and People ſtill under the Emperors as before. They ſtrangely diſputed alſo, whether the Power ſo granted by the People to the Emperor, might not be revoked, as that which is given to Delegates from the Delegators. And this is all that can be imagined, as meant by thoſe Men concerning the Hortenſian Law, as to the ſubject in hand, though it be ſtrangely wreſted to their deſign, and maketh nothing for their purpoſe.

* Seldenus ubi ſupra.

The Hortenſian Law ſtrangely wreſted by ſome.

But in vain.

32. For nothing is more certain than the former opinion, viz. that the people by the Lex Regia were wholly deprived of all Power and Authority in making Laws. This is clear from the words of Juſtinian formerly cited, which clearly ſignifie that the whole Power and Authority of People and Senate was transferred upon, and yielded or granted to the Emperors by this Law. And he (a) elſewhere declareth, that his ſentence ſtandeth for Law, and bindeth all under his command, which indeed the very compoſing of the body of Law, as from him it is tranſmitted to us, ſufficiently demonſtrateth, wherein he by his ſole Authority repealeth what he pleaſeth, and enacteth anew what ſeemeth good to him, without interpoſition of any other Authority; which he could not have done (nor his Predeceſſors) as to the Plebiſcita and Senatuſconſulta, though he might as to the Principales Conſtitutiones, except he had had that Power which formerly belonged to People and Senate, and they were deveſted of all. (b) Conſtantine challengeth to himſelf alone Authority to judge betwixt Law and Equity. Ulpian wrote, that all the Power and Authority which they had, the People placed upon, and in the Emperor, by the Lex Regia, and the moſt learned, and accurate (c) Expoſitors of more later times agree with him herein, rejecting the Hortenſian Law utterly, as having any thing to do in this matter of the Regal Law. In the Lateran Palace at Rome, or the Capitol, is extant (d) a Table of Braſs, wherein is to be ſeen a fragment of this Law renewed, as to Veſpaſian, confirming many things of Soveraign, and ſole Authority, as deſcending upon him from his Predeceſſors, and enacting, that what he had done, decreed, or commanded, before this ratification, ſhould be held and taken for as good Law, as if the People it ſelf had done, decreed, or commanded it. For, though he might make uſe of this Ratification, yet his right was as ſtrong before; there being no ſuch cuſtom as ſome have thought, that particular Princes had particular and ſeveral Laws made for their Authority, that one for Auguſtus reſpecting himſelf, and Succeſſors, as is clear from Juſtinian, who never mentioneth any other, nor ſpeaketh in the plural number.

For the whole power of people and Senate was given up by the Lex Regia to the Emperor.

33. If we fetch an explanation of the Lex Regia from Hiſtorians, we ſhall find that though they mention it not in words, yet they give that Supream and abſolute Power to Auguſtus, which deveſteth the Senate and People of all Legiſlative Authority, and ſheweth that his command (and that of his Succeſſors) was as large as could be transferred upon a Prince that was to govern perſons of free condition without Tyranny. Suetonius ſaith, that he received perpetual Tribunitial power (which could obſtruct all proceedings of Senate and People) and perpetual regiment of Manners, and of the Laws. Dio ſaith expreſly, that * all the power of People and Senate was transferred upon him; and that all things were managed meerly as the Emperor pleaſed, though all other Magiſtrates, except the Cenſors were preſerved. And that the Emperors may appear to have ſo great Power, ſaith he, not by force but from the Laws; all things which under the Popular Government were of greateſt force (and that by Univerſal conſent) together with the names, they take upon them, except Dictatorſhip. For they are often Conſuls, and when without the Pomærium, are called Proconſuls; and they bear the name of Imperator, (not only ſuch as have obtained victories, but all of them) to ſignifie their plenary and abſolute power; in the room of King and Dictator, which being taken away they never aſſume, but confirm the force and matter of them by the title of Emperor. Accordingly they have the power of raiſing Men and Money, making War and Peace, commanding all things effectually, both at home and abroad, putting to death Equites and Senators, even within the Pomærium, and doing all other things, which a Conſul and other Magiſtrates, who had abſolute power, might do. As Cenſors alſo they have Authority to inquire into our life and Manners, to make the Cenſus, admit perſons into the Equeſtrian or Senatorian rank, and remove thence according to their pleaſure. And in as much as they are inaugurate in all Prieſthoods, admit Prieſts into the Colleges, and ever one of them (if there be two or three Emperors at one time) is Chief Prieſt, it is that they may have all religious things and ſacred in their own hands. As for the Tribunitial power, which every eminent Emperor was

Hiſtorians ſhew it.

wont

(a) L. 12. C. tit. de Legibus, &c.

(b) C. Tit. de Legib. l. 1.

(c) Conſule inter alios Franciſc. de Amaya obſ. l. 1. c. 1.

(d) Inſcript. Gruteri p. 142. & Urſinus Notis ad Leges & Senatusconſulta.

* Οὕτω μὲν δὴ τό τε τοῦ δήμου καὶ τὸ τῆς γερουσίας κράτος πᾶν ἐς τὸν Αὔγουστον μετέστη.

wont to have, it inableth them to interpoſe againſt any thing that may be done contrary to their pleaſure, and they are thereby Sacroſanct, or Inviolable, ſo that if any one injure them by the leaſt, not only deed, but word, they may put him to death without proceſs as Piacularly Criminal. The Emperors count it unlawful to be Tribunes, becauſe they are Patricians, but they receive Tribunitial power as large as ever any enjoyed; and as renewing it yearly with the annual Tribunes, the years of their reign or power, are counted accordingly. Theſe things, as they were eſtabliſhed in the Popular Government, do the Emperors, together with the names, take unto them, that they may appear to have nothing but what was freely conferred on them.

34. But they have another privilege (ſo Dio proceedeth) which never was univerſally granted to any Roman. For the Emperors are looſed from the Laws; by which thing alone, liberty is given them to do thoſe which we have related, and all other things. After this manner, with theſe names which were uſed in the Popular State, they receive all the power of the whole Commonwealth, and the Kingly alſo, ſhunning only the name. For, the titles of Cæſar and Auguſtus add nothing of peculiar power unto them: but the one ſignifieth the ſucceſſion, and the other the ſplendor of their Dignity. As for the name of Fathers, though it giveth them ſuch right over their ſubjects, as Parents have over Children; yet at firſt it was given only for honour, and to admoniſh them to hold their Subjects as dear as Children, and theſe them as Parents. Theſe are the titles which the Emperors according to the Laws and Cuſtoms uſe even in our days and in our age, all theſe are at the ſame time given to them, except that of Cenſor; but in times paſt they were ſeverally according to the Laws decreed to them. The name alſo of Cenſor, ſome of them according to the ancient cuſtom have received, and Domitian bore it all his life; but now it is not ſo. For, the Emperors of our time having the thing it ſelf, are neither choſen to the Cenſorſhip, nor bear the name of the Office, except during the Cenſus. *But * thus the Commonwealth was changed into a better form and order; for it was utterly impoſſible it ſhould ſubſiſt under the power of the people.* Thus far Dio, excellently, according to his cuſtom of relating the principal matters of State. It clearly appeareth from him, how abſolute the Power of the Emperors was, and how without any co-ordinate Power of People or Senate in any reſpect. The main of their Authority lay in the title of Imperator; aſſiſted by the Tribunitial Power, which two, (nay the former of them) make good our Expoſition of the Lex Regia, without the other titles which they might take upon them for popularity, and to prevent the pretences of others, though their Authority was large, and ſtrong enough without them. Our Author concludeth this diſcourſe with an Atteſtation to that Truth we formerly aſſerted againſt Agrippa.

* Ἡ μὲν οὖν πολιτεία οὕτω τότε πρός τε τὸ βέλτιον καὶ πρὸς τὸ σωτηριωδέστερον μετεκοσμήθη, καὶ γάρ που καὶ παντάπασιν ἀδύνατον ἦν δημοκρατουμένους αὐτοὺς σωθῆναι.

Dio lib. 53. pag. 510.

35. The ſame night that Cæſar received the ſirname of Auguſtus, a conſiderable ſign (as it was accounted) of his confirmation hapned. For Tiber ſo overflowed, that all the lower parts of Rome were Navigable, which the Fortune-tellers interpreted to ſignifie his great advancement, and that he ſhould have the whole City in his power. Now many ſought to flatter him, but the indeavours of Sextus Pacuvius (or Apudius) exceeded all, who being Tribune of the People, after the cuſtom of the Spaniards, conſecrated himſelf to him, and cauſed others to do ſo. Having now obtained the Government by conſent of the People, he ſet himſelf more effectually to look after it, and made ſeveral Laws. Yet did he not all on his own head, but propounded many things to be debated in publick, that if any were diſpleaſed he might amend them: he deſired all, freely, and openly, to deliver their opinions; and being moved by their reaſons changed ſomething: but he eſpecially deſired to be adviſed by the Conſuls, or his Collegue, if he himſelf bore that Office. Of the other Magiſtrates he made choice of one out of each ſort, and out of the Senate fifteen choſen by lot, who were for ſix Months to be his Counſellors; that hereby he might ſeem to communicate his deſigns to the reſt. Some things he brought down to the whole Senate; but he thought it fitter to conſult with a few perſons at leiſure about the greateſt affairs. He called alſo theſe men ſometimes to decide cauſes: although the Senate ſtill heard certain matters, and gave anſwer to the Ambaſſadors of Kings and States as formerly. Although the Comitia, or Aſſemblies of the People were ſometimes held, yet nothing was done but according to the pleaſure of Auguſtus. He partly named Magiſtrates, and left others to be created by the People; only taking care that no unworthy perſons by indirect practices advanced themſelves. This was the general courſe of Auguſtus his adminiſtration, ſaith Dio.

The general courſe of Auguſtus his adminiſtration.

36. The

Dio lib. 53. p. 511.

Auguſtus repaireth the Via Flaminia.

36. This ſame year, perceiving the High-ways lying out of the City to have been for ſome time neglected, and thereupon travelling to be very troubleſom, he left the reſt to be repaired by certain Senators at their own charge, and he himſelf took care of Flaminia; becauſe upon it he was to draw forth his Armies. And it was preſently repaired, and for that work performed, Statues were erected to him on the Bridge of Tiber, and at Ariminum. The reſt indeed were mended afterwards, but the Senators were not haſty to do it at their own coſt, and whether the Expence was defrayed by Auguſtus himſelf, or the Publick Treaſury, our Author cannot well tell; for he and his Succeſſors ſeemed to have had the ſame Treaſury with the State it ſelf; and therefore it could not eaſily be diſcerned; but ſometimes the one happened, and ſometimes the other. Alſo Debts and Donations ſeemed common to him and the People. Theſe things diſpatched, he led away his Army from the City, with purpoſe to transfer the War hither into Britain; but coming into Gall, there he was ſtopped by the fair words of the Britiſh Ambaſſadors, and the Diſorders he found in that Country, which were wont to be followed by Civil Wars. He made a Cenſus of the Inhabitants, took order for Matters of Publick concernment, and for reformation of Manners: And thence he paſſed into Spain, and ſetled that Province.

Auguſto 8. & Statilio Tauro Coſs.

Cornelius Gallus his folly and Ruin.

37. For the following year, Auguſtus the eighth time bore the Conſulſhip with Statilius Taurus. Agrippa by ſeveral publick Works got himſelf Reputation, and the love of the People; while Cornelius Gallus by a contrary courſe of Actions incurred Odium, and procured his own Deſtruction. He was ſo ingrateful to Auguſtus, that many things he tatled againſt him, and many horrid things he did; and yet he cauſed Statues to be erected to himſelf, almoſt through Ægypt, and his Acts to be inſcribed upon the Pyramids. Of theſe things being accuſed by Largus, who had been his Companion, he was noted with Infamy by Auguſtus, and prohibited to inhabit in his Provinces. After this, others alſo fell upon him, and laid ſuch Crimes to his charge, that the Senate condemned him to Baniſhment, his Eſtate to be forfeited to the Emperor, and for this, Sacrifice was offered by the Fathers; but he overcome with Sorrow, prevented the Condemnation by a voluntary Death: Such end had Gallus by his Folly, whom when thoſe that were formerly his Acquaintance and Flatterers ſaw falling, they contributed to his Ruin with all their might. As for Largus, Dio tells a Story how one Proculeius meeting him, ſtopped his Noſe and Mouth with his hand, thereby ſignifying to the byſtanders, that it was unſafe to breath in his preſence. Another went to him and took Witneſſes that he was utterly unknown to him, which Largus confeſſing, he cauſed it to be written down, as now ſecure, that being unknown to a Knave, he could not load him with any Calumnies. However the Example of Gallus gave not ſuch warning as to cauſe all men to abſtain from intemperate Speeches.

Nations of Spain Rebel, and are reduced.

38. This ſame year, Polemo King of Pontus was received amongſt the Allies and Confederates of the Roman People, and Senators had the firſt Seats in the Theatres alotted to them throughout his Kingdom. For all the good words lately given Auguſtus by the Britiſh Ambaſſadors, there was nothing yet agreed on, and therefore he now thought of an Expedition hither, but was ſtopped by the Rebellion of the Salaſſi, Cantabri and Aſtures, whereof the former lived under the Alps, and the other two Nations inhabited the Champian of Spain, as far as the Pyreneans, the moſt fortified places of which they held. Auguſtus now having entered his Ninth Conſulſhip with M. Silanus, ſent Terentius Varro againſt the Salaſſi, who eaſily overcame and forced them to receive Conditions. He required of them a certain Sum of Money, and pretended to nothing elſe, but ſending his Soldiers all over to Collect it, he ſeized by that means upon all the youth, and ſold them on theſe terms, that they ſhould none of them be free before the twentieth year. The beſt part of their Land was beſtowed on the Prætorian Cohorts, and a City new built, on which was impoſed the Name of Auguſta Prætorianorum. The War againſt the Aſtures and Cantabri, Auguſtus himſelf undertook, and they being inferior in Number and ſtrength, plaid leaſt in fight, and took their Advantages upon the Mountains, which ſo perplexed him, that he fell ſick upon it, and giving over the Proſecution of the War to C. Antiſtius betook himſelf to Tarracon. And Antiſtius well behaved himſelf, and brought the War to an iſſue, not for that he was himſelf a more able Soldier than Auguſtus; but becauſe they deſpiſed him, gave him Battel, and preſented him with Opportunities to overcome them. The War being ended, he diſmiſſed the Emerit Soldiers, and Commanded them to found a City in Luſitania, by the Name of Auguſta Emerita. And this we muſt not forget, that while he lay at Tarracon diſcontented at his own ill ſucceſs, yet at the ſame time he received great Honor from the other Ends of the World. For having begun there his Ninth Conſulſhip, Ambaſſadors came to him out of India, ſent by King Pandion, to whom other Writers adde others from the Scythians, Garamantes and Bactrians.

Ambaſſadors out of India and other Parts.

39. To Juba in ſtead of his Father's Kingdom, he now gave certain Regions of Getulia, moſt of which were reduced to Roman Cuſtoms; as alſo certain Countries of Bocchus and Bogudes. Amyntas being dead, he did not deliver over his Kingdom to his Sons, but made it a Province, and thenceforth Galatia, together with Lycaonia, began to have a Roman Præfect; and the Towns of Pamphilia formerly ſubject to Amyntas, were reſtored to their liberty. About this time M. Vinicius by Defeating and Puniſhing ſome Germans who had killed certain Romans that came into their Country to Traffick, obtained alſo for Auguſtus the Title of Imperator; and for this and other Atchievments, Triumphs were decreed to him, which he refuſed. Yet upon the Alps was erected a Triumphal Arch, and Power was given to all to wear Garlands, and the Triumphal Garments. Having finiſhed theſe Wars after this manner, he ſhut again the Temple of Janus, which had been opened upon account of them. Agrippa at the ſame time adorned the City with ſeveral Works at his own proper charge, and amongſt the reſt he perfected the Pantheon. Dio tells us, that perhaps it was ſo called becauſe it received the Images of many gods in thoſe of Mars and Venus; but he rather thinks it took that Name from its arched Roof, whereby it reſembled Heaven. Agrippa would have placed in it the Statue of Auguſtus, and put his Name to the Work; but he refuſing as well the one as the other, he put that of Cæſar deceaſed within the Pantheon, and thoſe of Auguſtus and himſelf in the Porch or Entry. All this proceeding from kindneſs to him, and love to his Country, Auguſtus took well, and honored him upon occaſion for it. Being ſick, and not in a condition to celebrate the Marriage of his Daughter Julia with Marcellus his Siſter's Son, he procured him to do it at Rome in his Abſence. And the Houſe upon the Palatine Hill being burnt which formerly had belonged to Antonius; but ſince had been granted to Meſſala and Agrippa; he beſtowed Money on Meſſala, but received Agrippa into his own Houſe.

Galatia hath a Roman Governor.

The Temple of Janus ſhut again.

Pantheon whence ſo called.

40. Auguſtus being Conſul the tenth time with Norbanus, on the Calends of January, the Senate by Oath approved his Acts; and now being on his way to the City, whence he had been deteined long by Sickneſs, and having promiſed a Donative of an hundred Denarii to every man, but denied to pay it till the Senate ſhould conſent, and the Fathers freed him from the neceſſity of Laws, ſo as being of full Power, he might do all things according to his own will. After his return other things were done to honor him. It was decreed that Marcellus ſhould have place in the Senate amongſt thoſe of Prætorian Rank, and might ſtand for the Conſulſhip ten years ſooner than it was permitted by the Laws. And in favour of Tiberius, it was ordained that he might ſtand for any Office of Magiſtracy five years before the time; and ſhortly after the one was made Quæſtor, and the other Ædilis. Now for theſe two Perſons thus honoured, we have ſeen who this Marcellus was, and muſt inquire after Tiberius. We muſt know then that the firſt Wife of Auguſtus was Scribonia, which had been Married to two Perſons of Conſular Dignity, and by one was a Mother; for as for the Daughter of Servilius Iſauricus, he was only contracted to her when young; and Claudia the Daughter of P. Clodius by Fulvia, though he Married her, yet he diſmiſſed her untouched. By Scribonia he had a Daughter called Julia, and ſhortly after Divorced her for the perverſity of her Manners, as he wrote. Then did Nero, who had followed L. Antonius to Peruſium, but afterward was reconciled, freely yield unto him Livia Druſilla; though he had one Son already by her, which was this Tiberius, and ſhe was big with another; who being born three months after ſhe had Married Cæſar, was called Druſus. By Livia he had no Children but Abortive. His Daughter Julia, as we ſaid, he Married to Marcellus, the Son of his Siſter Octavia.

Auguſto 10. & Norbano Coſs.

Auguſtus honored by the Senate.

His Wives.

Sueton in Octavio. C. 62, 63.

His Daughter Julia.

41. The Cantabri and Aſtures preſently after the departure of Auguſtus, rebelled, and were preſently after reduced to obedience to their Coſt. And Arabia the Happy was invaded by Ælius Gallus, having then Sabos for its King, by order from Auguſtus, that if the Arabians let him paſs, he ſhould agree with them, but make War upon them if they uſed any force or violence. At firſt, none appeared to make any oppoſition; but it proved a very tedious and troubleſom Journey, Arabia invaded by Ælius Gallus.

by

A grievous Diſeaſe waſtes the Army.

by the Treachery of Syllæus the chief Miniſter of Obodes, King of the Nabatheans, who had taken upon him to Conduct Gallus. Beſides, the Deſert, the heat of the Sun, and the badneſs of the Water, ſo afflicted the Soldiers, that the greateſt part of the Army miſcarried. This Diſeaſe being like to none of thoſe that were then known, lay in the Head; and, as Dio deſcribes it, that part being dried, deſtroyed many out of hand; and in ſuch as eſcaped Death, it ran through the whole Body into the Feet, and there ſo held them, that no Remedy would give them eaſe, except they drank Wine and Oil mingled together, and therewith anointed themſelves, which only very few could do, neither of the Ingredients growing there, nor being brought along by the Romans. By the Aſſiſtance of this Diſeaſe, the Barbarians recovered ſuch Towns as had been taken from them, and expelled ſuch as remained alive out of the Country. However in the Opinion of ſome, he did extraordinarily well, and had well ſucceded, but that he was betrayed by Syllæus. But Dio tells us, that theſe were the firſt, and he thinks the laſt of the Romans that proceeded ſo far in Arabia in an hoſtile manner, peircing as far as Athlula (or Athrula) a famous City.

Anno V.C. 731. Auguſto 11. & Calpurnio Piſone Coss.

Auguſtus recovers from a dangerous Sickneſs.

In which he named no Succeſſor.

Marcellus and Agrippa diſagree.

C. 66.

42. The following year, being the DCCXXXI of Rome, had for Conſuls, Auguſtus the eleventh time, and Calpurnius Piſo. Auguſtus fell ſo grievouſly Sick, that no hope there was of his Recovery, and therefore he diſpoſed of all things, as being to leave the World. Calling to him the Magiſtrates, and the chief of Senators and Equites, he named no man his Succeſſor, though all imagined it would have been Marcellus; but having ſpoken his Mind concerning ſome points, he delivered to Piſo a Book, wherein he had made a Catalogue of the Armies, and Publick Revenues; and his Ring to Agrippa. But when nothing he could uſe would relieve him, Antonius Muſa, by cooling Baths and Potions; reſtored him to Health; for which he had much Money given him, both by Auguſtus, and the Senate, as alſo the uſe of a Gold Ring (for he was but a Libertus or Freedman) and Immunity was granted not only to him, but to all of his Profeſſion for the time to come. But that it might appear that this Muſa arrogated to himſelf what was the work of fate and fortune, it happened not long after that Marcellus falling Sick, and ordered by him after the ſame manner, died under his hands, and had a publick Funeral, with other Honours. But Cæſar being recovered, brought the Teſtament he had made into the Senate, and would have ſhown it to the World, that he had deſigned no Succeſſor; but the whole Aſſembly was againſt the reading of it. However, it cauſed great wonder in all men, that he ſhould not name Marcellus his Nephew, and Son-in-law, whom he ſo tenderly loved, and honored, eſpecially in the diſcharge of his Office of Ædilis; but that before him he ſhould rather prefer Agrippa. But he could not truſt to the young years of Marcellus; and he had a mind either that the People ſhould recover its liberty, or to prefer Agrippa to the Supreme Power, whom, though he knew to be extraordinarily beloved; yet he himſelf would not advance him. Being recovered, he found that Marcellus was diſpleaſed with Agrippa, and therefore to prevent all quarrels and contentions betwixt them, he ſent away Agrippa for Syria. Yet he went not into Syria himſelf, but ſtill uſing more Moderation, ſent thither his Legates and ſtaid at Lesbos. Thus writes Dio of his Moderation; whereas Suetonius accuſeth him of Paſſion, and commends Auguſtus for bearing with him, in that being moved with a light ſuſpicion of Rigour, and becauſe Marcellus was preferred before him, he left all, and went to Mitylene, in the Iſle of Lesbos. By this it appears that the diſſatisfaction of theſe two Perſons was mutual, and that Auguſtus had much ado to pleaſe them both.

The generoſity of Auguſtus.

43. Now he made only ten Prætors, becauſe he had no need of more, and theſe to hold for ſeveral years. Then did he retire, and reſigned the Conſulſhip; for both he and others, having ſince the ſettlement of the State, held that Dignity an whole year, he would have the courſe altered, that many might injoy it; and therefore he went out of the City, that he might not be hindered from laying it down. This was very much commended in him, as alſo that he ſubrogated in his place L. Seſtius, a Perſon that had always favoured the cauſe of Brutus, had aſſiſted him throughout the War, ſtill reverenced his Memory, kept his Images, and was ſo bold as to commend him; but Auguſtus not only not hated, but honoured him for his Friendſhip and Fidelity. The Senate affected with theſe his Actions, in way of acknowledgment, decreed that he ſhould be Tribunus Plebis for life; that as often as the Senate met, he might report matters, though he was not Conſul; that he ſhould always enjoy Pro-Conſular Power, neither ſhould he lay it down when he came into the City, or have any need to renew it; nay, that he ſhould have greater Power in the Provinces, than the Governors themſelves. Thence came it to paſs that he and his Succeſſors, as by a certain Law, injoyed the Tribunitial, and the other Powers. For as to the Name it ſelf, neither Auguſtus, nor any other bore that of Tribunus Plebis. And Dio verily believed that the Fathers did not do this out of Flattery, but in Sincerity; for he dealt with them in all reſpects as free perſons. So when Tiridates himſelf, and Ambaſſadors, came from Phraates for compoſing their Differences, he introduced them into the Senate, and the hearing of the Cauſe being committed to him, he would not deliver up Tiridates to Phraates; yet the Son of Phraates whom he had formerly received, he ſent back, that in exchange he might have the Captives and Military Enſigns returned, which were taken in the Overthrows of Craſſus and Antony. This ſame year, a certain Ædilis Plebis dying, C. Calpurnius ſucceeded him, who had been Ædilis Curulis; ſuch a thing as never before had been heard of. In the Feriæ, there were every day two Præfects of the City, whereof one had not attained to ripeneſs of Age. The death of Marcellus by ſome was imputed to Livia, who could not endure he ſhould be preferred before her own Sons; yet the Sicklineſs of the year rendred it doubtful, by which a great multitude was ſwept away. This our Author thinks was betokened by a Wolf found in the City, by Fire, and Tempeſt, and the overflowing of Tiber to ſuch an height that the Bridge called Pons Sublicius was born down, and Rome continued Navigable for three days.

More Honours decreed to him.

44. The next year, had for Conſuls M. Marcellus, and L. Aruntius, accompanied with ſo many diſcouraging Accidents, and ſo great a Plague, that the Grounds in Italy were left untilled. The Romans grieved with both Plague and Famine, imagined they proceeded from no other cauſe, than that they had not this year alſo Auguſtus for Conſul. Therefore they required that he ſhould be made Dictator, and kept the Senate ſo long in the Court, till they decreed it; threatning elſe to ſet it on fire. They repaired to Auguſtus, with four and twenty Faſces, beſeeching him to accept the Dictatorſhip, and to ſuffer himſelf to be made Procurator of Proviſions, as formerly Pompey had been. Though unwilling, he accepcepted of the laſt Imployment, and cauſed for every year two Perſons to be choſen, who had five years before diſcharged the Prætorſhip, to diſtribute the Corn. But he would by no means admit of the Dictatorſhip, and when he could no other way reſtrain the People, he tore his Robe, being ſo wiſe as to decline the Odium and Envy, when he had already both the Honour and Power that was larger than that which they offered to him. He made the ſame refuſal when they would needs create him perpetual Cenſor; for he would neither accept of that Honour, but named two Cenſors, which were Paulus Æmilius Lepidus, and L. Munatius Plancus. And theſe were the laſt Cenſors of private men, which now alſo Dio ſaith, was predicted to them. For, their Tribunal the firſt day they entred their Office, fell down, and was broken; and thenceforth were no Cenſors created like unto them. And though they bore the Office, yet did Auguſtus do many things belonging to it. Some Meetings he took quite away, and others he Reformed. He required the Prætors to take care of the Celebration of all Games; yet ſo that ſomthing ſhould be allowed them by the People. But by an Edict ordained that none ſhould in particular beſtow more upon them than others did; as alſo that without Command of the Senate, none ſhould exhibit the ſhow of Gladiators; nor oftner than twice in one year, nor more Gladiators than one hundred and twenty.

He ſtill refuſeth them.

The laſt Cenſors of private Men.

45. To the Ædiles Curules he committed the charge of Extinguiſhing Fires, allowing them ſix hundred Slaves for that Service. And becauſe that Equites, and many Illuſtrious Women danced in the Orcheſtra, he forbad not only that the Children of Senators, which already had been Prohibited, but their Grandchildren, and thoſe of the Equeſtrian Order, ſhould do it for the future. In theſe matters he carried himſelf like a Legiſlator, and an Emperor; but in other things he ſo far humbled himſelf, as even to plead for ſome of his Friends that were called to anſwer. So it happened, that a Day was aſſigned to one M. Primus to give an Accompt, who being Governor of Macedonia, had made War upon the Odryſi: He pleading ſomtimes that he did it by order from Auguſtus, and otherwhiles from Marcellus; Auguſtus, without ſending for, came into Court, and being asked by the Prætor, whether he had ordered him to make War, denyed it. Hereupon did Licinius Murena, who undertook the defence of Primus, revile revile him, and demanded of him what he did there, and who called him thither; to which he anſwered, That it was the Commonwealth. This took ſo with thoſe of ſounder Judgments, that they commended him for it, and gave him leave to aſſemble the Senate as often as he pleaſed; but others had ill thoughts of him, and ſome there were who not only acquitted Primus, but conſpired againſt Auguſtus. The Ringleader of them was Fannius Cæpio, and Murena was, whether truly or falſly, accounted Guilty, who had indeed a very intemperate Tongue, and would uſe it againſt any one, even to the uneaſineſs of the Hearers. Theſe abſenting themſelves were Baniſhed, and a little after put to Death, Murena receiving no relief from Proculius his Brother, nor from Mecænas the Husband of his Siſter, though in great eſteem with Auguſtus. However, theſe Conſpirators were abſolved by the Votes of ſome of the Judges, which cauſed him to make a Law, that none ſhould ſecretly give Sentence in behalf of thoſe Criminals that did not appear, but that all ſuch ſhould be Condemned without hearing. And he ſhewed that he did it for the publick good, and not thereunto incited by Paſſion. The Father of Cæpio manumitted one of thoſe Slaves, who fled away with his Son, becauſe he aſſiſted him to his power when he was ſeized; and another for that he betrayed his Maſter, he cauſed to be led through the Town, with a Writing which expreſſed the cauſe of his Puniſhment, and to be nailed to a Croſs. This Auguſtus did not take in any evil part.

Auguſtus his Condeſcentions.

Conſpirators againſt him puniſhed.

46. At this ſame time he reſtored to the People Cyprus, and Gallia Narbonenſis, as not needing the Protection of his Arms, and thenceforth Proconſuls began to be ſent into thoſe Provinces. Now alſo did he Dedicate a Temple to Jupiter the Thunderer; and the Cantabri and Aſtures about this time Rebelled, the latter being provoked by the Inſolence and Cruelty of Cariſius, and the former by their Example. They were quickly reduced, the greateſt part of the Cantabri killing themſelves, as not enduring to outlive their Liberty. At the ſame time the Æthiopians that inhabited about Ægypt, under Conduct of their Queen Candace, waſted all Regions as far as the City Elephantina, where when they heard that C. Petronius the Governor of Ægypt was coming againſt them, they indeavoured to make a Retreat, but were found out and Defeated by him; and upon this occaſion he was drawn into their Country. There did he order his Affairs very well, taking, amongſt others, the Royal City Tanape, which having Demoliſhed, and a Garriſon left in another place, he retreated with the greateſt part of his Army; being not able to proceed for the heat and ſand, nor having convenience there to ſtay with all his Forces: yet hearing that the Æthiopians, whom he had left in Garriſon, were Attacqued, he returned and relieved them, and conſtrained Candace to receive terms of an Accomodation. While theſe things paſſed, Auguſtus went into Sicily, to ſettle Affairs there; and thence to paſs into all Provinces, as far as Syria, and do the like.

Petronius peirceth into Æthiopia.

47. He being abſent, the People of Rome fell into Tumult, upon Creation of the new Conſuls, and thereby ſhowed that the Commonwealth could not continue under Popular Government. One place of the Conſulſhip was reſerved for Auguſtus, and M. Lœlius bore alone the title at the beginning of the year. When he had declared his refuſal, Q. Lepidus, and L. Silanus became Candidates, and uſed ſuch means to compaſs their Ends, that wiſe men deſired that the Emperor would return to Rome. Yet did he not return, but ſending for the Candidates, rebuked them for their Extravagant ſeeking of Voices, and Commanded them both to be abſent from the Election. But this did little good, it procured not more orderly or quiet proceedings, ſo that very difficultly, at laſt was Lepidus created Conſul. Hereat Auguſtus was much diſturbed, and it not being poſſible that he ſhould always be at the City, he found a Neceſſity of making a Governor to prevent theſe Diſorders. Agrippa he thought the fitteſt man, and to gain him more awe and Authority, he cauſed him to Divorce his Wife, though ſhe was his Siſter's Daughter, and to Marry Julia, and he ſent him preſently thither to conſummate the Marriage, and take the Government. Amongſt other Arguments which ſuggeſted to him this courſe, the ſaying of Mecænas, moved him, who being conſulted about this Affair, gave this Anſwer, That he had already made Agrippa ſo great, that there was neceſſity he ſhould be his Son in Law, or be taken away by Death. Agrippa compoſed the Diſorders in the City, and baniſhed out of it the Ægyptian Rites and Ceremonies, which again had crept into it, forbidding by an Edict, that they ſhould be celebrated within half a Mile. But he could not appeaſe the Tumult about making a Præfect of the place for the Feſtivals; and ſo the year paſs'd over without that Officer.

The People of Rome fall into Sedition.

Agrippa is made Governor of Rome, and Marries Julia.

48. Auguſtus

Auguſtus Travelleth Eaſtward.

His Acts while abroad.

48. Auguſtus having ſetled Matters in Sicily, where he made Syracuſe and other Cities, Roman Colonies, paſſed over into Greece. There he beſtowed Citheræ on the Lacedæmonians, and honoured them with his Company, becauſe they had harboured Livia with her Husband and Son when they fled out of Italy. Some reported, that he took Ægina and Eretria from the Athenians, becauſe they had favoured the Cauſe of Antony, and Commanded them to admit of none to be Citizens for Money. From Greece he ſailed to Samus, and there wintered. In Spring, when M. Apuleius and P. Silius were Conſuls, he paſſed over into Aſia, and ſetled Matters in Bithynia, and other Provinces he paſſed through, with no leſs care, than if they had belonged to himſelf, and not to the People. Remarkable it is, that he condemned thoſe of Cyzicus to ſlavery, becauſe they had Whipped, and put to Death ſome Roman Citizens, and in Syria he inflicted the ſame Puniſhment upon the Tyrians, and Sidonians for their Faction. In the mean time, Phraates having performed nothing of what he was obliged to by Agreement, now fearing that Auguſtus would be upon him, ſent to him the Military Enſigns, and all Captives, ſome few excepted, who out of ſhame killed themſelves, or lurked about in Parthia, and he received them with the ſame apprehenſions, as if he had overthrown the Parthians in War. Having recovered theſe things without bloodſhed, upon that account he both cauſed Sacrifices to be offered, and Commanded that a Temple ſhould be decreed in the Capitol to Mars the Avenger (in imitation of that of Jupiter Feretrius) in which, Military Enſigns might be hung up. This he afterward finiſhed, and rode on Horſeback in way of Triumph into the City, and was honoured with a Triumphal Arch; Being conſtituted Curator of the ways about Rome, he cauſed to be made the Milliarium Aureum, and appointed Perſons of Prætorian Rank, Overſeers of the ways, who were attended with two Lictors apiece. At the ſame time Julia brought Agrippa a Son named Caius, on whoſe Birth-day a perpetual Sacrifice was decreed to be made with ſome other things: and privately the Ædiles added Games on Horſeback, and Hunting to the Birth-day Solemnities of Auguſtus.

He thinks the Empire large enough.

Tiberius his Performances, and Conceits.

Ambaſſadors to Auguſtus out of India.

49. While theſe things were doing at Rome, he ſetled the Affairs of the Provinces according to the Preſcript of the Roman Laws. He permitted the Confederates to uſe their own Cuſtoms, neither determined he to take any thing from them, or get more by War, being content with what already was gotten, and accordingly he wrote to the Senate, and at that time he undertook no War at all. Yet ſome Alterations as to Governors he made in ſome Countries, and the People of Armenia the Greater accuſing Artabazes, and deſiring to have his Brother Tigranes then at Rome; he ſent Tiberius to drive away the former, and bring the latter to be King amongſt them. Before Tiberius arrived, Artabazes was killed by the Armenians, and then did he perform nothing anſwerable to the preparation that had been made; yet he boaſted of this matter, as having ſomthing notably performed, eſpecially Sacrifices being upon this account decreed: and now began he to have Imaginations in his Head that he ſhould be Emperor, becauſe coming to Philippi noiſes were heard in that place where the Battel had been fought, as out of a Camp, and Fire was ſeen to break out from an Altar built formerly by Antony, where he was incamped. Auguſtus being returned into Samus, gave liberty to the Inhabitants, as a reward of his Entertainment, and diſpatched many other Affairs. Many Ambaſſadors came to him; and now the Indians confirmed by a League, that Peace which formerly they had deſired. Amongſt other Preſents, Tigers were ſent by them; which ſort of Beaſt, in the Opinion of Dio, was then firſt ſeen, both by Greeks and Romans. There was alſo a Man without Arms, who did all feats with his Feet and Toes, as if they had been Hands and Fingers. One of the Meſſengers, Zarmar by name, either weary of his life, or out of vain glory, mounted voluntarily the Funeral Pile, and thereon was Burnt.

He returns to Rome.

50. For the following year, C. Sentius was Conſul, and Auguſtus once more refuſed the reſerved Place. Thereupon again happened Tumults, and the ſlaughter of ſeveral Perſons at Rome, inſomuch that the Senate gave Sentius charge of the City. He being not willing to undertake it, they ſent Meſſengers to Auguſtus with two Lictors, who ſeeing that there would be no end of theſe miſchiefs, if he obſerved former Rules, deſigned Conſul Q. Lucretius, one of the Meſſengers, who had been a proſcribed Perſon, and then went for Rome: At his return, various things were voted by the Senate to honour him, of which he accepted nothing, ſaving that he permitted an Altar to be Erected to Fortuna Redux, and the Day of his Return to be put amongſt the Feſtivals, and called Auguſtalia. The Magiſtrates and People however being reſolute to go out and receive him, he Entered by Night. Notwithſtanding, they decreed that he ſhould be Magiſter Morum for Five years, and for that term have the Dignity of Cenſor, but that of Conſul ~~for his life~~; that twelve Faſces ſhould ever be born before him, and that he ſhould ſit in a Curule chair betwixt the Conſuls. They earneſtly deſired him to make Laws, and amend all things as he ſhould think convenient, offering to ſwear to obey them. And this he did, but refuſed their Oath, knowing, that what was pleaſing to them, they would do without ſwearing, but nothing elſe, though obliged by never ſo many Oaths. Agrippa, now from the Government of the City, went into Gall, where the Invaſion of the Germans and other things cauſed a Diſturbance; which having quieted, he paſſed over into Spain, where was great need of his preſence. For, the Cantabri that there had been taken in War and ſold for Slaves, cut the Throats of their Maſters, and getting together, fortified ſeveral Places, and ſet upon the Roman Garriſons. Againſt them Agrippa marched, but e're he attaqued them, had a Contention with his own Army, wherein ſome Veteran Souldiers being haraſſed with Wars, and ſtanding in fear of that Martial Nation, refuſed to obey him. Attempting it by ſeveral means, he brought them again to obedience; which having done, he had a ſharp Conteſt with Men who had ſerved the Romans, and learnt their Skill, and deſpaired of Pardon if they came once more into their power. He ſuffered great Inconveniences; but at length having loſt many of his Soldiers, and fixed Ignominy upon many others of them for their ill demeanour, particularly forbidding the whole Legion called Auguſta, to uſe that Name, he deſtroyed almoſt all the Cantabri that were of Military Age; the reſt he diſarmed, and brought them down from the Mountainous places into the Champian. Yet of theſe things he neither gave account to the Senate; nor accepted of the Triumph decreed him by Auguſtus, governing himſelf by the wonted moderation of his Mind. Auguſtus took it in very good part, as alſo his bringing the Water formerly called Virginalis, into the City at his own proper Charge, to which he gave the name of Auguſta. On a time when there was ſcarcity of Wine, and the People thereof complained, the Emperor ſaid that Agrippa had ſufficiently provided that they ſhould not die of Thirſt.

Agrippa his Performances in Spain againſt the Cantabri.

His Moderation.

51. So modeſtly did Agrippa behave himſelf, when in the mean time certain other Perſons were of a quite contrary behaviour. For ſome there were who were ſo confident as to deſire a Triumph, though their Atchievements were no greater than the cutting off of ſome Robbers abroad, or ſuppreſſing ſome Seditions in the City, and they obtained what they ſued for, and therein prided themſelves; ſo facile was Auguſtus herein at the beginning of his Adminiſtration, as alſo in granting the honour of publick Sepulchre. But as for Agrippa, in a manner he promoted him to the Empire. For perceiving the Common-wealth in ſuch a condition as to require great Care and Vigilancy, and fearing Deſigns againſt his own Perſon, as there was ſome reaſon he ſhould, and againſt which, as he ſaid himſelf, there was little defence in that Breaſt-plate he wore when he went into the Senate; and frequently at other times, he prorogued his own Authority for five years more, his Tenth now drawing to a Concluſion, in the Conſulſhip of the two Lentuli, Publius and Cneus. Moreover, he conferred on Agrippa power almoſt equal to his own, in other reſpects, and that of a Tribune for five years. For ſo many years he ſaid were ſufficient for them; and yet long after he took more, that his Imperial Authority might Continue the other ten. Theſe things done, he began a ſcrutiny into the Senate, and to avoid the Odium of chuſing all the Members thereof himſelf, he ſelected certain Perſons who ſhould name five apiece, out of which number he elected one; and into the Places of ſuch as were abroad, he cauſed others to ſucceed by lot. But finding ſome deceit to be uſed in this way of Sortion, he would no further uſe that courſe, but made choice of the reſt himſelf, to the number of Six hundred. At firſt he had determined to have but Three hundred Senators according to the antient Cuſtom, being glad to find ſo many Perſons that deſerved that Dignity: but all of that Rank were diſpleaſed at it; for by this means it would come to paſs, that more would be removed than ſhould continue in the Senate, and thereupon every Individual perſon was more afraid to loſe than in hope to obtain the Dignity. He reſolved therefore upon the Number of Six hundred, but yet the matter did not end there.

Auguſtus prorogues his own Authority and that of Agrippa.

52. For ſeveral unworthy Perſons came to be Members, and one Licinius Regulus took it in ſo high diſdain, that he ſhould be ſtruck out of the Liſt, when his

He takes pains in modelling the Senate.

He diſgraceth Lepidus.

his own Son, and others he thought far more unworthy, were put in, that in open Senate he tore his Clothes, made himſelf naked, and reckoning up the Services he had performed, ſhowed the Skars of the Wounds he had received. One Articuleius Petus being choſen in, and his Father put out, made it his requeſt that he might ſurrender his Place to him. Auguſtus moved with theſe and other Circumſtances, made another Scrutiny; but neither did this remove Complaints, but ſeveral found themſelves ſtill aggrieved and unjuſtly dealt with: To them then he gave this Promiſe, That amongſt Senators they ſhould ſit at Feaſts, and behold the Spectacula in the ſame Habit; aud have liberty to ſue for Places of Magiſtracy; and moſt of them were afterward taken into the Senate again, only a few remained in a middle ſtate aud condition betwixt the Senate and the People. After this he puniſhed certain Perſons for Conſpiring againſt himſelf and Agrippa. He hated Lepidus for other reaſons as well as for that his Son had conſpired againſt his life, and had received puniſhment for it. Yet would he not put him to death, but put ſeveral diſgraces upon him. He cauſed him to come out of the Country into the City and be preſent at Aſſemblies, to expoſe him as a laughing-ſtock to the People, conſidering what Power he had formerly enjoyed; and he appointed him the loweſt place amongſt all the Conſulares. Antiſtius Labeo, to whom Auguſtus had given power of Chuſing the Senate, having taken him into that Order, he charged him with Perjury for ſo doing, and threatned to puniſh him. But Labeo anſwered, That he thought he had done no unfitting thing to retain him in the Senate, whom he ſuffered ſtill to injoy the Dignity of Pontifex Maximus: At which anſwer the Emperor remitted his Choler, having both privately and publickly made a ſhow of deſiring that Place, and yet he thought it was not to be invaded in the life-time of Lepidus. So ſeaſonable was the Reply of Labeo, as alſo was his Anſwer another time in the Senate, when it was moved as a fitting thing that Each of them ſhould attend Auguſtus in his turn to protect his Perſon. Not daring to contradict it, nor deigning to approve it, he ſaid He was ſleepy and ſnored, and was not fit to watch at his Chamber.

Is tacitely taxed for his familiarity with Women.

53. About this time he enacted ſeveral things in order to a Reformation of Cuſtoms and Manners. Such as by Bribery ſought after Offices, he barred from them for the ſpace of five years. He impoſed greater Mulcts upon ſuch of both Sexes as would not marry, and propoſed greater Encouragements for Procreation of legitimate Children. And becauſe the Males of the Patrician Rank exceeded far in number the Females of that Order, he gave leave to any, provided they were not Senators, to marty Libertæ or Freed Women, and made ſuch conjunctions legal. But great Complaint was now made to him of the Immodeſt Manners both of Young Men and Women, as the greateſt hindrance of Matrimony; and they Earneſtly deſired that he would alſo conſider how to redreſs this diſorder, thereby twitting tacitely himſelf for having to do with many Women. At firſt he anſwered, That he had taken care for things moſt neceſſary, and that other matters could not be ſo eaſily provided for; and ſome way or other he was brought to ſay, That they ought to Command their Wives, and uſe ſuch Admonitions as he did to his Livia. Then were the Senators much more importunate, and deſired to know what Admonitions they were. To whom replying very unwillingly, he inſtanced in ſome particulars concerning Clothes and other Ornaments of Women, about going to publick Meetings, and the Modeſty of himſelf and his Wife, little caring how ill his Actions ſuited with his Words. It was become a practice for Perſons to betroth to themſelves ſuch as were but Children, and after that to take the profits of their Eſtates though no Marriage followed thereupon. He Commanded, That No Sponſalia or Contracts ſhould be good, which were not Conſummated by a Marriage within Two years; that is, That ſuch as would receive the Profits of a Virgin's Eſtate, ſhould betroth her at Ten years of Age at leaſt, that of Twelve being the legitimate time of Marriage for Women, as then judged of Maturity. He further Ordained, That for Celebration of Games, but one Præfect of the City ſhould be made. And becauſe now the Sibylline Books were worn and decayed with Age, he imployed the Pontifices in Copying them out with their own Hands, that no others might have the opportunity of reading them. To all that were worth ten Myriads, and to whom it was lawful to ſtand for Offices, he gave liberty ſo to do. That was the firſt value he made of the Eſtates of Senators, which afterwards he inlarged to Five and twenty Myriads; and to ſome Perſons that lived well and wanted theſe ſums, he gave money to make them up. And he permitted Prætors to take the treble of what was allowed

Yet he pleaſeth generally.

lowed them for Games out of the Treaſury. This procured that although there were not ſome wanting who were diſpleaſed at the Rigor of his Laws; yet all Indignation ceaſed, becauſe he had done this, and recalled Pylades a Stage-Player, who had been driven away by the Factions in the City. This Pylades being chidden by Auguſtus, for brawling and contending with Bathyllus, of the ſame Profeſſion, and one that was familiar with Mecænas, is ſaid to have given him this wiſe Anſwer, It conduceth to thine Intereſt, O Cæſar, that the People be diverted by being intent upon us.

He goeth into Gall.

54. In the following year, being the DCCXXXVII of the City, C. Furnius, and C. Silanus were Conſuls, and a Son was born to Agrippa, and called Lucius, whom together with his Brother Caius, Auguſtus adopted before they came to Man's eſtate, that he might be more ſafe from Conſpiracies. Such as triumphed, he commanded that in memory of what they had done, they ſhould cauſe ſome work to be made of the ſpoils taken in War. He celebrated now the Secular Games the fifth time. He commanded that Orators ſhould receive no Reward for Pleading Cauſes, under pain of forfeiting fourfold of what they received. Such Judges as were yearly choſen by lot, he Prohibited in the year of their Adminiſtration to enter the Houſes of thoſe that had Cauſes depending before them. And becauſe Senators were negligent in coming to the Senate, on ſuch as were guilty of this neglect, without any reaſonable cauſe, he impoſed a greater Mulct than formerly had been uſual. Having ordained theſe things, and finding his preſence in the City troubleſom both to himſelf and others, while he ſometimes executed and ſomtimes neglected his own Laws, he reſolved, as Solon formerly had done to Travel, and the next year when L. Domitius, and P. Scipio, were Conſuls, he went into Gall, pretending thither to be called by Tumults and Wars. Some there were who ſuſpected that he went away, that without noiſe he might enjoy the Company of Terentia, the Wife of Mecænas, which Woman he ſo loved, that on a time he made her contend with Livia for handſomneſs. Before his departure, he dedicated the Temple of Quirinus, which had been re-edified, having adorned it with Seventy ſix Pillars, ſo many years as he lived, ſo that ſome believed he wittingly deſigned the number: The Government of Rome and Italy, he committed to Taurus; for he had ſent Agrippa into Syria, and Mecænas now was not ſo acceptable to him becauſe of his Wife.

Several Wars Compoſed.

The Impudence of Licinnius.

55. About the ſame time Commotions were raiſed by ſome Nations inhabiting the Alps, by the Pannonians, and thoſe of Noricum, all which were without much trouble compoſed, as others in Dalmatia, and Macedonia, and Spain. In Thrace M. Lollius giving aſſiſtance to Rhymetalces, the Uncle and Tutor of the Sons of Cotys, overcame the Beſſi, and after him C. Lucius upon the ſame account, making War againſt the Sauromatæ, overthrew them, and drove them beyond Iſter. But that War was of greateſt Conſequence, which drew Auguſtus from the City againſt the Germans; for the Sicambri, Vſipetæ, and Tenchteri having firſt nailed to Croſſes ſome Roman Citizens, then waſted Gall, circumvented a Party of Horſe ſent againſt them, and overthrew Lollius the Governor, upon whom they were drawn by thoſe that fled. Yet upon report of Lollius his further Preparations, and of the coming of Auguſtus, they returned home, and gave Hoſtages for their peaceable demeanor. Yet though he had no War to raiſe, did he ſpend the remaining of this year and the following, wherein M. Druſus Libo, and L. Calpurnius Piſo were Conſuls, in ſetling the Affairs of theſe Countries. For beſides the ſtirs raiſed by the Germans, great complaints were made againſt the Adminiſtration of Licinnius, who being a Gall by Original, and taken by the Romans, had become the Slave of Julius Cæſar, and being manumitted by him, been preferred by Auguſtus, to the overſight of that Country. He managed the Roman Dignity with Barbarick Avarice, and confounded all things, to make them ſubſervient to his humour. To that height of Impudence he arrived, that the Galls being to make Payments every Month, he would needs reckon fourteen Months to the year, affirming, that December according to its name, was really the tenth, and that there were two that followed called Auguſti, viz. an eleventh and twelfth, wherein Money muſt alſo be collected by the Galls. Auguſtus knew not how to carry himſelf, but ſometimes accuſed, and otherwhiles excuſed him, being aſhamed he had made choice of ſuch a Governor. But Licinnius by a Trick he uſed, came off, and deluded the Galls. Perceiving Auguſtus to be incenſed againſt him, and that he ſhould be puniſhed for his Villanies, he brought him to his Houſe, and there ſhowing him great Treaſure, called him Lord, and told him, That upon deſign he had gathered it for the uſe of him, and the Romans, leſt the Galls furniſhed with it, ſhould have revolted; and having kept it for him, he now delivered it into his hands.

The Rhæti ſubdued.

The Cruelty of Vedius.

56. At the ſame time Druſus and Tiberius, with good Succeſs managed ſeveral Wars againſt ſuch as Rebelled againſt the Empire; Theſe were the Rhæti, who inhabiting the Country betwixt Noricum and Gall, at the Tridentine Alps, both infeſted the adjacent Territories of Gall, made Incurſions into Italy, and offered violence to ſuch Romans as paſſed through their Coaſts. Nay, ſuch was their Cuſtom, that they put to Death all Males they took for Captives, not only thoſe they found in view, but ſuch as were in their Mothers Bellies, whom they pretended they could diſcover by a certain Art they had of Divination. Druſus with no great difficulty, defeated them near Trent, and obtained Prætorian honours; but for all that they were ſo bold as to invade Gall, and thither Tiberius was ſent againſt them. Now both Brothers ſet on them at once, and broke into Rhætia, partly by the indeavours of their Legates, and their own Preſence; Tiberius paſſing the Lake by Boats, deſtroyed ſuch Forces as they had abroad, conſtrained them to ſubmit, and becauſe the Nation was populous, they carried away the greateſt part thereof that was fit for War, and left the reſt to Till the Land. Now it will not be amiſs to follow the Example of Dio, and from him to relate that in this year died Vedius Pollio, a man famous for nothing performed, being a Libertinus by Original, and of the Equeſtrian Order, but remarkable for his Wealth, and his Cruelty. He kept that ſort of Fiſh called Mullets in a Pond, and when his Slaves offended him, ſuch as he Condemned to Death, he was wont to caſt into the Pond to fat theſe Fiſhes, being learnt to feed upon that ſort of food. On a time he invited Auguſtus to a Feaſt, and it happened that one of his Slaves who waited at the Side-board, brake a Cryſtal Glaſs, for which Offence he Condemned him to the Mullets; not at all moved by the preſence of him he entertained. The Boy caſt himſelf at the Feet of Auguſtus, who interceded for him; and when Vedius would not yeild, deſired that he might ſee all his other Glaſſes which were of ſo great a value, which when brought, he cauſed them all to be broken. He left to Auguſtus a good part of his Eſtate, particularly a Village called Panſilypas, betwixt Naples and Puteoli. He required that ſome Publick Work might be erected for the uſe of the People, and upon this pretence, Auguſtus cauſed his Houſe to be pulled down, with deſign indeed, that no Monument of him might be left in the City. There he built a Porticus, but upon it ſet not the Name of Vedius, but of Livia; which was done afterward. Now did Auguſtus ſend many Colonies into Gall and Spain; reſtored the Inhabitants of Cyzicus to Liberty; was bountiful to them of Paphus, who had been ſorely diſtreſſed by an Earthquake, and permitted them to call their City by the Name of Auguſta. This indeed was ordinarily performed by Auguſtus, and the Senate; and the Senate it ſelf was wont in way of Honours, to give Sirnames to Cities; though afterwards they themſelves made choice of what, and as many, as they pleaſed.

The Example of Agrippa followed.

Auguſtus Returns to Rome.

57. The Pannonians much about this time Rebelling, were reduced to Obedience; the Ligures Comati, who hitherto had inhabited the Maritim Alps, in free condition, were reduced into Slavery, and Matters were ſetled in the Cimmerian Boſphorus, which tended to Defection. This was effected by the Conduct of Agrippa, in whoſe Name a Supplication was decreed; but though a Triumph was decreed him, he refuſed the Honour; neither at the beginning did he write any thing of it to the Senate. And in the Opinion of Dio, this Example of his was afterward taken, and obſerved as a Law, for, thoſe that came after did not by Letters certifie the Senate of what was done, neither did they Triumph, as formerly; no Triumph being indeed decreed to them, being only graced with Triumphal Honours. As for Auguſtus, he had by this time diſpatched the Affairs of Gall, Germany, and Spain. Much Money he had expended, and much he had received: Liberty and Freedom of the City from ſome he took, and to others gave it; and having left Druſus in Germany, he returned to Rome, when Tiberius and Quintilius Varus were Conſuls. The Senate having met, had ordered an Altar to be Conſecrated in the Court it ſelf for his return, and Voted that ſuch as became Supplicants to him, when he was within the Pomœrium, ſhould obtain Impunity. Neither of theſe Honours would he receive, neither would he permit the People to come out and meet him, but entred the City by Night, as he was wont to do moſt commonly, that he might not be troubleſom. The day after his Return, he ſaluted the People in the Palace; aſcending the Capitol, he took the Laurel from about the Faſces, and laid it at the Knees of Jupiter; and on the ſame Day, he gave to the People gratis the uſe of Baths, and Barbers. After this, he cauſed the Senate to be Aſſembled, but having got a Cold, he ſpake nothing, but gave a Paper to the Quæſtor to be read, wherein was related what he had performed; the Term of the Militia was determined (or how many years Soldiers were to ſerve before diſmiſſion) and what Moneys they ſhould receive, when Emeriti for the Grounds they ſo earneſtly deſired. This he did to keep them from Mutining. The Prætorian Cohorts were to ſerve Twelve years; the reſt Sixteen; and more Pay was received by the former, than by the latter. At preſent by this courſe he took, the Soldiers were neither fully contented, nor yet moved by any Indignation, as not deſpairing of their Fortunes.

58. We have ſeen how careful Auguſtus was for Modelling and Reforming the Senate, but his indeavours therein did not anſwer Expectation. He thought he did well to raiſe the value of a Senator, and this had ſuch operation, that it ſo far kept out mean and inſolvent Perſons, that few could now be found that were able, at leaſt willing, to undertake the Imployment; and many ſwore themſelves off from it. There was now a want of Perſons to diſcharge the Offices of Judicature, and other Duties; and therefore the Fathers in his Abſence made a Senatusconſultum, that twenty Perſons ſhould be choſen out of the Body of the Equites, and not to be thereupon made Senators, except ſome Office afterwards diſcharged ſhould make them capable of that Dignity. That theſe twenty ſhould ſucceed into the room of the former twenty ſix; of them three ſhould judg in Capital Matters; other three look to the Coining of Money; four ſhould Overſee the Ways of the City; and ten more be imployed in ſuch Judicial Proceedings as formerly were devolved by lot upon the Centumviri; as for thoſe who took care of the Highways without the City, and four that were ſent into Campania, they were now abrogated. Beſides this Senatuſconſultum, they decreed that becauſe none would lightly ſue for the Tribuneſhip of the People, ſome ſhould be choſen by lot out of them that had been Quæſtors, and had not yet attained forty years of Age. Auguſtus now ſurveyed the whole Senatorian Order, and omitting ſuch as had paſſed their five and thirtieth year, compelled all the reſt that had Eſtates of value to receive the Dignity, if they were not maimed in their Bodies; which he himſelf viewed.

New Officers made.

59. For the value of Eſtates, he took the Oaths of the Parties; as alſo of ſuch as bore Teſtimony on their behalf, and required an account both of their Poverty, and of their Lives. As for private Matters, he rebuked Tiberius for placing Caius in a Seat next to himſelf, at the Votive Games he made for his ſafe Return, and chid the People for applauding him for ſo doing. Lepidus being now dead, he took the Office of Pontifex Maximus, and upon occaſion hereof, when the Senate was about to decree certain things in honour of him, he profeſſed he would receive none of them, and when they were importunate, he roſe and went out of the Court. Neither were their Decrees approved, neither did he receive a Publick Dwelling; but becauſe it was requiſite that the Habitation of the Pontifex Maximus ſhould be publick, he Commanded part of his own Houſe to be ſo accounted; and gave the Houſe of the Rex Sacrorum to the Veſtal Virgins, it being near their Dwellings. One Cornelius Seſentius being blamed for the evil Converſation of his Wife, ſaid in open Senate, that he had Married her, Auguſtus both knowing and adviſing him to it. Hereat he was moved with very great Paſſion, but without any more to do, haſted out of the Court, and ſhortly after again returned; and this he told his Friends he did it, leſt if he had ſtaid he ſhould have been provoked to ſome act that might have been inconvenient and ſevere.

Auguſtus is Pontifex Maximus.

60. Agrippa was returned out of Syria, and honoured with a Continuation of Tribunitial Power for other five years. Thus rewarded he ſent him into Pannonia, where now a War grew hot, with greater Power than any other employed out of Italy. He undertook the Expedition when Winter now came on, wherein were Conſuls M. Valerius Meſſala Barbatus, and P. Sulpicius Quirinius, and ſo affrighted the Pannonians with the very noiſe of his March, that they ceaſed to rebel. Hereby prevented as to Action, he returned, and in his way fell ſick in Campania. Auguſtus as ſoon as he heard it, made what haſte he could to come to him, but found him dead. He brought his Body into the City, and placing it in the Forum, commended him by a Funeral Oration, a Curtain being drawn betwixt him and the Beire: What the meaning of this ſhould be, our Author cannot tell us. Some thought it was, becauſe Auguſtus was Pontifex Maximus; and others, Agrippa Dies.

becauſe he Executed the Office of Cenſor; but he affirms both the one and the other ſort to have erred therein; for neither was the Pontifex Maximus forbidden to look upon dead Bodies,nor the Cenſor any time, but when he made a Luſtrum, or concluded his Office: then indeed if he beheld the Body of a dead-man before the Solemnities of the Luſtrum were performed, all he had formerly done were reſcinded. Then did Auguſtus carry him out into the place whither he himſelf was afterward conveyed, and buried him in his own Sepulchre; although Agrippa had a Monument of his own granted him in the Campus Martius. But ſuch was the End of this Perſon, the beſt Man without Controverſie of his Age in the Opinion of Dio; the Friend of Auguſtus, and that to the great advantage both of Emperor and Empire. As he uſed his utmoſt Indeavour to ſerve him; ſo the Honours and Advantages he received as Rewards, he imployed in well deſerving of other men. Hereby it came to paſs, that he was neither troubleſome to Auguſtus, nor obnoxious to the Envy of others; ſo Confirming his Authority and Domination, as if he ſeemed chiefly to deſire that form of Government; and yet ſo obliging the People that he was eſteemed as moſt Popular of all others. At his Death he bequeathed them his Gardens and a Bath,which was called by his Name, giving certain Grounds to Auguſtus for this uſe. And he not only gave to the People theſe Grounds, but diſtributed to them Money man by man, as if Agrippa had left it to them. Indeed by his death a great Eſtate came to Auguſtus, and amongſt other things the Cherſoneſus at the Helleſpont, our Author wondering how Agrippa came by it. However, Auguſtus could not forget him of a long time, but honoured him amongſt the People, and cauſed his Son born after his death, after him to be called by the name of Agrippa. This Name, Pliny ſaith,was firſt given to them that were born with the Feet forward, as one ſhould ſay, Born hardly, or with much ado. And in this manner (he writes) as they ſay, M. Agrippa came forth of his Mother's Womb, the only Man, almoſt, known to have brought any good Fortune with him of all that were after that ſort born. Yet he was much pained with the Gout, and paſſed all his Youth and many a day after in Bloody Wars, and in danger of a thouſand deaths. He was unfortunate in his Children, and eſpecially in his two Daughters, the Agrippinæ, who brought forth two Sons pernicious to the whole Earth, namely, C. Caligula, and Domitius Nero, Emperors. He died in the One and fiftieth year of his Age, tormented with the Adulterie of his Wife, and oppreſſed with the Intolerable Servitude, in which he lived under her Father.

His Commendation.

61. Auguſtus mourned much for the death of Agrippa, yet would he not ſuffer any thing inſtituted by the Antients to be omitted; and though none of the Nobility would be preſent at Games, Yet he himſelf ſolemnized thoſe of the Gladiators, which were alſo often celebrated in his Abſence. Being now made the Corrector of Manners for other five years, (for this Office he alſo took, as the Imperial Power it ſelf, to a limited time) he commanded that Senators ſhould when they came to the Court, or to his preſence, burn Incenſe; both that they might carry themſelves religiouſly, and come together with leſs trouble, ſuch a Ceremony, as a Token of their Meetings, being uſed. The Province of Aſia ſtanding now in need of help, being much diſtreſſed with Earthquakes, he paid the Annual Tribute due from it, out of his own money, and aſſigned it a Preſident, not choſen by Suffrages, but by Lot, for two years. It happened that Apuleius and Mecœnas being blamed in a Court of Judicature, in a Caſe of Adultery, not that they were guilty of it themſelves, but becauſe they undertook the Defence of an accuſed Perſon, he came into the Court, and ſitting down on the Bench, only gave warning to the Accuſer, That he ſhould not traduce his Kindred, and his Friends, and then aroſe and departed. For theſe and Other things they gathered Money amongſt themſelves and honoured him with Statues, and permitted what never formerly had been lawful to any, That upon his Birth-day unmarried perſons, of both Sexes, might amongſt the reſt come to ſee, and be preſent at the Feaſt. Now Agrippa was dead, whom Auguſtus had loved for his Virtue, not any Relation he had to him, and it was neceſſary he ſhould have ſome one to aſſiſt him in the Government, Superior to all others in Power and Dignity, the better to avoid Conſpiracies: He was forced to make choice of Tiberius, his own Grandſons not being yet grown up. He cauſed him to quit his Wife, being the Daughter of Agrippa, by a former Marriage, though ſhe had a Child living by him, and another in her Belly, and to Marry Julia; which done, he ſent him againſt the Pannonians, who after the death of Agrippa, delivered of their fear, returned to their wonted Rebellious humour. He made uſe of the Scordiſci their Neighbors, who obſerved the ſame way of Fighting, and after much miſchief done both to Country and Inhabitant, ſubdued them, took away their Arms, and led away the younger ſort into other Regions. For theſe Performances, the Senate decreed him a Triumph, but Cæſar would not ſuffer him to make uſe of the Decree, but in room thereof conferred on him Triumphal Honours.

Other Honours conferred on Auguſtus.

He Marries his Daughter Julia to Tiberius.

The Succeſs of the two Brothers, Tiberius and Druſus.

62. The ſame thing that befell him, happened to his Brother Druſus. The Sicambri, and their Aſſociates, incouraging themſelves upon the Abſence of Auguſtus, and for that the Galls bore the yoak of Servitude very unwillingly, had begun another War. Druſus under pretence of a Feſtival celebrated at Lugdunum, at the Altar of Auguſtus, ſecured the chiefeſt of the Galls, and thereby prevented the great miſchief that would have followed upon their Conjunction with the reſt. Then being intent upon the Germans, when they ſhould paſs the Rhine, he repulſed them, and invaded the Territories of the Vſipetæ, near the Iſland of the Batavi, as alſo the Country of the Sicambri, and waſted them to a great extent. After this, paſſing down the Rhine into the Ocean, he ſubdued the Friſii, and by a Lake paſſed the Borders of the Chauci. Here he was in Danger, by reaſon that upon fall of the Tide, his Veſſels were left upon dry ground, but by the Induſtry of the Friſii, who ſupplied him with foot, he eſcaped, and Winter approaching came to Rome, where he was made Prætor of the City, though he had already obtained Prætorian Honours, in the Conſulſhip of Q. Ælius Tubero, and Paulus Fabius Maximus. In the beginning of Spring he returned, paſſed the Rhine, ſubdued the Vſipetæ, and thence by a Bridge croſſing the River Lupia, invaded the Sicambri; and through their Country peirced into that of the Cheruſci, and as far as the River Viſurgis, which he might better do; becauſe the Sicambri had with all their force at this time fallen upon the Chatti, who of all their Neighbors had alone denied them aid. And he had alſo paſſed the Viſurgis, but that want of Proviſions, the approach of Winter, and a ſwarm of Bees ſeen in the Camp, deterred him. Returning into the Country of his Friends, he was near deſtruction by the Circumvention of his Enemies, who having done him much Damage, ſhut up him and his whole Army in a ſtrait and hollow place; and he was only delivered by their temerity, who contemning the Romans as already vanquiſhed, ruſhed upon them without any care or orders, and gave them advantage to Charge, and put them to Flight. After this they durſt not approach, and Druſus then contemning them, built a Caſtle to reſtrain them at the confluence of Lupia, and Aliſo; and another in the Country of the Chatti upon the Rhine. For theſe Atchievements it was decreed that he ſhould have Triumphal Honours, enter the City on Horſe-back, and his Prætorſhip ended, obtain Proconſular Power. He had been ſaluted by his Soldiers, as alſo his Brother Tiberius, with the title of Imperator, but it was not given them by Auguſtus. However the Games which Druſus exhibited as Prætor, were diſcharged with great Expence, and the Birth-day of Auguſtus was celebrated in the Cirque, and other places of the City with Huntings; for which, though there was no Decree, yet was it yearly done by the Prætor. But thoſe Solemnities called Auguſtalia were then firſt celebrated by virtue of a Senatuſconſultum, and continued till the time of Dio.

63. But as if there had been an Emulation betwixt the two Brothers, who ſhould do beſt, Tiberius now brought under, and forced to ſubmit the Dalmatians and Pannonians, who encouraged at his Abſence, had again Rebelled, invading them both together, and removing the War as occaſion offered. For this the ſame Honours were decreed to him as to Druſus, and thenceforth Dalmatia, as requiring careful Watch, and the Defence of Arms, both in reſpect of it ſelf, and the Neighbouring Pannonia, was committed to the charge of Auguſtus. Much about the ſame time Vologæſus a Thracian, of the Nation of the Beſſi, the Prieſt of Bacchus, who was worſhipped by them, by a vain ſhew of Religion, aſſociated many to himſelf, by their help raiſed a Rebellion, and killed Rhaſciporis, the Son of Cotys. Still uſing a Pretext of his Religion, without Battle, he deprived Rhymetalces of his Army, purſued him, brake into the Cherroneſus, and there did much miſchief; about the time that the Sialetæ alſo infeſted Macedonia. L. Piſo, who now governed Pamphilia, was commanded to make head againſt them, who firſt received loſs from the Beſſi, but ingaging with them again, obtained ſo conſiderable a Victory, that waſting the Country far and wide, moſt of all theſe Nations ſubmitted, and others that ſtood out by force of Arms, he conſtrained to undergo the yoak. For theſe things performed, a Supplication was decreed, and that he ſhould have Triumphal Honours. While Matters thus ſucceed in the Eaſt, Auguſtus imployed himſelf in making an Inventory of his whole Eſtate, as if he had been a private man. Again, he ſurveyed the Senate, and perceiving that the Members thereof were ſlow to meet, he ordained that for the future a Senatusconſultum might be made, by fewer than Four hundred; which Number formerly was required to be preſent.

The Succeſs of Piſo.

Dion Caſſius his odd Story of Auguſtus.

Stirs in the Eaſt quieted by Tiberius.

64. Now again both Senate and People contributed Money for making of Statues; but none he would permit to be erected, but only to Publick Safety, Concord, and Peace. Yet ſtill would they go about it upon all occaſions, and at length on the Firſt of January, they repaired to Auguſtus himſelf, and every one gave him more or leſs, which he reſtored to them with advantage; not only to Patricians, but others alſo. Here Dion Caſſius tells an odd Story; How he had heard that being moved by ſome Oracle or Dream, every year on a certain Day, he received ſome Silver by way of Begging from ſuch as he met with; he adds, That whether we will believe it or no, ſo it was reported. This ſame year, to be ſure, he Married Julia his Daughter to Tiberius, and his Siſter Octavia being dead, he cauſed her Body to be laid publickly in State, in the Sacrary of Julius, where he made a Funeral Oration, a Curtain being drawn, as formerly. Druſus publickly changed his Senatorian Robe for a Mourning Gown, and then her Sons in Law carried her away; yet would not Auguſtus admit all things that were decreed in her Honour. Now firſt after Merula, the Flamen Dialis, or Prieſt of Jupiter was ordained. And for as much as the Tribuni Plebis, and Ædiles, who were to look to the keeping of the Senatusconſulta, were wont to truſt their Apparitors, and thence much Error and Confuſion happened, they were delivered into the Cuſtody of the Quæſtors. It was alſo decreed, that the Temple of Janus ſhould now be ſhut; but this was hindred by the Daci, who when Iſter was frozen, paſſed over the Ice, and made Depredations in Pannonia; beſides this, the Dalmatians not enduring the Exaction of Tribute, caſt off the yoak. Theſe Motions were quieted by Tiberius, who was gone with Auguſtus into Gall. And the Germans, and amongſt thoſe the Chatti, who not content with the Territories aſſigned them by the Romans, had joyned themſelves with the Sicambri, Druſus either infeſted or reduced to Obedience. Both the Brothers now returned with Auguſtus, who had ſpent moſt of his time in Gallia Lugdunenſis, to Rome; theſe things being performed in the Conſulſhip of Julius, and Fabius Maximus.

Dio lib. 55.

Druſus Dies.

65. In the following year, wherein Druſus and T. Quintius Criſpinus were Conſuls, Druſus having invaded the Territories of the Chatti, waſted them as he paſſed; and having defeated them in Battel, proceeded into the Country of the Suevi, and thence turning to the Cheruſci, croſſed Viſurgis, and waſted all as far as the River Albis, which falling from the Vandalick Mountains, flows in a great Stream into the Northern Ocean. Having in vain attempted to paſs this River, he erected Trophies, and retreated; For, a Woman (our Hiſtorian tells us) of greater Dimenſions than Humane, met him in the way, and calling him by Name, demanded of him, Whither his boundleſs Ambition would carry him; She told him, the Fates did not permit that he ſhould ſee all Quarters; and bade him be gone; for the Period both of his Life and Actions approached. The death of Druſus he will have uſher'd in by this and other Prodigies, which according to his Cuſtom, he particularly relates; for he died in his Return, before he reached the Rhine. Livy, who extended his Hiſtory juſt ſo far, wrote that he died of a fall from his Horſe. It ſeems he lay Sick ſo long, that Auguſtus, who was at no great diſtance from him, as Dio writes, ſent with all ſpeed for his Brother Tiberius, who at his coming found him alive, though drawing on: He conveyed his Body to Rome, Centurions and Tribunes carrying it at the beginning, and afterwards the chiefeſt of the Cities. It being placed in the Forum, there he was commended by Tiberius in a Funeral Oration, and again by Auguſtus in the Flaminian Cirque; becauſe it was not lawful for ſuch as had led forth Armies to enter the Pomærium of the City, before they had uſed ſuch Ceremonies as were required by virtue of the ancient Cuſtom. He was by the moſt conſiderable Equites, and others of Senatorian Rank, carried into the Campus Martius, where being Burnt, the Aſhes were laid up in the Sepulchre of Auguſtus. The Sirname of Germanicus was given to him and his Sons, beſides the Honours of Statues and Triumphal Arches, and of a Monument upon the River Rhine.

66. Tiberius alſo for having in the life-time of Druſus ſuppreſſed the Dalmatians and Pannonians, who had made ſome ſmall offers to ſtir, entred the City on Horſe-back, in a ſort of Triumph, and gave a Collation to the People, in the Capitol and other places, and Livia and Julia entertained the Women. The ſame Solemnities were prepared for Druſus, and Holidays were again to be kept for his Triumph, when all theſe Expectations were blaſted by his Death. Livia his Mother, to comfort her, was alſo honoured with Statues, and reckoned amongſt ſuch as had thrice brought forth. For though Fortune was not ſo favourable as to give three Children to all Married Men or Women, yet the Law firſt made by the Senate, and afterward confirmed by the Emperor, gave the Privilege obtained by three Children to ſome of them, ſo that they ſhould not be liable to the Mulct impoſed upon Barren People, and a few things excepted, they might obtain all the Advantages due to them that had a numerous Iſſue. Auguſtus applying himſelf to Publick Affairs, ordained that on certain Days the Senate ſhould be aſſembled, whereas formerly nothing had been herein defined, and therefore many took the Advantage to be abſent. To prevent this, he appointed certain Days in every Month, on which it ſhould be neceſſary for all obliged by the Laws to be preſent. That no juſt excuſe might be pretended, he took order that no Judicial Proceedings, nor any other thing ſhould hinder them. Now alſo he determined what number ſhould be preſent at paſſing Decrees, according to the Nature of the Senatuſconſulta; and again he increaſed the Mulct, impoſed upon ſuch as abſented without a Cauſe. But, as uſually it happens, the multitude of Offenders ſeemed to plead for Remiſſion of the Mulct, and therefore he commanded, that when many offended, every fifth man, as it fell by lot, ſhould be certainly puniſhed. To be ſure he Publiſhed in a Liſt the Names of all the Senators; which Cuſtom continued till the time of Dion Caſſius.

Auguſtus appoints certain Days for the Senate to meet on.

66. Such Care was taken by Auguſtus, to conſtrain Senators to Aſſemble and give their Suffrages. If it happened that ſo many did not meet together, as was needful, (for when the Emperor came thither, the Liſt was always called over, and moſt commonly on other days) they that were preſent conſulted of Matters before them, and what they reſolved, was written down; but it did not obtain the force of a Senatuſconſultum, but was called the Authority of the Senate, ſhowing only what the Opinion was of thoſe that met. The ſame courſe was obſerved when they ſuddenly Aſſembled, either in a Place, or at a Time not uſual nor lawful, or called by ſome Edict that had no Authority to back it, or if the Tribunes of the People contradicted; for though in ſuch Caſes no Senatuſconſultum could be made, yet the Senate would not have its opinion to be concealed, which afterwards being in due form ratified, obtained the name and force of a Senatuſconſultum. This Cuſtom was obſerved in thoſe days, though in the time of Dio, he ſaith, it was in a manner aboliſhed, as alſo what Auguſtus ordained concerning Prætors, to whom he gave liberty of Voting in the Senate; becauſe they took it ill that in dignity preceding the Tribuni Plebis, they ſhould have no Voice. As he now gave it them, ſo time afterward took it away. But Auguſtus before he enacted theſe things, cauſed them to be written down and expoſed in the Senate, giving liberty to any two that came in to read them, to find what fault they could, and propound other Rules. Here it will not be amiſs to add what Suetonius hath written concerning this Subject. He tells us, that before Auguſtus his time, the Number of Senators was rude and deformed, being above a thouſand, ſome of them moſt unworthy, as being after the Death of Cæſar, taken in for favour or reward, and therefore by the vulgar they were called Orcini. Then Auguſtus by two Scrutinies, reſtored the Senate to its ancient luſtre, in one of which, one man choſe another amongſt themſelves, and the ſecond was made at the choice of himſelf and Agrippa, at which time it was thought he wore a Breaſtplate under his Robe, and had ten of the moſt Valiant Senators, all his Friends, ſtanding about his Chair. Cordus Cremutius wrote that at that time no Senator was admitted, but alone, and his Robe being firſt ſearched. Some he compelled to excuſe themſelves, but to ſuch he granted the Senatorian mark in their Habit, the right of ſitting to behold Sports in the Orcheſtra, and and of Feaſting publickly. That ſuch as were choſen and approved, might more Religiouſly, and with leſs trouble execute their Offices, he ordained before any ſate down in the Senate, he ſhould firſt Supplicate at the Altar of that God, in whoſe Temple they met, with Wine and Frankincenſe; as alſo that a legitimate Senate ſhould be held, but twice in one Month, viz. On the Calends and the Ides; that in the Months of September and October (Months of Vintage) it ſhould not be neceſſary that any ſhould be preſent, but ſuch as were choſen by lot, being being a ſufficient number to do the work. Moreover he procured that the Acts of the Senate ſhould not be Publiſhed.

The Vote called the Authority of the Senate.

In Octavio. C.C. 35, 36.

67. As to what he writes concerning Feaſting in Publick, granted to ſuch Senators as excuſed themſelves, we muſt know that upon three Accounts the Romans uſed Publick Feaſts. One was at the Funeral of ſome Eminent Perſon. Another when they Sacrificed, and then there were Perſons called Epulones, ſomtimes three; and otherwhiles ſeven in number, who took care of thoſe Epula or Feaſts. The third was after ſome Victory, as was often practiſed by Julius Cæſar, and others; and at this ſort of Feaſts chiefly Senators were entertained. From what both Dio and Suetonius write concerning the Incenſe, we may obſerve that the Senate was not wont to Aſſemble but in ſome conſecrated place, as in the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, of Jupiter Stator, erected over againſt that of Veſta at the foot of the Palatine Mount; that of Concord near the Capitol; of Tellus or the Earth; of Apollo; and Caſtor and Pollux. To foreign Ambaſſadors the Senate was wont to give Audience in the Temple of Bellona, without the Walls; as alſo to ſuch Magiſtrates as returned from the Provinces, and were not yet to enter the City before ſomething was performed. Sometimes indeed the Senate Aſſembled in the Campus Martius, and in other places, but theſe were alſo Inaugurate and Conſecrated; at leaſt ordinarily it could not Aſſemble but in ſuch. For the time when the Senate met, of old it might meet on any days but the Dies Comitiales, becauſe then the Comitia of the People being held, the Senators could not be abſent from them; nor were not to be hindered from giving their Suffrages. Neither could the Senate meet on unlucky days, becauſe then no Sacrifices could be offered, which were requiſite as we ſee. Neither when it Thundered, or Winds and Tempeſts raged; nor when both Conſuls were abſent from the City, at leaſt till the ninth day from their Abſence. And ſome think, that becauſe the Comitia were diſſolved if any were taken with the Comitial Diſeaſe or Epilepſie, the ſame was obſerved in the meeting of the Senate. Seeing then that on all other days the Senate might lawfully meet, ſome there are that admire how Auguſtus, a man loving Buſineſs, ſhould be for its Aſſembling but twice in a Month, at the beginning and middle. But their wonder ceaſeth when they conſider, that having taken upon himſelf the whole Government, he did it with deſign that the greateſt Affairs might firſt be debated by himſelf and his Councellors, whom, as Suetonius in the ſame place affirms, he choſe by lot every ſix Months for this very purpoſe. The truth is, he had transferred all the Power to himſelf, both of Senate and People, and he would have them do nothing but what he pleaſed, though he pretended that he took this courſe that things might be tranſacted with more mature Conſideration and Advice. Indeed adventuring upon ſo high and dangerous an Enterprize, as the changing of the Government, he uſed all the Cunning he could to cover his Deſigns, and he was to pretend all Modeſty and Self-denial imaginable. This made him ſhun all needleſs and invidious Ceremonies and ſhadows of Reſpect, ſo long as he was poſſeſſed of the Subſtance; and even to make a ſhew of waving the Subſtance it ſelf, as a burthen too heavy for his no way ambitious Shoulders; at leaſt of a reſolution to be the publick Drudge, only for a certain and limited time. And yet he was content they ſhould pleaſe themſelves, ſometimes in fancying, that they honoured him in giving him Titles, and Voting he ſhould have ſuch and ſuch Powers, when he was already poſſeſſed of the Supreme. Let us hear what Dion Caſſius further writes of theſe matters.

Vide Donatum in l.

Where and when the Senate was wont to Aſſemble.

Auguſtus ſtudies to be Popular.

68. He deſired to appear ſo popular, that one of his fellow Soldiers praying he would undertake his Cauſe; and he ſaying that becauſe he was hindered by buſineſs, he would ſend him an Advocate; when the man replied in Anger, That he did not ſerve him in this faſhion when he wanted his help, not ſending one in his room to do it, but in his own Perſon undergoing all dangers for him, he went into the the Forum and pleaded his cauſe. In like manner he aſſiſted another Friend he had, at the Bar, having communicated the matter firſt to the Senate, and he ſaved him; and not only not proſecuted the man's Accuſer, though he had uſed great liberty in his diſcourſe, but being called to account for his ill manners, abſolved him. He appointed Quæſtors on the Sea Coaſt near Rome, and in other places of Italy, there to præſide; which courſe he obſerved many years: but he himſelf would not enter into the City becauſe of the death of Druſus. The Year that followed, wherein C. Aſinius Gallus, and C. Marcius Cenſorinus were Conſuls, he came to Rome, where he found both them and other Magiſtrates accuſed for having procured their Places by Money. Yet did he diſſemble the matter,and made no Inquiſition, having reſolved to puniſh none by hearſay, nor to pardon any that was manifeſtly convicted. But of ſuch as would ſtand for any Office, he took money by way of pledge; and if they were found to uſe any Bribery, they made forfeit of it. This was commended as laudable, but ſo was not another thing by all ſorts of Perſons. The Laws forbad that a Slave ſhould be tortured to confeſs any thing againſt his Lord. He therefore commanded that ſuch Slaves ſhould be ſold to himſelf or the Publick when occaſion required, that the propriety being altered, they might be Examined againſt thoſe who were not now their Maſters. Some Complained that the Law was eluded by this changing of Lords; and others ſaid it was neceſſary to be done, for that many in confidence that their Slaves could not be queſtioned, were incouraged to conſpire againſt him and the preſent Power. Not long after he pretended he would lay down, and the ſecond Ten Years being over, was brought, unwilling, to receive the Government for other Ten.

War in Germany.

69. He undertook a War againſt the Germans, but ſtaying himſelf at home imploy'd Tiberius, who paſſing the Rhine, all the Clanns ſent their Ambaſſadors and begged Peace, except the Cantabri. Auguſtus refuſed to accept of their ſubmiſſion, except the Cantabri were concerned in it; and neither when they joyned would he grant them Peace, but diſpoſed through ſeveral Cities the Ambaſſadors of the Cantabri, who being many and moſt conſiderable amongſt them, would not endure the Uneaſineſs of it, but killed themſelves. So the Peace continued unmade, and the Barbarians were quiet, though to purpoſe afterward they avenged themſelves. Auguſtus gave money to the Soldiers, not upon the account of Victory, though he himſelf received and gave the Title of Imperator to Tiberius; but becauſe in this Action Caius was firſt trained up to Military Exerciſes, Promoting now Tiberius to the Imperial Power in the room of Druſus, and gracing him with the Name, he made him Conſul the ſecond time, and commanded him according to the antient Cuſtom to expoſe his Letters to view, and honoured him with a Triumph: For he himſelf would not Triumph, but rather choſe that on his Birth-day perpetual Games ſhould be ſolemnized with Horſes. He inlarged the Bounds of the Pomærium, and named the Month Sextilis, after himſelf Auguſtus. Others would have given this Name to September, becauſe in it he was born; but he preferred Sextilis, becauſe in it he was firſt made Conſul, and obtained many notable Victories: So writes Dio. And the ſame reaſon of his preferring Sextilis before September, is given by Suetonius, who mentions this paſſage as relating to his new modelling or reforming of the year. And this he did, he tells us, as Pontifex Maximus, which Place he reſolved never to take from Lepidus while living. When he was dead he took it, and for a firſt Eſſay, he cauſed all the Fortune-telling Books, both Greek and Latin, which either had no Authors known, or thoſe of no reputation, to be ſought out and burnt, above Two thouſand in number. The Sibylline Books he onely retained, and thoſe choicely ſelected,which he laid up in guilded Repoſitories under the Baſis of Palatine Apollo. Then he addes, That the Year being regulated by Divus Julius, but afterward through negligence diſordered and confuſed, he reſtored it to its former Courſe; and in this reformation choſe to give the Name of Auguſt to the Month Sextilis. After this he tells us what further he did about the Superſtition of the Romans, as his honouring the Veſtal Virgins, and reſtoring ſeveral Ceremoies in order to it, amongſt which were the Sæcular Games. But as to the reformation of the Year, Pliny and others relate, how in the ſpace of Thirty ſix years, twelve dayes were intercalated; whereas there ought to have been but nine. He therefore Commanded that Twelve years ſhould paſs without any Leap-year at all, that ſo theſe three dayes might be ſwallowed up, which increaſed by the over-haſtineſs of the Prieſts. For the naming of Sextilis after him Auguſtus, a Decree of the Senate paſſed; and alſo one of the People, Pacuvius one of the Tribuni Plebis propounding the Law; concerning which Macrobius in his Saturnalia, is to be conſulted.

The Month Sextilis, called Auguſt.

Auguſtus reformeth the year.

Vide uſſerium in Annal.

The Death of Mecænas.

70. Auguſtus was well enough pleaſed with theſe things, but grievouſly afflicted with the death of Mecænas, who was ſerviceable to him in ſeveral reſpects. He held him ſo faithful that he committed the Government of the City to him, though but of Equeſtrian Rank for a long time; and he found him uſeful to him when he was tranſported with immoderate Anger, to allay his Paſſion, and reduce him to a more quiet mind. Of this Dion Caſſius gives us one inſtance. It happened, that when Auguſtus ſate in Judgment upon accuſed Perſons, Mecænas himſelf was preſent in Court, and perceiving that He would condemn many of them, being not able to come at him for the Croud, he wrote theſe words, Riſe up at laſt Executioner; and as if it had contained ſome other matter, caſt the Paper into his Lap; which having read, he preſently aroſe without ſentencing any of them. And he was not at all diſpleaſed, but rejoyced that his Friends would take the liberty to reprove him, when his own Nature or that of the Matter before him inclined him to Anger. His Commendation. This is taken as a great Evidence of his Virtue, that though he oppoſed the Extravagant deſires of Auguſtus, yet he was held by him amongſt his familiar Friends, and withal approved himſelf well to all other Perſons; and having ſuch Intereſt in the Emperor, that he obtained for many of his Friends, Honours and Places of Magiſtracy; yet was he not ſo ambitious as to accept any Dignity himſelf, being contented with the Equeſtrian Degree. But what Dio attributes to his Humility, Others do it to his deſire of Eaſe and love of Pleaſure, though indeed more that of a Virtuoſo than Senſualiſt. And herein he was much incouraged and humored by the Poets, of which he was a great Patron as of all Learned Men. Whoever reads the Poems of Horace, wherein he ſo much commends a retired life, and refuſeth troubleſom greatneſs, cannot but fancy them ſitting together, hugging themſelves, and laughing at the follies of ſuch as buſſle and make a ſtir a little while, and prefer not the real injoyment of a ſhort life, before being hurried out of the World in a Crowd of Cares and Buſineſs. It's agreed, that he loved to live within his Fortune. Cillnius was the antient Name of his Family, and Arretium in the Tyrrhenian Coaſts the place of it. Pliny tells ſtrange paſſages of him, as that he never was without an Ague; and for three years before his death never ſlept a quarter of an hour together. But Dio addes, That for the reaſons related Auguſtus was grievouſly afflicted for his death, and this made him love his Memory the more, that though Mecænas was angry with him about his Wife, yet he left him his Heir, and excepting Onely a few things, left it in his power to be kind to his Friends. Mecænas firſt made uſe of a ſwimming place furniſhed with warm Water, and invented certain Notes or Characters for ſpeedy writing, which he communicated to many by the means of Aquila his Freedman. Horace dies. This Year alſo wherein Auguſtus mended the Calendar, Horace the Poet died in the Fifty ſeventh year of his Age; His familiarity with Cæſar and Mecænas is ſufficiently known. His Life is written by Suetonius.

Mecænas Eques
Hetruſco de ſanguine regum,
Intra fortunam qui cupis eſſe
tuam.

71. Tiberius on the Calends of January of the DCCXLVII. Year of the City, wherein he himſelf and Cn. Piſo were Conſuls, called together the Senate into the Court or Forum of Octavius. He undertook the Repairing of the Temple of Concord, thereon he ſet his own Name and that of Druſus. After this he Triumphed, and this being over, he dedicated the Temple of Livia together with his Mother. Then did he Feaſt the Senate in the Capitol, and Livia the Ladies apart by themſelves. A little after he went into Germany where ſome Stirs were made, but nothing memorable was performed in that Country all this Year. A great Fire happened about the Forum, which conſuming many Buildings, was ſaid to have been procured by thoſe that were deeply in Debt: Who conceived themſelves much injured, as if this would eaſe them of their Burthens; though they were deceived, getting nothing thereby. But it produced this Effect, That from amongſt the Plebeians were conſtituted certain Officers called Curatores Vicorum, who were permitted on certain dayes within the Extent of their authority, to wear the Robe of a Magiſtrate, and to have two Lictors go before them; and to them were aſſigned the Slaves which formerly had attended the Ædiles for quenching of Fires. Rome divided into Fourteen Regions. And now was the City divided into Fourteen Regions, the Government of which was aſſigned to theſe Curatores Vicorum, the Tribuni Plebis, and the Prætors by Lot.

72. The following Year had C. Antiſtius Vetus, and D. Lælius Balbus for Conſuls. Caius and Lucius being Educated in an high condition, in no wiſe imitated the modeſty of Auguſtus their Father by Adoption. They not only lived more delicately, but grew inſolent upon their Fortune; inſomuch that Lucius on a time going to the Theatre, and there being received with Applauſe which ſome gave him with a willing mind, and others out of Flattery, was puffed up to that degree of Pride, as to ask that the Conſulſhip might be given to his Brother Caius though yet a Boy. Young Lucius and Caius. Cæſar's Inſolence. Auguſtus hearing of it was angry, and wiſhed that never any ſuch Neceſſity might lye upon him, as he had found formerly, that the Conſulſhip ſhould be given to one under Twenty years of Age; but for all this his Son's preſſing him to it, he anſwered, That the Office was to be diſcharged by a man, that could take care that he himſelf offended not, and could reſiſt the Extravagant deſires of the People: At length he gave the Prieſthood to Caius, and leave to go into the Senate, and be preſent with Senators at Shows and Feaſts. However, Tacitus writes, that he earneſtly deſired that both of them not being yet Seventeen years old, ſhould be called Princes of the Youth, and Deſigned Conſuls. Yet Dion adds, that to make them ſomething more modeſt, he granted to Tiberius the Tribunitial Power for five years; and committed to his care Armenia, which had revolted. This he did to no purpoſe, for he offended both them and Tiberius; them, becauſe they thought themſelves undervalued; and him, becauſe he feared their Indignation; and therefore he betook himſelf to Rhodes, under colour of Study, and he took not all his Attendants with him, but did withdraw himſelf from their view and their Actions. Some ſay leſt his Glory ſhould dim the Luſtre of the two riſing young Men. Others thought that Auguſtus his Children being grown to man's eſtate, he quitted now, as it were, the Place and Poſſeſſion of the ſecond Degree, ſo long held by him after the Example of Agrippa, who when Marcellus was admitted to publick Offices, went to Mitylene; that being preſent, he might not ſeem either to withſtand or detract from them, and this Account he gave of his withdrawing; yet a long time after. Some yet there were who thought he did this becauſe of his Wife Julia, whom he could endure no longer; it's certain that he left her at Rome. Others imagined he took it ill that he was not adopted Cæſar; and ſome fancied he was ſent thither by Auguſtus; becauſe he uſed ſome Treachery toward his Sons.

Tiberius withdraws to Rhodes.

73. However we are further told, That diſſembling the Cauſe of his Reſolution, he asked leave of Auguſtus his Father-in-law, (both in reſpect of his Wife and himſelf) to depart. Neither would he yeild to his Mother, that humbly beſought him, nor to his Father-in-law, complaining that he alſo was forſaken by the Senate, and when they reſolutely detained him, he eat nothing in four days. At length having got leave, he went down preſently to Oſtia, not ſpeaking a word to them that went with him, and kiſſing very few at his departing; yet he opened his Will, and read it before his Mother and Auguſtus. As he ſailed along the Coaſt of Campania, hearing that Auguſtus was Sick, he ſtayed a little, but hereupon a Report being raiſed that he tarried upon occaſion of greater hope, he ſailed to Rhodes almoſt, in foul weather. He went and acted like a private man in all reſpects, except in this, that he compelled the Pharians to ſell him a Statue of Veſta, which he Dedicated in the Temple of Concord. He contented himſelf with no great Houſe, and as little a Country place, being much taken with the pleaſantneſs and healthfulneſs of the Iſland, ſince he Landed there, in his return from Armenia. He walked ſometimes into the places of Exerciſe, without either a Lictor or Viator, converſing with the Greeks almoſt on equal terms. Nevertheleſs Paterculus, his Flatterer, writes, That all Proconſuls and Legati going into the Provinces, coming thither to viſit him, always ſubmitted their Faſces, although in this privacy, and proteſted that this Retirement of his was more Honourable than his living in the Principality. And yet as Suetonius tells the Story, Sometimes, even in Rhodes, he exerciſed the Power of the Principality it ſelf; for, being a diligent Hearer of Theodorus the Gædarean (a Rhetorician, who deſired to be called the Rhodian) and of other Profeſſors, it happened that the Readers diſſented, and the Difference in Opinion procured a hot conteſt and quarrel in the School. Hereupon he interpoſed, and being thought to be Partial, was reviled by one of the contrary Faction, who uſed ſuch Language, that Tiberius provoked therewith, went home like a private man, but ſpeedily came abroad again like a Publick Magiſtrate with his Apparitors, and calling before him by voice of a Crier the Perſon that reviled him, commanded from the Tribunal that he ſhould be carried to Priſon.

Where he lives privately.

74. Auguſtus reduced the undetermined Number of them that were to receive Corn from the Publick to Two hundred thouſand, and ſome reported that he gave to every one Sixty Drachmes. When he exhibited the Spectacula, he brought the Flaminian Water into the Cirque, and in it Six and thirty Crocodiles were killed. Now firſt of all he inſtituted two Præfects of the Prætorian Guards. When he entered his twelfth Conſulſhip with Lucius Sylla, he brought Caius, being now come to man's eſtate, into the Court, and deſigned him Princeps Iuventutis, or Prince of the Youth, and made him Præfect of a Tribe. That this title of Prince was given him by the Equites, who gave him alſo Silver Spears, he himſelf ſhewed in the Breviary of his Acts, wherein he mentioned alſo

A. u. C. 749.

Auguſtus promotes Caius and Lucius Conſuls.

Baniſhed their Mother.

Vide Uſſer. in Annal.

that the Senate and People deſigned both Caius and Lucius Conſuls, to do him Honour, though they were but Fifteen years old, that they might enter upon that Office, after five years to be reckoned from the day that they were to be brought into the Court. In his Thirteenth Conſulſhip he brought his Son Lucius into the Court, and conferred the ſame Honours upon him, that he had done three years before upon his Brother Caius, which the Coins do teſtifie, in which are the Effigies of Caius and Lucius with Bucklers and Spears, and this Inſcription, Caius and Lucius Cæſars, the Sons of Auguſtus, deſigned Conſuls, Princes of the Youth. Thus he honoured the Sons, but found Cauſe to treat the Mother quite after another faſhion. He found their Mother, and his Daughter, Julia arrived at that Exceſs of wantonneſs and Prodigality, that even in the Forum, and at the Roſtra ſhe held her Meetings and Junkettings by Night, abuſing theſe Courts with Laſcivious Acts, in which her Father had made the Law againſt Adulteries. He had believed formerly that ſhe lived no ſtrict ſort of life, but did not think ſhe had been ſo wanton and Notorious, having the ſame misfortune with other Princes to be leaſt acquainted with his own moſt intimate Concernments. Now was he ſeized with ſo extraordinary a Paſſion upon full Diſcovery of her wickedneſs, that he could not contain his grief within his own dores, but Communicated his misfortune and the diſgrace of his Family with the Senate; not being there preſent himſelf, but by a Writing which was read by the Quæſtor. For he kept himſelf from Company a long time for very ſhame, and thought of putting his Daughter to Death. At laſt he Baniſhed her to Pandataria, an Iſland of Campania, whither her Mother Scribonia did voluntarily accompany her, who had been divorced from Cæſar, that day ſhe was Delivered of her, in the Conſulſhip of L. Martius, and C. Sabinus: So that Julia was Eight and thirty years old at this time, as ſome obſerve. Her Husband now at Rhodes was not ſorry to hear theſe things, and that a Divorce was ſent her in his Name by Auguſtus his Command; yet, as he thought it his duty, he begged of him by frequent Letters to Pardon her, and though ſhe deſerved very ill, yet that he would grant her whatſoever he had given her.

Armenia Revolts.

Reduced by Caius.

75. Auguſtus in this great misfortune was diverted by being neceſſitated to caſt his thoughts upon Armenia. Pompey had only laid this Servitude upon them of that Country, to receive their Governors from Rome, and Auguſtus had ſet over them Artaraſdes (or Artabazes) with this title. Him they now expelled, ſet up Tigranes in his room, and called in the Parthians to aſſiſt in maintaining what they had done, who leaving the Alliance of the Romans, laid hold on Armenia. Auguſtus hearing of the Revolt, and of the Conjunction, was much concerned, and doubted what courſe to take. He could not manage the War himſelf by reaſon of his old Age. Tiberius had withdrawn himſelf, neither durſt he truſt any of the more powerful Citizens of Rome. Caius and Lucius were young and unfit for ſuch an undertaking; but neceſſity urging, he made choice of Caius. He had indeed before this brought them, though young, into ſome charge in the Commonwealth, and being deſigned Conſuls, ſent them about the Provinces, and Armies. He made Caius Proconſul, and Married him, thereby to procure him more Eſteem and Friends to give him Councel. His Wives Name was Lollia Paulina, the Daughter, or Neice of Marcus Lollius, whom he appointed the Governor of his Youth. It's ſaid that Caius behaved himſelf variouſly in this Expedition, ſo as to afford matter both for commendation and diſpraiſe; but through the Greatneſs and Majeſty of the Roman Name, he quieted all things. At firſt Phraates King of Parthia was no whit terrified, although Auguſtus in his Letters had not called him King, but only by his Name; but proudly Writing back again, called himſelf King, and Auguſtus nothing but Cæſar. But when he knew that Caius was come into Syria, and ſuſpected that his Subjects out of the hatred they bore him, would not be quiet at home, he obtained a Peace from him, but upon this condition, that he ſhould leave off pretenſions to Armenia. And now Artabazes being dead of a Diſeaſe, Tigranes ſent Preſents to Auguſtus, and not Writing himſelf King, begged the Kingdom. Auguſtus moved herewith, and fearing the Parthian War, accepted of his Preſents, and Commanded him with ſome hope to go into Syria to Caius; and the Armenians thought it more profitable to be reconciled to the friendſhip of the Romans, and to live in their own Country, than to joyn with the Parthians, loſe their Country, and have the Enmity of the Romans.

The birth of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

76. Auguſtus having again quieted all Nations, and ſhut the Temple of Janus the third time; having ordained a general Taxation throughout the Empire, that he might know the State and worth thereof;having alſo refuſed the name of Dominus or Lord with great earneſtneſs,which he forbad about this time even his Children and Nephews by an Edict to uſe towards him,the Lord and Heir of all things came into the World, in the fulneſs of time, revealed by the Angel Gabriel to the Prophet Daniel, for the fulfilling of the Promiſes made concerning the Seed of the Woman, which ſhould break the Serpents head. Great difference there is in aſſigning the Year of the World, wherein our Saviour was born, by reaſon of the difficulty of computation ariſing from the ſeveral Verſions of the Scriptures, the intricate and uncertain Succeſſions of the Judges, the variety of the forms of years, and the ſeveral reckonings as to parcels of ſuch as are related in Scripture. A great help for the regulation of theſe things, is afforded from Prophane Hiſtory. But it beginneth but with Cyrus, whoſe Hiſtory, as to the reſtauration of the Jews, preſenteth us with the firſt certain note of conjunction (he being ſo named both by holy and prophane Writers, but not Nebuchadneſar) and yet the duration of his Reign is alſo uncertain. Yet as from all theſe Opinions weighed together, a good account may be given in another place, more proper for the length of it, as to the Year of the World, ſo the Evangeliſt teaching us, that in the Fifteenth year of Tiberius, Chriſt was about Thirty years old, it muſt needs follow, that Auguſtus reigned Fifteen years after his Birth; ſo that if we count (as ſome do) the Reign of Auguſtus from the death of Julius Cæſar, it laſted fifty ſeven years, and then muſt Chriſt be born in the forty ſecond of it. But if we follow them (as the order of this Work doth) who with more reaſon fetch the beginning of his Empire from the death of Antony, and the Conqueſt of Ægypt, then Chriſt's Birth fell into the twenty eighth year thereof, and according to the computation which we moſt approve, into the 4003 year of the World, the 752 of the City, and the third year of the 194 Olympiad, wherein Cæſar Auguſtus himſelf the thirteenth time, and M. Plautius Silanus were Conſuls. Although Cyrenius (who was Conſul ten years before, and is called elſewhere P. Sulpicius Quirinus) might not formally be Preſident of Syria (which Office, as others ſay, was now obtained by Quintilius Varus, the Succeſſor of Saturninus, who as yet was not departed out of the Province) yet being ſet over this Taxation by Auguſtus in that place, this Title might well be given him, though he then governed Cilicia, as Herod is by Joſephus ſaid to be conſtituted Procurator of all Syria, though it had its Officers, who were to act by his aſſiſtance and direction. Herod had now reigned 37 years and odd moneths, and being deluded by the Wiſe Men, (whom he willingly ſuffered to ſearch out Chriſt, that he might deſtroy him) killed all the Children in and about Bethlehem of two years and under; which Cruelty was but agreeable with his diſpoſition and conſtant practice. Here, that we may deſcribe his Affairs, we muſt make a little digreſſion, and take them where we formerly left them.

A. M. 4003.
Ol. 194. an. 3.
V. C. 752.
Cæſare Auguſto 13.
M. Plautio Silano Coſſ.

Joſephus Antiq. l. 17. c. 7.

De bello Judaic. l. 1. c. 15.

Matth. 2. 16.

A Digreſſion to the affairs of Herod.

Joſephus Antiq. l. 15. c. 1, &c.

77. After he had obtained the poſſeſſion of his Kingdom, he put to death forty five of Antigonus his Friends, having procured him to be beheaded, as we formerly ſhewed. Then did he prefer to the High-Prieſthood one Ananel an obſcure man, neglecting Ariſtobulus the Son of Ariſtobulus the King, and Brother to his own Wife Mariamne; and Antony deſiring to ſee this Youth, for the fame of his Beauty, he fearing the Roman might advance him, to ſtay him at home, gave him the Prieſthood, and excuſed his neglect to ſend him, by the inclination of the Jews to rebellion. Perceiving him then to be in extraordinary favour with the Jews, and that his Mother Alexandra (which he kept vevy cloſe becauſe of her reſtleſs ſpirit) plotted the eſcape of her ſelf and Son into Ægypt, a year after, as he was ſwimming, he cauſed him to be drownad, and though Cleopatra accuſed him hereof to Antony, yet by Preſents he made his Peace. In the Civil Wars he ſided with Antony, who having Forces ſufficient, deſired him to chaſtiſe the Arabians, that denied the Tribute impoſed on them. This he did, and though at firſt his attempts miſcarried, yet in another Battel he quite overthrew and brought them under. After the overthrow of Antony, he had little hope that his own matters would go well. He murdered Hyrcanus, who onely ſurvived of all the Males of the Royal Family, and whom he had recalled from Babylon, whither he was carried by the Parthians. He took the advantage of the Old man's intent to flye into Arabia, through the importunity of his Daughter Alexandra, who promiſed him great things, if Herod ſhould miſcarry under the power of Auguſtus. Then providing as well as he could for the worſt, in caſe it ſhould happen, he went

He maketh away Ariſtobulus.

Idem ibid. c. 9, &c.

Is reconciled to Cæſar, having ſided with Antony.

Killeth his Wife Mariamne.

went to Rhodes to viſit Cæſar, from whom he concealed not the love he bore to Antony, but with notable courage declaring it, withal ſignified that he was ready to ſerve him as faithfully; which ſo wrought upon the Magnificent Prince, that he liked him extremely, and confirmed him in his Eſtate. After Cæſar's return out of Ægypt into Syria, he entertained him, and as he thereby procured the reputation of a noble and heroick ſpirit, ſo alſo an addition to his Kingdom. Yet was he unfortunate at home, having commanded ſeveral times, That if any thing happened in his abſence, they ſhould make away his beloved Wife Mariamne. She hearing of it, uſed him frowardly, whereat being inraged, he was throughly perſuaded to put her to death, by his Siſter Salome; which envious Woman feigned ſome accuſations againſt her. But after the deed was done, having extraordinarily loved her, he fell even mad, and thereby into a great ſickneſs, ſo that caſting off all Government, he departed to Samaria, then called Sebaſte, in honour of Auguſtus.

Cap. 11, &c.

Groweth cruel.

78. Alexandra in the mean time endeavoured to get the ſtrong places of Jeruſalem into her hands; wherewith he being acquainted, ordered her to be put to death, and then returning to the City, grew exceeding cruel and diſtaſtful. The prejudice was increaſed by his making Games in honour of Cæſar, and hanging his Theatre with Trophies, which the People ſorely diſtaſted, as being by their Religion principled againſt Pictures. Ten men conſpired againſt him, but were diſcovered and put to death. Not long after he redeemed his credit by liberality in a great dearth, and married the Daughter of Simon, whom he preferred to the Prieſthood, having diſplaced Jeſus the Son of Phabes. Then did he imploy his time and Treaſure in Sumptuous and Royal Buildings, as that of Cæſarea amongſt the reſt, formerly called the Tower of Straton; and he built a Temple to the honour of Auguſtus, who had again inlarged his Dominions, and beſtowed a Tetrarchy at his deſire upon his Brother Pheroras. To the People, which was ready to mutiny, becauſe of his Idolatry, he releaſed the third part of their Tributes, to pleaſe them, forbad all their Meetings, puniſhed ſeverely ſuch as were obſtinate, and bound the reſt to him by an Oath. After this, taking down the Old Temple of Jeruſalem, he built another much more ſtately and magnificent (being a Work of moſt admirable Beauty) in the ſpace of Nine years and ſix months; during which time, it's ſaid, that it onely rained on Nights, leſt the Work ſhould be hindred. In the dedication he ſacrificed 300 Oxen, and the reſt of the People according to their abilities. He made a Law, That Thieves which broke Walls ſhould be ſold for Slaves, out of the Kingdom. This the People ill reſented, as againſt their Religion, which not onely provided otherwiſe concerning Thieves, but would be broken alſo by theſe men, who muſt neceſſarily ſerve Idolaters. Now he himſelf fetched from Rome Alexander and Ariſtobulus his Sons by Mariamne, whom having ſent thither to be bred, Auguſtus had kindly entertained. Theſe Youths were feared by Salome and Pheroras, as intending to revenge their Mother's death, and therefore they reſolved they muſt not live, eſpecially ſhe that was incouraged by the ſucceſs ſhe had had againſt their Mother. And they preſented her with an opportunity of accuſing them, ſeeming indeed not to be well-affected toward their Father, deſiring the Kingdom, and exclaiming greatly againſt the authors of their Mother's Ruine. Herod troubled hereat, called to Court Antipater his Son, begotten when he was a private man, that oppoſing him againſt them, he might make them more careful of their behaviour. But thereby were they more incenſed, and Antipater making uſe of his time, got more and more into his Father's affections, who commended him in eſpecial manner to Cæſar, (though he had not a thought at firſt of making him his Heir) and ſent him to Rome to procure the Emperour's favour.

Repaireth the Temple at Jeruſalem.

Joſephus Antiq. l. 16. c. 1, &c.

Idem ibid. cap. 7. &c.

Accuſeth his two ſons begotten of Mariamne unto Cæſar.

79. Antipater improving his Father's diſpleaſure againſt his Brothers, wrought ſo far, that he carried them to Auguſtus then at Aquileia, and grievouſly accuſed them of an intention to poyſon him. Yet the young men by their tears, and Alexander's refutation of the calumny, ſo moved Cæſar, that he reconciled them; and for that Herod had given him three hundred Talents, & been very liberal, as his cuſtom was to be in all places, unto the people of Rome, he beſtowed on him half of the profits of the Mines in Cyprus, and gave him liberty to leave which of his Sons he pleaſed his Succeſſor; or if he would, to diſtribute his Kingdom amongſt them all, which Herod preſently would have done, but Cæſar would not permit it. In his abſence the Inhabitants of Trachonitis, a conſiderable part of his Dominion rebelled, and were reduced by his Captains. After his return he made a Speech to the People, and named to ſucceed him firſt Antipater, and then his Sons by Mariamne; which naming a Succeſſor before-hand, when the Inheritance is uncertain, hath ever wrought great inconvenience to both parties. After he had opened David's Sepulchre to ſearch for Treaſure, (as John Hyrcanus had done before him) where he found none except very coſtly attire, and Ornaments of Gold, 'tis obſerved, that his Family fell into a very ſad condition, nothing being heard but complaints and accuſations one againſt another. The greateſt part of Antipater's malice fell upon Alexander, and the Court hereby was filled with tortures and ſlaughters. Herod ſuſpecting all, and truſting none, put many to death, and thoſe of his moſt intimate Friends, and committed Alexander to Priſon, being captivated by ſo great a fear of an untimely death, that he was almoſt ready to run mad. Theſe things were diverted by the rebellion of the Inhabitants of Trachonitis (which Countrey Cæſar, having taken it from Zenodorus, gave unto him) who again revolting, were protected by Syllæus an Arabian, that being to marry his Siſter Salome was rejected, becauſe he would not turn Jew. Saturninus and Volumnius, Preſidents of Syria, reſolved he might by force of Arms chaſtize theſe Rebels; whereupon he entred Arabia, and having formerly deſtroyed their Families, which they left in their Corn Countrey, took a Caſtle they held there. Syllæus now being at Rome accuſed Herod unto Cæſar, as having waſted all Arabia; and he ſo far believed it, that he twice denied his Ambaſſadors audience. The Rebels and Arabians hereupon did him much injury, which he was glad to put up for the preſent, but ſent Nicholaus Damaſcenus to plead his cauſe.

After his rifling of David's Sepulchre, his affairs decline.

Cap. 11. &c.

Cap. 16. &c.

Putteth his Sons to death.

Joſeph Antiq. lib. 17. cap. 1. &c.

80. He firſt joyned with the Ambaſſadors of Aretas King of Arabia, in accuſing Syllæus, thence came to lay open his Forgeries againſt Herod, to whom Auguſtus was throughly reconciled, and had given him Arabia too, but that he received from him other Letters, containing another complaint againſt his Sons. For whileſt he was thus out with Cæſar, the former ſtirs were renewed in his houſe by means of Eurycles a Lacedæmonian, who winding himſelf into Alexander's acquaintance, betrayed him firſt to Antipater, and then to Herod himſelf. He denied all accuſations, except that he intended with his Wife to fly to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, her Father; but Cæſar being conſulted, as we ſaid, willed Herod to call a Council at Berytus with the Roman Preſidents, Archelaus of Cappadocia, and the reſt of his Friends and Nobility thereabout, and do as he ſhould be adviſed. He called all but Archelaus, and in an Aſſembly of 150 men declamed moſt furiouſly againſt his Sons, not producing any proof at all, further than that they intended to fly, and not ſuffering them to be preſent to anſwer for themſelves; He onely required the ſuffrages of the Aſſembly to countenance his private reſolution, which the major part giving (though Saturninus and his Sons gave an indifferent Sentence) he, acted by fury, and unnatural madneſs, cauſed them to be ſtrangled at Sebaſte. Antipater, after the death of his Brothers, quickly plotted the deſtruction of his Father, and for that he was hated by all men, procured ſome eſteem by his Gifts, and drew Pheroras into the Conſpiracy, to the iſſue of whom the Phariſes promiſed the Kingdom. For refuſing to take the Oath of Allegiance, they were fined by Herod, to whoſe Kingdom they propheſied deſtruction, and happineſs to the Family of Pheroras, becauſe his Wife payed their Fine. Herod getting out theſe things by the means of Salome, put the principal of the Phariſes to death, with others, and urged his Brother Pheroras to put away his Wife; which he refuſing to do, he baniſhed him his Kingdom. Pheroras then departing into his Tetrarchy, died ſhortly after, being viſited by Herod, who buried him honourably at Jeruſalem. Antipater ſtanding in fear of his Father, wrought by his Creatures at Rome to be ſent for by Cæſar. But this availed nothing; for in his abſence all came out, which confirmed Salome's words (to which the King in this matter had given but little credit, knowing her to be too free in accuſations) and brought vengeance upon him, notwithſtanding all his craft, for the Murther of his Brethren.

Cap. 5. &c.

A grievous Conſpiracy againſt him.

81. Pheroras his Wife being accuſed of poyſoning her Husband, her Maids were tortured, and in their pain gave ſome ſuſpicion of the conſpiracy, which was more cleared by one Antipater that had the ordering of Antipater's affairs, who confeſſed that his Maſter had compounded a poyſon, and delivered it to Pheroras to be given to the King in his abſence, and that it was kept by Pheroras his Wife: She confirmed the ſame, declaring that the Poiſon was bought in Egypt by Antipater's procurement, that it was committed to her charge, and how, that when her Husband was Sick, and Herod came out of kindneſs to viſit him, being overcome with his love he forbad her to give it him. Amongſt the Acceſſaries was Herod's own Wife, the Daughter of the High-Prieſt; ſhe was put away, her Father depoſed, and Mathias the Son of Theophilus preferred to his place; Herod alſo her Son was put out of the King's Teſtament, wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdom to him after his death. In the mean time Bathillus the Freed-man of Antipater returning from Rome was tortured, and confeſſed that he had brought with him a Poiſon to deliver to Pheroras, wherewith the King might be certainly and ſpeedily diſpatched in caſe the other ſhould fail. Antipater returned ignorant of theſe paſſages, for that almoſt every one was his Enemy, and before his Father and Quintilius Varus, though he ſought to cover his wickedneſs, all things were made plain againſt him, whereupon he was committed to cloſe Priſon. Shortly after Herod himſelf ſickned, and became exceeding teaſty and wrathful, as well for theſe things, as for that he thought the People was glad of his misfortunes, having at the inſtigation of the Doctors of their Law, cut down an Eagle of Gold of great value, that ſtood over the Portal of the Temple. But his Sickneſs more and more increaſed.

her

UMI

He ſickneth.

His ſtrange Diſeaſe.

Cap. 8. & 9.

82. His Diſeaſe was ſtrange and fearful. He burned with an inward heat, which pierced and tormented him in his Bowels. He was alſo vexed with a ravenous and inſatiable appetite, and an Ulcer in his Entrails, with a ſtrange and furious Colick. His feet were ſwoln with moiſture, and a ſhining kind of flegm, his Stomach being no leſs afflicted. His body rotted, and was full of crawling Worms, which afforded an intollerable ſtench; beſides, he was held with a filthy and troubleſom Priapiſm, a ſtrong Convulſion of his Nerves, and ſhortneſs of Breath, being generally judged thus to be puniſhed for his infinite Impieties and Sins committed againſt the Majeſty of God; and doubtleſs his intention to kill Chriſt, with the innocent blood of the Infants cried loud. He uſed all means for recovery, and went over Jordan to the hot Baths of Callirhoe. Thence returning to Jericho, a Melancholick humour ſeized on him, which rendred him unſociable, and diſpleaſed with all men. Perceiving now that he ſhould die, and ſuppoſing that the Jews would much rejoice in his death, he ſhut up many of the chiefeſt of them in the Hippodrome, and gave in charge to his Siſter Salome, and her Husband Alexas, that as ſoon as he was dead, they ſhould cauſe them all to be killed, that a Lamentation might accompany his Funeral. Before his death he received Letters from Cæſar, who gave him leave to deal with his Son as he ſaw occaſion. Antipater yet believing that he was dead, plotted how to eſcape and ſeize on the Kingdom, but his Jaylor with whom he dealt revealed it to Herod, who commanded one of his Guard inſtantly to kill him; and to ſuch an end came he for the Murther of his Brethren, and the ſad Tragedies he had raiſed in his Father's Houſe. Herod having attempted to kill himſelf, died ſome five days after his Son, in the ſeventy ſecond year of his Age, twenty ſeventh after his getting poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, and twenty ninth after he had been declared King by the Romans; 'tis uncertain how long after the Birth of Chriſt, but as is ſuppoſed not above two years, in the firſt of the 195 Olympiad, the 754 of the City, Caius Cæſar, and L. Æmilius Paulus being Conſuls. Salome and Alexas, before his death was throughly known, to their great honour diſcharged thoſe that were locked up in the Hippodrome.

He killeth his Son Antipater, who had procured the Death of his Brothers, and plotted againſt his Father's life.

And dieth.

A. D. 2.
Ol. 195. ann. 1.
V. C. 754

Cap. 10, 11, & 13.

Archelaus his Son being left his Succeſſor in Judæa,

83. Herod not long before his end renewed his Teſtament, wherein he ordained his Son Antipas Tetrarch of Galile and Peræa, having before this appointed him his Succeſſor in the Kingdom, for that he was incenſed againſt Archelaus and Philip, by the means of Antipater. Now he made Archelaus King, gave the Province Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Batanea, and Peneade to Philip, left Salome very well, and gave great Legacies to Cæſar and Livia his Wife. Archelaus at firſt was much cried up by the People; but afterwards the multitude calling to mind the death of Mathias, and his Confederates whom Herod had ſlain for breaking down the Eagle, fell into a Sedition (many flocking out of the Countrey to the Paſſeover) and demanded juſtice againſt divers of his Officers; but this tumult was ſetled by the ſlaughter of Three thouſand men about the Temple. Then went Archelaus to Rome, not daring to take upon him the title without the leave of Auguſtus, to whoſe diſpoſal his Father had referred his Teſtament. Many followed, and ſpoke againſt him, being affected better towards Antipas, the Jews alſo ſent their Ambaſſadors, with whom joyned 8000 of their Countrey-men then living at Rome, in a Petition to Cæſar, that they might be joyned to Syria, and live under Roman Governors without out any King. At length Cæſar came to this reſolution, to give half that Dominion, which Herod injoyed, unto Archelaus, viz. of Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaria, with Cæſarea, Sebaſte, Joppe, and Jeruſalem: the other half be divided betwixt Antipas and Philip. The former had the Countrey lying on the further ſide of Jordan and Galile, with 200 Talents of Annual Revenue. Philip obtained Bathanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis with 100 Talents. Archelaus had 500 Talents of yearly Rent out of his Countrey. Whileſt theſe things were in hand at Rome, grievous Seditions tore the Jews in pieces at home; for they being now deſtitute of a King, ſeveral took upon them that title: Sabinus, who ſuperintended the affairs of Cæſar there, gave the occaſion, by pilling the people, which now at the Feaſt of Pentecoſt gathering together from all quarters, ſought to ſhake off that yoak. After great ſlaughters, at length all was quieted by the coming of Varus from Antioch, who left the firſt Legion in Garriſon at Jeruſalem.

Auguſtus giveth him half of the Kingdom, and the other half to his two Brothers.

Cap. 12.

Seditions in Judæa.

84. The Succeſſion being ſetled by Auguſtus; a young man, and a Jew, born at Sidon, counterfeited himſelf Alexander the Son of Herod by Mariamne, affirming, that both he and Ariſtobulus were delivered by a Friend, who had it in charge to ſee them Executed, others being killed in their rooms. He deluded thouſands of Jews inhabiting Melus, as alſo them at Rome, by whom he was received as their King. But he could not deceive Cæſar, who made him confeſs the forgery, and becauſe he had promiſed him pardon, if he would acknowledg the deceit, for that he had formerly laboured with his hands, he condemned him to the Gallies, and put the man to death who perſuaded him to turn counterfeit. As for Archelaus, he tyrannized for ten years, and then being accuſed by the Jews, Auguſtus ſent for him to Rome, where his Cauſe being heard, he baniſhed him to Vienna in Gall, and confiſcated his Goods. After this Cyrenius being ſent into Syria to ſucceed Varus, valued the Goods of each Inhabitants, and ſeized the Eſtate of Archelaus. This Ceſſe or Valuation of their Eſtates, gave occaſion to a great Sedition, by the means of one Judas a Gaulonite, Sodoc a Phariſe, and his Confederate, alleging that this Deſcription was no other than a manifeſt token of ſervitude, and exhorting all to maintain their liberty, to no purpoſe. For Judæa now having no more Princes of its own, was governed by Deputies, of which Coponius being the firſt, was ſhortly after ſucceeded by M. Ambivius, and he by Annius Rufus.

Cap. 14.

One counterfeits Alexander the Son of Herod by Mariamne.

And is detected by Auguſtus.

Cap. 15.

Joſephus Antiq. lib. 18. c. & 3. Act. 5. 37.

Judæa governed by Deputies.

85. Now that we may return to Roman Affairs, it will be convenient to inquire after Tiberius, and ſee how the former humour of Retirement holds him. The time of his Tribuneſhip being over, he fairly confeſſed, That he went away meerly to ſhun all ſuſpicion of Envy betwixt him and the two Brothers. And he requeſted that ſeeing there was no danger of that, now that they were grown Men, and next to the Emperor in Authority, he would give him leave to ſee again his Friends, with whom he had a very great deſire to be. This would not be granted, but inſtead of leave he was bid lay aſide all care of thoſe whom he had ſo reſolutely left. Againſt his will therefore he ſtaid at Rhodes, and by his Mother's Intreaties ſcarcely obtained to be there as Legatus to the Emperor to cover the Ignominy; in the mean time, living not only privately, but in danger and fear, lurking in the middle of the Iſland to ſhun the Compliments of them that ſailed by. When Caius went to the Armenian War, he croſſed over to Chius, to preſent his Service to him, and purge himſelf from all ſuſpicions, and he was very humble both to him and his Attendants. So writes Dio, though Paterculus a great Flatterer of Tiberius talks of Caius his giving all honour to him as his Superior. Suetonius ſpeaks of his going to meet him at Samos, and that there he found him much alienated from him, through the falſe Accuſations of Marcus Lollius, being alſo come into ſuſpicion by the means of ſome Centurions devoted to him, who going to the Camp, ſeemed to tempt the Soldiers to Innovations. Auguſtus dealt ſo freely with him as to tell him plainly of it, upon which he continually implored him to ſend one to him of what Rank or Quality ſoever he pleaſed to be an Obſerver of his Words and Actions. Now left he off his uſual riding, and other Martial Exerciſes, and laying aſide the Habit of his Country, reduced himſelf to the Pallium and Crepidæ; and in this condition he continued almoſt two years, every day more contemned and hated, inſomuch that the Inhabitants of Nemauſus defaced his Pictures and Statues, and in a familiar Banquet mention being made of him, one of the Company roſe up and promiſed Caius, that if he would but ſpeak the word, he would bring him the Head of that Baniſhed Man. Not ſo much through fear now, as manifeſt danger, he was moved both by his own, and his Mother's intereſt to ſolicit his Return. But Auguſtus reſolved to do nothing in this Affair, without the conſent of Caius.

Tiberius denied to return to Rome.

86. It happened luckily for Tiberius that Caius Cæſar fell out with M. Lollius, about this time; and if the Parthians told true, juſt cauſe he had for ſo doing. They diſcovered his perfidious and ſubtle Councils, how he took Bribes of the Kings, and Robbed all the Countries of the Eaſt, whereupon he renounced Friendſhip with him, although his own Wife the Daughter or Neice of this Lollius is ſaid to have got a Gown in this Expedition ſo ſet with Pearl that it was valued at four hundred Seſtertia. The Death of Lollius happened not long after their falling out, and moſt ſay by Poiſon which he took, and he being dead Quirinius was made Governor to Caius, who ſerved Tiberius at Rhodes, being a good Friend to him, as Lollius was the Author of the ill will betwixt him and Caius Cæſar; if Tiberius himſelf was to be believed. Now then the caſe was ſo altered, that by Caius his Permiſſion Tiberius was recalled; but with condition that he ſhould bear no Office in the Commonwealth, and accordingly being come to Rome, he gave himſelf wholly to eaſe, doing ſome private Courteſies, but medling with no Publick Buſineſs. Not long after it happened, that Lucius Cæſar being appointed to go to the Armies in Spain, died at Marſeilles ſuddenly, being a man of no fame; after whoſe death, if we believe Paterculus, his Grandfather Auguſtus would have adopted Tiberius, but he fearing the Envy and Power of Caius vehemently reſiſted it. But Caius and his fear, were both ſhortly after removed out of the way. For he received a wound in Armenia, being inticed by Treachery to the Wall of a Town by one who pretended a Revolt, after which he performed no great matters. Then he began in Body to be leſs able, and in his Mind leſs diſpoſed to be profitable to the Commonwealth. And he wanted not the Company of ſuch Men as by their Flattery fomented his Vices, by which means he was come to be of that humour, that he had rather ſpend all his time in any corner of the World, than return to Rome, though his Grandfather courted him by Letters, and at laſt grieved at his Reſolution, adviſed him but to return into Italy, and he ſhould do what he pleaſed. With much Reluctancy then he complied, and put himſelf upon the way, but being brought by ſhipping into Lycia, he died at Limyra, a City of that Country, twenty two Months after his Brother Lucius. The Bodies of both Brothers were brought to Rome by the Tribunes of Armies, and the ſilver'd Bucklers and Spears they received from the Equites when they came to be Men, were hung up in the Senate-Houſe. But thus we ſee the end of both the Brothers, concerning whom this muſt be added, That they were taken out of the way, as a ſuſpicion went, by the Arts of Livia to make room for her Son Tiberius.

He is permitted to Return.

The Death of Lucius,

And of Caius Cæſar.

87. Auguſtus his third ten years being ended, undertook the Government, unwilling and by conſtraint, for ten more; and now being more gentle and unwilling to exaſperate the Senators againſt him, he would offend none of them any more. It happening that his Palace was burned, and many offering him much Money to Repair it, he accepted only an Aureus from a Body or Corporation, and a Drachme from a private man; and by an Aureus or golden Coin, Dion Caſſius tells us, he means the Nomiſma, that was twenty five Drachmes in value, as certain Greek Authors took it, whom he had read out of his love to the Attick Dialect. When his Houſe was Re-edified, he would have it be counted Publick, either becauſe the People contributed Money towards it, or becauſe he was Pontifex Maximus, and would live both in a Publick, and his own Dwelling. He made Tiberius Nero his Partner in the Tribuneſhip, which he alſo eagerly refuſed both at home and in the Senate Houſe; ſome ſay for five years, and others for ten. Another caſt of his Office he gave again as Pontifex Maximus, in ſetting right the Roman Calendar. The third Intercalary Day being ſuperfluous, which had increaſed by the Default of the Roman Prieſts, was in the Month of February omitted; but afterwards he commanded that one Day in the beginning of every fifth year ſhould be intercalated according to the Inſtitution of Cæſar, and for the perpetual obſervation of this Order, he cauſed it to be Ingraven in a Table of Braſs. And thence afterward the Accounts of Times took their riſe, this courſe being conſtantly obſerved till the change made in the Calendar by Pope Gregory the Thirteenth, in the year MDLXXIX, juſt an hundred years ago. But leſt the Fairs kept by the Romans every ninth Day, ſhould fall upon the Kalends of January, one Day was often added in the end of the precedent year, over and above the Cuſtom, and taken away again in the year following, following, that the courſe might agree with the former Inſtitution of Julius Cæſar.

Auguſtus again regulates the year.

88. About this time the People, whether out of kindneſs to him or his Daughter, earneſtly requeſted him to reſtore her: He anſwered, That fire and water ſhould ſooner meet than that ſhe ſhould be reſtored. Yet after ſome five years Confinement, they forced him to let her come out of the Iſland into the Continent, but he could never be brought to recall her all together; and when the People ſtill intreated him for her, and were very urgent with him, he uſed this Imprecation openly, That they might have ſuch Daughters, and ſuch Wives. But he was very kind to her Husband, though the People affronted him for her ſake; ſo as Ælius Catus, and Sentius Saturninus, being Conſuls on the fifth of the Calends of July, he adopted him, ſwearing before the People, that he adopted him for the Commonwealth's ſake. But the ſame day he alſo adopted M. Agrippa Poſthumus, the Brother of Caius and Lucius, and fearing that Tiberius elevated with his condition, ſhould make diſturbance, before he adopted him, he cauſed him to adopt Germanicus, the Son of his Brother Druſus, although Tiberius had a Son of his own, of his Brother's Name. Tiberius upon his Adoption, was immediately ſent into Germany, where three years before, a War had broken out, and with him Valeius Paterculus, the Hiſtorian (formerly a Tribunus Caſtrorum) ſerved in quality of Præfect of Horſe, as ſucceeding his Father in his Places, and for eight years was, as he telleth us, the Spectator of Tiberius his Heavenly Actions, either in that place, or as Legatus, and as far as his meanneſs could reach, an Aſſiſtant in them. After this, he tells his Reader, or rather Tiberius, how gladly he was received by both Cities and Soldiers in Germany; how of the Soldiers one ſaid he had ſerved under him in Armenia; and another in Rhætia, and another had received from him a Donative in the Vindelici, another in Pannonia, and a third in Germany. Upon the firſt entrance into this Country, he ſaith, the Caninefates, Attuati, and Bructeri were ſubdued, the Cheruſci were received, and the River Viſargis afterward rendred famous by the overthrow of the Romans, paſſed over, Cæſar taking upon himſelf the moſt difficult part of the War, and leaving the more eaſie to Sentius Saturninus, who had been formerly in Germany Legatus to his Father. This year's Campagne continued till the Month of December, and thereby, as he words it, procured the Emolument of a vaſt Victory.

He adopteth Tiberius.

Who is ſent into Germany.

Vide lib. 2. c.c. 104, 105, 106.

89. Now if you believe him, the Piety of Tiberius drew him back to Rome for defence of the Empire, though the paſſages of the Alps were in a manner choaked up with ſnow, and the ſame at the beginning of Spring brought him back into Germany, in the middle whereof, at the Head of the River Julia, he had appointed the Winter Quarters. The Hiſtorian falls into a Rapture conſidering how great things, requiring how great a Volume, they did the following Summer under his Conduct. All Germany was over-run. Such Nations were ſubdued, as were almoſt unknown by any Names, and thoſe of the Chauci yielded themſelves in an humble poſture before the General's Tribunal. The Longobardi were diſtreſſed, being more fierce than the very German fierceneſs. In concluſion, he tells us, that from the Rhine, as far as to the River Albis, which flowed by the Borders of the Senones and Hermundori; the Roman Army paſſed with Enſigns diſplay'd, and thither alſo by wonderful good fortune, through the care of the General, and due obſervation had of the time, came the Fleet, out of the unheard of, and formerly unknown Sea, up the Albis, and after Victory obtained over many Nations, with great plenty of all things, joyned with the Army of Cæſar; a thing which never before had been conceived in hope, never before in fact attempted. The fawning of this Writer is indeed intollerable, neither can nor ought we to relate his extravagant flouriſhes; but he ſaith, that his Cæſar being Conqueror of all Nations and Places whither he came, with a Conquering and untouched Army (except at one time, and that to the great loſs of the Enemy, who did ſomething by fraud) reduced the Legions into their Winter Quarters, and went to Rome with as much ſpeed as he had done the preceding year. Indeed nothing now in Germany remained which could be overcome, except the People called Marcomanni, who by Perſuaſion and Conduct of Maroboduus, forſaking their former Seats, and retiring into the inner Countries, had taken up the Grounds of the Hercynian Wood, and through his management, had arrived at a conſiderable, nay, æmulous greatneſs. Maroboduus was now to be feared, having ſo placed himſelf as to have Germany on his left hand, and before him Pannonia; at his right, and behind him the Norici, at all which Coaſts he might make an Impreſſion. Neither could Italy be ſecure, the beginning of his Territories being not much diſtant above two hundred Miles from the Alps. This Man and this Country did Tiberius reſolve, to fall upon the following year from ſeveral Quarters. Sentius Saturninus had Orders, that through the Territories of the Catti, cutting down the Hercynian Woods, he ſhould bring the Legions to Boiohæmus; for ſo the Region was called, which Maroboduus inhabited; and Tiberius himſelf attempted to lead the Army that ſerved in Illyricum, from Carnuntus, a place bordering on the Kingdom of Noricum againſt the Marcomanni. But Fortune ſometimes breaks, ſometimes delays the purpoſes of Men. Cæſar had prepared the Winter quarters at the Danube, and the Deſign was to be executed when Pannonia grown inſolent with eaſe, and Dalmatia truſting to its ſtrength, by conſent Rebelled, drawing all the Nations of that Tract into the Conſpiracy, and making up eight hundred thouſand Men.

Paterculus his Flatteries.

Pannonia and Dalmatia Rebel.

90. With part they determined to invade Italy, and with part Macedonia, under Conduct of two Batones and Pinnetus. In Pannonia both the Roman Diſcipline and Language was known, and alſo Learning was common, and there was a familiar Converſation. This gave them the Advantage, that no Nation managed ſuch a matter with more Diſcretion and Expedition. The Roman Citizens and Merchants were faln upon and ſlain, and many Soldiers cut off in places at greateſt diſtance from the Emperor. Macedonia was overrun and waſted with Fire and Sword, and ſo great a fear this ſtruck into the Minds of men, that Auguſtus Cæſar himſelf trembled at it: Levies therefore were made, the veterane Soldiers were recalled every where to their Colours, and both Men and Women were compelled to find Soldiers even though Libertines, the Prince being heard in Senate to ſay, That without much care was uſed, in ten days, the Enemy might face Rome: both Senators and Equites promiſed their utmoſt indeavours. Tiberius was appointed General. Paterculus was deſigned Quæſtor, and though not yet a Senator, made equal to Senators; and now being deſigned alſo Tribunus Plebis, he led part of the Army delivered by Auguſtus, to his Son. Being afterward Legatus, what wiſdom he then could not but obſerve in the Conduct of Tiberius, he declares in way of Rapture. After that, he relates how Meſſala Governor of Illyricum, with the twentieth Legion half full, though ſurprized with the Rebellion, defeated and put to flight the Enemy. How that part of their Forces, which oppoſed it ſelf to Cæſar, not daring to ingage, ſeized on the Claudian Hill, and there fortified it ſelf. Another that met with the Army which came from the Tranſmarine Provinces, under the leading of A. Cæcina, and Sylvanus Plautius, Men of Conſular Dignity, put the Auxiliaries of Thrace to flight, falling upon them e're the unwary Captains thought of an Ingagement; and had not the valour of the Roman Soldier exceeded the Courage and Abilities of their Officers, the whole Party had miſcarried; but when many Centurions and Tribunes were loſt, and much hurt received, the Legions exhorted one another to play the Men, and wreſted the Victory out of the Hands of the Rebels.

Reduced.

91. Thus this War was full of Difficulties at firſt, but was in three years concluded by Tiberius. Pannonia firſt asked Peace. Bato and Pinetus both came into the hands of the Romans, the one being taken, and the other yielding himſelf, and though the Dalmatians were hard to be overcome by reaſon of the difficult ſituation of their places, the fierceneſs of their Natures, and their great Abilities in Matters of War, yet they were not long after reduced, being almoſt ruined. While Tiberius was here in Germany, the Ambaſſadors of the Parthians having delivered their Meſſage at Rome, were ordered to repair to him; being ſent by the Nobility to deſire to have for King one of the three Sons of Phraates, that remained Hoſtages at Rome. Hereupon Vonones was preferred before the reſt, and being aided by Cæſar, was joyfully accepted by the Parthians for ſome time. In the mean while, that we may return into Italy, Paterculus tells us, That Agrippa, who had been adopted the ſame day that Tiberius was, by his natural Grandfather, and for two years before had given ſufficient notice how he would prove by his wonderful pravity of mind, being inclined to run headlong into miſchief, alienated from him the affections of his Father and Grandfather Auguſtus; and his Vices every day increaſing, he had ſuch an end as he deſerved. His end followed afterward, and was brought about by Tiberius, whom Paterculus flatters, as ſuch a virtuous and deſerving Perſon as ſcarcely ever the like, writing a Panegy-rick to him, rather than an Hiſtory to another Reader. But we are told from other hands, that Auguſtus did proſcribe his only Nephew M. Agrippa Poſthumus, who was unlearned indeed and fooliſh, fierce out of a proud conceit of his ſtrength, but yet found Guilty of no Crime; and that confiſcating all his Goods to the Military Treaſury, he Baniſhed him into Planaſia, an Iſland near to Corſica.

A Conſpiracy againſt Auguſtus.

Livia procures Pardon for the Parties.

92. But Auguſtus after he had adopted Tiberius and Agrippa, thinking himſelf ſtrengthened by ſuch an Addition, went about another Purging and Modelling of the Senate. Few now quitted it of their own Accord as formerly, but ſome were caſt out whether they would or not. That he might not ſeem to do this as Cenſor, to do the work and ſolemnize the Luſtrum, he took Proconſular Power. Several Young men both of Senatorian and Equeſtrian Dignity, fallen to decay without any Crime, he recruited. Taking notice how many Slaves were now Manumitted, he ordained of what Age both the Lord and the Manumitted Perſon ſhould be, and other Rules to be obſerved both by Patrons and others toward Manumitted Perſons. In the mean time was diſcovered a Conſpiracy againſt him, the chief Author whereof was found to be Cn. Cornelius Cinna Magnus, the Nephew of Pompey the Great by his Daughter. He knew not what courſe to take; for if he put them to death, he feared he ſhould not thence free himſelf from the Plots of others; and if they were not puniſhed, it would incourage others to do the like. He was not able to reſt Night nor Day by reaſon of theſe anxious Cares, till Livia his Wife, took notice of his trouble, and got the matter out of him. Dion Caſſius relates, a Conference betwixt them, whether real or framed by himſelf, but the iſſue of it was this, that Auguſtus moved by her Arguments to methods of Clemency, only corrected the guilty Perſons by words, and ſo diſmiſſed them; nay, he deſigned Cornelius to be Conſul. And the Hiſtorian tells us, That by ſo doing, he ſo far obliged all men to him, that thenceforth not only no more Conſpiracies were made againſt him; but not the leaſt ſuſpicion was had of any; but ſo by the means of Livia, was Cornelius preſerved, though ſhe was ſuſpected afterward to have procured the Death of Auguſtus himſelf. In the Conſulſhip of the ſaid Cornelius, and Valerius Meſſala, horrible Earthquakes happened, and Tiber ſo ſwelled, that it brake down the Bridge, and made Rome Navigable for ſeven days; the Sun was Eclipſed, and there was a Famine. The Senators and Equites began to behold the Circenſian Games apart, which was afterward obſerved. And the Nobility being backward to give their Daughters to be Veſtal Virgins, a Law was made, that thoſe of Libertine condition might become Preiſts in that College, and a Diſpute being made about it by many, ſome were choſen by lot in the Senate, their Fathers being preſent; but not one was taken in to be a Veſtal.

The Legions of Auguſtus remaining in the time of Dio.

93. At this time the Soldiers grievouſly complained of the ſcantneſs of their Pay, and the rewards they received for their Service, and the more for being apprehenſive of impending Wars, and none would bear Arms beyond the term allotted to warfare. Hereupon it was Decreed that to the Prætorian Cohorts ſhould be given after they had ſerved ſixteen years, Five thouſand Drachmes, and to others after the ſervice of twenty years, Three thouſand, man by man. At this time were maintained three and twenty Legions of Roman Citizens, or as ſome affirmed, twenty five, whereas in the days of Dion Caſſius, when he wrote his Hiſtory, only nineteen remained, which he mentioneth in particular. Namely, the ſecond Legion Auguſta, which wintered here in the upper Britain, Three that bore the Name of Tertia, viz. One in Phœnicia, called Gallica; another in Arabia, called Cyrenaica; and a third called Auguſta. There was a fourth known by the name of Scythica in Syria; a fifth Macedonica in Dacia; two ſixths viz. one in Lower Britain, called Victrix, and another in India, named Ferrea; there was a ſeventh in Upper Myſia, and called Claudia. An eighth was Auguſta in the Upper Germany. Then two Decimæ; one called Gemella in the Upper Pannonia, and another in Myſia. An eleventh in the Upper Myſia, had the Name of Claudia, both it and the former having received the Name from Claudius, becauſe they did not Rebel againſt him in the Sedition of Camillus. A twelfth was Fulminifera in Cappadocia. A thirteenth Gemella in Dacia. A fourteenth Gemella in Upper Pannonia. A fifteenth was Sirnamed from Apollo, and lay in Cappadocia. A twentieth Valeriana and Victrix had their Stations in the Upper Britain. Theſe were the Legions of Auguſtus remaining when Dio wrote, the reſt being either Disbanded, or by him and other Emperors mixed with other Legions, whence the Names of Gemellæ are thought, to have been derived.

Such as were inſtituted by ſucceeding Princes.

Other Guards.

De Magnitudine Rom. lib. 1. c. 4. c. 10.

94. And becauſe he had undertaken to ſpeak of the Legions, he further tells us, He thinks fit to mention ſuch as were afterwards inſtituted by following Princes, that thoſe who deſired to know their Originals, might underſtand it better in one continued diſcourſe; Having the ſame Reaſon as he to inform the Reader, we ſhall follow him herein. Nero then inſtituted the firſt Legion called Italica, Wintering in the Lower Myſia: Galba the firſt Auxiliary in the Lower Pannonia; the Seventh in Spain. Veſpaſian the Second Auxiliary in the Lower Pannonia, and the fourth Flavia in Syria. Domitian the firſt Minervia (or Athenienſis) in Lower Germany. Trajan the Second Ægyptia, and the Thirtieth Germanica, to which he gave his Name. Marcus Antoninus the Second in Noricum, the Third in Rhætia, which were alſo called Italica. Severus the Firſt and Third Parthia in Meſopotamia, and the Second Media in Italy. So many Legions Dio took notice of, beſides that of the City and the Prætorian in his time. Under Auguſtus Twenty three or twenty five were maintained (he addes) and many other Auxiliary Companies of Horſe and Foot, and Sea-men, of which he knew not the certain number. The Guard (ſaith he) of the Emperor's Perſon, conſiſts of Ten thouſand divided into ten Parties. Six thouſand are appointed for a Guard to the City, divided into Four Companies. Then are there the Strangers, Horſemen, called Batavi, from Batavia, an Iſland in the Rhine, the Inhabitants of which excell in the Art of Riding; of them and of the Evocati he confeſſeth he knew not the Number. Auguſtus then began firſt to uſe them, when he called together the Veteran Soldiers of his Father againſt Antony, and ſo kept them; and they continued to be a peculiar Body, bearing Staves as the Centurions. Upon theſe Accounts wanting Money, he conſulted the Senate concerning the Eſtabliſhment of a perpetual Revenue, whence without injuring any Perſon he might maintain and reward his Soldiers. They buſying themſelves herein, and no man of his own accord ſeeking to be Ædilis, ſome were choſen by Lot from amongſt the Queſtors and Tribuni Plebis, and conſtrained to Execute the Office, as often at other times was practiſed. Thus much Dio writes concerning the Legions and other Forces of the Empire, which indeed grew and increaſed, and again decreaſed as the State had need they ſhould. Some reckon in Galba's time One and thirty Legions. In the Court of the Capitol was found a Stone, having the ſame Number of them as Dio, with ſome variety in the Names. As for the Evocati, we ſcarcely know what they were; but Lipſius points us to a certain place in Suetonius, which he thinks to make out the ſignification of the word. Speaking of Galba his being ſaluted Emperour, and of his Liſting Supernumerary Soldiers above the former Army, and chuſing a Council reſembling a Senate, to which he would have things of conſequence referred, he addes, That he made choice of Young Men of the Equeſtrian Order, who retaining the uſe of Golden Rings, were called Evocati, and were to watch about his Bed-Chamber in the room of Soldiers.

Auguſtus Erects a Military Treaſury.

95. But ſuch were the Forces Auguſtus thought fit to raiſe and maintain; it was another thing to procure the Money. In the Conſulſhip of M. Æmilius Lepidus, and L. Arruntius, and the DCCLIX. of the City, no Revenue could be found out whereon to fix the Expence which ſhould be approved by all ſorts of perſons, who yet were vexed that there ſhould be ſuch need of inquiring after it. Auguſtus then for himſelf and Tiberius brought in Money to a Treaſury which he named Military, and committed the Charge thereof to three Perſons of Prætorian Rank choſen by Lot, and that for Three Years, who ſhould be attended with two Lictors, and other Servants; which Ceremony was obſerved for ſeveral years, but in Dio's time they were choſen by the Emperour, and had no Lictors. But Money being thus paid in by him, and he promiſing to do it every Year, ſeveral Kings and People alſo ſubſcribed; for as for private perſons, though there were alſo that offered, he would receive nothing. For all this Revenue would not in the leaſt anſwer the Expence, and there being ſtill need of conſtant ſupply, he ingaged the Senators every one in particular to find out a way, and deliver it in Writing to be conſidered of by him; which he did not therefore do, becauſe he found out none himſelf; but that they might be brought to approve that courſe which he was reſolved to follow. Many being propounded, but none approved, he ordained that the Twentieth part of Inheritances and Legacies, thoſe excepted which were left to the near of Kin and to the Poor, ſhould be brought into this Military Treaſury; and he did it, as having found this ſort of Payment in the Commentaries of Cæſar. Indeed there had been formerly mention made of this thing, it was put off till this time. But ſo was the Reveuue increaſed, and then Auguſtus ordered three Perſons from amongſt the Conſulares to be choſen by Lot, partly to Contract, and partly to take away Expences.

A great Famine at Rome.

96. But theſe things were no whit pleaſing to the Romans, who were beſides at this time afflicted with a grievous Famine: It was ſo urgent, that the Gladiators and ſaleable Slaves were ſent away to Eighty miles diſtance from the City, and as well Auguſtus himſelf, as many others ſent away their Servants; non-term was proclaimed; Senators were permitted to go whither they pleaſed: And leſt the Senatuſconſulta ſhould thereby be of leſs force, it was decreed, That ſuch as ſhould be made by thoſe that continued at Rome, ſhould be valid. Men of Conſular Dignity were appointed to Overſee the Corn and Bread, ſo that a certain quantity thereof ſhould be ſold to particular Perſons. Auguſtus gave as much Corn gratis to thoſe who were wont to receive it from the Publick, as they were wont to have; and yet all this being too little, he would not ſuffer them to Eat publickly on his Birth-day. And whereas the City was in ſeveral Quarters much defaced by Fires, he appointed a Watch of the Libertini in ſeven places to prevent them, and over this Watch ſet a Perſon of Equeſtrian Degree; and though he did not intend they ſhould Continue, yet finding them very ſerviceable, he thought fit to Continue their Imployment; and when Dion Caſsius lived, thoſe Night-Watchers were in being, but conſiſting as well of other Soldiers, as the Libertini, who had Charge alſo of the Walls, and received publike Wages. But the Common ſort now harraſſed with Famine, Tribute and Fires, was much inraged, and openly talk't many things Seditiouſly, and deſired a Change, and many Libels were thrown about by Night, one P. Rufus being reported to be chief Author of theſe Miſdemeanors. But the Suſpicion light upon others, and indeed Rufus himſelf was abſent, and not in Capacity to be Mover of ſuch matters, but others under his Name went abont to make an Alteration. An Inquiſiion was decreed to be made into the Offence; Judges were appointed, and had Salaries allotted, and ſome were accuſed as guilty. But the Tumults ceaſed not in the City till the Scarcity being over, Germanicus Cæſar, and Tiberius Claudius Nero, the Sons of Druſus, in honour of their Father, ſet forth a Show of the Gladiators. The People was pleaſed that this was done in memory of Druſus, as alſo that Tiberius, when he dedicated the Temple of Caſtor and Pollux not onely ſet upon it the Name of Claudianus, (for ſo he called himſelf after he was adopted into the Family of Auguſtus, inſtead of Claudius) but of Druſus alſo; for it was his cuſtom, whileſt he managed Wars abroad, to come to the City as often as he might, partly to do ſome buſineſs, but chiefly out of fear leſt Auguſtus ſhould prefer any other in his Abſence. This Year the Governor of Achaia dying when but half of his time was out, one part of his Province lying within the Iſthmus, was aſſigned to his Queſtor, and the other part to his Legatus. Herod of Paleſtine being accuſed by his Brethren, was baniſhed beyond the Alpes, and part of his Dominions were made publick. Of this we ſhall hear from other Hands more fully than from Dio.

Stirs in the Provinces.

97. At this time he tells us thete were many Wars. Into many Countreys Invaſions were made by Rovers, inſomuch that Sardinia for ſeveral years had no Senator to govern it, but had Soldiers and Officers of the Equeſtrian Rank. Not a few Cities attempted to Revolt, ſo that the Provinces belonging to the People of Rome, for two years were governed not by ſuch as were choſen by Lot, but by Suffrages; whereas ſuch for many years were wont to præſide over the Provinces of Cæſar. The Iſauri began with Depredations, but proceeded to a War, and were overthrown. The Gætuli not enduring to be ſubject to Juba, roſe up againſt him, waſted his Borders, and killed many Romans, whom he imployed together with his own Army, and thereupon they were ſo Elevated and made ſuch work for Cornelius Coſſus, that for ſubduing them he obtained Triumphal Honours, and the Sirname of Gætulicus. Several Expeditions were made into Germany, and by Tiberius as well as others, who pierced as far as Veſurgis and Albis; and yet no very memorable thing was done, though both Auguſtus and he received the Name of Imperator from the Germans, and C. Sentius who governed that Province had Triumphal Honours; becauſe out of fear of them the Germans had twice made Peace with the Empire. They did not deſerve to have it granted, having violated their Faith, but the Affairs of Dalmatia and Pannonia were now ſo unſettled, and required ſuch ſpeedy Correction as wreſted it from the Romans. The Dalmatians not enduring the burthen of the Tributes laid upon them, having been formerly formerly inclined to rebel, were now encouraged to perfect their Reſolution, becauſe that Valerius Meſſalinus (ſo he calls him) the Governour of both Countries, was gone to the War which Tiberius now the ſecond time made in Germany. At firſt ſome few rebelled, at the ſuggeſtion, eſpecially, of one Bato Dyſidiatus, and overthrew the Romans that went againſt them, by whoſe Example the reſt broke out into rebellion. Then the Brenci, a People of Pannonia, taking for their Leader another Bato, went to Sirmium, which was held by a Garriſon of the Romans; And might have taken it, but that Cæcina Severus, who governed the Neighbouring Myſia, hearing of their Motions, met with and defeated them at the River Dranus. Notwithſtanding the Victory, yet many of the Romans having faln in the Battel, the Rebels hoped they might recruit by the aſſiſtance of their Friends, to procure which, they bent their utmoſt endeavours. In the mean time, Bato the Dalmatian, made an Inroad as far as Salonæ, where he received a great Bruiſe by a Stone, and returning without having any thing performed, ſent others on the ſame Errand, who waſting all the Maritime Tracts as far as Apollonia, in ſeveral Encounters with the Romans, both gave and received Defeats.

The Rebellion of the Dalmatians and Pannonians.

98. Tiberius having notice of theſe Diſorders, and fearing the Rebels might Invade Italy, ſent before him Meſſalinus, and then followed with greater Forces out of Germany. Bato though not fully recovered of his Bruiſe, met and fought with Meſſalinus, and had the better of him; but afterwards was Circumvented and beaten, and then he betook himſelf to the other Bato Breucus, and they joyntly ſeized on the Hill Alma. There they were worſted by Rhymetalces the Thracian, whom Severus had ſent againſt them, and afterward ſuſtained the Violence of Severus himſelf; and when he was called away into Myſia by the Daci and Sauromatæ, there infeſting that Country, and Tiberius with Meſſalinus ſtayed at Siſcia, they took the advantage, and invading the Territories of the Allies of Rome, drew many into Rebellion with them. Tiberius came up with them; but they refuſed to give him Battel, and wandered up and down waſting all things in their paſſage with Celerity, to which their Skill in the Country and the lightneſs of their Habit did Contribute, Winter now drawing on. Some of them again invaded Macedonia, but were ſet upon and defeated by Rhymetalces and Raſcupolis his Brother, and the reſt having their Territories depopulated, when Q. Cæcilius Creticus and A. Licinnius Nerva Silanus were Conſuls, left them and retired to Places more fortified by Nature, whence they made Incurſions upon occaſion. Auguſtus having notice of theſe paſſages, ſuſpected Tiberius as out of deſign to have a Command, drawing out the War in length, when he might put an end to it. Thither he ſent Germanicus, now bearing the Office of Quæſtor, and with him Soldiers not only ingenuous, but Freedmen, many of whom he redeemed both from Men and Women with Victuals ſufficient for Six Months. As he made this Proviſion for the War, he put off the Choice of Equites, which was wont to be performed in the Forum, and vowed to Celebrate the Ludi Magni upon ſome Prophecies pretended to be uttered by a certain inſpired Woman. And though he knew well enough ſhe was a Counterfeit, and acted a part out of Deſign, yet the People being exceedingly perplexed both by reaſon of the Wars, and of a Dearth which again oppreſſed them, he made a ſhow as if he gave credit to what ſhe ſaid, and did all he could to give ſatisfaction to the Multitude.

Agrippa Poſthumus his Extravagancies.

99. The charge of Proviſions he again committed to two Conſulares, to whom he allowed Lictors. When there wanted Money for carrying on Wars, and maintaining of night-Watches, he ſetled a Tribute conſiſting of the fiftieth part of price given for ſlaves; and he forbad the Money which the Quæſtors were wont to lay out upon the ſhows of Gladiators to be expended. Now that he ſent Germanicus, and not Agrippa to the War, our Writer tells us; the ſervile Diſpoſition and Humour of Agrippa himſelf, was the cauſe, who ſpent his time in Fiſhing and at Sea, and thence took upon him the Name of Neptune, fell out into Extravagant Paſſions; railed at Julia as his Step-mother; and not ſeldom accuſed Auguſtus as guilty of retaining his Father's Eſtate: when he would not be reclaimed, he was proſcribed by Auguſtus, his Eſtate was confiſcated to the Military Treaſury, and he himſelf baniſhed into Planaſia, an Iſland near to Corſica. Now Germanicus was got into Pannonia, and all the Forces marched thither; but the two Batones obſerving the time when Severus came from Myſia, ſuddenly fell upon him as he incamped himſelf in the Volcæan Fens, and worſted him, after which the Romans were diſperſed to invade the Enemy in ſeveral Quarters. No great matters were performed by other Parties; yet Germanicus overcame in fight, and much damnified the Macæi, a Nation of Dalmatia. The year following in the Conſulſhip of M. Furius Camillus, and Sextus Nonius Quintilianus, both Pannonians and Dalmatians deſired Peace, being diſtreſſed by Famine, and a Diſeaſe thence ariſing, from their feeding on Herbs and Roots, to which they were not accuſtomed. They deſired it by their Ambaſſadors, and yet ſtill made reſiſtance through the procurement of them who expected no Security from the Romans. As Germanicus was beſieging a certain ſtrong City, and could not take it, one Pulio an Eques and German by Nation, caſt a Stone at the Wall, which ſo broke and diſordered the Battlement, that a man leaning againſt it, it fell down; and this ſo affrighted the Defendants, that they fled into the Caſtle, which afterwards they yielded up with themſelves. Bato the Dalmatian treated with Tiberius, and the day after being brought before him, as he ſate on the Tribunal, Tiberius asked him, For what Reaſon they would revolt, and continue in Rebellion ſo long againſt the Romans? He anſwered him thus, You your ſelves are in fault, who appoint to the keeping of your Flocks not Dogs nor Shepherds, but Wolves. But ſo Dalmatia, partly by force of War, and partly by Compoſition returned into Obedience to the Romans.

100. At this time Auguſtus gave the Senate leave to take Cognizance of moſt things in his Abſence, and abſtained from appearing in Publick. And as in the preceding year, when Diſturbances were great, he himſelf made all the Magiſtrates: now ſuch as he would have advanced, he commended to the People. He was during the Wars in Pannonia and Dalmatia ſo intent upon them, that for better Correſpondence, and to give Directions, he betook himſelf to Ariminum, whither when he went, Vows were made, and at his return Sacrifice was offered, as if he had returned from the Field. About the ſame time, Bato the Breucus, having betray'd Pinnes, and for a reward received the the Kingdom of the Breuci, was taken by his Nameſake, the other Bato (who it ſeems for all his meeting with Tiberius, was ſtill his own Man) and put to Death as he went about the Garriſons to require Hoſtages: He had him delivered up by ſome that held a Caſtle whither he had entred, and carrying him to the Camp, condemned him. After this, ſtill many other Pannonians rebelled, but Silvanus had the better of them, and Bato ſeeing no hope to be remaining in Pannonia, fortified the Paſſages out of that into Dalmatia with Guards, and waſted this Country. The Pannonians ſeeing alſo their Territories harraſſed by Sylvanus, received terms, though they could not for ſome time be reſtrained from Robberies; to which theſe Nations were extremely addicted. Tiberius againſt Winter, wherein Q. Sulpicius Camerinus, and C. Poppæus Sabinus were Conſuls, came to Rome, and was met by Auguſtus in the Suburbs. He brought him into the Septa, and ſaluting the People from the Tribunal, performed what was wont to be done at celebrating Victories, and particularly exhibited the Spectacula by the aſſiſtance of the Conſuls. The Equites now were mightily concerned to have a Law abrogated, which had been made concerning unmarried Perſons, and ſuch as had no Children. He therefore called before him ſuch of them as were Batchellors, as alſo thoſe that were Married, and had Children, each ſort apart and by themſelves.

Pannonia ſubmits.

Dio lib. 56.

Auguſtus makes a Speech to incourage the Married Equites,

101. Finding the Married ſort to be far inferior in number to the unmarried, he was troubled thereat, and firſt ſpoke his mind unto them, if our Hiſtorian doth doth not make his Speeches for him, to this purpoſe. He applauded them both, for ſerving the ends of Nature, and of civil Society. Shewed how Mankind, was ordained, Male and Female, by Conjunction, as it were, to prevent Mortality; and how without Children, as the Species it ſelf could not ſubſiſt, ſo no Commonwealths could be ſupplied, either with Men for War, or Civil Imployments. He told them they alone deſerved the Name of Men and of Fathers, and as ſuch he both praiſed them, and would prefer them as occaſion ſhould ſerve, to ſuch Offices as they might tranſmit to their Children. And to ſome of them he preſently gave rewards; and promiſed to do the ſame to others of them. To the Batchellors, he made a Speech quite contrary, affirming, He was marvellouſly troubled becauſe of them, whom he knew not by what name to call. Not by that of men, for they performed no manly thing; not by that of Citizens, for the City might come to an end and periſh for all them; neither by that of Romans, for they intended to deſtroy the Roman Name. But by what Name ſoever they called themſelves, or whoever they were, he ſaid an unuſual thing had happened to him upon their Account. For he was wont to leave nothing undon, whereby to make of them a great multitude, but now he was as ſorry to ſee them ſo many, and could have wiſhed the number of them to whom he ſpake before, to have been as great, and that they had either been joined with them, or not ſeen by him: foraſmuch as without having regard to the Providence of the Gods, or the forecaſt of their Anceſtors, they purpoſed to aboliſh their Nation, deſtroy the Roman Name, and put an abſolute end unto it. What ſeed or remainder, ſaith he, of Mankind would be left, if all People ſhould imitate you? and the beginning of miſchief proceeding from you, you were juſtly to ſuſtain the blame of Univerſal Ruine. And if none ſhall follow your example, for this very cauſe all muſt hate you, ſeeing you neglect that which none other do, and introduce ſuch Rules and Courſes of living, as if all would imitate them, Mankind muſt fail and be loſt; but if it hate and diſapprove them, you muſt be condemned. He affirmed, That all Crimes laid together, would not equal theirs. For they committed Murther in not ſuffering thoſe to be born, which ought to proceed from them; they were guilty of Impiety, in forcing the Names and Honours of their Anceſtors to ceaſe; they were Sacrilegious in aboliſhing their Kind, which proceeded from the Immortal gods, and deſtroying Humane Nature, the greateſt thing conſecrated to them; and in this reſpect they overturned their Temples, and their Altars; they diſſolved the City in not obeying its Laws; betrayed their Country by making it Barren and unfruitful; nay, utterly demoliſhed the City, in depriving it of Inhabitants. For a City conſiſts not in Houſes, Porticus's or Forums void of Inhabitants; but in Men.

And to the Batchellors in behalf of Marriage.

102. He farther bad them conſider what Romulus their Founder would think of them; and if he would not be angry to purpoſe, when he compared his Original with their courſe of life, who refuſed to beget Children even by lawful Marriage. And what thoſe Romans that were with him would think, recollecting that they raviſhed Virgins that were Strangers; whereas theſe their Poſterity would not love thoſe that were of the ſame ſtock with themſelves; that they entred into War to procure an Offspring, and theſe would not endeavour to have Children by their fellow Citizens. He urged the caſe of Curtius, who died that the Romans might not want Marriage, and of Herſilia that followed her Daughter, and ſhewed to the Citizens Nuptial Rites. In truth their Anceſtors, he ſaid, in behalf of Marriage, waged War with the Sabines, and that Peace was made, which they by their cœlibacy did break and diſſolve. And to what purpoſe, and with what deſign? to live in cœlibacy as the Veſtal Virgins? If ſo, they ought to be puniſhed as well as they, if they did not preſerve their Chaſtity. He told them, they ought not to be diſpleaſed, at what he ſaid, for if they were diſpleaſed with his words, he, and their fellow Citizens had much more reaſon to be diſpleaſed with their Actions. Therefore if they found themſelves touched, he adviſed them to repent, that in ſtead of reprehending, he might commend and thank them for the time to come, as owning what a good Legiſlator ought to eſtabliſh. He told them, That before his time it was not lawful for any to neglect Marriage and Poſterity; Laws having been made againſt it at the firſt founding of the Commonwealth, and the Senate and People having ſince that, ordained many things againſt it. That he had increaſed the Mulct of unmarried Perſons to render them Obedient, and appointed ſuch Rewards to the Obedient, as never formerly had been propoſed, as an Incouragement for any Virtue; that if nothing elſe, yet theſe Advantages might provoke them to Wedlock, and the Procreation of Children. But for their parts, they neither deſiring the Rewards, nor regarding the Penalties, but as if they lived in no Society or Commonwealth, gave out that they made choice of a Life that was free and void of trouble, without Matrimony or Children; whereas in ſo doing they were no better than Thieves and Robbers, and the moſt ſavage Beaſts. For really they were not ſo far taken with any ſolitary kind of life, as to live without Women, or not to have a Bedfellow or Companion at the Table, but by this courſe ſtudied how to gratifie their wanton Luſt and Appetite.

103. Yet he had permitted them to court ſuch Virgins as were not quite ripe for Marriage, that pretending to the title of Sponſi, who would ſhortly celebrate the Nuptials, they might the more look after their Families; and he had allowed the Marriage of Libertinæ to thoſe that were not Patricians. Neither had he put them upon any haſte, having given them firſt the ſpace of three years, and then of two. But neither by threatning, exhorting, deferring or intreating, had he gained any thing. They could not but perceive how many more they were than the Married men, whereas they ought to have produced as many, nay, as many more in their Progeny. By what other courſe was the Nation to be continued? How could the Commonwealth be preſerved without Wives and Children, except they expected the Fable to be fulfilled of Perſons riſing out of the Earth? For ſhame he bad them eſteem it the greateſt wickedneſs after the Extinguiſhment of the Roman Stock and Name; to deliver over their City to Strangers, whether Greeks or Barbarians. Shall we, ſaith he, for this reaſon manumit our Slaves becauſe we would have many Citizens? Shall we give freedom of the City to our Aſſociates, that it may be filled with People, and you who from the firſt Original are Romans, having reckoned up the Quinti, Valerii, and Julii, reſolve together with your ſelves to deſtroy all ſuch Names and Families? I am aſhamed with words to ſet forth what it is that you practice. Therefore put a ſtop to your madneſs, and now at length conſider, that many of us being conſumed with Wars and Diſeaſes, the City cannot be ſafe, except it be ſupplied with a ſtock of Children. Yet let no body think I am ignorant that there are ſome difficult and troubleſom Occurrents in Marriage and Procreation of Children; but you ought to conſider, that there is nothing good that hath not ſome bitterneſs mixed with it; that the greateſt and moſt excellent injoyments have many ſad and harſh things joyned with them, which if you would decline, you muſt not deſire the good themſelves, ſeeing we cannot attain to ſincere Virtue or Pleaſure, except labour be uſed to attain them. Though Matrimony have its Inconveniences, yet compare the Advantages and them together, and you ſhall find them over-ballanced by far, not only as to the Conveniences which the thing in its own Nature affords, but as to the Rewards alſo propoſed by the Laws, of which a little part doth allure ſome men to undergo Death it ſelf; and theſe ought to induce you all to obey me. And it's a ſhameful thing, if for the ſame reaſon you will not marry Wives, and bring up Children, for which others will not ſtick to give their lives. I thought fit (Citizens, for I hope you are now perſuaded to retain this Name, and to accept of thoſe of Husbands and Fathers) thus to expoſtulate with you, unwillingly truly, but out of neceſſity; not as an Enemy, or one that hates you, but out of love, and deſire to have many like your ſelves; ſo that inhabiting lawful Houſes, and having our Habitations full of a Roman Offſpring, we may approach to the gods, with our Wives and Children, and Communicating with one another in all Publick things may converſe together in the injoyment of them. For how can I be ſaid to govern you, if I ſuffer always ſome part of you to be diminiſhed? How can I be called any more your Father, if you beget no Offſpring? Therefore if you really love me, and have given me the Name of Father, for Honour, and not out of Flattery, do your endeavour to become Husbands and Fathers; ſo that you may be partakers of it, and I my ſelf may not bear it in vain. Having ſpoken in this manner to both ſorts, he increaſed the Rewards of ſuch as had Children, and made a difference by ſetting a Mulct upon Batchellors, yet ſo, as he gave them the ſpace of a year to conſider; and ſuch as would obey him ſhould be free from the Mulct. Nay, he was ſo kind, that whereas by the Law called Lex Voconia, Women were Prohibited to come to any Inheritance above a certain Sum, he looſed ſome from that Obligation; and beſtowed upon ſuch as had vowed perpetual Virginity, the [illegible]me Rewards as upon Mothers. In order to theſe things, was framed the Law Pappia Poppæa, preferred by M. Pappius Mutilus, and E. Poppæus Secundus, who being Conſuls for part of the year, neither of them had either Wives or Children; by which very thing Dio ſuggeſts how neceſſary it was that that Law ſhould be made.

Tiberius ſent again into Dalmatia.

104. While theſe things were done at Rome, the Romans that with Germanicus, marched againſt Rhætinum, a City of Dalmatia, received loſs by Fire, wherewith the beſieged did ſurround them, and retired themſelves within the Caſtle. Several Towns were taken, yet many ſtill held out, and a Famine being by this means occaſioned in Italy, Auguſtus ſent Tiberius again into Dalmatia. He perceiving the Soldiers were impatient to finiſh the War, though it were with danger to the State, that being together, they might be able to plot new Matters, divided them into three Parties, whereof one he committed to Silanus, another to M. Lepidus, and with the third he and Germanicus went againſt Bato. Silanus and Lepidus without difficulty overcame their Adverſaries in Battel. Tiberius over-ran the Country, and ſtill purſued Bato, till he beſieged him in a Caſtle called Anderium, which was extraordinarily fortified by ſituation, and that Proviſion viſion they had made within for ſuch extremity. Nay, they laid Ambuſcado's to ſtop the beſiegers from forage, ſo that Tiberius beſieging them, in a manner was beſieged. He knew not what to do, the Siege being troubleſom and dangerous, and yet he thought it would be very ignominious to raiſe it, and the Soldiers fell into a Mutiny, with ſuch a noiſe that the Enemy who watched under the Caſtle out of very fear retired from their Station. Tiberius being partly pleaſed and partly angry at what had paſſed, both rebuked and commended his Army, and yet not daring to ſtir, he kept himſelf quiet till ſuch time as Bato ſent and deſired Peace, and his Allies being not perſuaded to imbrace it, he forſook them, and refuſed to give them any relief upon demand. Hereupon Tiberius deſpiſed them that kept the Caſtle, and reſolving to Storm it, moved his Men by Arguments to mount the Precipice on which it ſtood, and by conſtant Supplies ſo incouraged them, that part of the Defendants having iſſued out and betaken themſelves to the Woods, were purſued and knock'd on the head like ſo many Sheep, and thoſe in the Caſtle yeilded it up upon Conditions, which Tiberius performed. After this Germanicus took a Fort called Arduba, and Poſtumius reduced other places. Now did Bato ſend his Son Sceva to Tiberius, and offered if he might be accepted to deliver up himſelf and all his into the Power of the Romans. Having received his Faith, he came by Night into the Camp, and being the day after brought before Tiberius, ſitting on the Tribunal, he did not at all deprecate his own Puniſhment, but ſtretching out his Head as to be cut off, uſed many words to excuſe his Companions, and being again asked by Tiberius, why they had Rebelled, and ſo long continued the War? He anſwered, That the Romans themſelves were the cauſe of it, who ſent not Dogs nor Shepherds, but Wolves to keep their Flocks. Thus Dio by degrees and order of time, what Paterculus tells in ſhort.

He compoſeth the War.

105. After this ſort was this War compoſed, with ſmall advantage on the Roman ſide, much Money being expended, many Legions being maintained, and but very little booty got. But Germanicus brought the News of the Victory, for which the Title of Imperator was added to Auguſtus and Tiberius, a Triumph decreed them, and two Triumphal Arches in Pannonia, on which Trophies were to be placed. To Germanicus were decreed Triumphal Ornaments, as to others of the Captains, and Prætorian Honours: they voted that firſt after the Conſulares, he ſhould give his Opinion, and being looſed from the Laws, might ſtand for the Conſulſhip ſooner than uſual. It was farther decreed, That Druſus the Son of Tiberius, though he had no part in the War, might before he was taken into the Order, come into the Senate, and having executed the Quæſtorſhip, ſpeak his Opinion before thoſe of Prætorian quality. Such things were decreed, but News brought out of Germany, ſpoiled all the Sport of the Triumphs. The Romans in that Country held ſeveral Places, but not altogether, but as they were brought into ſubjection by chance here and there, and therefore in Hiſtories, no mention is made of them. But however in thoſe places they had their Winter Quarters, and built Towns; the Barbarians admitted of their ways and Cuſtoms, and met with them at the Forum, yet ſo as not to forget their own Cuſtoms, and the liberty of their Country. Now was Quintilius Varus ſent to govern there, one born, if you will hear Paterculus, rather of an Illuſtrious than a Noble Family, a Man both as to Body and Mind addicted to reſt, and accuſtomed to the idleneſs of the Camp, rather than Action, but not a Contemner of Money, as Syria bore witneſs; which being Rich (as Preſident) he entered Poor, but left it Poor coming away Rich. He thought the Germans as tame as Sheep, and having nothing but the Voice and Members of Men, though they could not be conquered with the Sword, yet might be tamed by Laws. He therefore ſpent his time amongſt them in Careſſes, and deciding Controverſies, yet even then he would Command them as Roman Slaves, and exact Money of them as from Subjects. The Germans could not brook his management of Matters, and the rather becauſe the chiefeſt of them were ſenſible of the loſs of the Supreme Command, and impatient to have it reſtored to their Country. But ſeeing many Romans to live about the Rhine, and many amongſt themſelves, they durſt not break out into open Rebellion, but ſo humoured Varus as ready to obey him in all things. They pretended great Controverſies amongſt themſelves, and drew him from the Rhine to the Territories of the Cherusci, and the River Viſurgis.

Honours voted to him and others.

The Sport ſpoiled by News out of Germany.

Illuſtri magis quam nobili ortus familia.

106. There living ſecurely in perfect Peace, they perſuaded him that without the aſſiſtance of the Soldiers, he might hold them in that Subjection. And he was ſo ſilly as being in an Enemie's Country, not to keep together his Men, and in one place,but diſtributed many of them to ſeveral weaker People of Germany, who deſired to have them upon pretence of ſecuring the Garriſons for ſeizing Highway-Men, and conveyance of Proviſions. There was a young Man, Noble in Birth, Valiant of his hand, of quick apprehenſion, and of a prompt Wit, for a Barbarian, by Name Arminius, the Son of Sigimer, Prince of that Nation, who by his very Eyes and Countenance diſcovering the ardour of his Mind, had formerly been a diligent Attendant in the Roman Wars, and had obtained the Jus Civitatis, and the Equeſtrian Degree: He well knowing, that no man can ſooner be ruined than he who hath no apprehenſion of danger, and that the moſt frequent beginning of Calamity is Security, abuſed the Sottiſh humour of the General,who converſing with him every day, and being told of Plots that were to be againſt his Perſon, would not believe the Informers, but bad them have a care of themſelves. Then by Conſpiracy did ſome of the furtheſt Germans make an Inſurrection, with deſign that Varus going to ſuppreſs it, might paſs through the Territories of thoſe he ſuppoſed his Friends, and be the more liable to Deſtruction. They had ſo orordered their Affairs, that he ſhould have no Forces at hand to reſcue him, and thoſe Romans that they had received in ſeveral places, as was ſaid, they put to Death. Then did they ſet upon him as he went through a Wood, which was very difficult to paſs, when he had not the leaſt apprehenſion of any miſchief, but marched in his Rear very diſorderly.

The Defeat of Varus, and the Legions.

107. Abundance of Rain falling, took away from the Romans the uſe of their Arms; ſo that more Germans pouring themſelves upon them, they were cut down and ſlain;Varus and other of the Principal Officers leſt they ſhould fall into the Enemies Hands, killed themſelves. This being underſtood, none of the Soldiers made any reſiſtance, but either followed their Example, or caſt away their Arms, and expoſed themſelves to the Sword. Now were both Men and Horſes killed without any oppoſition, and all the Romans had either been ſlain or taken this day,but that the Germans hurried away to take the Booty; whereby it came to paſs, that the moſt hardy eſcaped, and the Trumpeters ſounding, it being now dark, the Enemy believed that ſome Succours were ſent to them by Aſprenas. This belief reſtrained the Germans from purſuing, and Aſprenas indeed as ſoon as he had notice, haſted to their relief. But thus were cut off in a manner three Legions, as many Alæ, and ſix Cohorts; an overthrow the greateſt of all the Romans received ſince that of Craſſus from the Parthians. This was the moſt valiant Army they had, and the chiefeſt for Diſcipline, Strength and Experience, as Paterculus, who then lived aſſures us, who adds, that the General had a greater mind to die, than to fight, ſtabbing himſelf, as his Father and Grandfather had done before him. Of the two Præfects of the Camp, as L. Eggius gave a good example of Valour, ſo Ceionius afforded as bad, who after that moſt of the Soldiers were cut off, became the Author of yeilding, and choſe to die rather as a Malefactor by Puniſhment, than in Battel. But Volumnius the Legatus of Varus, being otherwiſe a quiet, and an honeſt man, deſerted the Foot, and ran away with the Alæ of Horſe to the Rhine, which fact fortune it ſelf revenged; for he did not ſurvive the deſerted; but himſelf periſhed a Deſertor: The Body of Varus when half burnt, the furious Enemies tore in pieces. His Head was cut off and carried to Maroboduus, who ſent it to Cæſar, and at length it was honoured with the Sepulture of his Family.

Auguſtus wonderfully concerned at it.

108. When Auguſtus had the News of the Defeat, he was afflicted in an extraordinary manner.He had in all his life-time, as Suetonius tells us, but two great overthrows, and they were both received in Germany, viz. that of Lollius, and this of Varus; that of Lollius brought more Infamy than loſs, but this of Varus he terms almoſt exitiable, three Legions with the General, the Legati, and all the Auxilia being cut off. Upon notice of it, he ſet Guards up and down the City, that no Tumults might be raiſed upon this occaſion, continued the Government to the Præſidents of Provinces, as by their experience moſt fit to keep the Aſſociates in order. To Jupiter he vowed the great Games if he reſtored the Commonwealth into a better condition,as had been done in the Wars of the Cimbri and Marſi.It was reported, That he was ſo far dejected with the loſs, that he let his Beard and the hair of his Head grow for ſeveral Months; ſomtimes would knock his Head againſt the Dores, and roar out, Reſtore the Legions, Quintilius Varus; and he obſerved the Day of the Defeat every year, as a Day of Mourning. Dio tells us, he feared the Germans and Galls would be in Italy, and was ſenſible that their Roman youth was inconſiderable, and the Auxilia of the Aſſociates were much diſtreſſed. Yet he ſet himſelf all manner of ways he could, and as the preſent poſture of Affairs would permit, to prevent miſchief. For as much as ſuch as were of the Military Age would not give their Names to the Service. Some on whom the lot fell, he puniſhed by Confiſcation of their Eſtates, and branding them with Infamy; and this not being effectual, but that many yet diſobeyed, ſome he puniſhed with Death. Then gathering by lot from amongſt the Veteran Soldiers, and the Libertini, as great a Force as he could make, he diſpatched it away under Command of Tiberius into Germany. And there being many Galls and Germans at Rome, ſome upon the account of Travel, and others ſerving in the Guards, he diſarmed and ſent them out of the City. Theſe things he did, and the uſual Sports, and other things were omitted. But hearing afterwards that ſome Soldiers ſurvived the Defeat, that a Guard was put upon Germany, and the Enemy durſt not paſs the Rhine, he was freed from his terror, and began to examine the matter. He ſuſpected that ſo ſudden and great a miſchief came by the Anger of their gods, declared by Prodigies both before and after, which Dio relates.

Provides for prevention of farther miſchief.

Tiberius invades Germany to ſmall purpoſe.

809. Tiberius made an Invaſion into Germany, together with Germanicus, who had the Power of Proconſul. Some Parts of it they waſted, but ſabdued no Nation thereof; fighting not one Battel, nor ingaging with any Enemy, for, whatever Paterculus may talk in commendation of Tiberius, Dio writes, that they were in heavy fear of another overthrow, and ſtirred not far from the Rhine, but kept themſelves ſomewhere thereabouts till Autumn, at which time having celebrated the Birth-day of Auguſtus with Games, and by the help of the Centurions, having had the Exerciſes of Horſemen, they returned into Italy. Now at Rome, Druſus Cæſar the Son of Tiberius was Quæſtor, and ſixteen Prætors were made, for ſo many ſtood for the Office, and Auguſtus in this conjuncture of Affairs, would diſguſt no man, though in many years that followed there were but twelve. He forbad Fortune-tellers either privately or before others to prædict the Death of any man, not that he was ſolicitous concerning himſelf, for he publickly expoſed to view the Scheme of the Heavens, under which he was born. He alſo required of all that were ſubject to his Command, that they ſhould not give any Honour to any of the Governors in the time of their Adminiſtration, nor within ſixty days after their departure, becauſe many by virtue of the Honours and Applauſes they received in the Provinces bore themſelves high, and did very bad things. To Ambaſſadors at this time three Senators gave Anſwers. And, which was accounted wonderful, Equites were permitted to fight in the Exerciſes of the Gladiators, ſome of them counting it no Ignominy; and an Edict having been publiſhed to reſtrain them: notwithſtanding they were reſolute, and the more, becauſe their Combats were greedily beheld, and Auguſtus himſelf was preſent with the Prætors who diſtributed the Rewards.

Auguſtus Enacts divers things.

110. After this Germanicus bore the Office of Conſul together with C. Capito, though he had not yet executed the Office of Prætor, and did nothing worthy of Memory, but only over-ballanced his Colleague. But Auguſtus now grown very old, by Writing recommended Germanicus to the Senate, and the Senate to Tiberius. He himſelf being not in a condition, did not read the Writing, but Germanicus, as he was wont to do. Having made an excuſe about the German War, he deſired of the Senate that they would not ſalute him at his own Houſe, nor take it ill if for the time to come he did not publickly converſe with them, for it had been the Cuſtom frequently to ſalute him, eſpecially when the Senate was held, in the Court, and Forum, as he went in or out, and as he ſat or lay in the Palace, not only of Senators, but Equites, and ſome Plebeians; yet for all this did he not caſt off the care of the Commonwealth. For he granted to Equites a Right to ſtand to be Tribuni Plebis, and he commanded an Inquiſition to be made after Libels, which being found in the City ſhould be burnt by the Ædiles, and out of the City by the Governors of the ſeveral places; and he animadverted upon ſome of the Authors of them. And whereas it was found that of many Perſons that were Baniſhed, ſome lived out of the places to which they were confined, and others too delicately there where they were appointed to abide, he ordained, that none of thoſe to whom Water and Fire were forbidden, ſhould remain in the Continent, or in any Iſland which was not fifty miles diſtant from the Continent, Coos, Rhodes, Sardinia, and Lesbus excepted, though Dion Caſſius knows not for what reaſon. He forbad they ſhould paſs over any whither, or have any more Veſſels than one of Burthen, containing a Thouſand Amphoræ; and two for Sailing; neither above twenty Slaves or Freed-men; nor poſſeſs above fifty thouſand Nummi; in caſe of Diſobedience, he both threatned to puniſh the Exiles, and ſuch as aſſiſted them in the breaking of theſe Laws.

111. When L. Munatius, and C. Silius were Conſuls, Auguſtus undertook, unwilling, the Government for ten years, now the fifth time. He Prorogued the Tribunitial Authority to Tiberius; he granted to Druſus his Son, Power to ſtand for the Conſulſhip in the third year, though he had not born the Prætorſhip; and not coming now into the Senate himſelf by reaſon of his old Age, he deſired to have twenty Councellors for a year aſſigned him, whereas formerly he was wont to have fifteen for ſix Months. It was Decreed that whatever he reſolved upon with thoſe, the Conſuls, and Conſuls deſigned, his adopted Nephews, and others he at any time aſſumed, after deliberation, ſhould be of the ſame force and virtue as if they had been Voted in the Curia. Theſe things were ordered by a Senatuſconſultum, though he had the Power before, and as he lay upon his Bed he would give Judgment. The Payment of a twentieth part of Inheritances lately mentioned, ſeemed generally a grievous burthen, and ſome ſtirs it was feared would happen upon it. Hereupon he ſent a Writing to the Senate, wherein he deſired they would conſider and find out ſome other ways of raiſing Money; and this he did not to abrogate that way of Tribute, but that they finding out no one more convenient, it might be eſtabliſhed by them, though unwilling, and the Odium be taken off from himſelf. But becauſe if Germanicus and Druſus ſhould ſpeak their Opinions, the Senate might think they ſpake as he directed them, and ſo might leave the matter undiſcuſſed, he forbad them to give any Vote at all. The Debate in the Senate was very high about it, and by Letters he was told, that ſome would indure any thing ſooner than the twentieth part, whereupon he transferred the Payment upon Lands and Houſes, and ſpeedily without ſhowing how it ſhould be paid, ſent Officers up and down to take an account of the Wealth both of Cities and private Men, that out of fear of greater expence they might ſubmit to the twentieth part. And his Deſign had its Succeſs. But now in the Auguſtalia, or Games celebrated upon Auguſtus his Birth-day, it happened that a Mad-man ſate down in the Seat of Julius Cæſar, and taking away his Crown, put it upon his own Head; and in the Opinion of Dio, it did really portend (as it was imagined) ſomthing to Auguſtus; for in the following year wherein Sex. Apuleius, and Sex. Pompeius were Conſuls, going into Campania, and having exhibited the Spectacula at Naples, he died at Nola. Auguſtus dies.

112. His Wife Livia was ſuſpected by ſome as having ſet him forward to another World. For not long before, he had gone without her knowledge into the Iſland to his Nephew Agrippa, and he ſeemed now to be reconciled to him, which ſhe fearing might amount to as much at length as to deliver up the Empire into his hands, was thought to poiſon ſome particular Figs, as they grew in the Garden, and to avoid ſuſpicion, to have her ſelf eaten the wholſom ones from the ſame tree. His Death is ſaid to have been foreſhewn by ſome tokens the year wherein he died. He made his third Cenſus, in the Luſtrum whereof were found Four Millions and one hundred thirty ſeven thouſand Polls of Roman Citizens. Celebrating the Luſtrum in the Campus Martius, with great concourſe of People, an Eagle they ſay flew about him ſeveral times, and directing her flight to a Chappel, ſat down over the Name of Agrippa, at the firſt letter. Auguſtus conſidering this, commanded Tiberius to make thoſe Vows, which it was the Cuſtom to make for the following Luſtrum. For though the Tables were written and ready, yet he refuſed to undertake that which he ſhould not perform. About the ſame time the firſt Letter of his Name on his Statue in the Capitol was ſtruck out by a Thunderbolt. Hereupon the Fortune-tellers ſaid, he ſhould live only One hundred days longer, which was ſignified by the letter C. and was to be reckoned amongſt the gods, Æſar the reſt of the Name in the Hetruſcan Language, ſignifying a God. In the mean time he wrote a Breviary of his Actions, which he commanded to be cut in Braſs and ſet before his Mauſoleum. His time being come, he ſent for his inward Acquaintance, and ſpoke what he had a mind to recommend to them, and told them this, That he received Rome made of Brick, but left it of Marble; by which expreſſion, Dion Caſſius tells us, he did not mean the Elegancy of the Structure, but the firmneſs of the Empire. Some ſay he called for a Looking-Glaſs, cauſed his hair to be Combed, and his wrinkled Cheeks ſmoothed up. Then like an Actor upon the Stage, he asked his Friends if he had performed his Part well, and upon their anſwer yea, he ſaid Plaudite, and ſo died in the imbraces of his beloved Wife Livia, bidding her remember their Marriage, and farewel. He died in the ſame Room as did Octavius his Father, and on the ſame Day (Auguſt the Nineteenth) on which he entred upon his firſt Conſulſhip, having lived Seventy ſix years, all but thirty five days, having held the Monarchy from the Battel at Actium, as Dio computes, forty four years, wanting thirteen days, in the Seven hundred ſixty ſeventh year of the City, the ſecond of the One hundred ninety eighth Olympiad, the fifty ſeventh after the Death of Julius Cæſar, and the fifteenth after the Birth of Chriſt, Sextus Pompeius, and Sextus Apuleius being Conſuls.

His Character. 813. He was the Founder of the Roman Monarchy, his Uncle having been rather the chalker of it out. He obtained it with the Deſtruction of many Perſons, and ſpared none to make way for his Purpoſes. Faults he had. He deceived Pompey under colour of Peace, and Lepidus under a ſhow of Friendſhip, as ſome obſerved. He drew on Antony with the Treaties of Tarentum and Brundiſium, and with the marriage of his Siſter, which deceitful Alliance, they ſay, coſt the other his life. A Peace followed this, but a bloody one, as witneſs the Death of Lollius and Varus, and in Rome it ſelf of Varro, Egnatius, and Julius. It was objected againſt him, that he took Nero's Wife from him, and asked the Opinion of the Pontifex in a Scoff; Whether there might be a lawful Marriage betwixt them, ſhe being ſtill with Child by her former Husband. They forgot not the laſciviouſneſs, and Riot (ſo Tacitus writes) of L. Atedius and Vedius Pollio, and to be ſure not the demeanour of Livia, whom they eſteemed a burthenſom, nay intollerable Mother to the Commonwealth; and to the Houſe of the Cæſars, a dangerous Stepdame. They added, that there was no honour left for the gods, ſeeing he would himſelf by the Prieſts and Flamines be worſhipped in the Temples, with all the Ornaments belonging to their Deities. They judged that Tiberius was deſigned Succeſſor, neither out of love to himſelf, nor care of the Commonwealth, but out of a deep inſight into his lofty and bloody diſpoſition and deſign, that being ſo unequally compared with him, he might win glory afterward to himſelf. For though not many years before, he had uttered Honourable Speeches in the Senate concerning Tiberius; yet when he moved for the Tribuneſhip to be again renewed to him, he interlaced in his Speech ſome things concerning his Attire and Behaviour, which in excuſing of him ſeemed to turn to his Reproach. But on the other ſide we have ſeen how kind and Popular he was. His Defects cannot be excuſed; but they muſt needs be heard, who in his Commendation alledge, that the Empire he bounded with the Ocean and other Rivers at a great diſtance, that the Legions, Provinces, and Navy were conjoyned in Peace and Unity, Juſtice was adminiſtred in the Cities, the Allies treated with Civility, the City beautified with ſumptuous Buildings, and if rigorous dealing had been uſed againſt ſome few, it was ſetling of Peace and quietneſs in the whole.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

From the Death of Auguſtus, to that of Tiberius.

The ſpace of Twenty and two years, ſeven Months, and odd Days.

1. THE Death of Auguſtus was not preſently known. For Livia fearing leſt Tiberius being as yet in Dalmatia, ſome ſtirs might happen to his diſadvantage, concealed it till his coming. So Dio tells us moſt Authors, and thoſe moſt worthy belief delivered; though there were not wanting, who wrote that Tiberius was with Auguſtus in his Sickneſs, and received ſomething in Command from him. Tacitus makes it a doubt, whether Tiberius found him alive or dead; For Livia had beſet the Houſe, and gave out words ſometimes as if he recovered, and having made all ſure as the time and occaſion required, the ſame rumour, which not long before gave hopes of Auguſtus his Amendment, now publiſhed his Death, and that Nero was in poſſeſſion of the Empire. The Body of Auguſtus was by the Principals of the ſeveral Cities born from Nola to Rome in Courſe; it was received by the Equites, and brought to Rome in the Night. The day after, the Senate aſſembled, to which the other Senators came onely in the Equeſtrian Habit, and the Magiſtrates in the Senatorian, except the Prætexta. Tiberius and his Son Druſus came in common Mourning, and offered Incenſe at their coming, omitting the Trumpeter. The Senators ſate in their uſual places, but the Conſuls lower, one on the Bench of the Prætorians, and the other on that of the Tribuni Plebis. Impunity was granted to Tiberius, for having touched, which was by Law forbidden, and accompanied the Body. Then did one Polybius a Libertus of Cæſar, read the Teſtament of Auguſtus, it not being thought fit that a Senator ſhould read it; wherein he left moſt he had to Tiberius and Livia: For he had deſired of the Senate, That he might have leave to give her more than was permitted by the Laws. He gave Legacies to many private perſons, to thoſe of the Prætorian Guards, and every Inhabitant of Rome. To the Sons of ſuch as had left him their Heir, he commanded that the Inheritances ſhould be reſtored; which indeed had been his practice all along. He was kind to the Children of other men, but his own Daughter he would not reduce into her Countrey; nay, he forbad ſhe ſhould be buried in his Sepulchre, though he left her ſomething by his Will.

The Body of Auguſtus brought to Rome.

His Will read in the Senate.

And four other Writings.

2. Beſides his Will, four Writings more were produced in the Senate. In one he had left Inſtructions concerning his Funeral. In another, an Enumeration was made of his Atchievements, which he Commanded ſhould be cut in Pillars of Braſs, and expoſed before his Sepulchre. The third Writing contained an Account of the Number of the Forces, of the Publick Revenues and Iſſues, of what Money was in the Treaſurie, and other things belonging to the Publick Government. In the fourth he gave advice to Tiberius and the Commonwealth. Amongſt other things it was his Opinion, That many Slaves ſhould not be manumitted, leſt the City ſhould be peſtered with a croud; nor many be made free of the City, that they might preſerve a difference betwixt themſelves and their Subjects. Then he would have them commit the Government to thoſe that were moſt qualified for it, and not to put too much upon one man, leſt he ſhould turn Tyrant, or in his Ruin the Commonwealth might receive danger. He charged them to be content with their preſent Fortune, and not to deſire to inlarge the Bounds of the Empire; for it being difficult to keep ſo much as they had already got, they would probably by indeavouring to get more, loſe what they had already. And that this was his Opinion, he teſtified not only by Words but Actions; for though he might have brought many Barbarians under, yet he never would. His Funeral was performed in great State, and an Eagle let looſe from the Pile as to carry his Soul to Heaven. Livia, and with her the chiefeſt of the Equites continued in the place five dayes, to gather up his Bones and put them into the Monument. Men mourned for him according to the Cuſtom not many dayes, but Women an whole Year, as had been decreed. Indeed few really mourned for him at preſent, but afterwards all found reaſon to do it, whilſt they had the ſad occaſion to compare him and his Succeſſor together: But now at preſent, Temples were erected to him, and a Summe of Money was given by Livia to Numerius Atticus a Senator, and one of Prætorian Degree, for having ſworn that He ſaw him aſcending up into Heaven, as Proculus antiently had ſaid of Romulus.

3. Tiberius was by birth a Patrician, had liberal Education, and a Wit more than ordinary. He made no ſhow of aiming at ſuch things as he deſired, and would uſe diſcourſes contrary to his deſign; denying what he deſired, and ſeeming to conſent to what he diſliked. By the practice of him and his Mother, Agrippa Poſthumus was Murdered e're the death of Auguſtus was known. He had ſecured the Soveraignty ſufficiently by ſtrong Hand, though he played the Diſſembler moſt egregiouſly, refuſing the Government ſo long as till the Senators fell down at his feet, and beſought him to accept of it; whom he anſwered with ambiguous words, and at length complaining that a miſerable and intollerable Servitude was impoſed on him, received it as by conſtraint, and yet ſo as he ſeemed to ſignifie that he would again relinquiſh it. Indeed there was cauſe for him to ſay, as he did, that he took a Wolf by the Ears. For Clemens the Slave of Agrippa had got a conſiderable party together, under pretence of revenging his Lord's death: Scribonius Libo ſecretly plotted his own advancement, and the Legions both in Germany and Illyricum mutined, the former chuſing Germanicus for their Prince, who earneſtly refuſed to accept of their Offer, and at length quieted them with much ado, as Druſus did the other in Pannonia, they being frighted into obedience by a total Eclipſe of the Moon, which fell out on the 27th. of September, five hours after Midnight. Clemens was apprehended, and Libo not effecting any thing, was in the ſecond year accuſed to the Senate. Tiberius in the mean while looking carefully to himſelf, notwithſtanding theſe motions, obtained the Supream Power, betwixt which and his rule with Auguſtus for two years there was this difference; That his former Command extended onely to the Armies and Provinces ſubject to Auguſtus, but this to the City it ſelf Miſtreſs of all. Formerly he had Tribunitial and Cenſorian Power; but now he became Monarch, and was looſe or exempt from all power of Laws, as Auguſtus before him. For he had not together with him when living, ſo equal authority as afterwards L. Verus had with M. Antoninus the Philoſopher; which two firſt governed the Commonwealth upon equal terms; but ſuch like as Antoninus Pius had with Adrian, who alſo adopted him, and made him his Collegue in the Proconſular power as to Provinces, and in the Tribunitial power at home. And therefore Suetonius telleth us, that Tiberius firſt aſſembled the Senate by virtue of his Tribunitial Office onely.

In Tiberio cap. 23.

Tiberius at firſt diſſembleth his Vices.

Sueton in Tiberio Capp.26.27, 28,&c. Tacitus ut ſuprà.

4. Tiberius at firſt carried himſelf (as ever in ſome caſes) very cunningly, cloaking with marvelous diſſimulation thoſe enormities which afterwards appeared. For ſome time he counterfeited incredible patience, ſtooped too low in his complementing of Senators and Magiſtrates, rejected all high Titles and Honours (not enduring the name of Dominus or Lord) and conſulted the Senate continually, not doing little or much without its conſent; nay, ſuffering ſome things therein to be carried againſt his mind; he was alſo at firſt very temperate in his diet, and exact in reforming manners, by degrees falling into his natural humour. From the beginning he was much afflicted with the fame of Germanicus, his Brother Druſus his Son by Nature (begotten of Antonia the younger, Daughter of Antony the Triumvir, by Octavia the Siſter of Auguſtus, concerning which Antonia, Pliny reporteth that ſhe never ſpate) and his own by adoption; who now proſperouſly carried on the War in Germany. Within two or three years a very plauſible occaſion preſented it ſelf for the calling of him back from thoſe Legions which were ſo much at his devotion. For it hapned then that the Parthians were in great commotions about their Kings. Phraates had twenty ſeven years before for his own ſecurity ſent four of his Sons as Hoſtages to Rome, through the procurement of his Wife Thermuſa an Italian woman, which having been formerly his Concubine had then a Son by him, and that this her Son might obtain the Crown, got the reſt to be ſent out of the way, and then they two murdered the King. This Baſtard called Phraataces reigned; but being hated by the People for his Paricide, was not long after ſlain, and then was ſet up one Orodes of the Family of the Arſacidæ, who being alſo hated for his cruelty came to the ſame end. Then ſent the Parthians for one of the Hoſtages, and Vonones the eldeſt was diſmiſſed by Tiberius. But they counting it a diſgrace for any to reign over them, who (as they termed it) had been a ſlave to Cæſar, rebelliouſly caſt him off, and called in Artabanus, who then reigned in Media, and was alſo one of the Arſacidæ or the Blood Royal of Parthia. He at his firſt entrance was repulſed by Vonones; but the ſecond time overthrew him, and got poſſeſſion of the Kingdom. Vonones retiring into Armenia ſent to Tiberius for aid, who, for that Artabanus threatned hard, and the principal of the Armenians were of his faction, did not think fit to make War upon him: therefore Vonones yielded himſelf to Creticus Silanus, who governed Syria, and Artabanus ſet Orodes, one of his own Sons over Armenia. At the ſame time Antiochus King of Commagena dying, a contention aroſe betwixt the Nobility and Commons; the former would have the Countrey reduced into the form of a Roman Province, but the people were for a King. Now alſo Philopator King of Cilicia being dead, his ſubjects were divided upon the very ſame grounds. Syria alſo, and Judæa being weary of their burthens, deſired a diminution of their Tributes.

Envieth Germanicus.

Joſephus Antiquit. lib. 18. cap. 3.

Tacitus Annal. l. 2.

Sueton in Tiberio cap. 49. Tacitus ut prius.

Idem cap. 43.

5. Tiberius now perſuaded the Senate that the abilities of Germanicus were requiſit for quieting the Eaſt, whereupon the Provinces beyond the Seas were decreed to him, with larger power than had been granted to any that governed them, either by lot or the gift of the Prince. Germanicus was often importuned by Tiberius upon this ground to return, yet intent upon his buſineſs he firſt ſubdued ſeveral Nations in Germany, and by the overthrow of Arminius obtained great glory, which was ſomthing obſcured at laſt by a Shipwrack. It was the deſign of Tiberius to expoſe him unto danger and treachery; therefore he removed Silanus his friend, and put Cn. Piſo a froward man into his room, to whom he gave in charge ſome ſecret thing as many believed. Germanicus, being thus expelled to compoſe the affairs of the Eaſt, as * one truly termeth it, placed Zeno the Son of Polemo King of Pontus over Armenia. Q. Veranius a Knight, had the overſight of Cappadocia, which was made a Province; for Archelaus the King thereof courted not Tiberius enough when he was at Rhodes, and therefore was called to Rome, and there kept till his Death. Q. Servæus alſo was ſet over Commagena. Artabanus ſent to Germanicus about renewing the league, and good correſpondence, deſiring that Vonones might not be kept in Syria, nor ſuffered by his Meſſengers to ſow diſcord amongſt the People, offering him alſo leave to come to the bank of Euphrates; to which he anſwered, as became the State and himſelf. This year died Livy the Hiſtorian, who was born at Padua; and alſo Ovid the Poet, having remained a baniſhed man in Pontus ſeveral years, whither the diſpleaſure of Auguſtus confined him, either for that he had ſeen him do ſome unſeemly thing which he would not have known, or for publiſhing his wanton books concerning Love, as he hints himſelf. This was the 771 year of the City, the nineteenth after the birth of Chriſt, Tiberius Auguſtus the third, and Germanicus Cæſar the ſecond time being Conſuls.

Under pretence of quieting the Eaſt expoſeth him to danger and treachery.

 Sueton in Caligula cap. 1. Tacitus ibid. cap. 56.*

Euſeb. in Chronico.

A. D. 19. V. C. 771.

Lib. 2. De Triſtibus.

6. Germanicus the year following made a Voyage into Egypt, to view it for the rarity of its Antiquities, for which he was chidden by Tiberius, as going without his leave. Thence returning into Syria, he was moſt ſhamefully, and without any meaſure affronted by Piſo, and at length died of a lingring Diſeaſe at Antioch, being thought to miſcarry by the fraud of Tiberius, and the Miniſtry of Piſo, who plainly ſaid, That he muſt either diſpleaſe Father or Son. But the fruit he reaped in pleaſing thus the Father, was but unpleaſing; for returning to Rome the year following, he eſcaped narrowly tearing in pieces by the People, and being condemned by the Senate, killed himſelf. For Germanicus there was an univerſal mourning, not only in Rome and the Provinces, but alſo amongſt Barbarians and Enemies themſelves. He was a Perſon excellently accompliſhed, and of a moſt ſweet diſpoſition, whereby he became the love and delight of the People, and Auguſtus long debating with himſelf whether he ſhould not leave him his Succeſſor, at length cauſed Tiberius to adopt him, who 'tis thought, being reſtrained by fear, and reverence of him, after his Death broke out into ſuch courſes as made the other more miſſed and glorious. By his Wife Agrippina (the Daughter of Agrippa and Julia) he died Father of three Sons, viz. Nero, Druſus, and Caius; and of as many Daughters. He died in the thirty fourth year of his Age, and that which followed his ſecond Conſulſhip, M. Junius Solanus, and C. Norbanus Flaccus being Conſuls.

Tacitus lib. 2. Capp. 59, 60. &c.

A. D. 20. V. C. 772.

Sueton in Caligula capp. 1, 2, 3, 4, &c. Joſephus Antiquit. l. 18. c. 8.

Who dieth of a lingring diſeaſe at Antioch.

His Iſſue.

7. Three or four years after was Tiberius puniſhed in his own kind by the poyſoning of his own Son Druſus, and that by his greateſt Favourite Ælius Sejanus. This man being the Son of Seius Strabo a Roman Knight, when very young, followed Caius the Nephew of Auguſtus, and afterwards by divers Arts wound himſelf into the Affections of Tiberius, who uſed him as his moſt inward Counſellor, Tacitus Annal. lib. 4.

Tiberius puniſhed by the treachery of Seianus, who poyſoneth his Son Druſus.

Sueton in Tiberio cap. 52.

Tacitus ut ſuprà.

Sueton. in Tib. cap. 40.

or Miniſter of State, and erected to his honour his Statue of Braſs in the Theatre. Now he thought of no leſs than the Empire it ſelf, as a ſtep to which, he poyſoned Druſus the Son of Tiberius, having brought Livia the young man's Wife to a compliance with him by his filthy dalliance, and corrupted Lygdus the Eunuch to betray his Truſt. Druſus had the year before the Tribunitial Power conferred on him; but for that he was none of the moſt towardly, was little regarded by his Father, who as ſoon as his Funeral was over, returned to his wonted Employments, forbidding any longer vacation upon his accornt. The Inhabitants of Ilium ſending their Ambaſſadors ſomething too late to condole his death, he anſwered, that He alſo was ſorry for the death of Hector their excellent Countreyman. Tiberius after this commended the two Sons of Germanicus, Nero and Druſus, to the Senate; which done, Sejanus began to ſtrike at them, though at firſt through the ſides of their Mother, labouring to bring them all into ſuſpicion and hatred. The firſt advantage he took was from the Prayers of the Prieſts, who made Vows for their Health, as for that of Tiberius; for he took it hainouſly, that they herein ſhould be made equal to him. Then did he provoke them, and never ceaſed till he cauſed them to be declared Enemies by the Senate, after which he ſtarved them to death, uſing alſo their Mother moſt injuriouſly, for that ſhe was not ſparing of her Tongue in reprehending and upbraiding him. Now was Tacfarinas, who had maintained a tedious War in Afric, ſlain by Dolabella. As for Tiberius, by the perſuaſion of Sejanus, he withdrew into the Iſle Capreæ, and thence forward minding nothing, gave up himſelf to all ſorts of enormities.

Idem ibid. Capp. 41, 42. &c.

Tiberius returneth to his natural humour.

His Character given him by his School-maſter.

8. For, caſting off all care of the State, being out of ſight, he returned to his natural diſpoſition, not looking to the ſupply, either of Army or Provinces; ſuffering Armenia to be ſeized on by the Parthians, Mæſia by the Dacians and Sarmatians, and Gall to be waſted by the Germans. He inſtituted a new Office for the management of Pleaſures, unto which he preferred a Knight, T. Cæſonius Priſcus: He held ſuch in greateſt eſteem, and beſtowed Offices on men that were moſt for his turn that way, being given up to ſuch beaſtlineſs as is incredible, and not to be mentioned. He was exceſſively covetous, both as to getting, and keeping what was unjuſt. He was ſo undutiful to his Mother, as he refuſed to come at her, when living; and when dead, he neglected to bury her; neither would he perform her Will, but perſecuted her Friends; but ſhe was juſtly rewarded (though as to him unjuſtly) having over and above other wicked practices, being ſuſpected to have had an hand in the death of Germanicus. So cruel, and filthy he became, that he verified the Character given him, when but young, by Theodorus Gadareus his School-maſter, that he was πηλὸν αἵματι πεφυραμένον, or Dirt mingled with blood. Having choſen Twenty of the Principal Men of the City to be his Counſellors, he ſcarcely left two or three of them alive, Sejanus being found out, and puniſhed juſtly for his wickedneſs. Amongſt others that were innocent, he ſpared not the familiar Friends of his Mother, Nephews, Agrippina or Sejanus. No day either holy or prophane was free from ſlaughters. Every offence little or great was Capital. Many were condemned with their Wives and Children. Rewards were propoſed to Informers, and all Teſtimonies taken for true. Simple death he accounted nothing, and therefore invented painful waies; eſpecially after he knew how his Son Druſus died, he neither ſpared any perſon nor ſort of Torments. Caius the Son of Germanicus he cared not for, as ſuſpecting him; and Tiberius his Grandſon by Druſus he deſpiſed, as conceived in Adultery.

Pontius Pilate ſucceedeth Gratus in Judæa.

Joſeph. Antiq. l. 18. c. 3. & Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 9. Luc. 3.

John Baptiſt beginneth to Preach and Baptize.

A.D. 29. Ol. 201. an. 4. V. C. 781.

9. In the Twelfth year of Tiberius was Pontius Pilate ſent into Judæa to ſucceed Valerius Gratus, the fourth Governour after the baniſhment of Archelaus the Son of Herod to Vienna. Coponius was the firſt, M. Ambivius was the ſecond, Annius Rufus the third, and Gratus the fourth. Pilate at his firſl entrance ſet up the Images of Cæſar at Jeruſalem, which moved the Jews to Sedition; but overcome by their intreaties, he removed them to Cæſarea. He being now Governor of Judæa, Herod Antipas Tetrarch of Galile, his Brother Philip Tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis, and Lyſanias of Abilene, Annas (who, formerly having had the Office, though diſplaced by Gratus, yet for his authority ſtill carried the name) and Caiphas (otherwiſe called Joſeph, whom lately Gratus had placed in the room of Simon, by him depoſed alſo) being High-Prieſts, in the Fifteenth year of Tiberius entering, John Baptiſt began to Preach and Baptize in the reſemblance and ſpirit of Elias. Amongſt others he Baptized Chriſt himſelf, of whom he was the fore-runner. His Miniſtry is thought to have commenced on the Tenth day of the Seventh Moneth, which was Penitential, and ſo great a Faſt, that the ſoul which did not afflict it ſelf, was to be cut off from amongſt it's People; and was alſo Expiatorie, wherein the High-Prieſt (the Type of him before whoſe face John was ſent) entred into the Holy of Holies alone, with blood expiating the ſins of the People, this being alſo the ſame day wherein by Trumpet the Jubile was proclaimed.

A. D. 30. Ol. 202. an. 1. V. C. 782.

The Lord Jeſus executeth his Miniſtry.

10. Jeſus now about Thirty years of age, being baptized of John in Jordan (and owned for the Meſſiah and Son of God, by the deſcending of the Holy Ghoſt in the form of a Dove, and reſting upon him, as alſo by a Voice from Heaven) was led of the Spirit into the Wilderneſs to be tempted of the Devil. After his temptation he returned in the Power of the Spirit into Galile. Going into Galile he received Andrew and Simon his Brother, the day following called Philip of Bethſaida the City of Andrew, and Simon ſirnamed Cephas or Peter by the Lord. On the third day being invited to a Marriage in Cana of Galile, he turned Water into Wine, this being his firſt Miracle, and by it his glory was manifeſted, and his Diſciples believed in him. Afterward he went down to Capernaum with his Mother, his Brethren, (or Kinſmen) and Diſciples, where they abode not many days. Then came he to the exerciſe of his Miniſtry, the Acts whereof are diſtinguiſhed by four Paſſeovers. Amongſt the four Evangeliſts which deſcribe them, Matthew alone hath neglected the order of time, which is conſtantly obſerved by the reſt, except in the Hiſtory of John's caſting into Priſon, as Luke hath recorded it.

The firſt Paſſeover thereof.

Ex Uſſerio Armachano, uti ille ex Richardſono Epiſcopo Ardachadenſi in provincia Armachana.

11. Jeſus having aſcended to Jeruſalem at the time of the firſt Paſſeover, caſt buyers and ſellers out of the Temple, wrought Miracles, and inſtructed Nicodemus in the myſtery of Regeneration, and Faith in himſelf. Leaving then Jeruſalem, he went into Judæa with his Diſciples, where abiding, he baptized by the Miniſtry of them; John then baptizing in Ænon; for he was not yet caſt in to Priſon. A certain queſtion aroſe about Purifying, betwixt ſome of John's Diſciples and the Jews. John inſtructed now his Diſciples concerning Chriſt the laſt time, as they told him of his acts with ſome emulation, and not long after he was caſt into Priſon, for reprehending Herod the Tetrarch his Inceſt with his Brother Philip's Wife. Jeſus hearing of his Captivity, and that the Phariſees took notice that he baptized more by the hands of his Diſciples, departed out of Judæa (where he had remained ſome Eight moneths) and came into Galile. In his paſſage through Samaria he diſcourſed with a Woman at a Well near unto the City Sychar, the Inhabitants of which by her means he brought to the acknowledgment of himſelf, four moneths before Harveſt, or the Paſſeover, about the middle of the Ninth Moneth called Ab. Having ſtayed two dayes at Sychar, he proceeded, and returned the ſecond time into Galile out of Judæa after his Baptiſm, being received with great reſpect by the Galilæans, who had ſeen what he did at Jeruſalem. Preaching in their Synagogues here, he alſo healed at Cana, the Son of the Nobleman that was ſick at Capernaum, which was his ſecond Miracle in Galile. Having wrought Miracles at Capernaum, he went to Nazareth, where he had been brought up, and expounding the Prophet Eſay concerning himſelf, they firſt admired, and then caſt him out, and would have thrown him down headlong, but he paſſed away through the midſt of them.

12. Leaving then Nazareth, he taught at Capernaum, where they were aſtoniſhed at his Doctrine, and caſt out an unclean ſpirit that was firſt commanded ſilence. Departing out of the Synagogue into the houſe of Simon and Andrew, he cured of a Feaver Simon's Wive's Mother. At Sun-ſet he healed ſick Folks brought to him, and caſt out Divels, firſt put to ſilence. In the Morning he went out into a deſert place to Pray, and the multitudes endeavouring to detain him, he anſwered, He muſt alſo Preach in other places; and coaſting through Galile, he Preached in their Synagogues, and caſt out Devils. Then taught he the People out of Simon's Ship on the Lake of Geneſareth, and helped them to a miraculous draught of Fiſhes; whereupon Simon Peter, Andrew, James, and John, being commanded to follow him, he maketh Fiſhers of men. Then going through all Galile healing and teaching, his Fame ſpread through Syria, and multitudes flocked to him. In a certain City he healed a Leper, which though forbidden, yet noiſed his Fame, and ſuch Companies now followed him that he could not enter the City, but taught without in deſert places, and prayed. After a few dayes he returned to Capernaum, and teaching in his own houſe he healed the Paralitick, who was let down in a Bed, and forgave him his ſins before the Phariſees. Thence going towards the Sea he taught, and paſſing by called Levi or Matthew, then ſitting at the receit of Cuſtom, by whom being feaſted, he defended his Diſciples againſt the Phariſees, for eating with Publicans and Sinners, and for not faſting. And it came to paſs, that on the ſecond Sabbath after the firſt (that is, on the ſecond Sabbath of the new year, inſtituted after their return out of Ægypt, and beginning with the Moneth Niſan or Abib) Jeſus paſſing through the Corn-Fields, defended his Diſciples, who plucked and eat ears of Corn, againſt the Phariſees, and explained the Doctrine of the obſervation of the Sabbath.

The ſecond Paſſeover.

13. After theſe things there was a Feaſt of the Jews, (that is, the ſecond Paſſeover of his Miniſtry) and Jeſus went up to Jeruſalem, where on the Sabbath-day he healed one who had layn 38 years diſeaſed at the Pool of Betheſda, for which thing, and becauſe he had called God his Father, the Jews went about to kill him, and he oppoſed againſt them his moſt Divine Apology. Departing thence, in the Synagogue, on another Sabbath, he healed a man that had a withered hand, for which the Phariſees and Herodians preſently ſought to kill him. Jeſus knowing this, departed to the Sea, where teaching the People, he commanded a little Veſſel to wait on him, becauſe the multitude crouded him. In theſe days he ſpent a whole Night in Prayer upon a Mountain, and when it was day, made choice of Twelve, whom he called Apoſtles. Going down into the Plain he healed the Sick, and coming home, ſuch was the preſſe, that they could not eat, whereupon his Friends came to take him, ſuppoſing he had been beſides himſelf. When he had ſeen the multitude he aſcended into the Mountain, and his Diſciples coming to him, there he Preached his long Sermon, firſt ſpeaking to the Apoſtles, and then to the multitude. Having ended all his words in the audience of the People, he entred into Capernaum, and healed the Centurion's Servant ready to die. The day following he raiſed from the dead the Widow's Son in the City Naim, whence his Fame was ſpread abroad. Then ſent John his Diſciples from Priſon to him, to ask Whether he was the man, or they muſt look for another; who being departed with an anſwer, Chriſt took occaſion to ſpeak of John, and upbraided the Cities, acquieſcing in the Will of his Father as to the revealing or hiding the things of Salvation. Then Simon the Phariſee inviting him to Dinner, a Woman that was a ſinner waſhed his feet with her tears, which defending againſt Simon, he forgave her her ſins. And it came to paſs afterward, that he Preached through every City and Village, his Diſciples being with him, and certain Women miniſtring to him, amongſt which was Joanna the Wife of Chuſa, Herod's Steward. Then healed he a man poſſeſſed with a dumb and deaf Divel, and defended himſelf againſt the Phariſees, who ſaid, that he caſt out Devils by Beelzebub Prince of Divels. To the Scribes and Phariſees demanding a ſign, he onely giveth that of Jonas, and his Mother and Brethren aſking to ſpeak with him, he declareth who are his neareſt Relations. On that day going to the Sea, he taught the People from the Ship in the Parable of the Sower and others. On this ſame day when it was Evening, he would they ſhould paſs to the further ſide, and having diſmiſſed the multitude, when in their paſſage a great Tempeſt aroſe, he chiding the Winds ſtilled the Sea, and ſaved his Diſciples then in danger. Coming unto the further ſide into the Countrey of the Gaderens, or Gergaſens, which lyeth over againſt Galile, two Dæmoniacs met him, exceeding fierce, (whereof Mark and Luke mention but one) out of which he caſting the Divels, permitted them to enter into the Swine. The Gaderens hereupon deſiring him to depart out of their Coaſts, he (having diſmiſſed the man who deſired to be with him, and upon refuſal, Preached throughout Decapolis what things Jeſus had done for him) returned by Ship unto the further ſide, and ſo to Capernaum his own City.

Joh. 5.

14. And it came to paſs, that when Jeſus was returned, the People gladly received him; for they were all waiting for him. And being by the Sea-ſide, he anſwered the Diſciples of John, inquiring why his Diſciples faſted not, ſeeing they, and the Diſciples of the Phariſees faſted often. Whilſt he ſpake, he was beſought to heal the onely Daughter of Jairus; and as he was going down, a Woman that had had an iſſue of blood Twelve years, was by touching the hem of his Garment made whole. Paſſing thence, he cured two blind men, whom he charged with threatning to ſay nothing of him; but in vain. As they paſſed away, a man poſſeſſed with a dumb Devil was preſented unto him, whom he healed, the company admiring, and the Phariſees blaſpheming. Then going about to all the Towns, he Taught and healed, and coming into his own Country was contemned again by his Country-men, as he taught in the Synagogue on the Sabbath-day, they calling him Carpenter, though they admired him. Going about the Villages he taught, and pitying the multitude becauſe the Harveſt was great and the Labourers few, he bade his Diſciples Pray for Labourers into the Harveſt. Then ſent he out his Twelve Diſciples two and two, commiſſionated with Power to preach and heal. Having made an end of commanding them, he went and Preached in their Cities: and the Twelve went about the Villages, teaching and healing every where. Now about this time was John Baptiſt beheaded, through the procurement of Herodias, which being told unto Jeſus by his Diſciples, who buried him, after the return of his own, he went with them by Ship into a deſert place called Bethſaida. The multitude hearing of it, got thither before him, where he taught and healed them. And Jeſus went up into a Mountain, and there ſate with his Diſciples, and the Paſſeover was nigh. It being late, he having Compaſſion on the multitude, fed the number of Five thouſand men (beſides Women and Children) with five Barly Loaves, and two ſmall Fiſhes, whereof twelve Baskets full of fragments were taken up. When they would come and take him by force to make him a King, he cauſed his Diſciples to paſs over to the other ſide oppoſite to Bethſaida, and towards Capernaum. Having Prayed in a Mountain apart, he came towards his Diſciples, walking upon the Sea, when they had now rowed Twenty five or Thirty Furlongs, and were troubled with a contrary Wind. They being affrighted at him, he made known himſelf, and ſaving Peter (who had deſired he would bid him come to him on the Water) when he was ſinking, he paſſed over with them. Coming into the Land of Geneſaret, they brought all ſorts of diſeaſed perſons to him, deſiring they might touch but the hem of his Garment, which as many as touched were made whole. The day after his paſſage came the People which he had left on the further ſide to Capernaum to ſeek him, where in the Synagogue he Preached concerning the Bread of Life, aſſerting himſelf to be it againſt the murmuring of the Jews. Many now of his Diſciples departed from, and walked no more with him. And though the Twelve refuſed to depart, yet he declared that one of them was a Devil, meaning Judas Iſcariot, who ſhould betray him, being one of the Twelve.

The third Paſſeover.

15. After the Third Paſſeover of his Miniſtery, the Scribes and Phariſees that were come from Jeruſalem came to him, and complained that his Diſciples eat with unwaſhed hands; To whom he anſwered concerning their aboliſhing God's Commands by their Traditions, and taught the multitude what he declared to his Diſciples, that Not what entreth in, but what cometh out, defileth a man. Departing into the Coaſts of Tyre and Sidon, he caſt the Devil out of the Daughter of the Syrophœnician Woman, becauſe of the greatneſs of her Faith. Paſſing thence to the Sea of Galile through the midſt of Decapolis, he healed a deaf man, who had an impediment in his ſpeech, and aſcending into a Mountain healed many. In thoſe dayes a great multitude having ſtayed with him three dayes, he fed them to the number of Four thouſand Men, beſides Women and Children, with ſeven Loaves, and a few little Fiſhes; and ſeven baskets full of fragments were taken up. Taking Ship preſently, he came into the Parts of Dalmanutha, or the Coaſts of Magdala. The Phariſees asking a ſign, he ſighed deeply in his Spirit, for that theſe Hypocrites could diſcern the face of the Sky, and not the ſigns of the times; and refuſing to give them any other ſign than that of Jonas, he left them, and returned by ſhip to the further ſide. His Diſciples having forgot to take Bread, and brought but one Loaf with them, he bids them beware of the Leaven of the Phariſees and of Herod; and expoundeth his meaning to be of the Leaven of Doctrine. Coming then to Bethſaida, he cureth a blind man by degrees without the Town. Paſſing thence into the Towns of Cæſarea-Philippi, he asked his Diſciples concerning the opinion which men had of him, and then what they themſelves thought; To which for themſelves Peter anſwered, That he was the Chriſt; which thing he forbad them to declare, foretold his Death and Reſurrection, called Peter Satan, for checking him about his Sufferings, and foretold his Transfiguration, which after ſome ſix dayes was fulfilled. The day following coming down, he caſt out a Devil out of the Lunatick, which his Diſciples could not eject. Paſſing thence, they journeyed through Galile, which he would not have known, and taught his Diſciples that he muſt die, and riſe again; which they underſtanding not were troubled, and afraid to ask him. Being arrived at Capernaum, the Lord paid Tribute-money, and taught his Diſciples Humility by the example of a little Child; ſpeaking alſo againſt offending one's weak Brother, and forgiving one another ſeventy ſeven times by the Parable of the King's two debtors. John telling him that they had ſeen one caſting out Devils in his Name, he ſaid he was not to be forbidden; and again ſpake againſt offending weak ones, and bade them beware that no Member offended them. After theſe things Jeſus walked in Galile, for he would not walk in Jury, becauſe the Jews ſought to kill him. Now the Jews Feaſt of Tabernacles (the Scenopagia) was at hand. His Brethren, or Kinſmen, willed him to go up that his Diſciples might believe in him; but he refuſed to comply with them therein who themſelves believed not, and went up after them, not openly, but as it were in ſecret.

16. When the time was come that he ſhould be received up, he ſtedfaſtly ſet his face to go to Jeruſalem. The Samaritans not receiving him, he checked his Diſciples, who would have had fire called down from Heaven upon them. Several in his paſſage deſiring to follow him, he gave anſwer to them all. After theſe things he ſent out Seventy Diſciples before his face, two into every City and Place where he would come. And in the midſt of the Feaſt when the multitude was buſie in inquiring about him, he came, and taught in the Temple. Some were ſent to lay hold of him. On the laſt, and great day of the Feaſt, when he ſpake of Faith in himſelf, a great difference aroſe, and the Meſſengers that were ſent to apprehend him, with Nicodemus, defended him againſt the Phariſees. Departing into the Mount of Olives, he returned early in the morning, and refuſed as a Judge to condemn the Woman taken in Adultery. In the Treaſury he ſpake much concerning many Truths, concluding with before Abraham was, I am; whereupon the Jews took up ſtones to caſt at him; but he hid himſelf, and paſſed away through the midſt of them. Paſſing by, he ſaw, and cured a man that was born blind, who for vindicating him was caſt out of the Synagogue. He then Preached concerning the true Shepherd, Sheep, and Door, as alſo of Thieves and Mercenaries, which cauſed a diſſention amongſt his hearers. The Seventy then return with joy, and a certain Lawyer asking him what he ſhould do to inherit eternal life, he ſendeth him to the Law, and to declare who is our Neighbour, ſpeaketh the Parable of the man that fell among Thieves. After this he was entertained in the houſe of Martha, which miniſtred to him, while her Siſter Mary hearing his Word was preferred before her. And it came to paſs that after he had done praying in a certain place, one of his Diſciples deſired him to teach them to Pray, as John alſo taught his Diſciples; therefore he preſcribed the ſecond time the ſame Lord's Prayer, adding arguments for conſtancy and firmneſs of Faith. He caſt out a Devil which was dumb, and proved againſt the blaſphemers that he did it not by Beelzebub. While he ſaid theſe things, a certain Woman ſaid, Bleſſed is the Womb that bare thee, and the Paps that gave thee ſuck, to which he anſwered. The multitude gathering about him, he ſaid, that Generation ſought for a ſign, but no ſign, but that of Jonas the Prophet ſhould be given it, ſaying, that the Queen of the South, and the Ninevites, ſhould condemn it in judgment. Dining with a Phariſee who had invited him, and wondred that he waſhed not, he ſpoke againſt their Hypocriſie, and denounced alſo Woes againſt the Expoſitors of the Law. He bade his Diſciples beware of the Leaven of the Phariſees (Hypocriſie) and not fear thoſe that could kill the body. He refuſed to be a Judge betwixt a man and his Brother about the Inheritance, and thence took occaſion to ſpeak againſt anxious Cares of the World, bidding them be ready againſt the uncertain time of their Lord's coming.

17. There being ſome that told Jeſus of the Galileans, the bloud of whom Pilate mingled with their Sacrifice, he took thence occaſion to preſs repentance, and ſpake the Parable of the barren Fig-Tree. On a certain Sabbath he healed a Woman that had a ſpirit of infirmity Eighteen years, which act he defended againſt the Ruler of the Synagogue, and compared the Kingdom of God to a Grain of Muſtard-ſeed, and to Leaven. Journeying towards Jeruſalem to the Feaſt of the Dedication, he Taught through the Cities and Villages, and anſwered that Queſtion, Whether few ſhall be ſaved? To certain Phariſees, who bade him be gone for fear of Herod, he gave a couragious anſwer. Being invited to eat in the houſe of one of the chiefeſt Phariſees, he healed one of the Dropſie, defended it, and ſpake the Parable of thoſe that were invited to a Feaſt, inſtructing the Phariſee who had invited him. One of the Gueſts ſaying, that Bleſſed is he that ſhall eat bread in the Kingdom of God, he took occaſion to ſpeak the Parable of the great Supper, and the excuſes of ſuch as were invited. To the multitude following him he Preached concerning the denial of life it ſelf for his ſake, propounding the Parable of one who was to build a Tower, and the King going to Battel. Upon the Publicans and Sinners their coming to hear him, the Phariſees murmured, and he ſpake to them the Parables of the loſt ſheep, the groat, and the Prodigal Son. To his Diſciples he alſo ſpake that of the Unjuſt Steward, which applying, the Phariſees who were covetous derided him, whereupon Preaching againſt them, amongſt other things he ſpake the Parable of the Rich man and Lazarus. Speaking to his Diſciples againſt offences, he alſo teacheth that we muſt forgive our offending brother. The Apoſtles deſiring him to increaſe their Faith, he ſpeaketh of the power of that Grace, and by the Parable of the ſervant ſheweth, that when we have done all we can we are unprofitable ſervants, having done but what we ought. Paſſing through Samaria and Galilee, towards Jeruſalem, he healed the ten Lepers, whereof one only returned and praiſed God. To the Phariſees asking him when the Kingdom of God ſhould come, he anſwereth, and declareth to his Diſciples, that the day of the Son of Man ſhould be like to thoſe of Noah and Lot, but he muſt firſt ſuffer many things. To incourage his Diſciples to Pray, he ſpake the Parable of the unjuſt Judge: and to ſome that thought themſelves righteous and deſpiſed others, that of the Phariſee and the Publican.

18. At the Feaſt of Dedication, when it was Winter, Jeſus walking in Salomon's Porch, to the Jews, who bad him tell them plainly whether he was Chriſt or not, he anſwered, that He and his father are one, whereupon they taking up ſtones to throw at him, he defended his Divinity by his works, and the Scriptures, and eſcaped when they ſought to take him. Paſſing beyond Jordan into that place where John baptized, he taught and healed, many believing on him, and anſwered the Phariſees tempting him, that it is unlawful for a man to put away his wife, except for Adultery. Now admitted he Infants, though his Diſciples rebuked ſuch as brought them, and as he was paſſing thence to come into the way, he anſwered the young Rich man that asked him what he ſhould do to inherit eternal life, and bad him ſell all he had, and give it to the poor, then to follow him. Hearing that Lazarus was ſick, he abode in the place where he was two days, and then coming to Bethany, after he had been dead four days, raiſed him from the dead. Hereupon Caiphas Propheſying that he was to die for the people, they reſolved to put him to death; which he underſtanding, went into the City Ephraim, and there taught. Aſcending towards Jeruſalem, he went before his Diſciples, who were amazed and afraid. He now told them of his Sufferings, which they did not at all underſtand; and the Sons of Zebedee asking to ſit on his right and left hand in his Kingdom, he gave them a repulſe, and improved it to the Teaching them all humility. Coming near to Jericho he healed a blind man. In Jericho he called, and was entertained by Zachæus, and paſſing thence reſtored ſight to two blind men, whereof one was Bartimæus; when they drew near to Jeruſalem, they thinking that the Kingdom of God was near, he ſpake the Parable of the King, who going a journey committed ten Talents to his ſervants to be improved till his Return. The Paſſeover being now at hand, many went up to Jeruſalem, to purifie themſelves, and Jeſus, ſix days before it, came to Bethany, where they made him a Supper. Lazarus ſate at Table with him, but Mary anointed his feet, and wiped them with her hair. Many of the Jews came, not only to ſee Him, but Lazarus alſo, upon which account, for that many believed on him, the Chief Prieſts conſulted alſo to kill Lazarus. Going towards Jeruſalem, when he was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives (on the twenty ninth of March) he ſent his Diſciples for the Aſſe's Colt whereon he rode to Jeruſalem. When he came near the City he wept over it, foretelling its final deſtruction. Out of the Temple he caſt Buyers and Sellers, where the Children cried Hoſanna, and many believed on him, the great ones ſtudying how to kill him. Certain Greeks who were come to the Feaſt deſiring to ſee him, he Preached concerning his Paſſion, and had a voice from Heaven anſwering his Prayer, which ſome thought to be of an Angel, and others of Thunder. It being late, he went to Bethany with the Twelve. Notwithſtanding, the multitude had ſeen ſo many works, yet they believed not, that the Saying of Eſaias might be fulfilled. Yet many of the Chief Prieſts believed on him, but durſt not confeſs him, for the Phariſees. Jeſus cried, and ſpake concerning Faith in himſelf.

19. The next morning as he returned he hungred, and curſed the barren Fig-tree. He caſt Buyers and Sellers again out of the Temple, and ſuffered nothing to be carried through it. Whilſt he taught concerning Faith in himſelf, the Chief-Prieſts conſulted how to kill him, fearing the People. At evening he went out of the City, and returning in the morning, his Diſciples found the Fig-tree withered; whereupon he took occaſion to Preach concerning the power of Faith. As he taught in the Temple, the Chief-Prieſts, and Phariſees, and Elders, asked him by what Authority he did theſe things? to whom he anſwered with another queſtion concerning John's Authority, ſpake the Parable of the two ſons, asking them, whether did the Will of his Father? and that of the husbandmen, who killed the heir of the vinyard, applying them to theſe men, who now ſtudied how to apprehend him, but feared the People. Again, he ſpake to them the Parable of the marriage of the King's ſon, and the Excuſes of the invited, with the Want of the Wedding-garment. Then the Phariſees ſent ſome to entrap him in his Talk, who asking him whether it was lawful to give tribute to Cæſar? admired his Anſwer, and left him. On that day the Sadduces asked him concerning the woman married to ſeven Husbands, whoſe ſhe ſhould be at the Reſurrection? to which having anſwered, and aſſerted the Reſurrection, a Lawyer tempted him, asking him, which is the greateſt Commandment? Having anſwered him, he asked the Phariſees whoſe Son Chriſt is? and no man could anſwer him any thing, nor durſt thenceforth ask him any more queſtions. Then ſpeaking of the Scribes and Phariſees, he pronounced eight Woes againſt them, and upbraiding Jeruſalem with her cruelty and obſtinacy, foretelleth her deſtruction. Sitting over againſt the Treaſury, he ſaw a poor Widow caſt in two mites; and going out to his Diſciples, who admired the Structure, he foretold its ruine. His Diſciples asked him on the Mount of Olives, when theſe things ſhould be, concerning the Sign of his coming, and the end of the World; he anſwered largely, adviſing them to watch, for they knew not what hour their Lord would come, illuſtrating his Doctrine by the Parable of the Ten Virgins, and the talents committed to the ſervants, to traffick. And he deſcribed the laſt Judgment by a Severing of goats from the ſheep. By day he taught, at night he went to the Mount of Olives, and all the People came in the morning to hear him in the Temple. When he had ended theſe Sayings, he ſaid to his Diſciples, You know that after two days is the Feaſt of the Paſſeover, and the ſon of man is betrayed to be crucified. The great ones aſſembling in the houſe of Caiphas the High-Prieſt, conſulted how to kill him; but they ſaid, not on the Feaſt-day, leſt there be an uprore amongſt the People. Jeſus being in Bethany in the houſe of Simon the Leper, a woman poured Oyntment upon his head, which he defended againſt his Diſciples, foretelling his Burial. Then entred Satan into Judas, who offered himſelf, and covenanted for Money to betray him.

The Fourth Paſſeover, wherein Chriſt the true Paſſeover himſelf was offered.

20. In the Fourth Paſſeover Jeſus himſelf, Our Paſſeover, was offered, and an end thereby was put to all Sacrifices, which were but types of this. Some think that he did not this time eat the Paſchal Lamb, but only unleavened Bread and bitter Herbs, ſuch as were uſed by thoſe that could not come up to the Sacrifice, being in another Country. For a (a) learned Man diſtinguiſheth betwixt πάσχα θύσιμον and μνημονευτικὸν, which later was performed by thoſe that were afar off, in memorial of the thing, it being unlawful to kill the Lamb any where out of Judæa. Now Chriſt would not ſacrifice, becauſe he himſelf was now to be offered. That he did not do it, appeareth, becauſe as ſoon as he came into the houſe he ſate down; and this many of the ancient Greek Fathers did believe. Theſe words of Chriſt, with deſire I have deſired to eat this Paſſeover with you before I ſuffer, the ſame learned Man expoundeth as meant, that he haſted to that Supper becauſe the time of his death was at hand, which would take from him the liberty of celebrating the πάσχα θύσιμον. It being granted that he kept the Paſſeover a day before the Jews obſerved it, (b) another contendeth that Chriſt kept it on the true day, and that the Jews receding from the Law, put it off till the following day, or the fifteenth of the Month Niſan, being the Sabbath, leſt they ſhould be debarred of working for two days together. But the other opinion is more probable, which holdeth that he anticipated it, being as the true Paſſeover, to be offered up on the true day of killing the Paſſeover, which fell out on the day preceding the Sabbath, and not on the Sabbath day. It clearly appeareth in Scripture, what things our Lord did and ſuffered for unworthy Sinners, after he had eaten this Supper, though the order of the former paſſages concerning his Preaching be obſcure, and therefore we have more largely deſcribed them. Being betrayed by Judas into the hands of the Chief-Prieſts, and by them delivered up to Pilate the Governour, he, convinced of his innocence and their malice, ſought how to deliver him, till they told him, that if he did it he was not Cæſar's friend; whereupon fearing to be accuſed to Tiberius, of Protecting one who affected the Kingdom, he condemned him, and delivered him to the Soldiers to be Crucified. This was about the ſixth hour, or a little after Noon, at what time a great darkneſs aroſe, for the Sun was obſcured, and ſo continued till the ninth hour, or three of the clock. Then Chriſt to ſhew the bitterneſs of his torment cried (yet) with

A. D. 33. Ol. 202. an. 4. V. C. 787.

(a) Grotius Annot. in Matth. c. 26.

(b) Voſſius de ſacræ cœnæ dominicæ Symbolis Diſp. 1.

with a loud voice, Eli Eli Lamaſabachtani, and receiving the Vinegar, after he had commended his Soul into the hands of his Father, gave up the Ghoſt. Thus he who was in the form of God, and counted it no Robbery to be equal with God, made himſelf of no reputation, and ſuffered Death, even the (moſt ignominious) death of the Croſs for ingrateful men.

The miraculous Eclipſe at our Saviour's death.

21. Some think that the darkneſs which hapned at our Saviour's Paſſion, was only in the Land of Judæa. But others, finding that the Evangeliſts mention * the whole Earth, conclude that this Eclipſe was Oecumenical or Univerſal, Luke expreſly ſaying, That the Sun it ſelf (the eye of the whole World) was darkned. Some conceived that the Sun was darkened by the interpoſition of the Body of the Moon, whereof (a) Dionyſius the Areopagite (as he calleth himſelf) was an eye-witneſs, at what time he and Apollophanes the Philoſopher being at Heliopolis, obſerved the Moon ſuddenly to caſt her ſelf before the Sun (though it was not the time of Conjunction) and again from the ninth hour to the evening, oppoſing her ſelf to the middle line of the Sun. If ſo, it was an extraordinary miracle, the Moon being now at the full (as (b) St. Auguſtine obſerveth it to have been ever at the Paſſeover) and conſequently at the greateſt diſtance from the Sun, out of which reſpect others ſeem to have held, that the Sun was darkned, not by the interpoſition of that luminary, but the retention of his beams. That the darkneſs was Univerſal, appeareth from the Records of Heathen Writers, which, as (c) Oroſius ſaith, beſides the Evangeliſts, mentioned the greatneſs of the Eclipſe. And (d) Tertullian writing to Pagans ſaith, You cannot make this wonder ſuſpected, ſeeing your own Calendars have remarked it, and your ſelves retain the teſtimonies thereof in your own regiſters.

Recorded by the Heathen.

Amongſt Greek Authors, Phlegon (e) Trallianus the Freed-man of Adrian the Emperour, in his Work of Olympiads or Chronicle, which conſiſted of ſixteen Books, clearly ſpoke of this Eclipſe, writing in his thirteenth Book, that in the fourth year of the 202 Olympiad, the greateſt Eclipſe hapned that ever was known; for, at the ſixth hour of the day it was night, ſo that the Stars were ſeen in the Heavens.

22. That Chriſt was put to Death in the reign of Tiberius by Pontius Pilate (a) Cornelius Tacitus writeth, an Author guilty of Ethnick ignorance, and prejudice.

The teſtimony of Joſephus concerning Chriſt.

But (b) Joſephus the noble Jewiſh Hiſtorian giveth him an honourable teſtimony, writing, That At the ſame time there was one Jeſus a wiſe man, if it be lawful to call him a man; For he was a worker of wonderful works, and a teacher of thoſe which willingly receive the truth. He had alſo many followers, not only Jews but Gentiles*: and he was believed to be Chriſt. And whereas by the malice of our Princes,* Pilate condemned him to be crucified, yet notwithſtanding they who firſt loved him have perſevered. For he appeared to them alive the third day; the Prophets having foretold in their writings, theſe, and many other wonderful things concerning him: and to this day the People from him called Chriſtians hath not ceaſed. This he relateth, after he had ſpoken of that Sedition which hapned becauſe of Pilate his bringing in of Cæſar's Images. Some from amongſt our ſelves have not given credit to this relation, thinking it to be foiſted in by ſome Chriſtians, for the greater honour of our Religion. But as the piæ fraudes ſuppoſed to have been uſed by the Primitive Chriſtians, are rather increaſed than otherwiſe, by ſome, who either pedantically, and out of oſtentation ſeek for applauſe from the prejudice of their own cauſe (as one hath done of late in reference to the matter in hand) or as out of a melancholick and diſtruſtful humour queſtion the evidence of the truth; ſo is there no reaſon that this teſtimony ſhould be condemned amongſt them. For Joſephus maketh mention of John Baptiſt, giving him large commendations, and relateth alſo that he was beheaded; though he aſſigneth the cauſe to have been out of jealouſie of him, and leſt he ſhould make ſome commotions through his popularity, which likely enough might be ſome cauſe, eſpecially the malice of Herodias conſidered, which woman would not be wanting to fill his head with ſuſpition, although the main reaſon was his reproving of the inceſt. He alſo maketh mention of James the Brother of Alphæus, whom he calleth the brother of Jeſus Chriſt, how he was put to death at Jeruſalem, ſaying, that all good men were ſorely troubled at it; and clearly expreſſeth himſelf diſſatisfied in it, writing, that Ananus, who commanded the Murder to be done, did ill, and this he ſaith not only becauſe the Judicial power was taken away from the Jews, as is evident from the courſe of his words.

23. It is hence clear enough, that Joſephus was not in the number of theſe whom Herod Agrippa could have pleaſed in the killing of the other James, the

* Ἐπὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν, Mat. ἐφ᾽ ὅλην τὴν γῆν. Marc. & Luc.

(a) Epiſt. 7.

(b) De Civitat. Dei l. 3. c. 15.

(c) Lib. 7. c. 4.

(d) Apologet. c. 21.

(e) Apud Euſeb. in Chronico, & Orig. contra Celſum. l. 2. & in Matth.

(a) Annal. l. 15. c. 44.

(b) Antiq. l. 18. c. 4.

Defended to be true and not feigned by Chriſtians.

brother of John; and truly amongſt the Jews, ſuch as were not extremely malicious againſt Chriſt, were ſomething inclining to him, if we conſider the temper of that People. It cannot therefore be ſaid, that Joſephus was ſo inveterately deſpightful againſt Chriſt and Chriſtians, that, as ſome have thought, he utterly paſſed over the ſtory of Chriſt upon that account. This Principle would have induced him to rail rather than to be ſilent, to beſpatter the Chriſtian generation, rather than to ſay nothing, or eſpecially to ſeem diſpleaſed at their ſufferings. It's true, he was with the younger Agrippa, but almoſt a Chriſtian, and therefore we rather follow the tranſlation of Jerome, which rendereth his words credebatur eſſe Chriſtus, than to take them as Euſebius and Rufinus have them, and as they are found in the preſent copies, ὁ χριστὸς οὗτος ἦν, Chriſtus hic erat. But ſome there were amongſt the learneder ſort of Jews, who knew not really what to blame as to Chriſt, nay they believed in him, only they deſired ſtill to * keep the Law, ſuch was their tenaciouſneſs as to it. It's true, they ſtumbled at the meanneſs of his outward condition, and expected a Meſſiah to reign at Jeruſalem. But Joſephus lived to ſee Jeruſalem utterly deſtroyed, and thereby an occaſion for ſuch an advantage taken away; and affliction maketh men more ſeriouſly to conſider things; ſo that he might be favourable enough towards Chriſt himſelf, though as to the Law he might ſtill be pertinacious, as many of them were. Euſebius writeth, that the Verſes of Sibylla were accounted by ſome as feigned by the Eccleſiaſticks, but not a word of this matter.

* Acts 15. Galat. 1. 23. 4, 5.

24. The Jews had great expectations of the Coming of the Meſſiah, at that very time when the Lord Jeſus was upon Earth. They knew that the Prophecies of old reſpected that ſeaſon: they underſtood well enough the weeks of Daniel, and that the Scepter was departed from Judah, when they had no Judiciary Power as to life and death left amongſt them. This expectation was ſo great, that it poſſeſſed the whole Eaſtern part of the Empire, though it was underſtood in the ſame ſenſe only, as by the carnal ſort of Jews; amongſt whom how many counterfeits do we read of, which at that time preſumed upon it? Hereupon, though Chriſt came in an humble way, yet his Miracles cauſed a reverence and eſteem of his Perſon, nay they durſt not but think well of him as the Meſſiah (how long doſt thou make us to doubt?) till confounded by the ſpiritualneſs of his Preaching, offended at his oppoſition of their Traditions, and Phariſaical Tenents (as contrary to their Law, which they thought muſt neceſſarily indure for ever) and eſpecially moved (the greateſt of them) by their corrupt intereſts of profit and applauſe (which made them deny him, though they knew the Reſurrection, and to ſin againſt their own Conſciences, and the Holy Ghoſt) they rejected, and put him to death. That Saying amongſt the Talmudiſts, and aſcribed to the houſe of Elias (whom ſome will have to be John Baptiſt) is commonly known, viz. that the World ſhould continue ſix thouſand years, whereof two thouſand belong to Tohu or Inane (that is the void ſpace of time betwixt the Creation and the Law) two thouſand to the Law, and two thouſand to the Meſſiah; that then it ſhould be deſtroyed. Now as the firſt diviſion lighteth well, if the Tohu be taken as ending at the birth of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful (or thoſe in Covenant with God) ſo the ſecond endeth much about the Birth of our Saviour (reckoning as to both thoſe accounts the years of the Patriarchs, according to the Hebrew Text) and pointeth out the time of the Meſſiah. Suidas mentioned out of Theodoſius a noble Jew, that before Chriſt did rebuke the Scribes, they marvelling at his wiſe anſwers and queſtions made him one of the Prieſts, and entred his name, Ἰησοῦς ὁ υἱὸς θεοῦ καὶ Μαρίας, Jeſus the Son of God and of Mary, otherwiſe he being of the Tribe of Judah could not have been ſuffered to Preach at Nazareth and Capernaum as he did.

Percrebuerat Oriente toto vetus & conſtans opinio, eſſe in fatis, ut eo tempore Judæa profecti rerum potirentur. Sueton. in Veſpaſ.

25. But (that we may improve thoſe things as to Joſephus) it doth appear, that not only before Chriſt gave them offence, and that before he died, ſome had honourable thoughts of him, but alſo after his death they accounted him the very Meſſiah, though they would not part with their old way of worſhip. Their * Talmud, like to Augeas his Stable, is full of filth, amongſt which but a few Granes of Corn do appear. It was not finiſhed in leſs time than a hundred years, being written with this deſign, to contain all the Sayings of their Elders which were not expreſſed in Scripture, and was compleated (ſuch a Fardel as it is) about five hundred years after Chriſt. Yet ſpeaking of that place of Zechariah (Chap. 12. verſ. 10.) And they ſhall look upon me whom they have pierced, after it hath reprehended a certain expoſition of it, addeth, Peace be to him who hath ſaid that theſe things are to be

* Babylonian.

Cap. 5. fol. 52. Vide ſis Jacobum Cappellum. In Hiſt. ſacra & exotic. ad A. M. 3670.

be underſtood of Meſſiah the ſon of Joſeph, who is ſlain. There is nothing in the whole Talmud more worthy of obſervation. For ſo we have him whom both the Bleſſed Virgin her ſelf, and Nathaniel calleth the Son of Joſeph, and whom the Jews put to death, to be the true Meſſiah, and to have been born about the 4000 year of the World.

Teſtimonies from the Heathen.

26. There are not wanting Teſtimonies concerning the truth of Chriſt and his Doctrine, from the Heathen. Rhodiginus and Volateran deliver it as a matter of credit, that there was an Altar in Egypt Dedicated unto a Virgin that ſhould bring forth a Child: and Poſtellus, that there was another intituled Primogenito Dei, to the firſt begotten of God. Upon the Star which appeared at his Birth (which ſome think the ſame mentioned by Pliny, and called Stella crinita ſine crine) many meditating turned to the truth, as Chæremon amongſt the Stoicks, and Challadius amongſt the Platoniſts, who thereupon went into Judæa, and became Jews. It is alſo reported that the Romans called their Temple which they had built to Bacchus for Victory, Templum pacis æternum, the everlaſting Temple of Peace, becauſe the Oracle at Delphi told them it ſhould ſtand dum peperit virgo, till a Virgin brought forth a Child; but as ſoon as Chriſt was born it fell. The Oracles generally fell in the reign of Tiberius, when the time of Chriſt his Preaching was come, who was the eternal Word of his Father. Plutarch of this Subject wrote a Tract, ſearching much, as a Philoſopher, what the cauſe of this ſtrange change ſhould be. After his acute ſearch after ſundry cauſes, and accurate Philoſophical diſputes, he refers it partly to the abſence of the Demoniacal ſpirits, which he thinks might die, or remove from place to place, either baniſhed by others more potent, or upon ſome diſlike; and partly unto the alteration of the ſoil wherein Oracles were ſeated, which yielded not exhalations of ſuch Divine temper as in former times it had done; for, without a certain temperature of exhalations, or breathing of the earth, he thought that ſpirits could not give their Oracles, more than a Muſician can play without an Inſtrument. Accordingly he expected, that Oracles ſhould either come in Uſe again in Greece, or elſe burſt out in ſome convenient ſoil. But where have they thus burſt out? Chriſtianity chaſed them away wherever it came, and put thoſe ſpirits to ſilence, which were afraid of the Chriſtians in the Primitive times, ſo, as thoſe Holy Men could make them confeſs they were Devils, and chaſe them out of ſuch Bodies as they had poſſeſſed; for the truth whereof Tertullian in his Apology appealeth to the Conſciences of the Heathen themſelves, and therefore he would not in ſo publick a Defence produce an untruth, which muſt have been notoriouſly known. Therefore the ſilence of the Oracles was not from any of thoſe cauſes (which to one that hath opportunity are in themſelves eaſie to be confuted); the truth was, the time was come wherein the ſtrong man's houſe was to be entred, his goods ſpoiled, and himſelf bound; Now the Prince of this world was to be caſt out: Satan fell like lightning from Heaven upon the approach of that true light which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world.

The Oracles ſilenced.

Lib. de defectu Oraculorum.

The great Pan that died, was Chriſt the true ſhepherd.

27. That notable ſtory which Plutarch bringeth for confirmation of his Opinion, concerning the Mortality of thoſe Dæmoniacal ſpirits, maketh exceeding much for our purpoſe; if we conſider the time thereof. Thamous the Egyptian Maſter, as he ſailed, was requeſted by an uncouth voice uttered three times from Land, to proclaim the news of Great Pan*'s death* as he paſſed by Palodes. Thamous, whoſe name was unknown to his Paſſengers, till he anſwered to it at the third Call, was reſolved to have let all paſs as a fancy or idle meſſage, if the wind and tide ſhould grant him paſſage by the place appointed: but, the wind failing him on a ſudden, at his coming thither, he thought it but a little loſs of breath to cry out aloud unto the ſhoar, as he had been requeſted, Great Pan is dead. The words, as Plutarch relateth, were ſcarce out of his mouth, before they were anſwered with a huge noiſe, as it had been of a multitude, ſighing, and groaning at this wonderment. Now, if theſe Spirits had been by nature Mortal, as the Philoſopher thought they were, the death of their Chief Captain could not have ſeemed ſo ſtrange: but that a far greater than the greateſt of them, by whoſe power the firſt of them had his being, ſhould die to redeem his Enemies from their thraldom, might well ſeem a matter of aſtoniſhment, and deep ſorrow unto them. The circumſtance of the time will not permit us to doubt, but that under the known name of Pan was intimated the great Shepherd of our Souls, who had then laid down his life for his flock; not the feigned Son of Mercury and Penelope, as the Wiſe-men fooliſhly reſolved Tiberius, who having had the truth of the Story confirmed to him by ear-witneſſes, called a Convocation of wiſe-men, to reſolve him who this great Pan lately deceaſed ſhould be. The Scriptures ſet forth unto us the true cauſe, why both the wild goatiſh Pan, and all the reſt of that Helliſh crew ſhould at that time howl and mourn, ſeeing by our great Shepherd's Death they were become Dead in Law; no more to breath in Oracles, but quite to be deprived of all ſuch ſtrange motions as they had ſeduced the ignorant World with before. All the Antick tricks of Faunus, the Satyrs, and ſuch like Creatures were now put down; God had reſolved to make a tranſlation of his Church; and for this cauſe the Devils were forced to diſſolve their old Chappels, and ſeek a new form of their Liturgy or Service. Theſe paſſages are pregnant enough, though we allege not what Nicephorus reporteth, that the Oracle at Delphi (perhaps not juſt then extinct) ſaid that this Pan was Πᾶις Ἑβραῖος, an Hebrew Child; and though we omit what Suidas writeth, that Auguſtus ſending to Pythia to inquire who ſhould ſucceed him, had anſwer, that an Hebrew Child, Lord of the Gods, had commanded him to be gone down again to Hell, and therefore he muſt no more enquire there. Whereupon Auguſtus erected an Altar in the Capitol Primogenito Dei, To the firſt born of God.

The Teſtimonies of the Sibylls.

28. But amongſt other teſtimonies of the Heathen concerning Chriſt, that of the Sibyll's muſt not be omitted. Theſe Women were indued with extraordinary gifts of Prophecy, as certain previous pledges, that the Gentiles ſhould alſo drink of the true, heavenly, and eternal Fountain. Like to thoſe was Balaam the Midianite, an Idolater, yet called a Prophet by the Scriptures, who amongſt other things, foretold that a Star ſhould riſe out of Jacob, and a Scepter from Iſrael. There were many of theſe Sibyll's as we have already ſhewn, and ſeveral of them Propheſied of Chriſt. Their Sayings were made much uſe of by ſuch ancient Chriſtians as had to do with Pagans, and Heathen Philoſophers. (a) Juſtin Martyr telleth ſuch, that the old, and very ancient Sibylla, of which Plato, Ariſtophanes, and others have made mention, ſpake of one God, and againſt Idolaters; as alſo of the Coming of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, plainly, and manifeſtly, and of his works. (b) Clemens alſo writeth of Hydaſpes an ancient King of the Medes, who clearly foretold that the Son of God ſhould come. Concerning the Verſes of Sibylla Erythræa many have written, and many of them are produced by Euſebius in the Oration (c) of Conſtantine to the Clergy, the Acroſticks whereof make up theſe words. *Ἰησοῦς χρειστὸς θεοῦ, &c. Jeſus Chriſtus Dei Filius, ſervator, crux, and foretel the laſt Judgment and Authority of Chriſt. There are others alſo cited by (d) Lactantius, which ſpeak of Chriſt his * coming into unjuſt hands, his being ſtricken on the head, and wearing a Crown of Thorns; the giving of him Vinegar, the renting of the veil of the Temple, and his being dead three days. Now ſome were of opinion of old, that theſe were feigned by Chriſtians, as appeareth by what Conſtantine (or Euſebius for him) ſubjoyneth. But there are many that give no credence, ſaith he, thereunto, although they confeſs that Sibylla Erythræa was a Propheteſs: yea, they ſuſpect that ſome of our Religion not ignorant in Poetry, made theſe Verſes; and that they are falſly inſcribed, and reckoned among the Oracles of Sibylla: ſeeing they contain very profitable ſentences, both to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of immoderate pleaſure, and perſuade to a modeſt continency of life. But the truth of this matter doth manifeſtly appear, for our men have with great ſtudy ſo accurately compared the times, that none can ſuſpect that this Poem was made, and came forth after Chriſt's coming, and therefore they are convinced of falſhood, who blaze abroad that theſe Verſes were not made by this Sibylla. For it is manifeſt that Cicero, having read this Poem, did tranſlate it into Latine, and joyned it to his works, who was afterward put to death by the Triumvir Antonius, and Antonius was overcome by Auguſtus, who reigned ſix and fifty years: Tiberius ſucceeded Auguſtus, in whoſe reign our Saviour came into the World, and the myſtery of Religion began to flouriſh, and the people were changed. Of which I ſuppoſe the chief of the Italian Poets hath thus ſung.

(a) In Pareanet. p. 16, &c. ad 37. vide.

(b) Strom. l. 6.

(c) Cap. 18.

(d) *L.*14.*c.*18.

* Ἱδρώσει γὰρ χθὼν κρίσεως σημεῖον, ὅς ἔσται. Ἥξει δ᾽ οὐρανόθεν βασιλεὺς, &c.

* Εἰς ἀνόμους χεῖρας, &c.

Conſtantine confuteth ſuch as accounted them forged.

29. He meaneth Virgil, whoſe Poem he reciteth concerning the Golden days foretold by Sibylla Cumæa (by which name the Romans called all the Sibylls, becauſe of the old Cumana or Cumæa, whoſe Verſes were burnt in the Capitol, in the 671 year of the City, and were ſupplied by other fetch't from Erythræ, and elſewhere) as alſo concerning a Child that was to be born. He aſcribeth to this Child ſuch Divine things, as none can doubt, but that he muſt be above a man, whom Sibylla deſcribed by ſuch expreſſions. Now that ſuch Verſes could be feigned by Chriſtians none can affirm, but the groſly ignorant, who know not that Virgil died died ſeveral years (viz. 18.) before Chriſt was born. Neither can it be thought he feigned it on his own head, although we cannot ſay with Conſtantine or Euſebius, that he did thus myſtically involve, and cover the truth, leſt the Emperour ſhould be offended with him for writing that which was contrary to their Laws, and Statutes eſtabliſhed, concerning their gods; or that we do believe that he foreſaw the happy and glorious myſtery of our Saviour's Coming: but that he might avoid their cruelty, he ſpake his audience in the accuſtomed manner. Some of late alſo have rejected the Poems aſcribed to theſe women, as feigned by Chriſtians, becauſe they ſeem to ſpeak more plainly of Chriſt, than the true Prophets do, and exhibit rather an Hiſtory of Chriſt already come, than a Prophecy of his Coming. They think it contrary to the Word of God, to think that theſe profound myſteries ſhould be more clearly propounded to the Gentiles than to the Jews. This alſo moveth them (for we will confeſs the utmoſt) that they perceive many of the Ancients in the moſt Primitive times, to have counted it the choiceſt work they could perform, to help the Heavenly truth by their fictions, whereby the new Doctrine might more eaſily be admitted by the Pagan wiſe men. And as they cannot but moſt grievouſly reprehend this thing, ſo not ſufficiently can they admire the judgment of thoſe Fathers, who with ſuch facility received theſe writings, and as doubt not to produce teſtimonies from them, to underprop the heavenly truth.

Eclog. 4.

Some of late have alſo queſtioned them.

30. But it is anſwered by way of utter denial, that there were many in the Primitive Times, who ſought to eſtabliſh the truth by fictions and lies, and by Challenge made, for them to produce any one lie or fiction made or uſed by the moſt ancient Fathers, though for a good end. Certainly they who in their Diſputations with the Pagans, appeal to the teſtimony of the Sibylls, deſerve great commendations for their Prudence. And hence may it be proved, that thoſe teſtimonies were not forged, becauſe they in all Conflicts more willingly had recourſe to them than to any other. For, can we imagine them fools, with whom theſe Fathers had to do? They were as cunning and knowing as the beſt; they were Philoſophers, Rhetors, Profeſſors of Arts, States-men, and moſt commonly ſuch as enjoyed the greateſt honours. Where is it objected by any of theſe in the moſt Primitive times, that theſe teſtimonies were feigned by Chriſtians? This Anſwer would have been eaſie and ready, and ſuch as would inſtantly have ſtopped the mouths of Primitive Saints. But the wiſeſt and bittereſt of the Enemies of Chriſtians, do not make any ſuch Reply, in the moſt ancient times, knowing well enough theſe Oracles, to which the Romans had ever recourſe, and which were known ſufficiently to the whole World, through which it ran for current, that in the Books of the Sibylls was held forth, that one ſhould reign who came out of the Eaſt. The clearneſs of theſe teſtimonies concerning Chriſt, can make nothing againſt them; for Eſaias ſpake not more evidently of Chriſt than Balaam, who ſaid, that a Star ſhould riſe out of Jacob. Who dare preſcribe to God a manner of propheſying? as if it were not free to him to ſpeak plainly or obſcurely to Jew or Gentile, or as if there were not in the Scripture moſt clear Predictions concerning Chriſt. But grant that the Sibylline Oracles are clearer: Ought not thoſe things which are predicted to the Gentiles concerning Chriſt to be clearer, becauſe they wanted Moſes, and the reſt of that learning, which ſhould direct them unto him, that what here was wanting might be ſupplied by the perſpicuity of theſe Oracles? Although we ought not to judge of theſe Oracles, by that light which at preſent appeareth. For what things are moſt evident to us after the accompliſhment, were moſt obſcure when they were predicted. If any one had feigned them, he would have made them induſtriouſly more obſcure, that they might ſeem written before the things were done, and like to thoſe Prophecies which are contained in the Scriptures. Theſe Heathen Prophets ſpake ſome times clearly, according to the intention of God who overruled them; but often abruptly. It's thought they propheſied as of old Balaam's Aſs ſpake, and not otherwiſe did Hydaſpes and the Sibylls ſpeak clearly of the Coming of Chriſt, the Holy Spirit moving them, and governing their tongues. It appeareth (a) from Juſtin Martyr, that it was forbidden upon pain of death to read Hydaſpes, Sibylla, or the Prophets, leſt the People ſhould attain to the knowledge of good things. To theſe (b) Clemens bringeth in St. Paul himſelf referring the Greeks: Take ye alſo the Greek Books, acknowledge Sibylla that ſhe manifeſted one God, and things to come. Take ye alſo Hydaſpes, read him; and you ſhall find the Son of God more clearly and openly deſcribed.

But in vain.

(a) In Apolog. 2. p. 82. totius operis.

(b) Strom. l. 6.

31. To omit what might be (and by others hath been) produced out of * Heathen Writers concerning the bleſſed Trinity (for we may eaſily admit, that God, who was ever the God of the whole World, and deſigned to do the Gentiles good alſo in the knowledge of himſelf, might give to them ſuch Hints of the truth, as afterwards might be improved for their welfare) we ſhall come to the laſt teſtimony concerning Chriſt, and that ſuch an one, as will reduce us to the courſe of our deſign. After that Chriſt was riſen from the dead, and had ſent his Diſciples about to preach and work miracles for the converſion of the World, Pilate who then governed in Judæa, reported his Paſſion and Reſurrection to Tiberius and the Senate, with the miracles done by him, or by them in his name; and how the multitude of believers daily increaſing, he was accounted a God. Tiberius hereupon reported the matter to the Senate, with his favourable ſuffrage, that Chriſt might be accounted a God. But the Senate, becauſe they were diſpleaſed that They had not firſt moved it, refuſed to canonize him, and by an Edict commanded that Chriſtians ſhould be baniſhed the City; eſpecially by reaſon that Sejanus, the great Miniſter of State, moſt obſtinately contradicted this Religion. But Tiberius by another Edict threatned death to the accuſers of Chriſtians. Theſe things thus related by (a) Oroſius, are alſo witneſſed by (b) Euſebius, Tertullian, and Juſtin Martyr, whereof, the teſtimonies of the two later are incontrolable; for in their Apologies they durſt not mention ſuch things, and cite ſuch teſtimonies as they muſt needs know would be eaſily confuted.

Pilate made report unto Tiberius of the Perſon and Works of Chriſt.

* Vide Auguſt. de Civit. Dei. l. 10. c. 23. & Ludovicum vivem in Locum. Tertul. Apolog. c. 21.

(a) Lib. 7. c. 4.
(b) Ecc. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 2.

32. (a) Tertullian writeth, that Tiberius referred it to the Senate, with the prerogative of his own ſuffrage, but they having not approved the thing, refuſed it. Cæſar notwithſtanding remained firm in his reſolution, and threatned ſuch as ſhould accuſe the Chriſtians. This he openly aſſerteth in his Apology to the Pagans, writing alſo in another (b) place of the ſame excellent Work, that Pilate, who in his heart believed in Chriſt, at the ſame time wrote all the Hiſtory of him to the Emperour Tiberius, whereupon the Cæſars themſelves had worſhipped our Maſter, if their Government in ſo doing had been conſiſtent with the men of this World, and Chriſtians permitted to have been ſaluted Cæſars. He giveth another reaſon, why Chriſt was not at firſt worſhipped as a God. There was an ancient Law that forbad Introducing new Ceremonies into Religion, as worſhipping ſtrange Deities, unleſs approved by the Senate; and this was an inviolable and unalterable Law, to which the Prince himſelf was ſubject. He inſtanceth, that Marcus Æmilius would have had divine honours rendred to his Idol, called the god Alburnus, but could not obtain it. As for Juſtin Martyr, he maketh it more evident, telling plainly the Pagans in his ſecond Apology, that they may know theſe things thus to have been, in the Acts which were written under Pontius Pilate; and again, that they might know, that Chriſt wrought ſuch miracles, from the Acta (or Acts) made under Pontius Pilate. Now the word Acta ſignifieth ſometimes the Journal-Book of the Senate, then called Acta Senatus, and otherwhiles the Records of the People, or of the Publick, then named Acta Publica, Diurna, and Urbana. In the former ſort was contained whatſoever was done or ſaid by the Fathers. In the latter, things concerning the People, as Publick Judgments, Puniſhments, Aſſemblies, Buildings, Nativities, the Death of Eminent Perſons, Marriages, and Divorces. Theſe afforded matter for Hiſtorians to digeſt and adorn. Now Juſtin Martyr either meaneth thoſe Acta Publica, wherein might be recorded what notable things hapned in the Provinces; and fell under the adminiſtration of the ſeveral Deputies or Governours: or rather thoſe Acta which Pilate himſelf compoſed in his Province. For we cannot but imagine, that care would be taken for the Recording of things memorable, as well in other places, as in the City it ſelf. The Provinces had their Subcenſors and their Tables. And the Preſidents and Deputies not only certified by Letters occaſionally what happened, but, as we may eaſily apprehend, did refer in Acta all memorable things; which were ſent to Rome, and there, it's probable, either tranſcribed into, or laid up with, the Acta Publica. But, thus much of the teſtimonies of Jews and Heathens concerning Chriſt.

(a) Apologet. c. 5.

(b) Cap. 21.

De Actis conſulant omnino Tirones Juſtum Lipſium in Comment. ad Taciti Annal. lib. 5.

33. The Lord Jeſus having riſen the third day from the dead, and after his Reſurrection given Commiſſion and Inſtructions to his Diſciples, whom he ordained his Ambaſſadors to the whole World; forty days after, he aroſe, aſcended into Heaven, and ſent down the Holy Ghoſt upon his Diſciples, according to his Promiſe, for the Furniſhing of them to the Work, ten days after his aſcenſion. Many being converted to the Faith, the Church increaſed, and living in Love and Unity together, they had all things common, none calling any thing his own which he

The Aſcenſion of Chriſt.

The ſeven Deacons made.

James the firſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem.

A. D. 33. Ol. 203. an. 1. V. C. 787.

Saul converted.

poſſeſſed. About the end of the year, as is rationally computed, the Greeks or Helleniſts (Jews which living out of Judæa ſpake Greek in a peculiar dialect, which is called Helleniſtick, and uſed the Scriptures in their Synagogues in that language) murmured againſt the Hebrews (or thoſe who both read and ſpoke Hebrew) for that their widdows were neglected in the daily miniſtration. Hereupon the Apoſtles committed it to the number of the faithful, to chuſe ſeven men who ſhould take care of what was gathered for the poor, and theſe Eccleſiaſtical Writers call Deacons. About this time James the Apoſtle the Son of Alphæus (who is alſo called the brother of the Lord, and was ſirnamed Juſt) was created the firſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem. For thus Clemens wrote in the ſixth Book of his Hypotypoſeωn, as he is cited by Euſebius. Peter, and James, and John, though they were preferred, after the aſcenſion of the Lord, contended not amongſt themſelves for glory and honour; but with one conſent appointed James the Juſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem. The ſame Clemens in his firſt Book, diſtinguiſhed thus concerning the two which bore the name of James. There were two James, the one termed Juſt, who was thrown down headlong from the pinacle, and brained with a Fuller's club, the other beheaded. Of him that was called Juſt, Paul made mention, ſaying, I ſaw none of the Apoſtles ſave James the brother of the Lord. In the year following Chriſt's reſurrection, a great Perſecution was raiſed by the Jews againſt the Church, wherein Stephan one of the ſeven Deacons and the Protomartyr was ſtoned to Death, by the procurement eſpecially of Saul a Jew of Tarſus in Cilicia. But in this ſame year as this Saul was journeying to Damaſcus to make havock of the Church, he was converted, and called to the Apoſtleſhip, after which he went from Damaſcus into Arabia, as he himſelf teſtifieth in his Epiſtle to the Galatians. Euſebius in his Chronicon placeth the converſion of Saul (afterwards called Paul) in the nineteenth year of Tiberius.

Pilate making a ſlaughter of the Samaritans.

Joſeph. Antiq. l. 18. c. 5.

Is ſent to Rome to give an account of it.

The Jews baniſhed Rome.

86. About this time it happened, that a certain man who ſought by all means the favour of the multitude, drew the Samaritans to Mount Gerizim (which they accounted holy above all other Mountains) promiſing to ſhew them there the holy Veſſels buried in a certain place by Moſes. Many had gathered themſelves to the foot of the Hill, where ſtaying for more company that they might aſcend all together, Pilate prevented them, and killing ſome, took many, diſperſed the reſt, and put to death the chief of thoſe he had taken. Hereof the Senate of Samaria complained to Vitellius Preſident of Syria, who ſent Marcellus his friend to take charge of Judæa, and commanded Pilate to go to Rome, there to anſwer before Cæſar what ſhould be laid to his charge. Hereupon he departed, after he had governed Judæa ten years, but e're he reached Rome, Tiberius was dead. About the ſame time that theſe things hapned in Samaria, the Jews were baniſhed Rome by the Emperor upon this occaſion: A certain Jew flying his Native Country for breaking of the Laws, came to the City, where he profeſſed himſelf an expounder of them, and drew to him two or three no leſs reprobate than himſelf. They made a Proſelyte Fulvia the wife of Saturninus an Honorable Perſon, and perſuading her to ſend ſome Purple and Gold to the Temple of Jeruſalem, converted it to their own Uſe. Saturninus complaining of this to Tiberius, he thereupon commanded all Jews to depart Rome. Of theſe the Conſuls choſe out and liſted four thouſand men, whom they ſent into Sardinia, and puniſhed many that refuſed to bear Arms, upon no other account, than becauſe they would not tranſgreſs the Ordinances of their Country.

Idem ibid. & cap. 6.

Philip the Tetrarch dieth.

Tacitus Annal. l. 6. c. 31.

The Parthian King reviletli and deſpiſeth Tiberius.

Sueton in Tiberio c. 60.

87. About two years after the death of Chriſt, died Philip the Tetrarch, Son to Herod the Great, a man of a modeſt and quiet diſpoſition, whoſe Principality, for that he died without iſſue, Tiberius laid unto the Province of Syria. By this time Artabanus King of Parthia proſpering againſt his neighbours, was much puffed up, and deſpiſing the old age of Tiberius, when his Son Artamas was dead made his other Son Arſaces King of Armenia in his ſtead. He alſo reviled Tiberius by Letters, objecting paricide, murthers, lazineſs, and luxury to him, and willed him by a voluntary death to ſatisfie the moſt juſt hatred of his ſubjects, as ſoon as poſſible. But many Noble men of Parthia, to eſcape his cruelty came to Rome, and deſired a King from Tiberius, who thereupon gladly named Phraates the Son of Phraates, that had been of a long time Hoſtage at Rome, and he dying in Syria, he commended to them Tiridates. Mithridates Brother to Pharaſmenes King of the Hiberi was alſo ordered to get Armenia, who breaking into it joyned the Albanians to him, and procured the death of Arſaces; for the Parthians were eaſily overthrown, being diſcouraged by a falſe rumour of the death of Orodes their Captain, another of Artabanus his Sons. Artabanus having before this attempted Cappadocia, ſent alſo to demand the Treaſure which Vonones had left in Syria and Cilicia, and that had been ſeized by Tiberius, * who with great perfidiouſneſs killed the owner at Antioch; and he further demanded the ancient Borders of the Perſians and Macedonians, bragging that he would invade whatſoever had been poſſeſſed by Cyrus and Alexander. But Vitellius the Preſident of Syria having drawn many of his ſubjects from their Truſt, his mind ſo changed, that he fled away cowardly with a few to the confines of Scythia. Vitellius taking the opportunity carried Tiridates into the Kingdom, but he by delaying to ſeize on the chiefeſt places, and haſtning his Coronation, gave occaſion to ſome of the great ones again to fly unto Artabanus, who coming on, the other fled as faſt back into Syria; ſo that he recovered his Kingdom, with Armenia, and reſolved to ſet upon Syria.

 Idem in Tib. c.* 49.

Tacitus ut ſuprà cap. 41.
Dio l. 59.

88. Tiberius hereupon wrote to Vitellius to make a peace with him. Vitellius about this time was come to Jeruſalem after the expulſion of Pilate, where he celebrated the Paſſeover, remitted to the Citizens the Impoſt upon ſuch fruits as were ſold, and depoſed Joſeph, ſirnamed Caiphas, from the High-Prieſthood, to which he promoted Jonathan the Son of Annas. He met with Artabanus upon a Bridge built over the River Euphrates, where they concluded a Peace, and afterwards they were feaſted by Herod the Tetrarch. Darius the Son of Artabanus was ſent an Hoſtage to Rome with many preſents. But Tiberius died before, (March 16) having ſince the death of Sejanus cruelly raged againſt many, and lived diſſolutely from his retirement to the Iſland Capreæ, whence he never returned to the City, though he was twice on his way. The people ran up and down overcome with joy upon the report of his death. Some would have had his body caſt into Tiber, and others prayed that no other place might be aſſigned him now dead than amongſt the wicked. He reigned twenty two years, ſeven months and odd days, and died in the ſeventy eighth year of his age, and the 790 of the City, Cn. Acerronius Proculus, and C. Pontius Nigrinus being Conſuls.

Caiphas depoſed.

Joſephus Antiquit. lib. 18. cap. 6.

Tiberius dieth.

Sueton ut ſuprà cap. 73. &c.

Tacitus Annal. l. 6. c. 50.

A. D. 38.
*Ol.*204.*ann.*1.
V. C. 790.

CHAP. III.

From the Death of Tiberius to that of Nero, the laſt Emperour of Cæſar's Family, containing the ſpace of Twenty years.

1. TIBERIUS left behind him a Grand-ſon of his own name by his Son Druſus, yet he preferred before him Caius the Son of Germanicus, either for ſome reaſon fetcht (a) from Aſtrology to which he was much given, or through the means (b) of Macro his Freed-man, and greateſt favourite, who being a looſe and vile perſon, Caius inſinuated himſelf into his favour by the procurement of his Wife. With her Caius was wantonly familiar, and promiſed her Marriage by an Oath, and under his hand, if he could compaſs the Empire, wherwith Macro was well pleaſed, if ſo be he could but therewith purchaſe greater Preferment. 'Tis reported that he helped his Maſter forward by ſtifling him in the bed-cloths. Others have thought (c) that a ſlow-working poiſon was given him by Caius; ſome that meat was denied him, and others that when he demanded his Ring which they had pulled off from his finger, they choked him with the Pillow. However it came to paſs, Caius ſucceeded him, and ſome (d) judged him willing that ſo it ſhould be, becauſe he would prove a very bad man, and hoped that thereby the faults of his own reign might be ſomething covered. He was received with great applauſe by all men. By the Army, for that he had been brought up continually amongſt them. Some ſay he was born in the Camp; 'tis certain that the ſirname of Caligula he had for that reaſon, becauſe he was wont (ƒ) to wear that habit of the ordinary Soldiers. By the people he was gladly entertained out of their affection to Germanicus, and commiſeration of his family ſo groſly abuſed by Tiberius, whoſe cruelty he eſcaped meerly by his great diſſimulation, and taking in.

Caius the Son of Germanicus ſucceedeth Tiberius.

(a) Joſephus Antiquit. l. 18 c. 8.

(b) Sueton in Caligula c. 12. Tacitus Annal. l. 6. c. 50.

(c) Sueton ut priùs.

(d) Xiphilinus ex Dione.

(e) Joſephus ut ſuprà.

(ƒ) Sueton ut priùs.

in good part every thing; ſo as it was ſaid truly of him, That never was there a better Servant, nor a worſe Maſter than Caligula.

Preferreth Agrippa.

Joſephus Antiq. l. 18. c. 8.

2. Caius, within a few days after the ſumptuous Funeral of Tiberius, made Agrippa King of that Countrey whereof Philip had been Tetrarch. This Agrippa was the Grand ſon of Herod the Great by his Son Ariſtobulus, whom he put to death, being begotten of Berenice the Daughter of Salome. Having run through many ſtraights for want of Money by reaſon of his great profuſeneſs, he became at length very dear to Caius, who reſtored him to liberty (being impriſoned by Tiberius for wiſhing his death, that Caligula might ſucceed him) and then ſet the Diadem on his head. He had a Siſter named Herodias, married to Philip Herodes (not Philip the Tetrarch) his and her Uncle, and Brother to Philip Antipas on the Father's ſide, his Mother being Daughter to Simon the High-Prieſt. This Woman Herod Antipas was ſo taken with, that though he had already to Wife the Daughter of Aretas King of Arabia Petræa, yet he Divorced this, and Married her, upon which account Aretas made War upon him, and defeated his Forces, which * was taken by the People as a Judgment of God upon him for putting to Death John Baptiſt. Now Herodias envying exceedingly the promotion of her Brother Agrippa, importuned her Husband to go to Rome and beg, or buy the title of King. Agrippa ſmelling out their Deſign before-hand, wrote to Caius, and accuſed him of having heretofore been of Sejanus his Conſpiracy, and of favouring at preſent the Party of Artabanus King of Parthia, whereof he ſaid his Magazines could teſtifie, being furniſhed with Proviſions for ſeventy thouſand men of War. This he could not deny, and therefore Caius Baniſhed him to Lugdunum (now Lyons) in Gall (whither Herodias would needs accompany him) and gave his Principality and Eſtate unto Agrippa. Thus were theſe two Puniſhed for the Death of John Baptiſt; and ſo was Pilate for that of Chriſt. For, being alſo Baniſhed by Caius to Vienna, two years after, he killed himſelf (whereof the Græcians are witneſſes, ſaith Euſebius, who commit to memory in their Hiſtories the Olympiads of times) and ſo became the revenger of his wickedneſs upon himſelf, as he who betrayed Chriſt into his hands had been before.

 Idem ibid. cap. 7.*

Idem ibid. cap. 9.

Herod Antipas Baniſhed to Lyons.

Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt l. 2. c. 7. & Oroſius l. 7. c. 5.

Pilate killeth himſelf.

Sueton in Calig. Capp. 15, 16, 17, &c. Joſephus Antiquit. lib. 18. cap. 9.

3. Though the diſpoſition of Caligula was from his Childhood tending to intemperance and cruelty, yet at his firſt coming to the Government he uſed much Moderation and Equity, as well towards publick as private Perſons. He would not hear any Accuſations, though ſaid to be for his own ſafety, permitted free and antient Juriſdiction to Magiſtrates, attempted to bring in again the Comitia, and reſtore the Privilege of Suffrages to the People, payed the Legacies given by Tiberius, though his Will was nulled, and thoſe given by Livia alſo, though her Son would never diſcharge them: he remitted part of the Taxes to Italy, relieved the neceſſities of ſuch as received loſſes by fire, and to ſuch Kings as he reſtored, he gave the Tributes collected in their abſence. At firſt he appeared a great Patron of virtue, but degenerated into a Monſter, ſo that as far as a man could go in luxury and cruelty, he ſeemed to proceed, which made Seneca * ſay, that nature ſeemed to have brought him forth to ſhew what the greateſt vitiouſneſs backed with the greateſt power could be able to do. We may be more favourable to this opinion, if we conſider that the greatneſs of his Eſtate made him ſo far ſurpaſs the limits of all modeſty, as, challenging to himſelf the title of Divinity, he governed all things in contempt of God.

Caligula beginneth well.

 De Conſolat. ad Albinam cap. 9.*

But turneth a Monſter of men.

Sueton ut ſuprà cap. 22. &c.

4. He thought at firſt to have taken a Diadem, and changed his Principality into a Kingdom, till by his Flatterers he was told, that he was above all ſuch titles. At length he began to take to himſelf Divine honour. For he cauſed the images of their Gods to be brought to Rome, whereof the heads being taken off, that of his own was placed upon each in their ſtead. He would offer himſelf to be adored amongſt his brother gods as he called them, and ordained Temples and Prieſts with Sacrifice of no commoner things than Peacocks, Turkies, and Pheaſants, which were to be offered every day; and he invited the Moon to his Imbraces. He could not endure to be accounted the off-ſpring of Agrippa, becauſe of his ignobility; but gave out that his Mother was conceived of the inceſt of Auguſtus with his Daughter Julia. He himſelf committed inceſt with all his Siſters, and ſpared not the chaſtity of either Sex. So imperious he was, that he would make Perſons of greateſt Rank run by his Chariot, and ſtand girt with Towels when he was at meat. So cruel, that he killed his Grand-mother Antonia by unkindneſs, he murdered his Brother Tiberius, though he had adopted him, with all his Kindred except his Uncle Claudius, whom he preſerved for a laughing-ſtock; and he forced Macro and Ennia to kill themſelves. As for others, he made havock of them, cauſing ſome to be knocked in the head with Clubs, if he were but diſturbed in the ſhows. He would caſt old men, or infirm, to wild Beaſts, and ſhutting up the Barns and Store-houſes proclaim a Famine. Many of Quality being firſt Stigmatized, he condemned to the Mines, or to repairing of High-ways, ſhut them up like Beaſts in a Den, or ſawed them aſunder; and that for no greater Matters than if they had not high thoughts of his gifts and ſhows, or had not ſworn by his Genius.

Aſſumeth divine honours.

His Vices.

Idem ibid. capp. 27, 28, &c.

5. He forced Parents to be preſent at the Death of their Children. To one that excuſed himſelf by Sickneſs, he ſent a Litter to carry him. A certain Knight whom he caſt to wild Beaſts, crying out that he was innocent, he cauſed to be taken out, and his Tongue to be cut out of his Head, after this to be caſt in again. Demanding of one whom he had recalled out of Baniſhment what he did all that time? upon anſwer that he prayed for the death of Tiberius, and that He might ſucceed him, ſuppoſing that all whom he had Baniſhed prayed alſo for his Death, he gave command that they ſhould all be killed. He would ſuffer none to be put to Death but by degrees, that ſo as he ſaid they might feel themſelves die. He ſorely afflicted the order of Knights, and being incenſed againſt the multitude for favouring a Party againſt him, he wiſhed that the People of Rome had but one neck. He was wont openly to complain of the condition of his time, becauſe not ſignalized by any publick Calamity, and how by the Serenity thereof he ſhould be buried in oblivion (his being herein contrary to the diſpoſition of Phalaris) in ſo much as he would wiſh for ſome overthrow of the Armies, ſome Famine, Peſtilence, Fire, or Earth-quake. He purpoſed utterly to deſtroy the works of Virgil and Livy, and take away the Law. He took away honour from Families, and when he met with any beautiful perſon, made them as deformed as he could. He was ſo Prodigal that he would drink moſt precious Pearls diſſolved in Vinegar, and invent all ſorts of delicacies, by which courſe he ſpent infinite Sums in the ſpace of three years, which Tiberius had hoarded up; and to recruit his Coffers raiſed unheard-of Tributes. Amongſt other means for increaſing his Revenue he ſet up Stews in his Palace, and ſome were ſent about to invite all ſorts of men to them, ſuch as came being commended for increaſing Cæſar's Revenues. He purpoſed to depart to Antium and thence to Alexandria, but firſt to kill all the chief both of the Senatorian and Equeſtrian rank; and anſwerably hereunto were there found after his death two Books, whereof the title of one was Gladius, or Sword; and the other Pugio, or Dagger, wherein were written the names of ſuch as he intended to murder. A great cheſt alſo was found full of divers Poiſons, which being by Claudius his appointment caſt into the Sea, the water is reported to have been ſo infected, that the fiſh was therewith killed, and was caſt up by the tide upon the ſhoar. Theſe things are reported by Suetonius, concerning which Author yet it is obſerved by ſome, that he wrote the lives of the Emperours with as great liberty as they lived them.

Joſephus Antiq. l. 19. c. 1.

He is ſlain by Caſſius Chæreas the Captain of his Guard.

6. Many deſired to have an hand in removing him, yet durſt not attempt any thing. But Caſſius Chæreas the Captain of his Guard being grievouſly affronted by him (for ever when Caius gave him the watch-word, it ſhould be ſome effeminate or obſcene name, and he continually charged him with Cowardize) fully reſolved to kill him, and broke the buſineſs to others, whom he thought to have the ſame deſire with himſelf. They killed him as he returned from the Games of the Palace to refreſh himſelf, Chæreas giving him the firſt wound. His guard of Germans (which loved him exceedingly, becauſe of the profit they reaped from the execution of his cruel commands) in a great rage ſlew all they could meet in the Palace, and with much ado were kept from putting thouſands to death, that were now aſſembled in the Theatre. Nay the common People allured by his ſhows and largeſſes, endeavoured to find out the Authors of his death, to whom Valerius Aſiaticus (who had been Conſul) coming forth whilſt they were in an uproar, and every one inquired who had done the deed, O, ſaid he, I wiſh I had done it. Being once adviſed to beware of a Caſſius, he ſuſpected Caſſius Longinus the Proconſul of Aſia (of the ſame Family with Caſſius one of the Murtherers of Julius Cæſar) and ſending for him, put him to death, never thinking that Chæreas had alſo that name. Having reigned three years, ten months and eight days, and lived twenty nine, he thus died, on the ninth before the Calends of February, in the 794 year of the City, and the 42 after the Birth of Chriſt, he himſelf the fourth time, and C. Sextius Saturninus being Conſuls.

A. D. 42.
Ol. 205. an. 1.
V. C. 794.

7. The

Vide Joſeph. Antiq. l. 19 c. 2, & 3. Sueton in Claudio. c. 10.

Claudius his Uncle ſucceedeth him.

7. The Senate now, as Joſephus telleth us, thought of reſuming the ancient form of Government, though it was utterly impracticable, Saturninus the Conſul eſpecially ſtickling for it. But the Soldiers rightly judging, that ſuch an Empire could not be ruled in a Popular way, and eſpecially looking at their own advantage, reſolved the contrary. Tiberius Claudius Druſus, Brother to Germanicus Cæſar, and Son to Druſus (by Antonia the younger, the Daughter of Antony the Triumvir and of Octavia the Siſter of Auguſtus) was yet living. Him they judging moſt fit to ſucceed his Nephew, pulled him out of an hole where he had hid himſelf to ſave his life, and ſtraight-way declared him Emperour. He was at firſt diſcharged by the meſſages of the Senate, but again took heart, at the Counſel and directions of King Agrippa, ſo that the Senators deſpairing of Succeſs, gave over their Enterprize, but not without (ſome of them) ſeeking the Sovereignty for themſelves, which would have produced as great Slaughters and Deſolations as ever, had any of them obtained liberty to proſecute their deſires. The People were for Claudius his preferment, envying the Senate it's ancient Power, and making account by the Sovereignty of one to be ſheltred from it's avarice. Hereby alſo they thought to avoid ſuch Civil Wars as fell out amongſt the great ones in the time of Pompey. The wiſer ſort knew that it was impoſſible the Commonwealth ſhould ſubſiſt but under Monarchy: ſome one they were ſure would eſtabliſh himſelf, and that through Deſolations, Confuſions, and Slaughters, they muſt come to it at laſt. Self-preſervation therefore, and publick intereſt eaſily led them to the next Heir, who by his Birth could challenge an intereſt. For hereditary Monarchies, by preſerving due Reverence, excluding Emulations and Conteſts amongſt equals, by preventing numerous pretentions, and the extravagant grandeur of divers Families, can only ſecure the Peace and Proſperity of their Subjects.

Putteth to death Chæreas.

Idem c. 11.

Inlargeth the Dominions of Agrippa.

Joſephus ut ſupra c. 4, 5.

Acts 12.

Whom vengeance overtaketh for the death of James.

A. D. 45. V. C. 797.

8. Claudius promiſed the Soldiers a Donative upon their taking an Oath to defend his Perſon and Authority. Then put he to death Chæreas and others that killed Caius, as a means to ſecure his own Perſon; but in reference to the Senate buried all things in oblivion, and behaved himſelf moderately and civilly. He confirmed Agrippa in his Kingdom, and inlarged his Dominions by an addition of Judæa and Samaria, which heretofore belonged to his Grand-Father. And he further beſtowed on him Abila, and the Principality of Libanus, which had belonged to Lyſanias; moreover upon his deſire he granted to his Brother Herod the Kingdom of Chalcis, and at the requeſt of both, publiſhed favourable Edicts in behalf of the Jews, who groaned under the perſecution of Caius. This Agrippa (called alſo Herod by St. Luke) labouring all manner of ways to gratifie the Jews, killed James the Brother of John, and ſhut up Peter in Priſon, intending to bring him forth to the People after the Paſſeover, but he was miraculouſly delivered by an Angel. A juſt puniſhment from God overtook Agrippa not long after: For, having begun to build the Walls of Jeruſalem, when upon complaint of Marſus Preſident of Syria, he was forbidden by Claudius, he deſcended to Cæſarea, there to celebrate Games in honour of Cæſar. Being clothed with a Robe of Silver, which gliſtered exceedingly by the reflection of the Sunbeams, he rejected not the flatteries of thoſe who aſcribed to him divine honours, and was preſently ſeized by a pain in his Guts, and being eaten with Worms, gave up the Ghoſt within Five Days, after he had Reigned Seven Years in all, and Three over Judæa. His Kingdom was not committed to his Son, by reaſon of his Youth, (for he was but Seventeen Years Old) and therefore Cuſpius Fadus was ſent to Govern it.

Claudius reſtoreth ſeveral Princes.

The Britains tumultuous.

9. Claudius reſtored alſo Mithridates the Iberian to his Kingdom, whom Caius had impriſoned. On another Mithridates (deſcended from Mithridates the Great King of Pontus) he beſtowed the Kingdom of Boſphorus (giving one part of Cilicia to Polemo in requital) and another part of this Country to Antiochus with Commagena; for he had alſo been deprived of this his Kingdom by Caius. But the Lycians and Rhodians he deprived of their liberty. The former, for that they had raiſed a Sedition, wherein ſome Romans had been ſlain, and the later, becauſe they had Crucified ſome of them. About this time the Britains were very tumultuous, for the reducing of whom to obedience, he ſent A. Plautius in his Second Year, with an Army out of Gall.

Lege Cambdenum.

10. Since the time of Julius Cæſar, the Romans had attempted nothing upon Britain. Auguſtus ſeemeth of purpoſe to have neglected it, counting it policy to keep the Roman Empire with in its bounds; to wit, the Ocean, the Rivers Iſter

and

This Iſland from Julius Cæſar his Expeditions, untouched by the Romans.

Auguſtus was diverted from it.

and Euphrates, limits ſet by nature, to the end it might be a State Adamantine (for ſo he himſelf ſpeaketh in Julian) or invincible, and not miſcarry through its too great bulk and burthen. Strabo is of opinion, that he deſpiſed it, ſeeing no cauſe to fear, nor hope of much profit from, the Britains; and yet it ſeemed that no ſmall danger would be preſented from other Nations lying about the Iſland. But at length he departed from Rome with a purpoſe to transfer the War into Britain; but when he was come into Gall, the Britains pacified him by Ambaſſadors, and having obtained his amity, dedicated Preſents and Oblations in the Capitol. They brought the Iſland now familiar to the Romans, and endured Taxes and Impoſts, which ſaith Strabo, are now nothing grievous to them, being raiſed out of ſuch Merchandiſe and Commodities as are Shipped to and fro out of Gall and Britain: thoſe be Ivory Works, Bits and Bridles, Chains and Wreaths, Veſſels of Electrum and Glaſs, with other baſe and common Wares of like ſort. And therefore there needs no Garriſon for that Iſland. For it would require one Legion at leaſt, and ſome Horſemen, if Tributes were to be Levied from thence, and the ſaid Tributes would but countervail the Charges of maintaining a Garriſon there, for of neceſſity, by impoſing a Tribute, the Revenues coming by Tollage and Poundage, and ſuch like Impoſts, would be leſs: and if any violent courſe were uſed, ſome Peril or other muſt be expected. The Year following alſo, Auguſtus intended a ſecond Expedition into Britain, becauſe there was ſome variance about the Covenants: but by occaſion of ſome inſurrections made in Spain by the Cantabri and others, that Journey was ſtayed.

Tiberius neglect it.

Caius his rare exploits.

11. Tiberius nothing tranſported with an inordinate deſire of inlarging the Empire, ſeemeth to have reſted in that counſel of Auguſtus; For he produced a Book written with Auguſtus his own hand, wherein was contained the whole Wealth and Eſtate of the Commonweal, what number as well of Roman Citizens as Allies were in Arms, how many Navies, Kingdoms, and Provinces, what Tributes and Impoſts belonged to the State, with a reſolution annexed thereto of containing the Empire within the ſame bounds. Which advice and reſolution of Auguſtus contented him ſo well, that, as Tacitus reporteth, he would attempt nothing in Britain, nor maintain any Garriſon or Deputies here. For, whereas Tacitus reckoneth up the number of Legions, and what Coaſts and Countries they defended at that time, he maketh no mention at all of Britain. And yet it ſeemeth, that the Britains entertained amity with the Romans. For when as at the ſame time Germanicus ſailed the Ocean, ſome of his Company being by force of Tempeſt driven to this Iſland, were by the Princes thereof ſent back again. That Caius Cæſar caſt in his mind to enter this Iſland is certain: but by his ſhittle brain, ſudden repentance, and wonderful Attempts againſt Germany it came to nothing. For to the end that he might terrifie Britain and Germany (over which he hovered) with the fame of ſome mighty piece of work, he made a Bridg between Baiæ and the Piles of Puteoli, three Miles and Six Hundred Paces in length. But having atchieved no greater exploit, than received to grace Adminius the Son of Cynobellinus King of the Britains (who being by his Father Baniſhed, had fled over Sea with a ſmall Power and Train about him) he ſent magnificent and glorious Letters to Rome, as if the whole Iſle had been yielded up into his hands, warning and wiſhing the Poſts to ride forward directly into the Forum and Curia, and in no wiſe to deliver the ſaid miſſives unto the Conſuls, but in the Temple of Mars, and that in a frequent Aſſembly of the Senate.

And great atchievement.

Britenhuis.

12. After this, to the Ocean he marched, as if he minded to tranſlate the War over into Britain. There upon the ſhoar he embattelled his Soldiers: he himſelf took Sea in a Gally, and having lanched forth a little from the Land, returned again. Then mounting an high Scaffold, he ſate him down, and gave his Soldiers the Sign for Battel, and commanding the Trumpets to ſound, on a ſuddain charged them to gather Cockles, Muskles, and other ſmall Shel-fiſhes. Having gotten theſe ſpoils he waxed proud, as if he had Conquered the Ocean: and having rewarded his Soldiers, he brought ſome of theſe Shel-fiſhes to Rome, to ſhew the booty he had gotten. In token and memorial of this great atchievement, he cauſed to be built a brave high Turret, out of which as from a Watch-Tower, there might blaze all night long, Lights, and Fires, for the better direction of Sea-men. The ruines hereof are ſome times ſeen at a low-water on the ſhoar of Holland, by the People inhabiting thereabouts, called Britenhuis, that is, the Britiſh houſe, who alſo find oftentimes ſtones ingraven with letters:

of which one had theſe Characters, C. C. P. F. which they expound thus, Caius Caligula Pharum Fecit, that is, Caius Caligula made this Pharus (or Watch-Tower) ſo called, I ſuppoſe, from that notable one, and one of the Worlds wonders, built by Ptolomy Philadelphus in the Iſland Pharus, from which † ſome would have the ancient Kings of Ægypt called Pharaohs. It is probable, that this Watch-tower afterward being repaired by Septimius Severus, became a Granary for reception of Corn, which was brought out of Britain, whence it might take its name of Britenhuis. For Zozimus writeth, ſaith Cambden, that Corn was wont to be brought out of Britain by Ships to this place, and thence with Barges and Boats haled up the Rhene againſt the ſtream, to ſerve the Roman Garriſons : ſeeing that Julian the Emperour built Garriſons, as Marcellinus ſaith, wherein might be inned and kept the Corn, that the Britains uſually tranſported thither.

† *Vives in Aug. de civit. Dei l.*16.c. ult.

Claudius ſendeth Plantius into Britain.

Paſſing thither himſelf ſubdueth part of it.

Sueton ut ſuprà cap. 17.

13. But, afterwards the inland parts of Britain waſted, rather with Civil Wars and Factions than by the force of the Romans, came by little and little ſubjected to them. Some making choice of their protection ſwore allegiance to them, and practiſed by all means to ſubject their Native Countrey unto their Government. The principal of theſe Fugitives was one Bericus, who moved, and perſwaded Claudius to give the Attempt upon Britain, which none aſſayed to do ſince the time of Julins Cæſar, and which then was up in a broil and commotion, for that the ſaid Fugitives were not rendred again unto them. Claudius therefore in his Second Year Ordered A. Plautius the Prætor to paſs over out of Gall, who having by the means of Narciſſus quieted the Soldiers that refuſed to make War without the compaſs the World, overthrew ſeveral times the Sons of Cynobellinus. His Lieutenant was Flavius Veſpaſian, who behaved himſelf very gallantly in the Service. But Claudius in his Fourth Year being very ambitious of a Triumph (as not contenting himſelf with Triumphal Enſigns decreed to him by the Senate) without a juſt cauſe pitched upon Britain as yet Seditious, becauſe their Fugitives were not reſtored. Sailing from Oſtia, he was twice in danger of Shipwrack, once near Liguria, and again near the Iſlands Stæchades (four or five in the French Sea near Languedoc and Provence) where from Maſſilia (now Marſeils in Provence) he went by Land as far as Geſſoriacum (now Bologne) and thence paſſing into the Iſland ſubdued part of it, and amongſt other Towns Camalodunum (now Maldon) the Regal Seat of Cynobellinus, with the Orcades : Dio writeth, that at his firſt Landing he defeated the Barbarians in Battel. But Suetonius ſaith, he performed theſe Acts without a Battel, and the loſs of one drop of Blood. Having been divers times ſaluted Imperator (a thing directly ſaith Dio againſt the Roman Cuſtom ; for lawful it is not in one War to aſſume that Title oftner than once) he diſarmed the Britains, and committing as well the Government of theſe, as the War with the other (not yet ſubdued) to Plautius, he haſted to Rome in the ſixth Month, ſending before him Pompey and Silanus his Sons-in-Law with Tidings of the Victory.

Extraordinary expreſſions of joy at Rome.

14. So great a matter it was, and of ſuch conſequence to have Conquered even ſo ſmall a parcel of Britain, that the Senate thereupon decreed in honour of Claudius, Yearly Games with Triumphal Arches, both at Rome, and alſo Geſſoriacum in Gall, and a moſt honourable and ſtately Triumph. To the beholding hereof Governours of Provinces, and ſome baniſhed Perſons alſo were permitted to come to the City : a Naval Crown was fixed on the Loover of the Palace, as the Enſign of the Britiſh Sea ſubdued by him : the Provinces brought in Crowns of Gold, and Gallia Comata one above the reſt weighing nine pounds : and the hither part of Spain, another of ſeven pound weight. He mounted up into the Capitol by the ſtairs on his knees, ſupported, and heaved up by his Sons-in-Law on either ſide. He entred in Triumphing wiſe the Adriatick Sea, embarked in a Veſſel more like ſome exceeding great Houſe than a Ship. Unto his Wife Meſſalina was allowed the higheſt place to ſit in, as alſo to ride in a Caroach or hanging Coach. After this he ſet forth Triumphal Plays and Games, being made Conſul for that purpoſe. The Solemnities were exhibited at once in two Theatres, and many times when he was gone aſide from the fight, others had the charge hereof. Horſe-races for the Prize he promiſed as many as thoſe days would admit. Howbeit, above Ten there were not ; for between every courſe of Horſes Bears were killed, Champions performed their duties, and choice Boys ſent for out of Aſia, danced the Warlike dance in Armour. Upon Valerius Aſiaticus, Julius Silanus, Sidius Geta, and others, in regard of this Conqueſt, he heaped Triumphal Ornaments. He ſuffered Licinius Craſſus Frugi to follow after himſelf in his Triumph, mounted upon a trapped Courier with a rich Capariſon, and arrayed in a Robe of Date-tree work. Upon Poſidius the Eunuch he beſtowed a Spear-ſtaff without a head: upon C. Gavius Chains, Bracelets, Horſe-trappings, and a Coronet of Gold; as is to be ſeen in an ancient Marble at Taurinum.

15. In the mean time Aulus Plautius went on with the remainders of the War in Britain, and ſped ſo well, that Claudius paſſed a Decree That he ſhould enter Rome in Ovant Triumph: and when he was entred into the City, he himſelf went to meet him, giving him the right hand all the way. Veſpaſian, partly under Claudius, and partly under Plautius, fought Thirty Battels with the Enemy; ſubdued alſo two moſt mighty Nations, and above twenty Towns, together with the Iſle of Vectis or Wight. For thoſe exploits he received triumphal Ornaments, and within a ſhort ſpace two Sacerdotal Dignities, with a Conſulſhip which he bore the two laſt Months of the Year. Titus alſo ſerved in quality of a Tribune under his Father with exceeding commendations for his induſtry and valour (for he valiantly delivered his Father when beſieged) and no leſs Repute of his modeſt carriage ſay ſome, as appeareth by a number of his Images and Titles to them annexed, throughout the Provinces of Germany and Britain. About this time a new Iſland appeared in the Ægean Sea named Thia near to Hiera, which One Hundred and Ten Years before it firſt alſo ſprung up: And both of them lay betwixt Thera and Theraſia, which in like manner One Hundred and Thirty Years before the Original of Hiera were firſt ſeen amongſt the Cyclades.

Plautius.

And Veſpaſian proſper in Britain.

Sueton in Veſpaſian.

Idem in Tito.

Oroſius lib. 7. cap. 6.
Plin. l. 2. c. 87.
A. D. 46.
V. C. 798.

16. Two or three Years after this, Claudius being certified that his Wife Meſſalina (the moſt unchaſt of all Women) had openly Married C. Silius, he animadverted upon her and her Minions. About the ſame time Herod the King of Chalcis dying, he beſtowed that Kingdom upon Herod's Nephew Agrippa the younger, for Judæa his Fathers Kingdom was ſtill governed by Deputies. Tiberius Alexander, who ſucceeded Fadus, gave place to Cumanus, under whom the Jews, being affronted at the Paſſeover by impudent and ſawcy Soldiers, mutined, but now, as ever, came by the worſt: and not long after their Country-men who dwelt at Rome were expelled thence by Claudius, and under their name, as many think, the Chriſtians alſo. In the Nineteenth Year of his Reign he Married Agrippina his own Niece by his Brother Germanicus through the perſwaſion of Pallas his Freedman, which Woman preſently as ſoon as ſhe perceived her ſtrength procured his Daughter Octavia to be given in Marriage to Domitius Nero her Son by her former Husband Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus. The Maid was formerly contracted to L. Silanus an eminent young man, but he accuſed by Vitellius was put out of his Prætorſhip, and the match was broken betwixt him and the Princeſs, whereupon he ſhortly after killed himſelf. And a Year after was Claudius perſuaded by Pallas to adopt Nero his Wive's Son, though he had a Son of his own, by name Britanicus, but two Years younger. Pallas was ſo high flown in favour, that he procured his Brother Felix to be ſent Governour into Samaria, and afterwards got his power extended to Judæa, Galilee, and Peræa, where he acted the part of a Tyrant, and having married ſeveral great Ladies, obtained alſo Druſilla Siſter to Agrippa. The Parthians now again at variance amongſt themſelves, and wearied with the Tyranny of Gotarzes, asked a Prince from Rome. Claudius ſent them Meherdates the Son of Vonones, and Grandſon of Phraates; but he was preſently betrayed into the hands of Gotarzes. At this time alſo the Britains rebelled.

Claudius animadverteth upon his Wife Meſſalina.

Marrieth Agrippina his Niece.

Felix ſent Governour into Samaria.

Stirs in Parthia.

The Britains rebell.

Lege Tacit. Annal. l. 11. c. 26. &c.

Joſephus Antiquit. lib. 2. capp. 3, 4.
Oroſius lib. 7. cap. 6.
Sueton ut ſupra cap. 25.
Tacitus Annal. l. 12. c. 1. &c.

17. Now was P. Oſtorius Proprætor here, upon whoſe firſt coming the Britains grew confident, as contemning him for his want of experience. The Winter being begun they made excurſions into the Territories of the Allies of Rome. He knowing that the firſt event would either incourage or daunt them, ſet upon, and ſcattered them, then went about to diſarm all ſuch as he had reaſon to ſuſpect; but the Iceni (inhabiting thoſe parts now called Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgſhire, and Huntingtonſhire) a ſtrong Nation, refuſing to ſubmit, drew others in to them, and pitching upon a very convenient ground gave Battel to the Romans, who by reaſon that they deſpaired of Pardon, had much ado to overcome them. By this foil of the Iceni, others before unſettled were contained in obedience, and Oſtorius led his Army againſt the Cangi (a People living towards the Iriſh Sea) and waſting their grounds had paſſed on well nigh to the Tacitus Annal. lib. 12. Capp. 31, 32. &c.

the Iriſh Sea, when he was recalled by the diſcord of the Brigantes (people inhabiting the North part of this now called England) the Ring-leaders of whom when he had taken off, the Rebellion was extinguiſhed. But the Silures (inhabiting Southwales) would by no means be either allured or diſcouraged from waging War, truſting to the ſtrength of Charactacus the greateſt Prince amongſt the Britains, who excelling as well in policy as the knowledge of the Countrey, transferred the War into the Territories of the Ordovices (now Northwales) as more convenient for him by reaſon of the Mountains and Rocks. Here he made a ſpeech to his Officers, putting them in mind how their Anceſtors had repulſed Cæſar the Dictator, and willing them to behave themſelves at this time, as the beginning of their liberty or eternal ſlavery. Till they came to ſtrokes the Romans had the worſt of it; but afterwards breaking into the Rampires they eaſily routed the Britains, and got a great Victory, wherein the Wife and Daughter of Caractacus being taken, his Brethren yielded themſelves.

Are reduced.

Caractacus betrayed is carried to Rome.

Idem ibid. cap. 36, &c.

18. Caractacus committing himſelf into the hands of Cartiſmunda, Queen of the Brigantes, was treacherouſly bound, and delivered up to the Conquerours in the Ninth Year of the War, wherein he had got himſelf an exceeding great name. Being carried to Rome, the people was called together as to ſome famous ſhow, and the Prætorian bands were placed along for the reception of him. The Prayers of the reſt were by reaſon of fear, baſe, and nothing ſavouring of Nobility: but Caractacus, neither hanging down his head, nor craving any mercy, when he ſtood before the Emperour's Tribunal, ſpake to this purpoſe: If my moderation in proſperity had been as great as my Nobility and Fortune, I had come rather as a Friend into this City, than a Captive: neither would you have diſdained to receive me with Covenants of Peace, being a Prince deſcended of Noble Progenitors, and a Commander over many Nations. My preſent ſtate is, as to me Diſhonourable, ſo to you Magnificent. I have had Horſes, Men, Armour, and Wealth: What marvel if againſt my will I have loſt them all? For if you will rule over all men, it followeth that all men muſt abide Servitude. If preſently I had yielded, and been delivered into your hands, neither had my Fortune nor your Glory been very remarkable: and oblivion would have followed my puniſhment. But if you ſave me alive, I ſhall be an example of your Clemency for ever.

His ſpeech to the Emperour.

He is pardoned.

19. Upon thoſe words Cæſar pardoned him, his Wife and Brethren. And they being all unbound did their reverence likewiſe unto Agrippina (who ſat aloft not far off in an high ſeat to be ſeen) giving her the like praiſes, and in the ſame degrees of ſtyle as they did the Emperour himſelf. Surely a ſtrange precedent without any example, ſaith the Hiſtorian, that a Woman ſhould ſit and command the Roman Enſigns. But ſhe carried her ſelf as a fellow and aſſociate in th Empire gotten by her Progenitors. After this the Senate was called together, and the Fathers made long and glorious diſcourſes, as touching the Captivity of Caractacus. Neither was this leſs honourable, as they affirmed, than when Pub. Scipio ſhewed Siphax, L. Paulus, Perſes, or whoſoever elſe exhibited Conquered Kings to the view of the People. As for Oſtorius, it was Decreed that he ſhould be honoured with triumphal Ornaments. But his Fortune ſoon changed, either for that he grew ſecure upon the Captivity of ſo conſiderable a man, or the Enemy was highly moved to revenge it. For a Party left to awe the Silures was incompaſſed by the Britains, and if help had not preſently come in from the adjoining Villages and Fortreſſes, had been utterly cut off, beſides, that the Commander in Chief with Eight Centurions, and many others was ſlain. Not long after ſuch as went to gather Forrage, and ſeveral Companies ſent in to their aid, were alſo routed, and the Enemy was hardly reſtrained at length by the help of the Legions. After this hapned many Skirmiſhes, as they met by chance, or were deſirous of Booty, and two Auxiliary Cohorts were intercepted, with the Spoils of which other Nations were drawn to revolt, and not long after Oſtorius ſpent with care and penſiveneſs died. To his place Claudius preferred A. Didius, who found things but in a bad condition, through the boldneſs of the Silures. But the Britains falling out amongſt themſelves were ſeveral times overthrown, and then kept under.

The Britains again are up.

Subdued.

Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 20. cap. 5. Tacitus Annal. lib. 12. capp. 64, 67, 68.

20. Claudius, the Twelfth Year of his Reign ending, beſtowed on Agrippa the Tetrarchy of Philip, as alſo that of Lyſanias, taking Chalcis from him after he had Governed it Four Years. After this he reſtored the Rhodians to their former liberty upon their repentance, and eaſed the Inhabitants of Ilium of all Charges and Tributes, as being the Authors of the Roman Race. Nero pleaded the cauſes of both Cities, whoſe Mother Agrippina now began to be diſcovered to her Husband. He chanced in his drink to ſay that it was Fatal to him firſt to endure, and then to puniſh the wickedneſs of his Wives, and he repented of his folly in preferring her Son before his own. She bethinking her ſelf how to eſcape the danger, firſt gave him Poiſon in Muſhrooms his beloved meat, but it paſſing through him, ſhe uſed the skill of Xenophon the Phyſician, who as it were to help him to Vomit, put ſomething down his Throat dipped in a moſt violent Poiſon, and ſo he died, who within a ſmall time upon a very ſmall account had put to death Thirty Five Senators, and Three Hundred Equites. He was a man that before his coming to the Government was deſpiſed by his Relations as ſome imperfect thing, and afterwards was but counted blockiſh, and deſpicable by others, yet ſometimes he would judg very wiſely and circumſpectly, and ſo far profited in liberal ſtudies (which he very much plied) that he wrote divers things, and amongſt the reſt a learned defence of Cicero in anſwer to the Books of Aſinius Pollio. He was fearful above meaſure, ſo that (amongſt other demonſtrations) when Camillus, who attempted a Rebellion, ſent to him a reproachful, and menacing Letter, willing him to lay down the Government, he was in doubt, and ſeriouſly conſulted whether he ſhould not do it: and this made him put many to death upon idle and malicious accuſations. He was the very Slave of his Freedmen (whereof Narciſſus and Pallas were chief) who rather Reigned than he; for, they managed all things according to their Pleaſure or Luſt, beſtowing favours upon whom they pleaſed, and killing any, though never ſo worthy, or nearly allied to him. He excuſed his anger and peeviſhneſs by a publick Declaration. He was ſo forgetful that he would ſeveral times ask for ſuch as he had put to death. He would eat and drink at any time, or in any place: he was a great player at Dice, of which Art he ſet forth a Book. He died on the third before the Ides of October, in the 64 Year of his Age, when he had Reigned Thirteen Years, Eight Months, and Twenty Days, in the 807 Year of the City, the 55 after the birth of Chriſt, M. Aſinius Marcellus and M. Acilius Aviola being Conſuls.

Claudius poiſoned by Agrippina his Wife.

A.D. 55.
V.C. 807.

Sueton. in Claudio.

His Character.

21. Now that we may note briefly ſuch Eccleſiaſtical matters, as fell out in the Reign of Claudius. In his Firſt Year James the Brother of John was, as we ſaid, put to death by Agrippa, and Peter being caſt by him into Priſon was delivered by an Angel. In his Second, Paul returned out of Arabia, to Damaſcus, whence he came to Jeruſalem to ſee Peter. Hence he went to Tarſus, and not long after to Antioch, being called by Barnabas, who had been ſent thither by the Apoſtles. In his Third, Paul Preached for a whole Year at Antioch, together with Barnabas. In his Fourth, Paul carried the Almes of the faithful from Antioch to Jeruſalem, becauſe of the Famine foretold by Agabus. Thence returning to Antioch, he was ſent with Barnabas to Preach the Goſpel in Aſia. In this Fourth then, and the Fifth Year of Claudius he Preached Chriſt in Cyprus, Pamphylia, Piſidia, Iconium, Lyſtra, and Derbe, and returned to Antioch. In the Sixth he was ſent from Antioch to Jeruſalem to the Council with Barnabas, whence returning to Antioch he reprehended Peter, who came thither a little after him, for his diſſembling, and not long after went with Silas into Aſia, to confirm the Churches he had Founded, In the Seventh of Claudius he Preached Chriſt in Crete, and through Piſidia, Pamphylia, and Phrygia, viſited the Churches, and converted the Galatians to the Faith. In the Eighth he came to Troas, and thence into Macedonia, where at Philippi, as alſo at Theſſalonica, at Beræa, and then at Athens he Preached the Goſpel. About the end of the Ninth Year he came to Corinth, where he found Aquila and Priſcilla, with whom he ſtayed half a Year Preaching the Goſpel, and thence wrote both his Epiſtles to the Theſſalonians. In the Eleventh Year he came from Corinth to Epheſus with Aquila and Priſcilla. whom there leaving, he went to Jeruſalem to the Feaſt. Thence he returned to Antioch and Epheſus through Phrygia, Galatia, and the higher parts of Aſia. Being at Epheſus in the Twelfth Year, there he continued Two Years, till the Tumult raiſed by Demetrius. Hence he wrote his Epiſtle to the Galatians; the former alſo to the Corinthians, and to Titus, but about the end of the following Year; as alſo the firſt to Timothy. About the end alſo of the Thirteenth Year, or the beginning of the following, he came into Macedonia and Achaia, to receive the Collections to be carried to Jeruſalem. And hence (from Corinth) being to paſs into Aſia, he wrote his Epiſtle to the Romans about the end of the following Year. About the end alſo of the Fourteenth Year he was impriſoned at Jeruſalem. And being carried to Cæſarea was there kept Priſoner by Felix for two Years. Concerning the Chronology of theſe accounts, Ludovicus Cappellus is by Students to be conſulted, in his Hiſtoria Apoſtolica Illuſtrata.

Eccleſiaſtical matters in his Reign.

Of S. Peter his being at Rome.

22. St. Peter the Apoſtle is reported in the ſecond Year of Claudius to have come to Rome, having been formerly Biſhop of Antioch, in which See he was ſucceeded by Evodius one of the Seventy Diſciples, of whom alſo Paul maketh mention: ſome ſay that he continued Biſhop at Rome Twenty five Years, viz. Twelve under Claudius, and Thirteen under Nero. Perhaps he might come to Rome at this time, but that he ſtayed there Twenty five Years is but to be taken for a Fable. For we read that Claudius Baniſhed all Jews from Rome, and he being a Jew, muſt needs give place, or abide the danger. We do not find he had any trouble, and this was by reaſon of his abſence. It's probable that he went away when Aquila and Priſcilla departed Rome, and met St. Paul at Corinth. Euſebius indeed often mentioneth his being at Rome, and writeth, that he ſuffered Martyrdom together with Paul under Nero. This might be at his ſecond return unto Rome, ſo that we may count Twenty five Years from his firſt Coming under Claudius unto the end of his Martyrdom under Nero; it being, to ſay truth, better thus to reconcile Writers, than flatly to deny all, or to ſay, he never was at Rome. Here he met with Simon Magus again, and confounded him, as it's reported. This man being a Samaritan, of the Village Gitton, was Baptized by Philip the Deacon in Samaria. He would have bought of Peter the gift of the Holy Ghoſt; and thence of him aroſe the word Simony. He came to Rome in the time of Claudius, where calling himſelf a God, he was honoured with an Image, having this inſcription, Simoni Deo Sancto. He had to his yokemate one Helene, by Irenæus called Selen, a Witch and a common Harlot, whom he called the Principal underſtanding. He ſaid unto the Samaritans that he was the Father, unto the Jews, that he was the Son deſcended from Heaven, and unto the Gentiles, that he was the Holy Ghoſt. Peter foiled him in Samaria, whence for ſhame he fled; and leaving Samaria and Judæa, he ſailed from Eaſt to Weſt, and came to Rome, under Claudius, where Peter met him. Peter it's ſaid had much to do with him in the preſence of Nero. Some write that he had three Conflicts with him; and in the end Simon ſeeing himſelf foiled, and his Witchcraft not at all to prevail, told them he would leave their City, and flie up into the Heavens whence he came. Whereupon at a certain day appointed, he climbed up into the high Capitol, whence he took his flight by the means of Witchcraft, and the Spirits that bore him up in the Air. The People at the ſight hereof was amazed. But Peter fell down and prayed God that his Witchcraft might be revealed to the World. He had no ſooner ſpoke, but down came Simon Magus, and was broken to pieces, ſo that he there miſerably died. Now again to the courſe of our Hiſtory.

Acts 8.
Euſeb. l. 2. c. 1.
Idem c. 12, 13, 14.
Irenæus l. 1. c. 20.
Ephiphan. l. 1. tom. 2. hæreſ. 21.

23. The death of Claudius was kept private by Agrippina, till ſuch time as the Empire could be ſecured to Nero her Son, who then, at noon time of the day, the doors of the Palace being opened ſuddainly, accompanied with Burrhus Captain of the Guard, went to the Watch, by which at the inſtance of the Captain, he was received with lucky Acclamations. Being put into a Litter, he was thence carried to the Camp, where ſpeaking at the time required, and promiſing a Donative to the Soldiers, after the example of his Predeceſſors, he was ſaluted Emperour, and preſently owned by the Senate, and in the Provinces. Claudius his Teſtament he never publiſhed, leſt the People ſhould be moved by the injury offered to Britanicus, to whom his Father was ſo Superlatively unnatural, as to prefer his Wives Son before him. Indeed ſome of the Soldiers at firſt pauſed, and looking back, asked for Britanicus; but finding no body to ſtir in his behalf, joined themſelves to the multitude. Nero came to the Government, being Seventeen Years Old, Six Years after he had been adopted by Claudius.

Tacitus Annal. l. 12. c. ult.
Nero ſucceedeth Claudius.
Sueton in Nerone c. 7.
Idem c. 10.

24. Nero at firſt carried it exceedingly well towards People and Magiſtrates, Governing according to the Pattern of Auguſtus, whoſe preſcript he profeſſed he would obſerve. He omitted no occaſion of ſhewing liberality, clemency, and mildneſs, inſomuch that Trajan himſelf admiring his firſt Five Years, averred, that All Princes came ſhort of them. Heavy Tributes he either took off or leſſened, diſtributed money to the People, gave Annual Stipends to impoveriſhed Senators, and to the Prætorian bands Corn every Month freely. Being deſired to ſubſcribe to the execution of a condemned Perſon, Oh, ſaid he, I wiſh I knew not letters. But this good beginning is rather to be attributed to

All Princes came ſhort of his firſt Five Years.
Aurelius Victor.

Tacitus Annal. l. 13. c. 1, &c.

Burrhus and Seneca (the latter of whom, after his Adoption, was his Schoolmaſter) who being in power, mutually helped each other. Agrippina thought by virtue of his name to rule indeed; and at the beginning Poiſoned Silanus Proconſul of Aſia, and made away Narciſſus; without his knowledge the former, and the latter without his conſent; and had gone further, but that Burrhus and Seneca interpoſed. Not long after, jealouſies aroſe betwixt them, for he falling in love with Acte a Freed-woman, and diſtaſting ſuch as ſhe leaned upon, removed Pallas her Minion from publick imployment, which ſo far exaſperated her, that ſhe upbraided him with Britanicus, as moſt fit to enjoy his Fathers Seat. This Seat ſhe told her Son he now enjoyed by her means, and not ſparing to lay open all the evils, as ſhe ſaid, of their unhappy Family, her own Marriage and Sorcery; ſhe took it as happy for the gods and her, that Britanicus was living, and proteſted ſhe would go with him to the Camp.

His Mother and he fall at odds.

Idem ibid. c. 15.

25. This, together with Britanicus his frowardneſs (who being Fourteen Years old, began to be ſenſible of his condition, and to move compaſſion towards himſelf) made Nero reſolve to diſpatch him out of the way, and for that he could not do it openly to his Brother, he procured Poiſon to be given him, which working downwards firſt without any great incommodity, he cauſed to be boiled to that height, that it inſtantly killed him the ſecond time, whilſt he himſelf ſate at a Supper with him, as knowing nothing. He made him be buried the ſame, though a very rainy Night, his mean Funeral being provided beforehand. Agrippina very much troubled that her refuge was gone, was ſhortly after accuſed to her Son, as intending by a Marriage with Rubellius Plautus (who was as near to Auguſtus as Nero himſelf) to invade the Sovereignty. Being ſomething gone in drink when he heard of it, he would have had her killed out of hand, but being hindred by Burrhus, the next day ſhe ſtoutly denied any ſuch Deſign, and the wound of jealouſie for the time was ſkinned over. After two Years, Nero began to diſcover what his Nature prompted him to. Diſguiſing himſelf in a ſervile habit, he ran about the City by Night to Taverns and Stews, accompanied with ſuch as himſelf, where taking away things by force, as alſo cutting and ſlaſhing ſuch as they met, he himſelf came into danger of life.

He poiſoneth Britanicus.

Idem ibid. c. 25.

Beginneth to diſcover himſelf.

Joſephus Antiquit. l. 20. c. 7.

26. A little before thoſe things, he ſent Porcius Feſtus into Judæa to ſucceed Felix, who being out of his Office, was accuſed at Rome by ſuch Jews as dwelt at Cæſarea. Nero pardoned him through the interceſſion of his Brother Pallas, who was as yet in favour. About the ſame time happened a great diſſention betwixt the Jews of Cæſarea and the Syrians, which there inhabited with them, about the Right and privilege of the City. They pretended that Herod the founder of it was a Jew, and thoſe anſwered, that e're he named it Cæſarea, it was called the Tower of Straton, at what time none of the Jews inhabited it: and the Syrians by a great Sum of Money procured Beryllus (who had been Nero's School-Maſter) to get them the Emperours Letters, whereby was abrogated that Privilege which the Jews had formerly enjoyed with the Syrians. Herewith the Jews incenſed, were ſtill ſeditious till the beginning of the War. Great motions at this time fell out in the Eaſt. The Parthians had ſet upon Armenia, having driven away Rhadamiſtus Nephew to Mithridates, whom Claudius had ſet over that Kingdom, and who was killed by the other, that he might ſucceed him. Nero ſent to preſerve that Countrey Domitius Corbulo, who for two or three Years had little to do, becauſe the Parthians deferred the War. But now Tiridates Brother to Vologeſus the Parthian being reſolved to fight for the Diadem, the Armenians alſo inclining to him, Corbulo took ſeveral Forts, and beſieged Artaxata the Metropolis, which, though the Inhabitants opened the Gates, and for this were ſpared, yet becauſe it could not be held for the greatneſs of it, was burnt and razed. Nero for theſe things was ſaluted Imperator, very great Honours were Decreed to him, and a far greater ſtir was made by the flattering Fathers than was convenient.

Feſtus ſucceedeth Felix.

Tacitus ut ſuprà c. 34, &c.

Corbulo proſpereth in the Eaſt.

27. The ſame Year that theſe things were done by Corbulo, being the Fifth of his Reign, Nero fell in love with Poppæa Sabina, the Daughter of P. Ollius, though ſhe named her ſelf after her Grand-Father by the Mother's ſide, becauſe more eminent. He came firſt acquainted with her by the commendations of Otho her Husband, who alſo had been too familiar with her in the days of her firſt Husband Rufus Criſpinus: She incenſed him more againſt his Mother, becauſe ſhe feared, that as long as ſhe lived, he would not diſmiſs Octavia and marry marry her ſelf. Sometimes ſhe laid at him by divers Criminations, and otherwhiles jeered him as a Pupil, who not only wanted Command and Authority, but alſo Liberty. Some have ſuſpected, that Agrippina ſought to commit Inceſt with her Son. How true ſoever this was, he now began to be abſolutely weary of her, to ſhun her company, and within a while reſolved to make her away, though ſolicitous how to do it. At length Anicetus his Freed-man and General of the Fleet at Miſenum, acquainted him that a Ship might be ſo framed, as to break into peices and let her fall into the Sea. This Ship was thus made, and ſhe brought into it by her Son, under colour of doing her honour, but the upper part of the Ship falling, chanced to miſs her, though it killed one of her attendants. One of her Maids knowing nothing of the deſign, cried out, that ſhe was Agrippina, hoping thereby to ſave her ſelf, and was thereupon killed by the Oars; but ſhe her ſelf being ſilent, eſcaped them, and ſwom to Land. Her Eſcape ſtruck Nero with great conſternation, who called up Burrhus and Seneca to give their advice. Whether they knew of the thing before or no is uncertain. Some ſay, Seneca asking Burrhus whether the Soldiers ſhould not be commanded to kill her, he anſwered, they would do no ſuch thing to the Daughter of Germanicus, and that Anicetus rather ſhould perform his Promiſe of diſpatching her. This he readily undertaking, accompanied with two others, went to the Village where ſhe lay. One of them firſt bruiſed her Head with a Club, another drawing his Sword, ſhe ſtretched out her Belly and bad him ſtrike that, and ſo died of many wounds. Some report, that her Son viewed her dead Body exactly, and paſſed his Judgment upon every part. She had been a very leud and ambitious Woman, and now reaped the fruit thereof, according to her own deſire. For conſulting on a time about the Fortune of this her Son, the Chaldæans told her, that He ſhould Reign, but kill his Mother, to which ſhe anſwered, Occidat modo imperet: Let him kill me, ſo he but Reign. After this wicked Fact he was continually tormented in his Conſcience, confeſſing often, that he was haunted by the Furies, which did beat him with Firebrands.

Now falleth in love with Poppæa, which incenſeth him againſt his Mother.

Tacitus Annal. l.14 c.1,2,&c.

Sueton in Nerone c. 34.

He cauſeth his Mother to be made away.

A. D. 60.
V. C. 812.

The Senate and People flatter him.

Tacitus ut ſupra c. 12, 13.

28. He excuſed himſelf to the Senate, laying great loads of heavy accuſations upon her. But the Fathers not only excuſed but commended the deed; nay to ſuch ſordidneſs of Spirit was both Senate and People degenerated, that returning to the City, they met him with as great Pomp, as if he had come from ſome notable Victory; for the ſeveral Tribes, and the Senate received him, their Wives and Children being placed according to their Sex and Age. Hereupon he grew exceſſive Proud, as Lord over ſo many Slaves, and preſently unmasking himſelf, without any care of his actions, fell into ſuch diſorders, as he appeared rather a Devil incarnate than a man. He became a Stage-player, learning that Art, and exerciſing himſelf therein in publick continually. He ordained Games to be ſolemnized at Rome evety Fifth Year, in imitation of the Greeks, and called them Neronia; perſons of all ſorts, and degrees, being conſtrained to be Actors. Theſe being continued Night and Day, moſt horrid things were committed, Prince, Senate, and People, either through affection or fear, not only giving way, but compelling to ſuch filthineſs. Corbulo at this time proſpering in Armenia had Tigranocerta yielded to him, and then placed in that Kingdom Tigranes, Grand-ſon to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, with whom having left a Guard, and ſettled matters, he departed into Syria to ſucceed Vinidius the Governour. The Year following, being the 814 of the City, wherein Cæſonius Pætus and Petronius Turpilianus were Conſuls, the Romans received a ſad Defeat in Britain.

His enormities.

Corbulo proſpereth in Armenia.

Conſule Tacitum ubi ſuprà Capp. 29. 30, 31. & Xiphilin. in Excerptis ex Dione.

Suetonius in Britain ſubduing the Silures.

29. Of late the Lieutenants of this Province had made but ſmall progreſs in their Conqueſts; A. Didius Avitus the Succeſſor of Plautius contenting himſelf with what was done before, and Verannius, who followed him, making only ſome excurſions upon the Silures; for he was prevented by death from any further ſervice. But now Paulinus Suetonius the Æmulator of Corbulo for Military glory, had the chief Command, and ſought to equal the Acts of the other in Armenia, by chaſtizing and taming the Britains. He ſet upon the Iſle Mona (now called Angleſey) Peopled with ſtrong Inhabitants, and the receptacle of all Fugitives, where he was received with multitudes of men on the ſhore, and with Women running about like Furies with Fire-brands in their hands, having their hair ſpred about their ſhoulders; the Druides alſo, the ancient Seat of whom that Iſland was, pouring out plenty of Curſes. The Soldiers

His Province revolteth.

A. D. 62.
*Ol.*210.ann. 1.
V. C. 814.

diers ſomething terrified at firſt, being exhorted by their General, eaſily broke through, and diſſipated this furious Company: then placed he a Garriſon in the Iſland, and cut down the Groves where they were wont to offer man's blood, and conſult their Gods by the entrail of ſome Captive. But whilſt theſe things were adoing, news came to Suetonius of the Revolt of his Province. For, Praſatagus King of the Iceni, that his Kingdom and Family might be freed from moleſtation, left Cæſar his Heir, together with his two Daughters. But it happened far otherwiſe, his Kingdom being waſted by Centurions, and his Houſe by Slaves: his Wife Boadicia (otherwiſe called Boodicia, Boudicia, Voudica, and Bunduica) was whipped, his Daughters defloured, his chiefeſt Subjects ſpoiled of their Goods and Lands, and his Kindred counted no better than Bond-men. Provoked by theſe things, and Fear of worſe, when they ſhould be reduced into the form of a Province, the Iceni took Arms, ſtirring up the Trinobantes to Rebellion. Others alſo with joined them, having heretofore combined to recover their liberty out of hatred to the old ſuperannuated Soldiers, who being planted as a Colony at Camalodunum, committed grievous outrages againſt them, and theſe were rather cheriſhed by the Army than otherwiſe, in hope of the like liberty for the time to come. But this Colony not being fenced by any Fortifications, for the Founders rather looked at the pleaſantneſs of the ſituation than commodiouſneſs of the ground; the Britains accounted it no great matter to deſtroy it.

Tacitus ut ſupra Capp. 32, 33. &c. & Sueton. in Nerone cap. 39.

Camalodunum the Colony deſtroyed.

And Verulamium.

30. The Camalodunians being terrified by ſeveral Prodigies, deſired Aid of Catus Decianus the Governour in Suetonius his abſence. He ſent them but 200 men, and thoſe but meanly Armed, and they neglected ſtill to raiſe any Fortifications, their Counſels being confounded by ſuch as were ingaged in the Plot. Being then beſet round by the Natives, all things were burnt and deſtroyed, and Petilius Cerealis coming to their relief with the Ninth Legion was utterly defeated, all the Foot being cut in pieces, and the Horſe with himſelf glad to run away to the Camp; whereupon Catus paſſed over into Gall, having by his avarice been the great cauſe of this defection. The ſame Defeat was given to Verulamium (out of the ruins of which aroſe St. Albans) a Town free of the City of Rome; for the Britains paſſing by Caſtles and places of defence, ſet upon ſuch as were moſt obnoxious to their fury. At both places were Maſſacred 70000 perſons, none being taken or ſold after the cuſtom of War, but either put to the Sword, Hanged, Burnt, or Crucified as Malefactors. Suetonius paſſed through the midſt of his Enemies to Londinum (now London) a Town not then notable in reſpect of a Colony, but for multitude of Merchants, and plenty of Traffick very famous. Perceiving it but badly provided of Soldiers, although he once thought to make it the Seat of the War, he left it, being not prevailed with to ſtay either by the Prayers or Tears of the Inhabitants. For, reſolving with the loſs of one Town to preſerve the reſt, he took all along with him that could go; and all others, whom either Sex or Age, or the pleaſantneſs of the place detained, were deſtroyed by the Enemy. Having got together an Army of 10000 men, he reſolved to venture a Battel with all expedition; and for that purpoſe made his choice of convenient ground. Boadicia carrying her two Daughters in the Chariot with her about to the Companies, told them it had been uſual before for the Britains to fight under the conduct of Women, but ſhe was now in another capacity than her Anceſtors, being not to fight for a Kingdom, but as one of the ordinary ſort to revenge her loſt liberty, her own ſtripes, and the violence offered to her Daughters. As for her ſelf ſhe ſaid ſhe was reſolved to win the Field, or die; as for men, they might live if they pleaſed, and be Slaves. Suetonius on the other ſide conſidering the weight of the Enterprize, was not ſilent.

Tacitus ut prius Capp. 37, 38.

Suetonius defeateth the Britains in Battel.

31. The Romans, though far inferiour in number, yet in Military knowledg and Diſcipline far exceeding the Britains, put them to the worſt, and made of them great ſlaughter by reaſon of the difficulty of flight; for thoſe having brought their Wives to behold the Battel, and be Eye-witneſſes of their Valour, they had placed them in Waggons about the Army. Some reported that ſcarcely fewer then 80000 of the Conquered were ſlain, and of the Conquerors about 400. and Boadicia ended her life by Poiſon. Afterwards, the Army being increaſed by a great Supply ſent over by Cæſar, waſted the Countrey with Fire and Sword, which was ſorely oppreſſed by Famine; for being intent upon the War, the Britains had neglected the Sowing of Corn, hoping alſo to enjoy the Proviſions of the Enemy. For all this they were not forward to ask Peace, being incouraged by Julius Caſſilianus, who being ſent to ſucceed Caius, diſagreed ſo far with Suetonius, and ſo illed him to thoſe at Rome, that he wrote they muſt not expect an end of the War till ſome one was ſent to ſucceed him, attributeing all miſhaps to his unfitneſs, and all ſucceſs to the good Fortune of the Commonwealth. To view then the condition of Britain, was Polycletus the Freedman of Nero ſent over, who coming in with a great Train ſeemed terrible to the Roman Soldiers, but ridiculous to the Britains, who burning with affection to liberty, and as yet ignorant of the power of ſuch, wondred that the General and Army (which had put an end to ſuch a War) would obey Slaves. Suetonious was commanded to deliver up his Army to Turpilianus, who was even now out of the Conſulſhip, and neither provoking nor being provoked coveted ſlothful idleneſs, as Tacitus telleth us, with the ſpecious, and comely name of Peace.

Turpilianus ſucceeding him is ſlothfull.

32. The Year after was Albinus ſent into Judæa to ſucceed Feſtus, who died in his Government. About the ſame time Agrippa (who had power after his Uncle of Chalcis to beſtow the High-Prieſthood on whomſoever he pleaſed) gave it to Ananus Son of that Annas or Ananus, who beyond example having himſelf enjoyed the Office, had five Sons, who every one of them executed the ſame. This young Ananus being a Sadduce, as alſo very bold and cruel, conceiving he had got a convenient opportunity (Feſtus being dead, and Albinus not yet arrived) called a Council, and condemned James the Brother of Jeſus Chriſt, as Joſephus writeth, with ſome others, as guilty of impiety, to be ſtoned. This act diſpleaſed, ſaith the Hiſtorian, all good men, and eſpecially ſuch as were moſt ſtudious of the Law, who deſired of Agrippa that he would command Ananus to forbear the like for the time to come: ſome going alſo to meet Albinus, told him that the High-Prieſt had no authority to call a Council, whereupon he wrote to him very angrily, and threatned him, upon which account Agrippa the King removed him from his Office after the Third Month. At this time died Burrhus at Rome, not without ſuſpicion of Poiſon, and Seneca's power was weakned by the loſs of that conjunction, whereby they had mutually ſtrengthned the hands of each other. Seneca was now backbited, and by Nero ſlighted, of whom he deſired leave to withdraw himſelf, having been with him Fourteen Years, and he offered to give up his great Eſtate into his hands (for that had brought him ſo far into envy;) but Nero having learnt, and practiſed Diſſimulation, under colour of reſpect denied his Petition. Now did Nero marry Poppæa, whom all this while he had kept as his Concubine, and diſmiſſed Octavia loaded with Accuſations of Barrenneſs and greater Crimes; and when the people troubled at it grew ſeditious, he cauſed her to be put to death in that fatal Iſland Pandateria. The ſame Year alſo as 'tis believed he poiſoned the Chief of the Liberti or Freed-men, Periphorus, becauſe he was againſt his marrying Poppæa, and Pallas, for that living very long, he had ſcraped together a vaſt Sum of Money.

Albinus ſucceedeth Feſtus.

Joſephus Antiquit. lib. 20. cap. 8.

James the Juſt killed by the procurement of Ananus the High-Prieſt.

A. D. 63. V. C. 815.

Burrhus dieth.

Tacitus Annal. lib. 14. Capp. 51, 52, &c.

Nero marrieth Poppæa.

33. At this time were the Stirs renewed in Armenia. For Vologeſes ſeeing his Brother beaten off, and Tigrantes ſet up in his ſtead, had invaded the Countrey to revenge the injury offered to the line of the Arſacidæ. Corbulo, though very warily, yet reſiſted and repelled him, when Ceſennius Pætus was ſent to defend that Countrey, who by his ignorance in Military matters, and raſhneſs, undid all. Being beſieged, he was glad to Covenant for his preſervation to quit Armenia, and remove the Garriſons thence, which done, Nero was to be ſent to. Yet ſo ridiculous and degenerate were they at Rome, as to erect Trophies over the Parthians, though they knew nothing of the ſucceſs, either one way or other. The Parthian Ambaſſadors came to Rome to deſire that (as they hinted) which had been gotten by force, but without effect, for War was decreed againſt them to be managed by Corbulo; yet were they diſmiſſed with gifts, ſo as there might be hope, that, if Tiridates himſelf would intreat for the Diadem, it ſhould not be in vain. Corbulo again invaded Armenia, at which the Parthians affrighted came to a Treaty, wherein it was agreed that Tiridates laying down his Diadem at the feet of Nero's Statue ſhould not receive it without his leave. Nero now growing worſe and worſe, broke out into moſt horrid impieties, well nigh beyond all belief.

Tacitus Annal. lib. 15. Capp. 1, 2, 3, &c.

The ſtirs in Armenia renewed.

34. The next Year being the 817 of the City, the 65*th* after the birth of Chriſt, and of his own Reign the 10*th*. C. Lecanius Baſſus, and M. Licinius

Idem ibid. Capp. 37, 38, &c.

Craſſus being Conſuls, acting the common Stage-player, and giving up himſelf to all Luxury, and unheard-of Pollutions, amongſt the reſt he married himſelf as a Woman to one of his filthy crue, called Pythagoras, all things being provided and celebrated as at a Marriage. He made himſelf alſo the Husband of Sporus, from whom he took as much of the Male as poſſible, and ordered him to be brought to him in a Veil as a Bride. Being offended at the deformity of the old Buildings, and the narrowneſs of the Streets, or elſe to feed his cruel Eye with ſo ſad a ſpectacle as he had read to have happened at the Siege of Troy, he cauſed the City to be ſet on Fire, which burning Six Days and Seven Nights, of the Fourteen Diviſions Four only remained whole, the other being waſted, or defaced, with the fury of the Flame. He beheld the Fire from the Tower of Mæcenas, and very merry at the beauty of it, as he termed it, in a Player's habit ſung the deſtruction of Illium. This calamity being generally attributed to him as the cauſe, he accuſed the Chriſtians thereof, and raiſed the Firſt Perſecution, torturing them with moſt exquiſite kinds of puniſhment. About this time he ſent Geſſius Florus into Judæa to ſucceed Albinus, who deſiring to gratifie them of Jeruſalem, for all the miſchief he had done, e're his departure, brought out all the Priſoners, whereof thoſe that were Committed for any Capital Offence he put to death, but the reſt he Fined only and diſmiſſed; whereby all the Gaols being thus emptied, the Countrey was filled with Thieves more than before. The Year following a Conſpiracy was diſcovered againſt Nero, which gave him occaſion further to indulge his cruel humour.

Sueton. in Nerone cap. 38.

Nero's wickedneſs.

A. D. 65. V. C. 817. Idem ibid. cap. 16.

Setting Rome on fire, he accuſeth and perſecuteth the Chriſtians.

Tacitus ut ſuprà cap. 44.

35. Who wat the Author of it is uncertain, as alſo upon what particular grounds it was hatched, though all the Perſons bore him malice, as they thought they had reaſon. But Lucan the Poet (who wrote the Civil Wars betwixt Cæſar and Pompey, and was Nephew to Seneca by his Brother Annæus Mela) was agrieved that Nero envied him the glory he had got by his Verſes; and ſeveral others joined with them out of love to Cn. Piſo the head of the party. It was diſcovered by Milichus the Freed-man of Sceninus, who had commanded him to ſcour his Dagger, and provide neceſſaries for wounds; whereupon ſome would have had Piſo to have gone to the Roſtra, and laid open the Tyrant to the People, to obtain their help; but he refuſed. The next after him that was put to death was Annæus Seneca the Philoſopher, and Nero's School-maſter, not being convicted of any Treaſon, though accuſed by one Natalis, as it's thought, to pleaſe Cæſar, ſuch an earneſt deſire his Scholar had to diſpatch him, having formerly without effect attempted it by Poiſon. Being commanded to die, he did it very chearfully, though he was forced to ſeek for death ſeveral ways. For, he had ſo ſtarved himſelf with abſtinence, that he could not bleed, and Poiſon would not work upon him; but at length entering into a Bath he was ſtifled with the fume of it, having all this while diſcourſed, even to his laſt, according to his wonted Elegancy, ſuch excellent things, as being then taken from his mouth, came afterwards abroad. Such was the end of this excellent Philoſopher, concerning the character of whom, Students are rather to truſt to Cornelius Tacitus than to Dio, if Juſtus Lipſius be a competent Judg. Dio accuſeth him of Extortion, Adultery with Agrippina, and what not? He maketh him a Sodomite, and to have taught his Scholar that wickedneſs, as alſo the cauſe and procurer of the death of Agrippina, and a Cart-load of other Calumnies, ſaith * Lipſius, doth the idle man heap upon him, contrary to the belief and mind of all men. What cauſe was there of this hatred? or what reward had he for lying? for Seneca lived ſo long before him, that he neither could injure him nor oblige him. I believe, ſaith he, it was a certain perverſity of judgment and manners, which alſo ſet him keen againſt Cicero and all good men. I deſire that Youth may take heed, and ſo to gather the flowers of Antiquity from theſe Fields, that they do not alſo gather Poiſon. But as for what concerneth the riches and galantry of Seneca, ſee Reader, and read his excellent Treatiſe De vita beata, which he wrote with no other deſign, than to ſtop the Mouths of theſe Calumniators, eſpecially from the Seventeenth Chapter. Thus hath Lipſius prevented us in our Apology for this excellent Perſon, in whoſe vindication much might be ſaid.

Idem ibid. c. 49, &c.

A conſpiracy againſt him.

A. D. 66. V. C. 818.

Seneca his School-maſter put to death.

* Quem conſule in Comment. ad Taciti Annal. l. 14. & omnino ad l. 15.

Lipſius his Apology for him againſt Dio.

36. Pompeia Paullina the Wife of Seneca (Dio calleth her a moſt noble Woman, perhaps the Daughter of Pompeius Paullinus, to whom Tacitus giveth the Title of Conſularis, and who was ſet over the publick cuſtoms or impoſts) cut alſo her veins, that ſhe might die with him, but Nero bearing her no malice as it happened, ſent ſome to ſtop the bleeding, and recover her. Seneca had another ther brother beſides the father of Lucan, who was alſo put to death. This was Annæus Novatus, otherwiſe called Junius Gallio from his adoptive Father, being alſo mentioned in the Acts of the Apoſtles, and then Governour of Achaia. Their Father was M. Annæus Seneca a Rhetorician of Coruba in Spain, whoſe Suaſories and Controverſies are yet extant, joyned to his ſons Works. Nero proceeded in his madneſs and cruelties. Acting the Stage-player ſtill he was reviled at his Return home by Poppæa his wife, for which he kicked her great with child, and thereupon ſhe miſcarried. Then raged he againſt many of greateſt note, amongſt whom was Mela the father of Lucan (who had formerly periſhed for the conſpiracy) and this allayed the grief which was conceived for the death of many others, by the Peſtilence that now raged, becauſe they ſeemed thereby well delivered from the fury and rage of the Prince, who now neither uſed choice nor meaſure in his ſlaughters. Being puffed up with the ſucceſs of his cruelty, he ſaid, that None of his Predeceſſors knew their power, hinting alſo, that he meant to deſtory the remnant of the Senators. It was believed he had a great deſire to deliver up quick men to be devoured of an Ægyptian, a monſtrous eater of raw fleſh, or any other thing that was given him.

Nero killeth Poppæa.

*Vid. Sueton. in Nerone c.*1,2,3,4,5.

The height of his wickedneſs.

*Idem ibid. c.*31, & 32. *Tacitus Annal. lib.*15. c. 42.

37. Neither was there wanting to him luxury and effeminateneſs, ſuitable to his cruelty, nor any other vice, whereby the truth of that ſaying of Domitius his father might appear, who hearing of his birth, ſaid, That From himſelf and Agrippina could proceed nothing but accurſed, deteſtable, and to the dammage of the Commonwealth. For in him ſeemed to meet and be conjoyned not only all the vices of his own family (which of late had been too pregnant of them) but all the corruption of his Country, from the beginning to his very time. He lengthened his feaſts from Noon to Midnight, accounting no Uſe of riches but in the Abuſe of them. Such he thought to be ſordid and baſe, as took account of their expenſes, and he extolled and admired his Uncle Caius, for ſpending in ſo ſhort a time ſo vaſt ſums, as had been hoarded up by Tiberius. To Tiridates that came to Rome to take a Diadem from his hands, he allowed an incredible ſum for his daily expenſes, and as profuſely gratified him at his departure. He put on no garment twice, plaid for vaſt ſums at dice, fiſhed with a golden net, when he journed any whither, he never had leſs than a thouſand Caroches in his train, and he cauſed his Mules to be ſhod with Silver. But his houſe exceeded all belief, he having built it out of the ruines of the City. For length, for pleaſantneſs of groves and fiſh-ponds it was admirable, garniſhed alſo with Gold and precious ſtones. To the madneſs of this expence he was incouraged by one that made him fair promiſes of diſcovering a vaſt treaſure in Africk, which Dido the Queen flying out of Tyre ſhould thence bring with her. But being deceived, as was likely, with ſo fooliſh a project, he took ſuch courſes as became Nero to recruit his Coffers.

The Jews rebel.

A. D. 67.
V. C. 819.

Vide Joſephum de bello Judaico l. 2. c. 13.

The occaſion thereof.

38. When Tiridates was departed into Armenia, he went into Greece, there to act Tragedies, to ſing, and run races in the Chariot. Running in the Olympick Games, although he fell from his Chariot, yet he was arewarded with a Crown as Victor. He took from Appollo the Cyrrhæan Territory, and defaced the place where they were wont to receive Oracles, killing men at the hole whence the blaſt came. He attempted to cut through the Iſthmus of Peloponneſus, digging firſt himſelf, and carying out the firſt basket of Earth upon his ſhoulders: but with the ſame ſucceſs as others had before him. When he was in Achaia news came from Ceſtius Gallus Preſident of Syria, concerning the Rebellion of the Jews. Being long vexed with the injuries of the Deputies and Governours, they could no longer contain themſelves. Chriſt's blood lying heavy upon them, and crying for vengeance, they themſelves executed part of it. For ſuch robberies in the Country, ſuch and ſo many murders in the City were committed, and ſuch deluſions by falſe Prophets prevailed amongſt them, as after a wonderful manner turned their eſtate upſide down, drew upon them the malice of their enemies, and demonſtrated the high diſpleaſure of Almighty God. The particular occaſion of their rebellion was taken from Florus their Governour, who through the inſinuations of his wife into Poppæa having procured that Office, carried himſelf as worthy of ſuch a Maſter. He flew to that height of impudence and wickedneſs, as by a publick Crier to give free leave to rob and ſteal through the whole Country, on condition that he might have part of the booty. It was his deſign to provoke them to rebel, that his impieties might thereby be covered. After he and the Townſmen of Cæſarea had grievouſly abuſed ſuch Jews as there lived, he came to Jeruſalem with an Army, rifled the Forum, plundred the houſes, killed the Inhabitants, whipped and hung up ſeveral, who, though Jews born, were made Eqnites of Rome, and all under pretence that ſome had reviled him for cruelty. Not content herewith, he perſwaded the People of Jeruſalem to go out to meet, in a courteous manner, certain Soldiers that were coming thither, to whom he ſent, that they ſhould not return their civility, that ſo they might be offended, and give out words, which advantage he commanded them to take, and fall upon them. This was performed, and many periſhed, whom the Chief-Prieſts and others with lamentable intreaties had perſwaded to go forth, hoping thereby to pleaſe the Tyrant, and prevent miſchief. From this violence ſprung the War, in the Twelfth Year of Nero's Reign, the Seventeenth of Agrippa, the Second of Florus his Government, the 819 of the City, and 67 after the birth of Chriſt, C. Suetonus Paullinus and L. Pontius Teleſinus being Conſuls.

Idem ibid. c. 17, 18.

39. Some of thoſe that were moſt eager after Rebellion, aſſaulted a Caſtle called Maſſada, killed the Romans, and placed therein a Garriſon of their own. And in the Temple Eleazar the Son of Ananias the High-Prieſt Captain of the Guard and a forward young man, perſwaded the People no more to offer the Sacrifices which were wont to be offered for the good of the Romans. The Chief-Prieſt and Nobility diſſwaded them all they could from Rebellion, but profiting nothing, beſought Agrippa and Florus to come and ſuppreſs the Sedition betimes. Florus glad to hear ſuch news, gave no anſwer. Agrippa ſent 3000 Horſe, which being received into the upper part of the City, the Rebels took the lower part with the Temple, and after ſome ado brake alſo into the upper Quarters, burnt divers Palaces and publick Houſes, and then beſieged the Tower of Antony, which having taken within two days, they put the Garriſon to the Sword. After this they laid ſiege to the Kings Palace, whither Agrippa's Soldiers being retired, upon their deſire they were diſmiſſed. But the Romans yielding upon the Faith of Eleazar, were all cut in pieces contrary to his word, except Mitilius their Captain, who begging hard for his life, promiſed to be Circumcized and turn Jew: and this was done on the Sabbath-day, in September. On the ſame day were all the Jews of Cæſarea Maſſacred by the Inhabitants, to the number of above 200000, not one being left alive; for thoſe that eſcaped were taken by Florus, and brought out bound to the People. Throughout all Syria the ſlaughters of the Jews were renewed. At Alexandria alſo a ſedition being raiſed, 50000 Jews were ſlain in one day by two Roman Legions.

Great ſlaughters of them in ſeveral places.

40. Ceſtius Gallus as ſoon as he heard of theſe motions, came with an Army into Judæa, wherein taking ſome Towns he ſate down before Jeruſalem, at the Feaſt of Tabernacles. But though he might eaſily with a little patience have taken the City, yet raiſed he his Siege, having neglected many opportunities. He departed to Antipatris, loſing many of his men by the way, that were cut off by the Jews who followed him cloſe in the rear. With this ſucceſs the Jews being elevated, created two Commanders to govern the City, viz. Joſeph the Son of Gorion, and Ananus the High-Prieſt: and they ſent ſeveral Captains and Governours into the Country, amongſt whom was Joſeph, who wrote the Hiſtory of this War. He fortified the ſeveral Towns of Galilee, and indured as great a conflict as to his own Perſon, with divers, both there and at Jeruſalem, (who envying him the honour of his Command, would have had him turned out) as he did afterwards with the Romans. But Ceſtius ſent to Nero then in Achaia, as we ſaid, to let him underſtand the ſtate of affairs, laying all the blame of the Rebellion upon Florus.

They chuſe themſelves Captains.

41. Nero deliberating what Captain he ſhould ſend into Judæa, wanted Corbulo whom he had killed. At length he pitched on Veſpaſian, who having been trained up in Martial matters all his Youth, he thought him only capable of ſuch a Charge, though a little before he was grievouſly offended at him, for that he little regarded his ſinging (either departing from off the ſtage, or ſleeping if there) ſo that he forbad him not only his preſenee, but alſo publickly to ſalute him. Hereupon he withdrew himſelf, and lurked out of the way in fear of his life; but Nero having now need of him, and not fearing him, becauſe of the meanneſs of his birth and name, gave him this imployment. Veſpaſian diſpatched away his Son Titus to Alexandria, thence to bring Forces into Judæa, and he himſelf paſſing the Helleſpont into Syria gathered together the Roman Soldiers with ſupplies from the Princes, and came to Ptolemais, where Titus reached him ſooner than was expected for the Winter-ſeaſon. Nero returning towards Rome in Triumphant manner, manner, after he had been two Years in Greece, C. Julius Vindex a Gall by birth, but of Senatorian degree amongſt the Romans, incenſed his Country-men againſt him, for that they groaned under his intolerable exactions, yet ſtriving not for the Principality himſelf, he offered it to Ser. Sulpicius Galba an old Soldier, and now Governour of the Tarraconian Province in Spain, who, as well for his own ſafety, as to gratifie ambition, accepted it. Nero being come to Naples heard of the conſpiracy on that day he had killed his Mother, and was then little moved at it; but ſeemed rather to rejoice for the occaſion that was thence offered to ſpoil the rich Provinces of Gall. For though the Mathematicians had told him that he ſhould be forſaken, yet he interpreted it of the loſſes ſuſtained in Britain and Armenia; and ſome alſo promiſed him, though in this condition, the Empire of the Eaſt, and ſome by name the Kingdom of Jeruſalem; but moſt affirmed that things would go well at this time. He took nothing ſo ill in all the opprobrious ſpeeches of Vindex, as to be called an unſkilful Muſician, and, after the name of his Family, Ænobarbus; yet at length terrified by many meſſages he returned to Rome. Now had he moſt horrid projects in his head, as of killing the Captains and Governours of Provinces, with all the Exiles, and all of Galliſk Original at Rome; of poiſoning the whole Senate in Feaſting, burning the City, and letting looſe wild Beaſts upon the People, thereby to hinder the quenching of the Flames. From theſe things he was thought to be terrified more by deſpair of accompliſhing them, than out of any repentance concerning his purpoſe. In preparing for his expedition his ſpecial care was for the choice of carriages, wherein to convey his Concubines and inſtruments for the ſtage.

Veſpaſian ſent againſt them.

Vindex and Galba conſpire againſt Nero.

42. When he heard of the revolt of the reſt of the Armies, in a great rage taking ſome poiſon with him in a Golden Box, he left his Houſe, and ſending certain of his truſtieſt Servants to Oſtia to make ready ſome Ships, moved the Tribunes and Centurions of his Guard about flying with him; but ſome ſtaggering at it and hanging backwards, others flatly refuſed it. Then he conſidered whether he ſhould not fly to the Parthian, or in an humble manner to Galba; or whether going to the Roſtra in a mourning habit, he ſhould not there ask pardon in as doleful manner as he could for what was paſt? but he was fearful to to be pulled in pieces ere he could reach the publick meeting-place; and put off thoſe thoughts till the next day. At night finding his Guards withdrawn, he ſtarted out of his Bed, and ſending his Friends about to their Lodgings, went alſo himſelf; but none would anſwer; ſo that he returned to his Chamber, whence his Attendants alſo were now fled, having taken away the furniture, and removed out of the way the Box of Poiſon. Then deſired he that ſome one would kill him, but none attempting it, Then, ſaith he, I have neither Friend nor Enemy, and ran down as to throw himſelf into Tiber. But ſtopping ere he came there, he deſired ſome lurking hole wherein he might recover his Spirits, and Phaon his Freedman offering him his aſſiſtance, he went with him to a Village four Miles diſtant in a diſguiſe, hearing as he paſſed the Prayers of the People for his deſtruction. Here being called on to rid himſelf out of the way, and prevent the abuſes which elſe would fall upon him, he ordered things to be prepared for his dead Body, weeping, and adding, Qualis Artifex pereo? How excellent an Artiſt do I die? Underſtanding at length that he was declared an Enemy by the Senate, and how he was ſought for to be puniſhed more majorum, or after the cuſtom of their Anceſtors, and upon his enquiry hearing that this kind of death was, to be ſtripped, and having his neck made faſt in a Pillory to be whipped to death, he called for two Daggers, the points of which he only felt, and put them up again, pretending that his fatal hour was not yet come: He bad Porus lament and weep, and wiſhed that ſome would help him by their own example to kill himſelf, chiding alſo himſelf for his backwardneſs. Certain Horſe-men now drawing near to fetch him alive, he at length effected it, by the help of Epaphroditus his Freed-man, on the fourth of the Ides of June, having Reigned 13 Years, 7 Months, and 28 Days, in the 32 of his Age, and the 821 of the City, Anno Dom. 68. C. Silius Italicus, and M. Valerius Trachalus being Conſuls. Veſpaſian asked Apollonius what was Nero*'s overthrow*? He anſwered, Nero could touch and tune the Harp well (noting his exceſſive delight in that Inſtrument) But in Government ſometimes he uſed to wind the Pins too high, ſometimes to let them down too low. The unequal, and untimely Enterchange of power Preſſed too far, and Relaxed too much, deſtroyeth Authority above all things.

A. D. 69.
*Ol.*211.ann. 4.
V. C. 821.

He killeth himſelf.

Eccleſiaſtical matters in his time.

43. About the latter end of Nero's Second Year St. Paul was ſent bound to Rome by Feſtus, where he continued in durance two Years. In his Third living at Rome in free cuſtody, he wrote to the Epheſians, Philippians, Coloſſians, and Philemon. About the end of the Fourth he ſeemeth to have been ſet at liberty, and thence to have returned into Greece and Aſia, where for five or ſix Years he Eſtabliſhed the Churches he had Founded. In the Eleventh Year of Nero he is ſaid to have ſuffered Martyrdom at Rome. For, Nero having ſet the City on fire, accuſed the Chriſtians, as Tacitus writeth; and expoſed them to ignominious deaths. Some he cauſed to be covered with the skins of wild Beaſts, that they might be devoured of Dogs, others to be Crucified, and others burnt alive, and that in the night, that they might give light to paſſengers. He offered his own Gardens for this ſhow, and celebrated the Circenſian Games amongſt the common ſort in the habit of a Chariot driver, who could not have raged againſt Chriſtianity as Tertullian obſerveth, but that ſome excellency was in it. In this Firſt Perſecution, beſides Paul, who was beheaded, and many others, Peter alſo was Crowned with Martyrdom; being Crucified as 'tis reported with his head downward, which kind of death he himſelf deſired, becauſe he would die in a more diſhonourable ſort than his Lord and Maſter. But ſome will have St. Paul and Peter to have ſuffered Martyrdom in the laſt Year of Nero's Reign, and that on June the Twenty-ninth, inſomuch that Chryſoſtome ſaith, that the day of Paul's death was more known than that of Alexander.

Conſule Lud. Cappellum in Hiſtor. Eccleſ. Illuſtrata.

Tacitum Annal. l. 15. c. 44. Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 25. & l. 3. c. 1.

44. After the Martyrdom of James ſirnamed Juſt the First Biſhop of Jeruſalem (whom Euſebius (a) from Clemens reporteth to have been thrown down from a Pinacle of the Temple, and brained with a Fuller's Club) who governed that See Thirty Years, Simon (b) Cleopas the Lords Couſin German, one of the 70 Diſciples, and who ſaw Chriſt with his eyes, was choſen into his place by the Apoſtles, and Diſciples themſelves, being gathered together for this purpoſe. After the Martyrdom of Peter, (c) Linus one of the 70 Diſciples, of whom Paul makes mention, ſucceeded him in the See of Rome, where he continued Biſhop Twelve Years, though ſome place his Martyrdom alſo in the laſt Year of Nero, and the Ninth before the Calends of October. Evodius one of the 70 Diſciples, whom St. Paul remembred in his Epiſtles, was Biſhop of Antioch, being by Euſebius ſaid to be the firſt known to govern that Church. Him ſucceeded Ignatius (d) the Diſciple of John, who wrote as they ſay to Mary the Mother of Chriſt, and Mary unto him again. He wrote unto John the Evangeliſt, and to Polycarpus his Diſciple. Beſides, he wrote ſundry other notable Epiſtles, yet extant, and in the Eleventh Year of Trajan was brought to Rome, and torn in pieces of wild Beaſts, as will be ſhewn. Euſebius writeth that he was the Second Biſhop by Succeſſion after Peter in the Church of Antioch. When Nero had Reigned the ſpace of Eight Years, ſaith the Hiſtorian, firſt after Mark the Evangeliſt, Anianus took the Government of the Church of Alexandria, a man both virtuous, and renowned in all reſpects.

(a) Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 23.

(b) Idem l. 3. cap. 11.

(c) Idem l. 3. c. 2, 13, 19. & in Chron.

(d) Idem l. 3. c. 19, 32. & in Chron. Tritem.

Lib. 2. 24.

CHAP. IV.

From the Death of Nero to that of Domitian, the laſt of the Family of Veſpaſian, the ſpace of 27 Years.

Galba ſucceedeth Nero.

GALBA after the Death of Nero obtained the Principality, yet not long; for being Emperour, he maintained not the opinion which had been conceived of him whilſt a private man; for he gave way to a cruel and covetous humour, acting all things according to the Will and Luſt of three men whom the People thence called his School-maſters. But his ſeverity towards the Soldiers, eſpecially that ſpeech Legi à ſe militem non emi, procured his ruin, who upon the revolt of the Armies in upper Germany betrayed him to M. Salvius Otho, notwithſtanding he had adopted Piſo. He was murdered by them in the Forum

Tacitus Hiſtor. lib. 1. Sueton in Galba.

Is murdered by his Soldiers.

Forum near the place where Curtius rode into the hole, and his head being cut off, for ſome time was carried up and down on a Spear, till his Enemies had with the ſight ſatisfied their flouting appetite, and then it was buried with the Body. He died on the 17*th.* of the Calends of February, in the 73. Year of his Age, having Reigned Seven Months.

Otho ſeizeth on the Empire.

Being oppoſed by Vitellius.

Idem ibid. Tacitus Hiſtor. lib. 2. Plutarch. in Othone.

2. Otho ſeized on the Empire by the help of his Soldiers, having reſolved it after he ſaw Piſo preferred before him. He was Nero's great companion, and now refuſed not to be called by his very name, ſuffered his Images and Statues to be reſtored, as alſo his Officers and Freed-men to their ſeveral places, and the firſt thing he ſubſcribed to was for Money to finiſh his golden Houſe. But A. Vitellius was ſhortly after ſaluted Emperour in Germany by the Army there, being Son to L. Vitellius, who Governed Syria. Being ſent into Germany by Galba, he denied nothing to the Soldiers, but granted them their wills, with impunity in all things, and for that was rewarded with this Election. Hereupon Otho deſired the Senate that they would ſend to him, to acquaint him with his Election, and to perſwade him to be quiet; but he himſelf by Letters offered to be only Partner with him in the Sovereignty, and to be his Son-in-law. The Enemy drawing near, the Prætorian bands ſtood very faithfully to him, even ſo far, that with much ado, and with the ſlaughter of ſome of their Officers, were they kept from deſtroying the Senate, which they ſuſpected to be falſe to him. His intereſt was to draw out the War in length, having the Enemy at advantage, who was ſtraightned both for neceſſaries, and by reaſon of the narrowneſs of the paſſage: but he raſhly and imprudently reſolved on a Battel, either for that Vitellius was not yet come, or urged by the earneſtneſs of the Soldiers. They had four Ingagements; whereof in the firſt three he had the better, but in the laſt at Bebriacum (a Village in Italy betwixt Cremona and Verona, now called Labemein) was worſted; yet ſo as he might without difficulty have recovered himſelf, though taken at unawares, and deceived by pretence of a parley.

He killeth himſelf.

But being aſhamed to ſeek his own eſtabliſhment with the hazard of ſo many mens lives, rather than out of any deſperation, he killed himſelf. He was much extolled for his generous death (as it was accounted) which rendred him ſo much more deſirable than his life had done, that many thought him to have killed Galba, not ſo much out of the deſire to rule, as to reſtore liberty (ſo called) to the Common-wealth. He died on the 12*th.* before the Calends of May, in the 38*th.* Year of his Age, and the 95*th.* day of his Empire.

Tacitus Hiſtor. l. 2. c. 3. Sueton in Vitellio.

Vitellius owned as Emperour.

3. Otho being dead, though Vitellius was deteſted by thoſe at Rome, yet when they heard how things went they began to flatter, and gave him the Title of Emperour. The Army of upper Germany which firſt mutined againſt Galba turning to him, he gladly received the ſirname of Germanicus, but deferred the Title of Auguſtus, and utterly refuſed that of Cæſar. When yet in Gall he heard of the event of the Battel at Bebriacum, he preſently caſhiered the Prætorian bands, as giving a bad example of revolt, and 120 which had demanded a reward of Otho for killing Galba, he commanded to be ſought, and put to death. Hereby he much commended himſelf to the People, and gave hopes of an excellent Prince; but carrying on all things afterwards according to his natural inclination and former courſe of life, he deſerved to be ranked amongſt the worſt of Governours.

Is very vicious.

4. He returned to Rome in a triumphant manner, and gave up himſelf to Luxury and Exceſs, wherein he alſo tolerated his Family and Soldiers, as in all manner of wickedneſs. Coming through the Fields where the Armies fought, when many loathed the noiſomneſs of the Carkeiſes, he ſtuck not to ſay, Optime olere occiſum hoſtem, & melius civem: that A ſlain Enemy ſmells well, but ſweeter a Citizen. He drunk much Wine in the place before them all, to prevent any hurt that might proceed from the ſtench, and cauſed this Liquour to be diſtributed to the Soldiers, with the like vanity and inſolence. Entring the City as into a Field with Trumpets ſounding to the charge, with Colours flying, and in his Coat-armour, he fell more and more into the neglect of all Laws, divine and humane. He made himſelf Perpetual Conſul; and that it might be ſeen after whoſe Pattern he meant to Govern, in the Campus Martius attended by a number of Prieſts he Sacrifized for the Soul of Nero; and at a ſolemn Feaſt commanding a Muſician to ſing ſomething of Domitius, he leaped up and applauded the beginning of Nero's Songs. He Governed State-matters at the will and diſcretion of the vileſt Player and Chariot-driver, eſpecially of Aſiaticus his Freed- man. He gave himſelf over to ſuch Luxury as he had been accuſtomed to in the days of Caius and Nero; eſpecially to Gluttony, the abominable exceſs whereof turned him into a very Monſter. For, he would eat four or five Meals a day, which that he might be able to bear, he uſed frequent vomiting, and inviting himſelf to the Houſes of his friends, he would, as Nero did, put them to incredible expenſes. At his coming to Rome his Brother made him a Feaſt, wherein were ſerved up 2000 ſeveral Diſhes of Fiſh, the daintieſt that could be found, and 7000 ſorts of Fowl. But he far exceeded this preparation at the Dedication of the Great Platter, which he called Minerva's Target, in which were mixed together the Livers of Guilt-heads, Brains of Pheſants and Peacocks, with the Tongues of Phœnicopters, and the ſmall Guts of Sea-Lampries fetched as far as the Carpathian Sea and the Straights of Gibraltar. He would alſo eat meat taken from the Hearth in time of Sacrifice, and fetched from Victualling Houſes, either ſmoaking, made ready the day before, or half eaten.

And cruel.

5. He was prone to the killing of any perſon, and for any cauſe whatſoever: Noble-men, his School-fellows and contemporaries, he deceitfully made away by degrees. To one in a Fever, deſiring a draught of cold Water, he gave Poiſon in it with his own hands. He ſcarcely ever ſpared any of his Creditors or others that asked him the Money he ought. One of them ſaluting him, he ſent away to be put to death, and preſently again calling him back (for which the by-ſtanders commended his clemency) he cauſed him to be killed before his eyes, ſaying, that he would ſatiate his eyes with the ſlaughter of him; and another that interceded for him, he put to death with his two Sons. A certain Knight whom he commanded to be ſlain, to ſave his life, told him he had made him his Heir, whereupon he commanded his Will to be produced, in which finding that the man's Freedman was made coheir with him, he cauſed them both to be put to death. He was cruel to Mathematicians, becauſe they foretold his Reign ſhould be but ſhort. And to compleat all, he was ſuſpected to have killed his Mother. Theſe Vices only ſeemed to put him in mind of his condition, for elſe ſo great a ſtupidity had ſeized on him, that if others had not known him to be the Prince, he himſelf would quickly have forgot it. He accounted all ſharp that was wholeſome, liking of nothing but what was pleaſant; and fortifying himſelf only with mirth and ſottiſhneſs againſt all dangers, he forgot all things paſt, and regarded nothing preſent or to come: not a word of War proceeded from him, the rumour and talk of which was forbidden in the City. But he was within a ſhort time rouzed by the coming of the Forces of Veſpaſian, who was by others put upon ſeeking the Empire, being then in Judæa.

Veſpaſian put upon ſeeking the Empire. His acts in Judæa.

6. Veſpaſian (that we may now proſecute the Hiſtory of his actions in that Country) after Titus had brought the Army to Ptolemais out of Ægypt, with his Forces united ſet upon Galilee, and at the firſt onſet took Gedara, which was burnt and deſtroyed. Thence removing to Jotapata, on the 21 day of May he took it by ſtorm after 40 days, though ſtoutly defended by Joſeph the Hiſtorian. Joſeph was taken and kept to be ſent Priſoner to Nero; but deſiring to ſpeak with Veſpaſian, foretold him that he ſhould diſmiſs him out of Captivity, but as Emperour. After this, beſtowing his Army at Cæſarea and Scythopolis, to refreſh the Legions, he himſelf went to Cæſarea Philippi, where he was entertained by Agrippa the King for twenty days. Then went he about to ſubdue Tiberias and Tarichæa, whereof the former yielded, and was ſpared at the requeſt of the King, but the latter was taken by force and deſtroyed. After this were Gamala, Giſcala, and the Hill Itaburium taken; and all Galilee being reduced, Veſpaſian and Titus returned to Cæſarea.

Joſephus de bello lib. 3. c. 5. &c.

Idem l. 4. c. 1, 2, &c.

The Jews fall out amongſt themſelves.

7. The Jews were now imbroiled in civil diſſentions, whilſt ſome deſired Peace, and others would not hear a word of it. Parties were made and fought in every City, and raſh young men prevailed every where againſt grave the and elder ſort, who foreſaw the calamity. At firſt they robbed one another ſingly; but at length turned Thieves in whole Troops, committing ſuch Cruelties, as equalled the misfortune received from the Romans. At laſt the Thieves loaded with plunder brake into Jeruſalem, where they not only conſumed the proviſions of the People, but filled the City with Slaughters, Rapines, and Diſſentions. They caſt the principal Citizens into Priſon, and then put them to death unheard, pretending they intended to betray the City to the Romans; yet for all this wickedneſs they boaſted of Zeal for the Law of God, and Cuſtoms of their their Country, and thereupon were called Zealots. The People being about to riſe againſt them, they betook themſelves to the Temple, where they made one Phanias an ignorant fellow High-Prieſt, though he was not of the Order of Prieſts; but they were oppoſed by Ananus, who procured the People to riſe againſt them, and beat them into the inner part. Hereupon they ſent to the Idumæans, accuſing Ananus of an intention to betray their Country, and foraſmuch as they fought for the liberty thereof, and now were beſieged, they implored their aſſiſtance. Twenty Thouſand came, and being let into the City, together with the Zealots, committed horrid outrages againſt the Inhabitants. They ſlew 8000 the firſt Night, and afterwards other 1200 of the chiefeſt, (amongſt whom was Ananus) beſides an infinite number of the common ſort: then at length the Idumæans perceiving the wickedneſs of the Zealots, and that they had falſely accuſed the Nobility, ſet at liberto 2000 which they had impriſoned, and returned home. After their departure the Zealots renewed their ſlaughters, and raged more cruelly than ever, eſpecially againſt ſuch as they had found attempting to flie to the Romans.

Idem ibid. c. 5, 6.

Horrid outrages committed by the Zealots.

Idem l. 5. c. 3, 4, 5, 6, &c.

All Judæa languiſheth in an unheard-of manner.

Veſpaſian ſubdueth all, except three Caſtles and Jeruſalem.

8. But they preſently after fell out amongſt themſelves by reaſon of one John, who with a ſeditious party holding Giſcala, pretended to receive the conditions given him by Titus, and ſtole away to Jeruſalem. There becoming the great Incendiary, he now affected ſovereign power; but he was withſtood by ſuch as before this had been equal to him. Though they thus diſagreed, yet herein they conſented, to ſpoile the People; and Jeruſalem being thus filled with Tumults, thoſe that were without the City had liberty to rob and ſpoil, and thoſe whoſe Towns were hereby deſtroyed, aſſembled together in the Wilderneſs, and uniting, brake into other Places and Towns; ſo that there was no place in Judæa, which did not languiſh in an unheard-of manner together with the Mother City. Veſpaſian excited by the ſeditious, and intreated by the Fugitives to ſave their Country, prepared for the Siege of Jeruſalem, and that he might not leave an Enemy at his back, took in Gadara (where 13000 were put to the Sword) and all other places beyond the River, except the Caſtle of Macheron. He built Caſtles at Jericho and Adida, and made all things ready for the Siege; but hearing of Nero's death, and the ſucceſſion of Galba, he deferred the Expedition, and ſent Titus to know Galba's pleaſure. But as Titus ſailed by Achaia he heard of his end, and Otho's advancement, whereupon he returned to his Father. Uncertain what would enſue, and who ſhould be Emperour, they neglected the War againſt the Jews, for they feared their own Country, and therefore thought it an unfit time to aſſault ſtrangers. Yet he drew out his Army from Cæſarea, and ſubdued all the Forts of Judæa ſave three Caſtles, Herodium, Maſſada, and Macheron, which were kept by the Thieves. Beſides theſe Jeruſalem only remained to be Conquered.

Tacitus Hiſtor. lib. 3, & 4. Sueton in Vitellio, & Joſephus de bello Judaico l. 5. c. 10, 12, 13, 14.

The Armies in the Eaſt declare for Veſpaſian.

9. Veſpaſian hearing of Otho's death, and having compaſſion on the State, thought of freeing the Commonwealth from the Tyranny of Vitellius; but for that it was now Winter, and he was at a great diſtance from Rome, he ſtrove to conceal that indignation which he had conceived. But Mucianus Preſident of Syria perſwaded him to it very earneſtly: certain Soldiers alſo who were removed out of Syria into Mæſia, giving him large commendations, the three Legions which proceeded as far as Aquileia to help Otho, reſolved to proceed, notwithſtanding his death, and put Veſpaſian's name into their Colours. Firſt of all others, Tiberius Alexander Governour of Ægypt, on the firſt of July ſwore the Legions to him, and two days after the Army in Judæa, compelling him with Threats to take the Government upon him, took the Oath. The Armies then in ſeveral Provinces declaring for him, he ſent Mucianus with Forces into Italy, and went himſelf to Alexandria, to make ſure of Ægypt. The Mæſian Legions hearing of Mucianus his coming, choſe Antonius Primus an excellent Soldier (who had been baniſhed by Nero, and reſtored by Galba) for their Captain, and haſted for Italy, that they might have the plunder of the Country. Cæcina (otherwiſe called Allienus) the General of Vitellius, made haſt and got to Cremona before them; but conſidering the effeminateneſs of his Army, he hearkned to the friendly advice ſent him by Antonius, and perſwaded his Soldiers, by laying before them the weakneſs of Vitellius, and the force of his adverſary, to revolt. They accordingly ſware fealty to Veſpaſian, but preſently repenting, caſt bonds upon their General as a Traytor, and exhorted even Antonius to imbrace the quarrel of Vitellius; then coming to blows, though they wanted a Leader, maintained a moſt ſharp fight, both parties being poſſeſſed with ſuch fury, that Night it ſelf could not ſever them. They knew and talked to one another, nay intermitting the fight for ſome time, gave Victuals one to another, and yet after their repaſts fell to it again. But in a morning the Soldiers of the Third Legion ſaluting according to the faſhion, the riſing Sun, Vitellius his men thought Mucianus was arrived, and thereupon betook themſelves to Cremona, where looſing Cæcina, they procured him to make their Peace, and the Mæſian Army entering the Town made great diſorder.

10. Vitellius hearing of this was amazed, and not knowing what to do, became ridiculous unto all men; for his affairs went down the wind in all places. He covenanted then with Flavius Sabinus the Brother of Veſpaſian for his own ſafety, and preſently after, at the ſtairs of the Palace, before many Soldiers, profeſſed he would give up the Empire, which he had unwillingly taken upon him. But the Soldiers crying out againſt it, he deferred the thing, and in the morning went to the Roſtra in a mourning habit, where with many tears out of a paper he uttered the ſame words he had before ſpoken to the Soldiers, who again interrupting him, the People bad him be of good chear, and promiſed him their aſſiſtance. Taking courage hereafter, he forced Sabinus (who was Governour of the City) with others into the Capitol, which ſetting on fire he ſuppreſſed them, Sabinus being put to death, whoſe Nephew Domitian (afterwards Emperour) was hid by the Prieſt of Jupiter's Temple and eſcaped. Then would he have had the Senate ſend Ambaſſadors to the Enemy with the Veſtal Nuns to beg Peace, or at leaſt ſo much time as to conſider what was to be done. But Veſpaſian's Soldiers inraged at the report of the beſieging of the Capitol, made haſt. Petilius Cerealis being ſent before with a Thouſand Horſe ſet upon the City, but was forced to retreat. Antonius Primus coming on with the reſt of the Army, many skirmiſhes happened, till ſuch time as the Guards being beaten from off the Bridg Veſpaſian's men entred the City with great fury, wherein they committed grievous outrages. Vitellius was pulled out of an hole in the Palace where he lurked, at firſt unknown; but being diſcovered, he deſired he might be kept in Priſon, for that he had ſomething to reveal, which concerned the ſafety of Veſpaſian. But his hands being tied behind him, and an Halter caſt about his neck, he was dragged half naked into the Forum, and being abuſed in the way, both by many words and deeds, was killed with many blows, and caſt after the faſhion of Traitors into Tiber. This happened in the 57*th.* Year of his Age, after he had held the Government Eight Months, and Five Days. The day following Mucianus entred the City, and the Soldiers being hindred from any further ſlaughters, the Empire was by the Senate decreed to Veſpaſian, who hearing theſe things at Alexandria, receiving congratulatory Embaſſies from all quarters, and having ſettled affairs in Ægypt e're he ſet forward for Rome, ordered his Son Titus to fall upon Jeruſalem, and finiſh the War in Judæa.

Vitellius is to ſeek what to do.

Is killed.

A. D. 70. Ol. 212. an. 1. V. C. 822.

Veſpaſian e're his departure from Ægypt ordereth his Son Titus to beſiege Jeruſalem.

11. Whilſt Veſpaſian and Vitellius were yet diſputing the controverſie, great commotions happened in Germany, the Batavians (now Inhabitants of Holland in the Low-Countries) rebelling firſt at the inſtigation of Claudius Civilis, the moſt eminent amongſt them, who having been ſent Priſoner in Chains unto Nero, and diſmiſſed by Galba, came into danger again under Vitellius, the Army requiring that he ſhould be put to death. He drew into the Conſpiracy, beſides the Caninæfates (a more inconſiderable people inhabiting the ſame Iſland) by ſecret meſſages the Auxiliaries of Britain, and the Batavian Cohorts, which then quartered at Mogontiacum, now Mentz. They caſt out, or deſtroyed the Roman Garriſons, overthrew Aquilius Captain of the Vantguard, and after him Mumius Lupercus the Lieutenant. Herennius Gallus alſo, endeavouring to hinder the march of the Batavian Cohorts, was worſted by them. Civilis after the coming of the Cohorts, to colour the matter, ſware his Soldiers to Veſpaſian, and beſieged ſuch as refuſed in the old Camp. After this the Romans mutining againſt Hordonius, the command was given to Vocula, and Herennius Gallus was made his Lieutenant. Vocula in his firſt ingagement with Civilis had the worſt, but at length by good hap overthrew him, the Vizard of his friendſhip to Veſpaſian being drawn off.

Tacitus Hiſtor. lib. 4.

Commotions in Germany.

12. The report of Vitellius his death through Germany and Gall doubled the War. For now Civilis, without any pretence of friendſhip to Veſpaſian, carried himſelf as an Enemy to the Romans, and Vitelliut his Soldiers rather wiſhed for external ſervitude than his Government: the Galles alſo took heart, interpreting the burning of the Capitol to preſage the deſtruction of the Empire. The Treviri therefore (now Inhabitants of Triers) and the Lingones (now of Langres) revolted, when all Gall was in a tottering condition, and what was worſe, and unheard of, the Legions proved unfaithful, and were corrupted. For Vocula being ſlain, they took an Oath for the Empire of Gall, and to them other Legions in ſeveral places joined themſelves, ſome being beſieged upon neceſſity, and afterwards cut in pieces by Civilis as they had deſerved. In the mean time Julius Sabinus one of the revolters taking on him the name of Cæſar, led a great and diſorderly Company againſt the Sequani (inhabiting the Country now called La Franche Conte) who not refuſing Battel routed the multitude, and put him to flight. Theſe things being reported at Rome rather with improvement, all things ſeemed there to be loſt, whereupon Domitian the Son of Veſpaſian, and Mucianus, addreſſed themſelves to the War, and four Legions were preſently diſpatched away towards Germany.

Idem ibid.

13. By this time the Galles, by the means eſpecially of Julius Vindex, began to conſider of the power of the Romans, and at length approved rather of a ſervile Peace than a dangerous War; Petilius Cerealis alſo gave the Treviri a great Overthrow, and moſt of the revolters returned to obedience. After this he accepted of Battel from Civilis and Claſſicus his companion, in the beginning whereof he had the worſt, for the Legions began to be broken, the Horſe was put to flight, and the Bridg over the River Moſella gained by the Enemy; but though he had now loſt even all for want of heed, yet he reſtored all by his diligence, ſo as, on the ſame day he took and deſtroyed the Enemie's Camp. Domitian and Mucianus heard of the ſucceſs ere they came to the Alpes, and Mucianus perſwaded Domitian againſt marching further, knowing his ambitious and haughty humour, which he had already betrayed whilſt at Rome; but his advice ſucceeding not, he went with him out of compliance to Lyons, whence, as 'tis ſaid, Domitian wrote privately to Cerealis to deliver up the Army to him, that he might therewith ſeize on the Empire. But perceiving he was deſpiſed for his Youth, he betook himſelf to ſuch courſes whereby he thought that his deſigns might beſt be covered. During theſe Stirs Veſpaſian was yet at Alexandria. Afterwards both Civilis recruited his Forces through Germany, and Cerealis alſo doubled his ſtrength, whereupon followed ſeveral fights, the effect of which was a Peace. For the Batavians were ſo chaſtized, as glad they were to accept of it, as Civilis of pardon, both of which were offered by the Roman General.

Compoſed by Petilius Cerealis.

The invaſion of the Sarmatæ.

14. With the aforeſaid revolt of the Germans, at the ſame time, ſaith * Joſephus, agreed the boldneſs of the Scythians. For thoſe that are called Sarmatæ, in great multitudes having privily paſſed over Iſter, being violent, and moſt cruel, through the ſuddenneſs of their invaſion killed many of the Romans whom they found in Garriſons, with Fonteius Agrippa the Lieutenant (who valiantly reſiſted them) and waſted all the adjacent Countreys with Fire and Sword. Veſpaſian hearing of this, and the waſting of Mœſia, ſent Rubrius Gallus to chaſtize them, by whom many being ſlain, ſuch as eſcaped returned home in great fear. The War being thus ended, the General taking more care for the future, fortified the places with ſtrong Garriſons, that the paſſage might be utterly impaſſable to the Barbarians. Theſe firſt eruptions of the Barbarous Northern Nations are therefore more to be noted, becauſe at length they over-ran and deſtroyed the Roman Empire. Now return we to the affairs of the Jews, and the War managed by Titus.

* De Bello Judaico lib. 7. cap. 23.

The Zealots fall out amongſt themſelves.

15. During the former tranſactions in the Weſt, a faction was raiſed againſt the Zealots by one Simon the Son of Giora, who getting together a company of Thieves and Murderers that were aſſembled on the Hilly Countrey, fell upon many Villages and Cities, brought all Idumæa into his power, waſted Judæa, pitched his Camp againſt Jeruſalem it ſelf, and became a great terror to the poor Inhabitants, who were moſt cruelly oppreſſed by the Zealots within. In the mean time ſuch Idumæans as had of late fled into the City, and were become of John's party (whom the Zealots had now choſen their Captain) fell at odds with him, deteſting his cruelty, and killing many of his men, forced the Tyrant out of his Palace into the Temple; but Citizens fearing that by night he might fall out upon the City, let in Simon, and then ſet upon the Temple, but in vain. After this Eleazar, who once had been Chief amongſt the Zealots, envying John his power withdrew ſome Soldiers from him, and kept the inwardeſt part of the Joſephus de bello Judaico, lib. 5. cap. 5. & l. 6. c. 1.

Temple, whereby John was forced to fight, both againſt Simon and him. Hereby all things about the Temple were burnt up, and Proviſions deſtroyed, which might have ſerved them a long time, and for want whereof they were oppreſſed with Famine in the Siege.

Titus beſiegeth the City.

15. But Titus in proſecution of his Fathers Orders came from Alexandria to Cæſarea, where gathering together ſome Forces with Aids from the Neighbouring Kings, he appointed the reſt to follow him, and marched towards Jeruſalem, accompanied with Tiberius Alexander, (who now began to be in principal favour) and Joſeph the Jew, he being for the truth of his prediction now releaſed out of bonds. He ſat down within ſix or ſeven furlongs of the City, a little before the Feaſt of the Paſſeover, and therein ſhut up an infinite multitude, which according to the cuſtom flocked to that ſolemnity; and hereby all Proviſions were conſumed in a ſhort time. The three Factions upon ſight of his great Army agreed to oppoſe it, and iſſuing out, made great diſorder, forcing the Romans to forſake their Camp, and flie to the Mountains; but they were repelled by the great care and induſtry of Titus. But on the day of unleavened bread (April the 14.) Eleazar, who kept the inward part of the Temple, opening the Gates to the people, which was deſirous to Sacrifize, John ſent many of his party in amongſt the reſt with Swords hid under their Cloaths, who killing Eleazar, and many of his faction, ſeized alſo on that part of the Temple, and thereby the number of the factions was reduced to that of two. That under John conſiſted of 8400. and the other under Simon of 10000 fighting men, beſides 5000 Idumæans. Notwithſtanding the Enemy was at the Walls, and to oppoſe him, they a little joined together: yet did they break out the one upon the other, and the poor people miſerably ſuffered under both.

Idem ibid. & Capp. 2,3,4.

Idem ibid. & Tacitus Hiſt. l. 5. c. 12.

16. The City being fortified with three Walls on every ſide, but where it was fenced with deep Vallies, Titus having with much oppoſition placed his Engines, battered the uttermoſt of them, and breaking, on the third of May, and the City, poſſeſſed all the North part as far as the Tower of Antonius, into the Valley of Cedron. Five days after, he brake within the ſecond Wall, though the beſieged made divers Sallies. They beat him out again, but the fourth day after he recovered the place, and prepared for the Battery of the third Wall. Yet he ſent Joſeph the Hiſtorian to them, who exhorting them with many words to yield, was entertained only with Scoffs and Reproaches. The people thinking to eſcape out of the City, John and Simon ſtopped up all paſſages, yet the Famine increaſing many came out, whom being taken Titus cauſed to be Crucified to ſuch a vaſt number, that room was wanting for Croſſes, and Croſſes for Perſons. On the 12*th* of May he began four Mounts whereon to place his Battering Rams: two near to the Caſtle Antonia, where he hoped he might take the Temple, and other two near the Monument of John the High-Prieſt, where he thought he ſhould with moſt eaſe break into the upper part of the City. But John, whoſe part it was to oppoſe the Romans in the former place, caſt down, and burnt two of them, and two days after Simon did as much by the other, though ſeventeen days had been ſpent in making them all. He deſtroyed alſo many Rams and Engines, and brake into the very Camp of the Romans; but was repelled by Titus from Antonia, who in a Council of Officers reſolved now to compaſs the whole City with a Trench, which with incredible diligence and celerity was finiſhed in three days, with thirteen Forts to hinder the flight of the beſieged, and hinder the conveyance of relief into the City.

Joſehpus de bello l. 6. c. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Breaking into it.

17. The ſeditious were nothing herewith moved, though the Famine not only raged amongſt the common ſort, but themſelves alſo were preſſed by it. A certain Noble-woman ſod her Child to eat it, and ſuch a mortality enſued, that from the fourteenth of April to the firſt of July were carried out to be buried at the publick charge One Hundred and Fifteen Thouſand and Eighty Carkeiſes of the poorer ſort, as Titus was told by one Mannaus, who was appointed to pay the Money. Divers Noble-men that fled to him, certified him alſo that Six Hundred Thouſand of the ordinary ſort were caſt dead out of the Gates, and others that were dead beſides, were innumerable; for becauſe they could not carry all out, they laid them up in Houſes. A Buſhel of Corn was ſold for a Talent, ſinks and holes were raked to find old dung of Oxen to eat, which moved the Romans to compaſſion, but the ſeditious were hereby nothing changed. For Simon not abſtaining from Murders and Rapines, notwithſtanding this lamentable condition, killed Matthias the High-Prieſt, by whom he had been let into the Famine rageth.

City, with his three Sons, and ſixteen others, pretending that they purpoſed to flie to the Enemy. Judas one of his own Officers hereupon weary of his cruelty, attempted to betray a certain Tower, whereof he had the charge, to the Romans; but being diſcovered, was put to death with ten others of his complices. John alſo being driven by neceſſity, converted the Golden Veſſels of the Temple with the Sacred Money to prophane uſes, and was conſtrained to divide the Wine and Oil, ordained for Sacrifices, to his Soldiers.

Idem l. 7. c. 1. &c.

Yet the deluded defendants refuſe to yield.

The Temple burnt.

18. Titus cut down all the Groves within a great diſtance of the City, and cauſing more Mounts or Scaffolds to be Erected within Twenty-one Days, on the firſt of July began to batter the Wall of Antonia, John that oppoſed him being beaten back, and on the fift day broke into the the Caſtle. At this time many many falſe Prophets ſuborned by the Seditious, told the multitude they muſt expect aſſiſtance from God, and therefore though Titus often exhorted them to yield, they flatly refuſed, boaſting that they would rather endure all miſeries. The conteſt was earneſt about the Temple. The Wall of the inward part thereof was too ſtrong for the battering Rams, and the Defendants valiantly reſiſted at the top: the foundation of the Gates could not be undermined, and therefore Titus was conſtrained to ſet them on fire. Yet was it his intention to ſave the Temple, but on the Tenth of Auguſt, a certain Soldier without any command, (nay againſt the command of his General) moved as by an inſtinct from above, caſt fire into the buildings on the North ſide, which catching the flame imparted it to the Temple it ſelf, notwithſtanding all that Titus could do to quench it, on the ſame day of the ſame Month that it was formerly ſet on fire by the command of Nebuchadnezzar. The Temple thus burning, Titus was ſaluted Imperator by his Soldiers, and the Tyrants with their Companions fled into the City. They now deſired a parly with the General himſelf, who checked them much for their obſtinacy, but promiſed them life if they would yield. But refuſing to commit themſelves to his fidelity, they required to depart the City with their Wives and Children, wherewith being greatly vexed, he commanded it to be proclaimed by a Crier, That they ſhould not look any longer for Mercy.

Idem ibid. c. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18.

Titus commandeth the Temple and City to be utterly razed. Idem 7. c. 1. &c.

A. D. 71. Ol 212. an. 2. V. C. 823.

19. He permitted his Soldiers to plunder and burn the City, but the ſeditious wretches got to the King's Houſe, where many had depoſited their wealth, and thence repelled the Romans. They alſo killed of their own Country People to the number of Six Thouſand and Four Hundred, and rifling the money got them into the upper and ſtrongeſt part of the City, called Sion, where for all this danger they ſtill moſt cruelly Tyrannized. Titus having conſidered the ſtrength of the place, provided Engines to batter the Walls, and began ſo to do it on the Seventh day of September. Part of the Wall being broken down, the Tyrants were ſeized with great fear and amazement, not knowing what to do. Some ſaid the Eaſt part of it was broken down, others that the Romans were entred, and that they ſaw them out of the Towers; ſo that the power of God appeared in the overthrow of theſe wretches; for they forſook the Towers which were their only ſtrength, and in vain ſeeking to eſcape, hid themſelves in Caves and Privies. The Romans entering, put all to the Sword, and burnt the Houſes with all that fled to them for ſafeguard. Titus commanded both the Temple and City to be utterly razed by a plow brought over them, according to the cuſtom; only the Weſt part of the Wall with three Towers for their ſtrength and beauty he preſerved, to bear teſtimony of the ſtatelineſs of the City to poſterity. They would have crowned him as a Conquerour for this work, but he refuſed the honour, denying that he was the Author of it, for that he only ſerved God herein, who by it demonſtrated his wrath againſt the Jews. To ſuch an end came this famous City, on the Eighth day of September, in the Second Year of Veſpaſian, he and Titus his Son being Conſuls, Thirty Eight Years after the death of Chriſt, the Blood of whom now fell heavy upon them. It had been taken in all ſix times; by Aſochæus or Shiſhack King of Ægypt, Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey, Herod and Soſius, and now by Titus; but twice only was it deſtroyed, viz. by Nebuchadnezzar and Titus. It was firſt built, ſaith Joſephus, by Melchiſedeck King of Salem, and afterwards inlarged by David. It was burnt by the Babylonians, One Thouſand Four Hundred Sixty Eight Years and Six Months after the Founding of it, and Four Hundred Seventy Seven Yars and Six Months after it had been taken by David from the Canaanites. By Titus Veſpaſian it was deſtroyed One Thouſand One Hndred Seventy Nine Years after David took it, but from it's firſt Founding to it's laſt Deſtruction intervened Two Thouſand One Hundred Seventy Seven Years.

20. John and Simon having hid themſelves were taken, and the former being condemned to perpetual Priſon, the other was reſerved for a Triumph. The reſt of the Thieves and Seditious were diſcovered, one telling of another, and were all ſlain. Of thoſe which during the whole War were taken Captives the number amounted to 97000, and of thoſe that Periſhed in the Siege to 1100000. So heavy was the guilt which lay on them for the death of Chriſt, and ſuch were the horrid Enormities committed by them, that we have reaſon to agree with Joſephus, who thought, that if the Romans had delayed to come againſt them, the City would either have been ſwallowed up of the Earth, or have periſhed by ſome Deluge, or elſe by Thunderbolts and Lightning have undergone the puniſhments of Sodom, whoſe Inhabitants they exceeded in wickedneſs. A Year after was Lucilius Baſſus ſent Lieutenant into Judæa, who having the Army of Cerealis Vitellianus, took the Caſtle of Herodian and of Machærun beyond Jordan. Not long after Veſpaſian wrote to Liberius Maximus the Governour, to ſell all the Land of the Jews, upon whom whereſoever they lived he impoſed a Yearly Tribute to be paid into the Capitol, it being that they were wont to pay into the Temple at Jeruſalem. About a Year after Publius Sylva ſucceeded Baſſus then dead, and finiſhed the War, taking the ſtrong Caſtle of Maſſada from Eleazar, who held it with 960 Hackſters, ſuch as upon his motion ſet fire to the Caſtle and all their Goods, and then killed themſelves. Many like them flying out of the Country came to Alexandria in Ægypt, where they ſollicited the Jews to revolt, but were by them delivered up to the Romans, and thoſe of them that then eſcaped were afterwards taken. Veſpaſian hearing of their attempt, gave order to Lupus Governour of Alexandria, to demoliſh the Temple of the Jews, (built in Ægypt in times paſt by Onias Brother to the High-Prieſt) which he neglected to do, only ſpoiled it of ſome conſecrated things, and ſhut it up. But Paulinus his Succeſſor utterly bereaved it of all, and ſo ſhut it up, that he made it inacceſſible, and without any ſhew of Religion, 343 Years after it was firſt built by Onias.

Lib. 6. c. 16.

Idem l. 7. c. 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31.

The War finiſhed by Sylva.

The Temple of the Jews in Ægypt deſtroyed.

21. But the Jews of Cyrene were alſo infected with a diſtemper of madneſs. There one Jonathan a Weaver led many of the ſimple ſort into the Wilderneſs, promiſing to ſhew them ſigns and wonders; but by the chiefeſt of the Jews the matter being diſcovered to Catullus Governour of thoſe parts, he ſent Soldiers who ſlew moſt of them, and not long after Jonathan himſelf was taken. Catullus a covetous man procured him and others to accuſe many unjuſtly, whom having ſlain and ſeized on their Eſtates, he carried him to Rome, where following the ſame Trade, Joſeph the Hiſtorian was alſo accuſed; but Veſpaſian having found out the deceit, cauſed Jonathan firſt to be whipped, and then burnt alive. Catullus at preſent eſcaped through the mildneſs of the Emperour, but not long after fell into grievous anguiſh of mind, imagining he ſaw the Ghoſts of thoſe he had ſlain, and his bowels rotted away from him, that he died miſerably. Thus far hath Joſephus communicated to us the affairs of the Jews, who being kindly entertained by Veſpaſian, was honoured with a Statue, and his Books were thought worthy of the publick Library. For the truth of his Hiſtory concerning the Wars, he had the teſtimony of the Emperours, King Agrippa, and others. Titus would have the certain knowledge of theſe Wars delivered unto the World by his Books only, commanding them to be publiſhed with the privilege of his own hand. And King Agrippa wrote 62 Epiſtles, wherein he teſtified of the true Hiſtory delivered by him. But his Jewiſh Antiquities he finiſhed not till the Thirteenth of Domitian, when he himſelf was 56 Years old, as he teſtifieth at the end of that Work.

A Sedition of the Jews in Cyrene.

Vide Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 3. c. 9, 16.

The end of Joſephus his Hiſtory.

Joſephus contra Apionem lib. 1. & Antihuit. l. ult. c. ult.

22. To Veſpaſian was renewed the Lex Regia, and the ſame power that Auguſtus, Tiberius, and the reſt enjoyed, was confirmed to him as Hæreditary. A fragment of this Law (which evinceth that abſolute power we formerly proved to have been in the Emperours) is yet extant after this manner. Let it be lawful for him to make a League with whom he pleaſeth, as it was lawful to Divus Auguſtus, Tiberius Julius Cæſar Auguſtus, and Tiberius Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus, &c. As alſo to hold the Senate, make report, diſmiſs, and make Senatus Conſulta by reporting and ſeparation, as it was lawful to Divus Auguſtus, Tib. Julius Cæſar Auguſtus, Tib. Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus. Moreover, when as by his Will, Authority, Command, or Mandate, or he being preſent, the Senate ſhall be aſſembled, it ſhall be effectual to all ends and purpoſes, as if the Senate had been aſſembled or held by Law. Moreover, whatſoever he

The Lex Regia renewed in behalf of Veſpaſian.

The Lex Regia renewed to Veſpaſian.

Ex tabula ænea in baſilica Lateranenſi alta palmos 9. lata 5, digitos 3. craſſa. in Inſcrip. Gruteri pag. 242.

he ſhall commend to the Roman Senate and People that ſtand for any Magiſtracy, power, command, or charge, or to whomſoever he ſhall give or promiſe his Suffrage, let them be conſidered beyond the uſual form in the Comitia. As alſo it may be lawful for him to inlarge the Pomærium if he think it convenient for the Commonwealth, ſo as it was lawful for Tib. Claudius Cæſar Germanicus. Moreover, whatſoever he ſhall think uſeful for the Commonwealth, or agreeable to the Majeſty of all things divine or humane, publick or private, let him have right and authority to act and do, ſo as it was lawful for Divus Auguſtus, and Tiberius Julius Cæſar Auguſtus, and Tiberius Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus. Moreover, from what Laws and Plebiſcita it was ordained, that Divus Auguſtus, Tiberius Julius Cæſar Auguſtus, and Tiberius Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus ſhould be looſed, from thoſe Laws and Plebiſcita, let the Emperor Cæſar Veſpaſian be looſed. And what things ſoever, by what Law or asking ſoever Divus Auguſtus, Tib. Julius Cæſar Auguſtus, and Tiberius Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus ought to do, let it be lawful for the Emperor Cæſar Veſpaſian Auguſtus to do them all. Moreover, what things ſoever before the asking of this Law were acted, done, decreed, or commanded by the Emperor Cæſar Veſpaſian Auguſtus, or by any other, by virtue of his Command or Mandate, let them be held as juſt and valid, as if they had been done by command of the People.

Et ex Antiq. Epigrammatum libro apud Hotomannum l. de Legibus Romanis.

The Sanction.

If any one by virtue of this Law hath done or ſhall do any thing againſt the Laws, asking of Laws (rogationes) Plebiſcita or Senatuſconſulta, or ſhall not do what he ought to have done according to any Law, asking, Plebiſcitum or Senatuſconſultum, and that by virtue of this Law, let no dammage thence light upon him; neither let him owe any thing to the People for this matter, neither let any have an action againſt him, neither let any one judge him, nor permit the matter to be debated before him.

Joſephus de bello Judaico lib. 7. c. 27.

Pætus gaineth Comagena.

The Alani invade Media, and Armenia.

23. In the fourth year of Veſpaſian, Cæſennius Pætus Preſident of Syria, accuſed Antiochus King of Comagena and Epiphanes his Son, as holding correſpondence with the Parthian, whereupon order was given him to prevent what might enſue. Pætus then invaded Comagena, which Antiochus quitted, being loth to fight, and fled into Cilicia. His Sons alſo, after they had made ſome oppoſition, went to Vologeſus into Parthia. But Pætus procured Antiochus to be taken and ſent to him bound towards Rome, yet Veſpaſian cauſed him to be looſed, and ſtay at Lacedæmon, where he allowed him a revenue to live like himſelf, and he afterwards ſent for both him and his Sons to the City, where they were magnificently entertained. About this time the Alani, who being Scythians inhabited about Tanais and the Lake Mæotis, conſulted with the King of the Hyrcanians who was Maſter of the Straights to invade Media, which they entred and ſacked at their pleaſure, Pacorus the King being forced up into a ſtrong Hold, and glad to redeem his Wife and Concubines with an Hundred Talents. From Media they paſſed into Armenia, and waſted the Country. Tiridates the King oppoſed them, but was near being taken alive in Battel, for with his Sword he cut in pieces the Rope that was caſt about his neck, as they were therewith drawing him amongſt his Enemies, and eſcaped. But they inraged at his oppoſition waſted the Kingdom, and carrying great booty out of both Countreys returned home.

Several acts of Veſpaſian.

Sueton in Veſpaſiano.

Oroſius l. 7. c. 9.

His Character.

24. Veſpaſian took away liberty from Achaia, Lycia, Rhodes, Byzantium, and Samus, reducing them into Provinces, as alſo Thrace, Cilicia, and Comagena, the King whereof he ſent for to Rome, as we ſaid before. Cappadocia now began to be over-run with barbarous Nations, to reſtrain whom he added Legions, and placed one of Conſular dignity over it in room of an Eques. At length all Wars and Tumults being ſuppreſſed both at home and abroad, he ſhut the Temple of Janus the ſixth time from the foundation of the City. It was his principal care firſt to ſettle and eſtabliſh the afflicted and tottering condition of the Empire, and then to adorn it. Whereas the City was very deformed by reaſon of the burning of it, he permitted any to build upon old Plots, if the owners would relinquiſh them: He alſo re-edified the Capitol. As to his perſonal quality, he was of much temper and clemency, eaſily paſſing by and forgetting injuries. The meanneſs of his former condition he ſought not to hide, but ſometimes would profeſs it openly. He took not the Tribunitial power, nor tle of Father of his Country for ſome time. If any innocent perſon were puniſhed, it was ſorely againſt his will, and for want of knowledge. He paſſed by the Treaſon of many that had plotted his Deſtruction, ſaying, They were fools, and knew not what a weight and trouble the Empire was: he wept and groand at the puniſhment of an offender. To Vologeſes King of Parthia who wrote to him thus: Arſaces King of Kings to Fl. Veſpaſian, without any reproof he directed his anſwer thus, Fl. Veſpaſian to Arſaces King of Kings. The only vice reprehended in him was covetouſneſs, and yet to that ſeeking earneſtly for Money, he was conſtrained through the neceſſities of the State. 'Tis certain he uſed it well however gotten, being very liberal in feaſting, relieving impoveriſhed Senators, and others of deſert. He incouraged Learning, and gave the firſt ſtipends out of the Exchequer to the Profeſſors thereof. He was Conſul eight times (beſides once before he was Emperour) and in his laſt Conſulſhip died of a Flux, in the Sixty ninth year of his Age, the Tenth of his reign being compleated; in the 832 of the City, A. D. 79, he himſelf the ninth time, and Titus Cæſar the ſeventh being Conſuls. He was the firſt Emperour whoſe Succeſſor was his own Son. In his time flouriſhed Pliny the Elder and Writer of the Natural Hiſtory. Who alſo the ſame year that he died, whilſt he went to ſee what might be the cauſe of the burning of the Hill Veſuvius, was ſtifled with the ſmoak thereof, and died, as Pliny Junior his Nephew writes in his Epiſtle * to Trajan. Now alſo Quintilian and other Learned Men were famous.

Xiphilinus ex Dione.

His death,

And that of Pliny.

Titus ſucceedeth him.

Sueton in Tito. Eutrop. l. 7. Oroſius l. 7. c. 9. alii.

A. D. 79. V. C. 832. Titi 1.

25. Titus his eldeſt Son ſucceeded him (by whom Jeruſalem had been taken, and deſtroyed) on the eighth of the Calends of June. He was born that year wherein Caius was ſlain, and brought up with Britanicus the Son of Claudius, being inſtructed in the ſame things by the ſame Maſters: he was thought alſo to have drunk ſome of the poyſon which Nero gave to that Prince, and that this was the cauſe of his want of health ſome conjectured. He performed the Office of Tribune both in the Wars of Germany and Britain with great Commendations, and after that, being Quæſtor, came to have the command of a Legion in Judæa. After his Father came to the Government he was ſuſpected by ſome, when he was yet in Ægypt, as intending to eſtabliſh himſelf, whereupon he haſted to Rome to cut off all jealouſies. Taking then part with his Father in the Publick Cares, he triumphed with him over Judæa, executed with him the Cenſorſhip, Tribuneſhip, and ſeven Conſulſhips; nay, taking as it were all upon him, he dictated Letters in his Fathers Name, publiſhed Edicts, ſpake in the Senate, and that in the room of the Quæſtor, and took on him the Government of the Palace, which never had formerly been diſcharged but by ſome Roman Knight; and this Office he executed with ſuch rigor, that he contracted much envy, and was accounted cruel. He was ſuſpected of Luxury, for feaſting with voluptuous perſons till midnight; of Incontinency alſo, being (amongſt other Arguments) too familiar with Berenice the Siſter of King Agrippa, to which Lady he is alſo ſaid to have promiſed Marriage, but performed it not, becauſe of the diſtaſte of the People. Moreover rapacity was laid to his charge. He was both accounted and openly talked of as another Nero, and ſcarcely did any ever come with more fear or leſs favour to the Government.

His admirable Virtues.

Several calamities in his time.

26. But ſo contrarily to expectation did he behave himſelf, that his former carriage did but ſet him off with the greater luſtre; and ſo free was he from all Vice, and adorned with ſo many Virtues, that he became the Love and Delight of Mankind, and by an happy exchange was ſo called. His temperance he ſhewed in the moderation of his Diet, the choice of his Companions, and putting away Berenice: His moderation by abſtaining utterly from other mens Goods, and refuſing often ordinary Benevolences, although no man ever exceeded him in Munificence. He was the Mirrour of Courteſie, being wont to ſay, That no man ſhould go ſorrowful from the preſence of the Prince; and on a day having done no courteſie for any man, he ſaid, Amici diem perdidi, My friends I have loſt a day. Several ſad Accidents hapned in his little time; ſo great a Peſtilence as ſeldom had been known. So great a fire there was in Rome, and kindled from Heaven, that it burnt three days together. Veſuvius alſo the Hill in Campania burſt forth with great flames, and deſtroyed all round about it; all which miſeries he leſſened as much as he could, neither ſparing coſt nor pains to relieve the diſtreſſed. At the ſame time another War aroſe in Britain,

---

* Lib. 6. ep. 16.

Britain, wherein Cn. Julius Agricola haraſſed all the Country of the Enemies, and firſt of all the Romans, that we know of, ſaith Dio *, knew that Britain was compaſſed about by the Sea. For certain Soldiers in a Sedition having killed their Centurions and Tribunes fled to their Ships, and launching out, ſailed about that part of Britain which lieth toward the Weſt, being carried by waves and wind: when they had done this, and by chance light upon the other Camp of the Romans on the other ſide, Agricola ſent out others to hold the ſame courſe, from whom he alſo knew that it was an Iſland. Theſe things being done in Britain, Titus was ſaluted Imperator the fifteenth time. Agricola paſſed the reſt of his life in Ignominy and Poverty, becauſe he had done greater things than were ſuitable to a Prætor; and for that cauſe he was afterwards put to death by Domitian, though by the permiſſion of Titus he had triumphed. But concerning theſe things Tacitus is rather to be conſulted in the life of Agricola.

* Apud Xiphil. in excerpt. l.66.

He dieth.

27. Titus put down Informers, uſually tolerated before. His mercy was too great; for he vowed he had rather periſh than deſtroy another, as according to the judgment of ſome it came to paſs. Amongſt others that plotted his deſtruction, he not only ſpared his Brother Domitian, but had him in the ſame reſpect as from the beginning, and owned him as his Partner and Succeſſor; only betwixt them two he beſought him with tears at length to relent to Love and Unity. He was a man of excellent parts, both outward and inward accompliſhments; but to the great loſs of Man-kind, was preſently taken away, whether by the treachery of his Brother or no, is uncertain. In the beginning of his Sickneſs he is ſaid to have look'd up to Heaven, as taking it ill he ſhould dye ſo ſoon, being not conſcious to himſelf of any Sin, ſave one, which as he did not expreſs, ſo it is altogether unknown. He was with good reaſon ſadly lamented throughout the Provinces. He died in the ſame Village his Father had ended his days, near the Country of the Sabines, in the forty ſecond year of his Age, when he had reigned two years, as many months, and twenty days; in the 834 year of the City, A. D. 81. M. Plautius Silvanus, and M. Annius Verus being Conſuls.

Domitian his Brother ſucceedeth him.

28. Domitian (ſo called from Domitilla their Mother) ſucceeded Titus, being more like to Nero, Caligula, or Tiberius, than either Father or Brother. His youth he paſſed diſgracefully enough. Doubting upon the death of his Father, whether he ſhould not give a double donative to the Soldiers to obtain their good-will, he never feared to boaſt that he was left Partner in the Empire by his Father, but that his teſtament was corrupted. He never ceaſed to plot againſt his Brother ſecretly or openly, and e're he was quite dead, commanded him to be carried out as ſuch. In the beginning of his reign he reſtrained himſelf; for his cruelty was then imployed upon flies, which privately in a room he was wont to catch and prick with a Bodkin, ſo that one asking whether any body was within with Cæſar? it was not unfitly anſwered by Vibius Criſpus, No not ſo much as a fly. But though at preſent he ſtrove to allay the fury of his vices by ſome forced virtue, yet within a while he let fall alſo this vizard, and became in appearance what inwardly his indiſpoſition inclined him to be.

Sueton & Eutropius.

A. D. 81.
V. C. 834.
Titi 3.

At his beginning diſſembleth his Vices.

Great difficulties in his time,

29. He undertook ſeveral Expeditions, as againſt the Catti and Sarmatians (People inhabiting the Northern parts of Europe) who had cut off a whole Legion. The Dacians alſo put him to much trouble, and grievouſly afflicted the Roman State, under conduct of Diurpaneus their King; for they overthrew firſt Oppius Sabinus a man of Conſular dignity, and next Cornelius Fuſcus Captain of the Guards, in ſeveral ſore and bloody Battels, inſomuch that the Hiſtorians of thoſe times, have thought fitteſt to paſs over in ſilence the number of the ſlain; Yet at length he triumphed over them all. He was alſo ſtruck at by a Civil War raiſed by L. Antonius Preſident of upper Germany, whom he had incenſed by the odiouſneſs of his vices, and eſpecially by uncivil language. This he finiſhed though abſent with admirable felicity; for, that very hour the Fight was to be, the Rhine ſwelled ſo high, that it hindred the Auxiliaries which were ſent to Antonius, from joyning with him. In the ſecond year of his reign Agricola defeated the Ordovices in Britain, and took the Iſle Mona about Autumn, and that upon his firſt coming into the Iſland. So that the years of the Expeditions which Tacitus afterwards relateth, are rather to be reckoned from the Kalends of January of the former year, as Jacobus Cappellus hinteth. Though Dion Caſſius, as appeareth from Xiphilin, referred the diſcovery of Britain being an Iſland to the reign of Titus: Yet others unto the time of Domitian, who at length envying Agricola that great glory he had got in reducing Britain, recalled him, Sueton in Domitiano.

Eutropius ut ſuprà.
Oroſius lib. 7. c. 16.

Which yet he overcometh.

Tacitus in vitâ Agricolæ.

under pretence of ſending him into Aſia; and he died two years after, on the tenth of the Calends of September, in the fifty ſixth year of his age, Pompeius Collega and Cornelius Priſcus being Conſuls. Whether he died of poyſon or not, though there wanted not ſuſpitions, Tacitus his Son-in-law dareth not affirm.

His cruelty.

30. Domitian having ſuppreſſed the Rebellion of Antonius, grew extraordinarily cruel, putting men to death upon ſmall and trivial accounts. Thoſe of any note that were of his party he tortured to death by ways unheard of, and confounded the cauſe of the innocent with that of the guilty, raging againſt the Chriſtians with a ſecond perſecution. He arrived at that horrid arrogance, that he ſticked not to ſay in the Senate, That he gave the Empire to his Father and Brother, who did but reſtore it to him; and (what was worſe than this) he would be called our Lord and God. Being hereby rendred terrible and hateful unto all, he wrought his own deſtruction, which fearing, and being foretold it by the Chaldæans, he grew timorous out of meaſure, and was moved with the leaſt ſuſpition. Hence did he cauſe the place where he was wont to abide, to be beſet with the ſtone Phengites, that he might ſee if any one came behind him; and though he was ſufficiently ambitious, yet did he refuſe an extraordinary honour offered him by the Senate, viz. that when he bore the Conſulſhip, Equites ſhould go before him with ſpears amongſt the Sergeants. Hence alſo he put Epaphroditus his Secretary to death, becauſe it was believed that he had helped Nero in diſpatching himſelf; and he killed Flavius his Uncle, though he had openly owned his two Sons as his Succeſſors, whereof the one he called Veſpaſian, and the other Domitian; which haſtened his deſtruction. Eight months after he was ſlain by his own ſervants, of whom Parthenius the chief of his Chamber was principal, Domitia his Wife being drawn in to the Conſpiracy, for that ſhe feared to be poyſoned for her kindneſs to Paris. Longinus Proculus then in Germany is ſaid to have foretold the very day of his death, and Apollonius Tyanæus a famous Magitian (who being convented before him vaniſhed out of his ſight) ſpoke of it that very hour, exhorting Stephanus as it were to ſtrike him home. The people took his death indifferently, the Soldiers heavily, which they ſhortly after revenged upon the Murtherers; but the Senate as it were triumphed, and ordered the memory of him to be aboliſhed. The beſt thing we find concerning him is, that though he was no Scholar himſelf, he took care for repairing of Libraries. He was murthered on the fourteenth before the Calends of October, in the forty fifth year of his age, and the fifteenth of his reign, in the 849 year of the City: A.D. 96. T. Fulvius Valens, and C. Antiſtius Vetus being Conſuls. In his time flouriſhed Statius Papinius, who beginneth the fourth book of his Sylvæ with the celebration of his ſeventeenth Conſulſhip, which fell in with the fourteenth of his reign. Juvenal and Martial alſo flouriſhed at this time; whereof the latter was of Equeſtrian Rank, though ever poor, as * he himſelf witneſſeth.

His death.

A. D. 96.
V. C. 849.
Domitiani 15.

* Sum fateor, ſemperque fui Calliſtrate pauper.
Sed non obſcurus nec malè notus eques.

Eccleſiaſtical matters in his time.

31. Now muſt we give a ſhort account of Eccleſiaſtical affairs, according to the courſe of time and matter. (a) Dionyſius the Areopagite being by St. Paul, (who converted him to the faith) made Biſhop of Athens, governed that Church in the time of Nero and afterwards. There are extant ſeveral works under his name, but ſuſpected; and ſundry Epiſtles, whereof one to John the Evangeliſt then in the Iſle Pathmos, and another unto Polycarpus. Linus the Biſhop of Rome, being Crowned with Martyrdom on the ninth of the Calends of October, in the laſt year of Nero, according to Damaſcus, Cletus or Anacletus ſucceeded him in that See. Some next unto Linus do place Clemens, then Cletus, and then Anacletus. But Irenæus, Euſebius, and Epiphanius rank them thus: Peter, Linus, Cletus, or Anacletus, Clemens; for he whom Irenæus and Euſebius call Anacletus, is by Epiphanius and Damaſus called Cletus. This Cletus according to Damaſus died in the ſecond year of Domitian, on the ſixth before the Calends of May, and was ſucceeded by Anacletus. But (b) Euſebius maketh Anacletus to have been Biſhop twelve years, and in the twelfth of Domitian to have been ſucceeded by Clemens, whom St. Paul in his Epiſtle to the Philippians, calleth his fellow-labourer. In the fourth year of the reign of Domitian (c) Anianus the firſt Biſhop of Alexandria (having continued there thirty two years) died, to whom ſucceeded Abilius. As for the Biſhops of Byzantium afterwards called Conſtantinople, we have them in this order from (d) Nicephorus the Patriarch. The firſt was Andrew the Apoſtle, who having preached the Word at Byzantium, and built an Oratory in Argyropolis orained Stachys to be Biſhop, of whom (e) St. Paul maketh mention.

Biſhops.

(a) Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 3. c. 4.
L. 4. c. 22.

(b) Lib. 3. c. 14.

(c) Idem ibid. c. 13.

(d) Vide Joſeph. Scaliger in Euſebianis pag. 313.

(e) Rom. 16. 9.

Stachys governed Sixteen years, after him ſucceeded in the year of our Lord 55 Oneſimus, who governed Fourteen; then Polycarpus ruled Seventeen, and Eleutherius Seven, who came to the Chair A. D. 85. in the ſecond of Domitian.

32. Domitian having raiſed the ſecond Perſecution againſt the Chriſtian faith, St. John the Apoſtle, who having continued at Epheſus Twenty ſeven years, was in the ninth of his Reign Baniſhed into the Iſland (a) Pathmos, one of the Cyclades, where he wrote his Revelation. In this work he ſheweth both Chriſts and his own hatred of the Doctrine of the Nicolaitans; for ſeveral Hereſies had by this time ſprung up, as St. Paul had forewarned. (b) Euſebius maketh Simon Magus the firſt Author of Hereſies, concerning whom we have already ſpoken; but, as to his Hereſies particularly: 1. He affirmed that he himſelf was Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, and that he was worſhipped of all people by divers names. 2. That Chriſt did ſuffer no hurt from the Jews; for he was Chriſt. 3. That any man might lye with any woman, for this was no ſin. 4. That the World was made by Angels, and that an Angel redeemed Mankind. 5. He denied the Reſurrection. 6. He thought that the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt might be bought with Money, and therefore that Sin of him is called Simony. (c) Nicholas the Patron of the Nicholaitans was one of the ſeven firſt Deacons. He having a fair wiſe, and being accuſed of Jealouſie, permitted any to Marry her, at which Fact others taking occaſion, thought it lawful for any man to have the company of any woman whom they themſelves could like. (d) Epiphanius writeth, that they taught Venery to be ſo neceſſary, that thoſe men who uſed it not every week on Friday, could not be ſaved. Beſides theſe Hereticks, about the year 69 ſprung up the Hereſie of the Cerinthians. (e) Cerinthus was a Jew by Birth. He taught that the World was made by Angels. 2. That Jeſus our Saviour had for his Parents indeed Joſeph and Mary, and that at his Baptiſm Chriſt deſcended on him, who (ſaith he) is called the Holy Ghoſt, by whom he did all his Miracles; when Jeſus was to be crucified of the Jews, then Chriſt left him, and returned into Heaven. 3. That Chriſt's Kingdom after the Reſurrection ſhould be an earthly Kingdom, and men then ſhould live in all fleſhly luſts and pleaſures together for a Thouſand years. 4. He denied the Divine Nature of Chriſt, and ſaid, that he had only an Humane Nature; and that he was not yet riſen from the dead, but ſhould riſe hereafter. 5. He affirmed that the old Law, and all the old Commandments and Precepts belonging to it were to be kept, together with the new Law or Goſpel, and that therefore Circumciſion was neceſſary for every one that would be ſaved. Epiphanius writeth, that certain Hereticks called Alogi, affirmed Cerinthus to have been the Author of the Revelation.

St. John baniſhed to Pathmos.

Hæreticks. 1 Simon Magus.

2 Nicholaitans.

3 Cerinthians.

(a) Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 3. c. 18.

(b) Lib. 1. c. 13.

(c) Clemens Alexandr. Strom. l. 3. & Euſeb. l. 3. c. 29.

(d) Lib. 2. Tom. 2. Hær. 25.

(e) Irenæus Epiphanius Euſeb. l. 3. c. 28. l. 4. c. 14. Philaſtrius.

33. About the beginning of Domitian aroſe alſo the Hereſie of Menander a Samaritan, and the Scholar of Simon Magus. He taught firſt, that the World was made by Angels, and that theſe Angels could be overcome by no means but by Art Magick. 2. He denied Chriſt to be true man. 3. He affirmed himſelf the Saviour of the World, and that he came from Heaven to ſave Mankind, and that all who would be ſaved muſt be baptized in his name. Out of his Doctrine (that we may ſpeak of theſe Hereticks briefly) budded that of Saturninus of Antioch, who not long after in like manner taught, 1. That the World was made by ſeven Angels, without the knowledge of God the Father. 2. That Chriſt was but the ſhadow of a man, for he had neither the true Body nor ſoul of a man, and thus he fulfilled the myſterie of our Redemption. 3. He ſaid moreover, that Marriage and Procreation was of the Devil. Baſilides, of whom were named the Baſilidiani, agreed in ſeveral points with Simon, Menander, and Saturninus, He taught, that Chriſt did not ſuffer, but Simon of Cyrene; that Chriſt taking the form of Simon laughed them to ſcorn. 2. He turned men away from Martyrdom, affirming that it was no Sin to deny Chriſt in time of Perſecution. 3. That the Angels made Three hundred ſixty five Heavens, and that theſe Heavens made the World. He wrote Twenty four Books upon the Goſpel, and feigned to himſelf Prophets, whom he called Barcabas and Barcoph. He commanded ſilence to his Scholars for the ſpace of five years, after the manner of Pythagoras.

Menander.

Baſilides.

Euſeb. l. 3. c. 26. &c. Irenæus, Epiphan. Auguſt. Philaſtr.

Euſeb. l. 4. c. 7.

34. Irenæus writeth, that in the time of theſe two Carpocrates lived, the father of the Hereſie held by the Gnoſticks, who thought good not to make known the Sorcery of Simon privily, but openly, glorying of charmed love-drinks, of Deviliſh, and drunken dreams, of aſſiſtant and aſſociate ſpirits, with other like illuſions. They taught further, that who ſo would attain to the perfection of their myſteries, muſt work ſuch facts though never ſo filthy, otherwiſe could they not overcome (as they termed them) the ſecular Potentates, unleſs every one played his part after the ſame ſecret operation. Theſe were the moſt vile Hereticks in filthineſs of all others. They held 1. That the Soul was made of the ſubſtance of God, and that brute beaſts have reaſon as man hath. 2. That there are two Gods, a good and an evil one, and that this evil God was the Creator of all things. Carpocrates alſo taught 1. That Chriſt was a meer man born of Joſeph, and not of the bleſſed Virgin, that he was a good man, and therefore after he was Crucified, his Soul went up into Heaven, but his body is ſtill in the Grave. 2. That the World was made by Angels. 3. That there is no reſurrection. 4. He rejected the Old Teſtament as not Canonical. Beſides theſe, at this time aroſe the Hereſie of the Ebionites, ſo called from Ebion. He taught, that Chriſt was but a meer man. 2. That when Jeſus was 30 years old there deſcended on him, and dwelt in him another perſon called Chriſt, and thus Jeſus and Chriſt dwelt, and were united together. 3. He agreed with Cerinthus in the reſt of the Hereſies, touching Circumciſion, and keeping all the Law of Moſes. He denied the Epiſtles of Paul, accuſing him that he fell from the Law. The Jewiſh Sabbath, and other Ceremonies he obſerved together with the Jews, only the Sunday he celebrated as we do in remembrance of the Reſurrection. 'Tis reported that St. John hearing Ebion was in the Bath refrained his company, and having ſeen and allowed the three Goſpels publiſhed by the other Evangeliſts, wrote his own to confute the Hereſies of him, Cerinthus and Menander.

Carpocrates, and the Gnoſticks his Scholars.

Ebionites.

Epiphan. Hæreſ. 30. *Euſeb. l.*3. *c.*21.

CHAP. V.

From the Death of Domitian to that of Pertinax, and the expoſing of the Empire to publick ſale by the Soldiers, the ſpace of 97 years.

Sueton in Domitian. Eutropius. Xiphilinus ex Dione.

Golden days after Domitian.

1. IT is reported of Domitian, that not long before his death he dreamed, that a golden neck and head was grown up on his ſhoulders, and that he was fully aſſured, that after him were thereby portended golden days to the Commonwealth. This truly came to paſs through the abſtinence, moderation, and excellent government of the ſix ſucceeding Princes, during the Reign of whom the Roman Empire (for temporal reſpects) enjoyed more happineſs, than ever before or after, Strangers affording that, which the Natives of Italy would not contribute to their own Country. Cocceius Nerva, an old man, and born in Crete (ſay ſome, though others make him a Native of Narnia in Italy) after the death of Domitian had the Empire put upon him, by the Legions which then quartered amongſt the Sequani in Gall. After his aſſuming the Government, a ſtrong rumour went abroad, that Domitian was yet living, which ſomewhat perplexed him, till by Parthenius, and Petronius, Captains of the Guards, he was put out of doubt; and afterwards his election was confirmed by the Senate.

Nerva ſucceedeth him.

Aurelius Victor.

2. Moſt of the Golden and Silver Statues of Domitian, who was hated by all men, he cauſed to be taken down, of which was raiſed a great Sum of Money. The Triumphal Arches, of which many had been erected to him, were alſo demoliſhed. He abſolved them who were held guilty of Impiety, and reſtored the Exiles. Slaves and Freedmen, who had been treacherous to their Lords, he commanded to be put to Death, taking care that they accuſed their Maſters of no Crime; neither did he ſuffer any to be be accuſed of Impiety, or the Jewiſh rites; for many had by Calumnies been condemned, and amongſt the reſt Seras the Philoſopher, which cauſed a great Tumult; (for all accuſed all) So that Fronto the Conſul was reported to ſay, That It was a very bad thing to have an Emperor, under whom it was not lawful to do any thing; but much worſe when every one might do what he pleaſed. Nerva was old, and had a weak Stomach, which cauſed him to Vomit what he took. Statues both of Gold and Silver he forbad to be erected to him, and he reſtored the Goods as were found in the Palace, to ſuch Owners as Domitian had unjuſtly deprived of them. To Roman Citizens that were poor, he gave Lands, to be divided by certain Perſons of Senatorian Rank. Wanting Money himſelf, he ſet to Sale abundance of rich Clothes and Furniture, both of his own, and what belonged to the Publick. Houſes alſo and Lands, and what things ſoever were not Neceſſaries; neither was he rigid in Exacting the Price, but herein ſhewed himſelf liberal towards many Perſons. He took away many Sacrifices, Circenſian Games, and other Shows, to diminiſh Expences. He Swore in the Senate, that by his Order no Senator ſhould be put to Death; and his Oath he kept, although a Conſpiracy was hatched againſt him. Doing nothing without the Aſſiſtance of the Principal Senators, he enacted many Laws, of which was remarkable one, which forbad the making of Eunuches, and another which Prohibited the Marriage of a Niece.

Dio lib. 68.

Nerva his good Government.

He adopts Trajan.

He dies.

3. He ſtuck not at taking Virginius Rufus to be his Colleague in the Conſulſhip, though he had often the Title of Emperor given him; on whoſe Sepulchre was Ingraved, That having overthrown Vindex, he enſured the Empire not for himſelf, but his Country. Nerva indeed was ſo good a Prince, that he dared to ſay, That he had done nothing, but that quitting the Government, he might ſafely live a private life. When Calpurnius Craſſus, deſcended from that Noble Family, and others had conſpired againſt him, he placed them at the Spectacula near himſelf, before they knew that they were diſcovered, and delivered them Swords into their Hands, to try as he ſaid, whether they were ſharp; but his deſign was to let them ſee that he cared not though he were preſently killed in the place. Caſperius Ælianus, whom, following the Example of Domitian, he had ſet over the Prætorian Guards, ſtirred up the Soldiers againſt him to require certain Perſons to be puniſhed; and he ſo oppoſed himſelf againſt what was intended, that he offered his Neck naked to them, but profited nothing; they being killed whom Ælian had demanded to be ſlain. Perceiving that he was deſpiſed for his Age, he went up into the Capitol, and there with a loud voice praying that it might prove happy for himſelf, the Senate and the People of Rome, he adopted M. Ulpius Trajanus Crinitus, who now governed Germany, and afterward he deſigned him Cæſar in the Senate. This he did, though he wanted not Kindred of his own; for he would not prefer his own Relations before the Publick Good, neither did it affright him that Trajan was a Spaniard, and not an Italian, and that before him none of another Nation had held the Roman Empire, judging that the Virtue, and not the Country of a Man was to be eſteemed. This Account we have from Dio, who writing of the Perſecution raiſed againſt ſuch as followed the Jewiſh Rites, we have cauſe to believe that Chriſtianity was chiefly meant thereby; for our Eccleſiaſtical Writers ſay, Nerva recalled ſuch as were Confeſſors upon that account, and that St. John the Apoſtle by virtue of that Indulgence returned out of Pathmos to Epheſus. We are told from other Hands, that Nerva only baniſhed Craſſus the Conſpirator to Tarentum. That he eaſed the Commonwealth of grievous Impoſitions, and conjoyned two things in the times of ſome of his Predeceſſors inſociable, viz. Sovereignty and Liberty. He lived with Trajan but three Months; For falling out with one Regulus a Senator, he was in ſo great a Paſſion, that it drove his Natural heat into a Fever, whereof he died on the ſixth before the Calends of February, having, as Dio tells us, lived ſixty five Years, ten Months, and ten Days, and Reigned one year, four months, and nine days, in the DCCCLI year of the City. A. D. XCVIII, he himſelf the fourth, and Trajanus Cæſar the ſecond time, being Conſuls.

Trajan Succeeds.

4. Trajan was a Spaniard by Birth, of the City Italica, of an Ancient rather than an Eminent Family, and took the Enſigns of the Empire at Agrippina in Gall. As ſoon as he was Emperor he wrote much to the Senate, and amongſt other things, that he would never put to Death any good Man, nor mark ſuch with Infamy; and this he not only at preſent confirmed by Oath, but alſo afterward. He ſent for Ælian and the Prætorian Soldiers, who had moved Sedition againſt Nerva, as though to make Uſe of them, and cauſed them to be ſlain. He preſently reduced all Germany into its former condition, as well as brought under ſeveral Nations beyond the Danube. When he came to Rome, he did many things there for correcting the State of the Commonwealth, and in favour of good Men, of whom he took care, To the Cities of Italy he gave much, toward the Education of Children. When his Wife Plotina firſt of all entred the Palace, ſhe turned her ſelf upon the ſteps to the Multitude, and told them, That ſhe entred ſuch a ſort of Woman as ſhe deſired ſhe might come out again; and indeed, ſhe carried her ſelf ſo in her greatneſs, that nothing could be ſaid againſt her. When he had ſtaid ſometime in the City, he was provoked to undertake a War againſt the Daci, the King of whom, Decebalus (or Decebalis, Diurpanes, or Diurpanis, for he hath ſeveral Names) had forced Domitian to pay Tribute. Trajan found himſelf burthened with the Payment of the Money, beſides the Diſgrace, and he was netled with the Reputation that people had got, with their confidence thereupon, and the daily increaſe of their Forces. Decebalus when he heard of his Deſign, was troubled at it, knowing that formerly he had not overcome the People of Rome, but Domitian; but now he ſhould have a War with the People of Rome, and Trajan the Emperor too; that Trajan, who for Juſtice, Fortitude and Goodneſs was excellent, and vigorous in Body as well as Mind, being in the Two and fortieth year of his Age. Theſe good qualities Dion Caſſius makes out in many Particulars, though to the Virtues lately mentioned, he adds not Temperance. But he writes that though he was given to the love of Boys and of Wine, yet did he nothing that might be reprehended; for though he drank largely, yet he was Sober, and as for what concerned Boys, he was troubleſome to no body. For thoſe his good qualities and his Skill in War, Decebalus feared him. Trajan gave him Battel, and therein made great ſlaughter of the Enemy, but had many of his own Men wounded, ſo many, that Linnen failed to bind up their wounds, the want of which to ſupply, he ſpared not his own Robe.

He makes War upon the Daci.

Returns Victorious.

5. After this Succeſs, he removed into the higher part of the Country, where ſeizing on divers Hills, he came, not without danger, to the Royal Seat of the Daci. Their King ſent ſeveral times, and at length obtained Peace, which he was to purchaſe by delivering up his Arms, his Engines, and them that made them; by giving up Fugitives, diſmantling his Forts, and having the ſame Friends and Enemies with the People of Rome, he laid aſide his Arms, and having faln at the Feet of Trajan, and done his Reverence, he ſent to the Senate to have the Peace confirmed by the Fathers. Theſe things performed, and theſe Agreements made Trajan left a Garriſon in Zermizegethuſa, and fortifying the reſt of the Country returned into Italy. At Rome the Ambaſſadors of Decebalus were admitted into the Senate, where they ſpake a few things, having laid aſide their Arms, and holding their hands joyned together like Slaves or Captives. The Peace being confirmed, they had their Arms reſtored, and Trajan triumphing over the Daci, obtained the Sirname of Dacicus. He preſented a Show of Gladiators, with which Sport he was delighted, and of Dancers in the Theatre. Yet in ſuch a noiſe of Arms, he caſt not away the care of other matters, but in the Forum of Auguſtus, the Porticus of Livia, and other places adminiſtred Juſtice from the Tribunal. But within a little while word was brought that Decebolus acted all things quite contrary to the League, receiving Fugitives, fortifying places, and ſolliciting the Neighbouring Nations to the War, whereupon he was by the Senate judged an Enemy, and Trajan again undertook the War in Perſon. When he was come into Myſia Decebalus ſent ſome to watch their time, and kill him, but this being diſcovered, he perſwaded Longinus one of his Officers to come to him about an Agreement, and then kept him, hoping to make his terms by him, till he killed himſelf.

Provoked again, he makes a ſecond Expedition.

He makes a Bridge over Danubius.

6. In the mean time Trajan cauſed a Stone Bridge to be laid over the River Danubius, ſuch a Bridge as Dio, or Xiphilin, could not ſufficiently admire. Though there were other works of his, very Magnificent, yet in his Opinion this excelled them all. It ſtood upon twenty Piles of fourſquare Stone, an hundred and fifty foot high from the Foundation, diſtant from each other an hundred and ſeventy feet, and conjoyned with Arches. It was built in a River full of whirlepits, having a muddy Channel, and in which the Stream could not be turned another way, rapid in its motion, and uncertain as to its breadth and depth. The Piles only remained in the time of Dio, ſerving for to ſhew that there is nothing but the wit of man can accompliſh it. Trajan built it with this Deſign, That if War was made upon the Romans that lived beyond the River in Winter when it was frozen, Succours might by it be ſent over to them. But Adrian on the contrary, fearing that the Barbarians ſhould kill the Guard, and break into Myſia, commanded the upper parts of it to be broken down. Trajan having finiſhed the Bridge, paſſed over, and waged War with the Daci, rather more ſecurely than ſpeedily; and hereby at length ſubdued them. Many things he performed both like an Expert Captain, and a Valiant Soldier, and his Men gave notable Teſtimonies of their Valour. At length Decebalus underſtanding that his Seat, and all the Country about it was taken, leſt he ſhould run the ſame riſque, killed himſelf. His head was ſent to Rome; Dacia became a Province of the Roman People, and into it Trajan led a Colony. Bicilis the Companion of Decebalus diſcovered that he had cauſed the Current of the River Sargetia to be turned another way, and in the Channel thereof had buried his Treaſure, and then ſuffered the Stream to return to its former courſe; after which, he killed ſuch Slaves as he had imployed in the work. This Treaſure, and ſuch good things as he had hid in Caves, was ſecured as excellent booty.

Arabia joyned to Petra ſubdued.

Trajan his familiar converſe.

7. At the ſame time Palma the Præfect of Syria, ſubdued that Part of Arabia which joyned to Petra, and thereby increaſed the Dominion of the People of Rome. To Trajan when he was returned to Rome, Ambaſſadors from ſeveral Nations made their Addreſſes, and particularly from India. He Exhibited Shows for an hundred and twenty three Days together, in which ſometimes were killed a thouſand Beaſts tame and wild, and ſometimes ten thouſand; and a thouſand Gladiators fought. He converſed with his Friends with all freedom, and eſpecially with one Licinius Sura, of whom he was bidden to beware. This man was ſo rich, that he built at his own expence a Gymnaſium for the City, and on a time invited Trajan to Supper. The Emperor went, and diſmiſſing his Guard, firſt, called Sura's Phyſitian, and bad him ſhave his Eyelids, then his Barber whom he permitted to do the ſame office upon his Chin; for this was the ancient Cuſtom both of the Roman Citizens and Princes, Hadrian being the firſt of the Emperors that let grow his Beard. Afterward being waſhed he went to Supper; and the day after told his Friends, who were wont to calumniate Sura, That if he would have murdered him, he had ſufficient opportunity to have done it. But he was ſo far void of fear, that when he delivered the Sword to one whom he had advanced to Command the Prætorian Cohorts, with which he was to be girt, he gave it him naked, and bad him draw it in his defence, if he governed as he ought to do; but if contrary, then to uſe it to his deſtruction: yet was he ſo prudent as to Animadvert upon ſome who had plotted his Death, in the number of whom was Craſſus, their Cauſe being firſt heard by the Senate. He built Libraries, and erected a vaſt Column in his own Forum, partly for a Sepulchre, and partly for a Monument to Poſterity, having digged away the hilly ground, and by that means levelled the Forum.

He makes War againſt the Parthian King.

A Dreadful Earthquake.

8. After this he made War againſt the Armenians and Parthians; finding himſelf concerned, as he ſaid, That the King of Armenia had not received a Diadem from himſelf, but the Parthian King; but his great Inducement was deſire of Glory. When he came to Athens, he was courted by Ambaſſadors ſent from Choſroes, who promiſed all fair things, but he would not be diverted from the Expedition. After he was come into the Enemie's Country, he was met by the Satrapa, and the neighbouring Kings, who preſented him richly; he took all Armenia, puniſhed Paramaſites the King thereof, and rewarded the King of the Heniochi. Having placed Garriſons as was convenient, he came to Edeſſa, where he received the ſubmiſſion of Angarus, who ruled Oſroena. When he arrived in Meſopotamia, Choſroes offered to quit that Country and Armenia, but he proceeded againſt his Captains Manus and Maniſarus into Adiabene. When theſe things were heard at Rome, many Decrees paſſed to honour him, and amongſt other marks, the Sirname of Optimus was conferred on him. He in his Expeditions travelled on foot; as he marched, Exerciſed his Soldiers, and tried their Courage and Fidelity by ſpreading abroad falſe Reports. Niſibis and Barnæ being taken, he was Sirnamed Parthicus; but he gloried moſt in that of Optimus, whereby his Nature and Diſpoſition was expreſſed, and not his Wars. Returning to Antioch, he there made ſome Stay, and was frighted with a moſt terrible Earthquake, which afflicted other Cities, but eſpecially this, in an unheard of manner. With the fall of Houſes and Rubbiſh, and by other means a vaſt number of People periſhed, ſo that the Town being full of Strangers, who came either for Law-Suits, upon Meſſages or other Buſineſs, the Court being there all the Winter, there was no Nation that received not loſs from ſo great a Calamity. Trajan himſelf eſcaped out of a Window, being, it's ſaid, drawn out by one of more than humane proportion, and though the Earthquake ceaſed, he continued many days in the open Air. The Hill Coraſius was ſo ſhaken, that its higher parts fell down, and it looked as if it would tumble upon the City. Other Mountains were levelled, waters broke out where formerly none appeared, and Fountains which formerly poured out water were ſtopped up.

9. When Spring came on he led his Army into the Enemies Country, reſolving to paſs the River Tigris, and knowing that thereabout was no Timber for building of Ships; the Veſſels he had made of Trees felled in the Woods about Niſibis, he cauſed to be conveyed thither in Carriages, being ſo framed as to be taken in pieces and ſet together again upon occaſion. With them he made a Bridge at the foot of the Mountain Cardynus, in deſpight of the Enemy, who was diſcouraged

by

Trajan takes in Adiabene.

by his multitudes of Men, and the ſight of Ships in that place, where they thought they had no reaſon to expect them. Then croſſing the River, he took in all Adiabene, being that part of Aſſyria belonging to Ninus, with Arbela and Gaugamela, where Alexander overthrew Darius; it was called Attyria, the letters S.S. being by the Barbarians changed into T.T. To Babylon he marched without controul, there being none left in his paſſage to oppoſe him; for the Parthians were weakened by Civil War, and this ſort of Diſcord was not yet taken up amongſt them. There he had opportunity to behold a Lake of Bitumen, of which the Walls of that City were built, being of that Nature, that mixed with Brick or ſmall Stones, it was more ſtrong and durable than any Stone or Iron. He beheld the mouth thereof, when ſo great a vapour proceeded out of it that no ſort of Terreſtrial Animal, nor Fowl was able to bear it, but died with the ſmell thereof; and had it proceeded far, the place had not been habitable; but it contained it ſelf in a narrow compaſs, to the bounds of which when it came, it returned back. The like to this Dio tells us he himſelf had found at Hierapolis, a Town of Aſia, the vapour of which, as he heard and ſaw, was pernicious to all living Creatures, Eunuchs or gelded Men excepted, the reaſon of which he confeſſeth he did not underſtand; no more do we.

He ſails to the Ocean.

His end not anſwerable to his beginning.

10. Trajan had a deſign to joyn Euphrates with Tigris by a Ditch, thereby to convey his Boats for making of a Bridge; but finding it was higher than Tigris, he changed his purpoſe, leſt it ſhould make Euphrates rapid and not Navigable. He conveyed then his Veſſels by Land over the narrow place betwixt them; for, Euphrates falling into a Fen, joyned it ſelf with Tigris. Having paſſed Tigris, he took Cteſiphon, and thereupon had the Title of Imperator, and that of Parthicus confirmed; and it being known, the Senate decreed many things in his honour, particularly, that he ſhould Triumph and keep as many Feſtivals as he pleaſed. Now had he a great deſire to Sail down into the Red Sea, being a Sinus of the Ocean, and called Erythræan from Erythrus, who there reigned. In his paſſage he was in danger, by reaſon of the rapid Stream of Tigris, the Winter Seaſon, and the Tide; but coming to the Sea, and taking notice of the paſſage into India, he affirmed, that had he been a young man he would have ſailed thither. He made curious Inquiries concerning that Nation, and would ſay, Alexander was an happy man, yet ſometimes affirm, That he had gone farther than he, and ſo he wrote to the Senate; although he could not defend what he had got. But he wrote ſo often of ſo many Nations ſubdued by him, that the Fathers not able to reckon them, voted him as many Triumphs as he pleaſed to accept of, ordered a Triumphal Arch to be erected in his Forum, and the Citizens would have gone far to meet him, had he ever returned. His latter end however did not anſwer his beginning; for while he ſpent his time in ſailing to the Ocean, all he had taken fell off again in the greateſt Tumult, each Nation either killing or caſting out the Garriſons he had left to bridle them, while his Journey anſwered not his expectation, for he ſaw and heard nothing beſides heaps, falls and ruins; only he made a parentation to Alexander in the Houſe wherein he died.

He makes a fruitleſs Expedition againſt the Agareni.

11. The News of the general defection being brought to him while ſtill on Shipboard, he ſent Lucius and Maximus againſt the Rebels, of whom Maximus was overthrown in Battel, but Lucius behaving himſelf very gallantly, recovered Niſibis, took Edeſſa, and after he had plundered it, ſet it on fire. Beſides this, Seleucia was taken and burnt by Erycius, Clarus, and Julius Alexander. But fearing that the Parthians would alſo revolt, he reſolved to give them a King, and when he was come to Cteſiphon, calling them and the Romans together in the Field, after he had from an high Tribunal boaſted of his Performances, he ſet a Diadem on the Head of Parthamaſperes. This done, he undertook an Expedition againſt the Agareni in Arabia, who had alſo revolted, poſſeſſing a City neither great nor rich. For, the adjoyning Region, for the moſt part, was Deſart, having no Water, or that unwholſom, and being deſtitute of Wood and Forage, ſo that no great multitude of Men could there long continue, and it was protected by the moſt violent Heats to which it was expoſed. Therefore neither Trajan now, nor afterwards Severus took it, though they caſt down part of the Wall. Trajan ſent his Horſe againſt them, and afterwards he followed in Perſon; but the Horſe received much loſs, and he himſelf narrowly eſcaped, one that rode near to him being ſhot dead; for though he diſguiſed himſelf, yet by the gravity of his Perſon they gueſſed him to be the Emperor. Now did the Heavens ſhake with Thunder, Rainbows were ſeen, Lightning, Tempeſt, Whirlwinds, Hail and Thunderbolts fell upon the Romans, as often as they attacked them, and when they went to Supper, they were exceedingly plagued with Flies, both in their Meat and Drink. Therefore did Trajan diſlodge and get him gone, and not long after fell into his Mortal Diſtemper.

A furious Rebellion of the Jews.

12. In the mean time, while he was thus imployed, the Jews ſuppoſing him intangled in an inextricable War, perſwading themſelves alſo, that by the Earthquake was portended the ruine of the Roman Empire; moreover imagining that from the firſt year of Cyrus, to this preſent, had paſſed but Four hundred and eighty three years, and conſequently that but one of Daniel's Weeks was unfulfilled, entred into a Conſpiracy, and made incredible Slaughter of the Romans, uſing in ſeveral Countreys, ſome ſay ſeveral Captains, whereof yet Barcocab was Chief. The fury of this Rebellion fell upon Ægypt, Cyrene, and Cyprus; and Dio tells us, That about Cyrene one Andreas was their Captain. The manner of their Outrages they committed, both upon Greeks and Romans, was as horrid as the Facts themſelves, though theſe horrid beyond all belief, if they had not been related by moſt credible and impartial Writers. From the head they ſawed them downwards, they caſt them to wild Beaſts, cauſed them to fight and kill one another; they eat their fleſh, beſmeared themſelves with their blood, and wore their skins. In and about Cyrene periſhed by this means Two hundred and twenty thouſand men, and in Ægypt and Cyprus Two hundred and forty thouſand; upon which account, in the time of Dio, it was not lawful for a Jew to come in Cyprus, if he entred there, he was preſently ſlain. Trajan reſolved to proſecute them throughout his Dominions, not as Enemies or Rebels, but as Creatures noxious to Humane Society, and that with revenge ſuitable to their Crimes; and for this purpoſe ſent Marcus Tubero, with a great Power, both by Sea and Land, who neither in a ſhort time, nor without cruel hoſtility finiſhed the War; but he ſlew many Myriads of the Jews. Their carriage in the Weſt made the Emperor ſuſpect their Brethren in Meſopotamia, whereupon he commanded L. Quintius to Baniſh them that Country, and he joyning Battel with them, ſlew alſo a great Number.

13. Dio writes, That Trajan thought of making in perſon another Expedition into Meſopotamia; but his Diſeaſe growing upon him, he took his Journey for Italy, leaving P. Ælius Hadrianus in Syria with an Army. Therefore though Armenia was taken, and a great part of Meſopotamia, and beſides, the Parthians were overcome; yet the Romans thought they had in vain been at ſuch pains, and undergone ſo many Dangers, for that the Parthians deteſting Parthamaſpates were reſolved to be governed according to their own Cuſtoms. As for Trajan, he ſuſpected that his Diſeaſe came by Poiſon; ſome thought it proceeded of Blood, which being wont to iſſue from his Interior Parts every year, had of late ſtopped; and indeed he was ſeized with an Apoplexy, ſo as he loſt his Senſe in ſome part of his Body; but he manifeſtly laboured of a Dropſie. Being brought to Selinus a City of Cilicia, called Trajanople in Dio's time, he ſoon died, after he had Reigned Nineteen years, ſix months, and fifteen days. He extended the Empire farther than any of his Predeceſſors, ſo that now it reached from the Iriſh Ocean further than the River Tigris; from the Atlantick Sea to the Perſian Gulf; from Mount Atlas to the Caledonian Foreſt; as alſo as far as the River Albis, and beyond Danubius. His Moderation was exceeding great, he ſo uſing his Subjects as he himſelf, he ſaid, would deſire his Prince ſhould uſe him, were he a private Perſon. Though he was not learned, he much favoured Humane and Secular Learning, converſing very often and familiarly with the Profeſſors thereof, whom he alſo preferred to Publick Offices. But Humane and Secular Learning he only favoured; for he raiſed the third Perſecution againſt the Heavenly Doctrine and Church of Chriſt, which drew down its thought, the heavy Judgments we have mentioned, upon the Empire during his Government.

Trajan perſecuteth the Church.

14. Being puffed up with the Victory he had obtained over the Daci and Thracians (after the ending of the ſecond Dacian War, in the ninth year of his Reign, Decebalus having killed himſelf) as he was marching againſt Oſroes or Choſdroes the Parthian King, and the Armenians, having commanded all that would not worſhip his falſe gods to be put to death, Ignatius the Scholar of St. John the Apoſtle, and Biſhop now of Antioch, was brought before him, whilſt he lay (in his paſſage) in this City.

His diſcourſe with Ignatius Biſhop of Antioch.

City. Ignatius ſtanding in his preſence, he ſaid, who art thou Devil (Cacodæmon) who makeſt haſte to tranſgreſs our Commands, and perſwadeſt others to deſtroy themſelves? Ignatius anſwered, No body calleth Theophorus a Cacodæmon, for Devils flie from the Servants of God. But I know thou ſo calleſt me becauſe I moleſt them. For I confeſs I have Chriſt the heavenly King; and diſſolve their councils. Trajan demanded, who is Theophorus? Ignatius replied, He who hath Chriſt in his breaſt. Trajan ſaid, Doſt not thou think we have the Gods in our breaſt which aſſiſt us againſt our Enemies? Ignatius anſwered, In that thou eſteemeſt the Devils of the Gentiles to be gods, thou erreſt. For there is one God, who made Heaven, and Earth, and Sea, with all that are in them; and he hath one only begotten Son Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe friendſhip I have obtained. Trajan then ſaid, Thou ſpeakeſt of him that was crucified by Pontius Pilate. Ignatius replied, Of him who crucified ſin and the inventor of it; and who approveth not of him that ſerveth Idols, but who in his heart wiſely underſtandeth this. Trajan added, Doſt thou then carry Chriſt in thy ſelf? Ignatius ſaid, Yea, for it is written, I will dwell and walk in them. Trajan concluded thus, I award that Ignatius, who ſaith, he beareth in himſelf the Crucified, be conveyed in bonds by Soldiers to the great City Rome, there to be devoured of beaſts for a ſhow to the People. This was accordingly executed upon the moſt holy Martyr, on the Twentieth of December, as it is recorded in his Acta, or the Memorials of him, collected by Philo, Gaius, and Agathopes, who followed him from Syria to Rome; concerning which, as alſo the Epiſtles which go under his name, the Diſſertations of the moſt Reverend and Learned Arch-Biſhop of Armagh are to be conſulted.

Whom he cauſeth to be caſt to wild Beaſts at Rome.

Conſule Uſſerium in notis ad Epiſt. Ignatii ad Philadelphenos.

15. Ignatius being vexed by a tedious journey, that his conſtancy might be ſhaken, when he came to Troas (or new Troy, built not far from the place where that of Priamus ſtood) underſtood that Peace was reſtored to his Church of Antioch. This came to paſs whilſt Trajan ſtill continued there, conſulting about the Parthian War, as appeareth from Malela the Hiſtorian of that City. For Tiberianus the Preſident of the chief Nation of Paleſtine, moved the Emperor to moderation by this Letter: I am wearied with puniſhing and putting to death the Galilæans (who come before us under the name of Chriſtians) according to your Commands, yet they ceaſe not to reveal themſelves for the ſlaughter. And although I have laboured both by exhortation and threatnings, that they might not dare to make known themſelves to me as profeſſors of that doctrine; yet being proſecuted, they do not ceaſe. I deſire therefore that what your pleaſure is in this kind, your Majeſty would pleaſe to certifie me. * Suidas mentioning alſo this meſſage of Tiberianus unto Trajan, addeth, that the Emperor forbad all his Subjects to puniſh the Chriſtians. Yet that this indulgence was not ſo univerſal, but that it moſt eſpecially concerned Palæſtine, Syria, and other parts of the Eaſt, where the Emperor then reſided, appeareth from Ignatius his deprecation, that the Perſecution might ceaſe, when he was even to be brought into the Amphitheatre; as the Acta or Memorials concerning him relate. But beſides this Letter of Tiberianus, there is extant another of Pliny the younger, who was moved to write to the Emperor upon the ſame occaſion, and for the ſame end.

Tiberianus his Letter to Trajan.

Mitigateth the Perſecution.

* In voce Τραϊανὸς.

As alſo the Letter of Pliny Junior.

Plin. Epiſt. 97. l. 10.

16. For being Proprætor of Bithynia, the variety of caſes in thoſe that were accuſed, troubled him; although, to comply with the iniquity of the times, he declareth, that ſuch as ſtood out his threatnings thrice, he commanded to be led to puniſhment. He ſignifieth, that out of ſuch as had formerly been Chriſtians, but now worſhipped the Images of the Emperor, and the gods, and blaſphemed Chriſt, he could not get any confeſſion of any other fault or error, than that they were wont on a day appointed, before it was light, to meet together, and ſing an hymn to Chriſt; and bound themſelves by a Sacramentum or religious Oath, not for any wickedneſs, but that they ſhould not commit robbery, theft, or adultery, that they ſhould not break promiſe, nor cheat. Which being done, they were wont to depart, and meet again to eat, promiſcuouſly but innocently. To get out the truth he tortured two women ſervants, but could not find any thing juſtly chargeable, though through his Ethnick pravity and deſire to pleaſe the Emperor, he termeth the faith Superſtitio prava & immodica, or a naughty and immoderate ſuperſtition. He addeth, that it ſeemed to him a thing worthy of ſerious conſideration; eſpecially for the number of thoſe that were in danger: for many, ſaith he, of every age and order, and of both Sexes, are brought, and will be brought into danger. For not only hath the contagion of this ſuperſtition gone through Cities; but alſo Villages, and Fields, which, as it ſeemeth, might be ſtopped and corrected. To be ſure, it's clear enough, that the Temples which were almoſt deſolate, begin to be frequented, and the ſacrifices of long time intermitted to be reſtored, beaſts for that Uſe now going off, which till now ſcarcely any would buy. Whereby it is eaſie to gueſs, what a multitude of men might be reclaimed, if there were but place for repentance. Thus Pliny, to whom Trajan anſwereth (that we may only repeat the Summe) that Chriſtians are not to be ſought for, but if accuſed and convicted, except they recant, to be puniſhed; concerning the abſurdity and injuſtice of which Sentence, Tertullian excellently argueth in his * Apology, moſt worthy to be read of all Chriſtians.

* Chap. 2.

The death of St. John the Apoſtle.

17. In the Reign of Trajan died St. John the Apoſtle, the time and manner of his death being uncertain, though all agree as to the place, which was Epheſus. (a) Jerome referreth his death to the ſixty eighth year after the Paſſion of Chriſt, which fell in with the third of Trajan, and the twenty ſeventh of December, on the firſt Feria. (b) Others place it in the ſeventy firſt after Chriſt's Paſſion, and the ſixth of Trajan. Dorothæus Biſhop of Tyre (in his Tract written concerning the lives, ends, and Martyrdoms of the Prophets, Apoſtles, and ſeventy Diſciples) writeth, that being a hundred and twenty years old, yet living (the Lord would ſo have it) he buried himſelf. (c) Jerome alleged out of Tertullian, that in the time of Nero (though others ſay in the Reign of Domitian) he was thrown at Rome into a tun of hot boyling oil, yet thereby took no harm, but came out after this trial purer than he went in. (d) Auguſtine calleth him a Martyr by will: Polycrates Biſhop of Epheſus (as (e) Euſebius allegeth) ſticketh not to call him a Prieſt, a Martyr, and a Doctor. But that which (f) Auguſtine writeth of his end, is ſtrangeſt of all (and let the credit thereof reſt in the choice of the Reader,) how John cauſed at Epheſus his grave to be made, and in preſence of divers went in alive, and being no ſooner in, and to their ſeeming dead, they covered him. Which kind of reſt, ſaith he, is rather to be termed a ſleep than death, for that the earth of the grave bubleth or boyleth up after the manner of a Well, by reaſon of John's reſting in it, and breathing: a ſign of his ſlumbring therein. Though he died at Epheſus, yet was not the ſucceeding Biſhop, much leſs any other, Heir of that Authority, which for ſo many years he had obtained in the Church, as having many outlived the reſt of the Apoſtles. For to the Apoſtles ſucceeded not Apoſtles nor univerſal Meſſengers of Chriſt, of which ſort John was for many years, and he alone; but Biſhops, every one circumſcribed within his own Limits. In the days of Trajan, and this third Perſecution was Crucified (g) Simeon Cleophas Biſhop of Jeruſalem, being an hundred and twenty years old. Juſtus a Jew ſucceeded him, after whom ſome place Zachæus, Tobias, Benjamin, and John in the nineteenth and laſt of Trajan. In the eleventh of his Reign was Euariſtus Biſhop of Rome Crowned with Martyrdom, on the ſixth of the Calends of November, and Alexander ſucceeded him, who alſo being Martyred in the nineteenth year, on the fifth before the Nones of May, (h) Xiſtus had his ſeat according to Damaſus. And we muſt not forget that Heros ſucceeded Ignatius in the Sea of Antioch.

(a) In Jovinian. l. 1.
(b) Arabica Kirſtenii apud Jacob. Cappellum ad A. D. 103.
(c) ut ſuprà, & in Mat. c. 20.
(d) In John. tract. 124.
(e) Lib. 3. c. 31.
(f) ubi ſuprà.
(g) Euſeb. l. 3. cap. 32.
(h) Euſeb. l. 3. cap. 35.

18. Trajan, that we may conclude his Story, was eſteemed a Prince of unuſul Civility and Fortitude, and Aurelius Victor tells us ſome reaſon, becauſe the Eſtate of the Roman Empire had been ſo afflicted and waſted by many and cruel Tyrants, that he was believed ſent by heaven, by deſignment to amend and repair it. He pleaſed the more becauſe he took order for ſupply of Rome with Proviſions, inſtituting a Company of Bakers; and it was thought a great Advantage to the State, that for ſpeedy Intelligence, he more vigorouſly managed the Curſus Publicus. Pliny Junior, who flouriſhed in his time, upon his being promoted to be Conſul, made a large Panegyrick in the Senate ſtill extant, wherein as he extols him for many things, ſo in an eſpecial manner for removing grievances, and heavy Impoſitions, particularly that of the Viceſima, or twentieth part of Eſtates, firſt required by Auguſtus, which his Succeſſor again rigorouſly exacted. That Inclination he had to Wine, of which alſo Nerva is ſaid to have been guilty, it's ſaid he moderated by Prudence, giving order, that after a full meal, no more ſhould be brought in, though called for. All the reſpect and love he had from the People, was cemented by his familiar converſe. For he would make viſits to his Friends, ſee them when Sick, eat at their Houſes, and often ride in their Chariots. He was liberal, and ſtudied to inrich thoſe with whom he had but ſmall acquaintance. In his time was but one Senator Condemned, and he by the Senate without his knowledge. Hereby he procured ſuch fame even after his death, that in the Acclamations of the Senate, the Fathers would wiſh that the ſucceeding Princes might be happier than Auguſtus, and better than Trajan. Eutropius writes, that he died of a Flux at Seleucia, a City of Iſauria in his return from Perſia, in the ſixty ſecond year of his Age. He alone, he adds, was buried in the City. His Aſhes in a golden Urn were put in his own Forum, under his Column, which was an Hundred and forty four foot high. In his time flouriſhed, beſides Pliny Junior, Plutarch, Lucian, Suetonius, L. Florus, Cornelius Tacitus, and others. His Death fell in the fifth of the Two hundred twenty fourth Olympiad, the Eight hundred and ſeventieth of the City A. D. CXVII. Quintus Niger, and T. Vipſanius Apronianus, being Conſuls.

The Death of Trajan.

Hadrian Succeeds.

19. It was commonly believed, that the Deſign of Trajan was to leave Neratius Priſcus his Succeſſor; and his Friends were ſo much inclining to it, that one time he told him, He commended the Provinces to him, in caſe that any thing fatal ſhould happen; many ſaid, that he thought good to imitate the Example of Alexander the Macedonian, and dye without a certain Succeſſor; and that he intended to ſend an Oration to the Senate, wherein he would deſire, that if any thing happened to him otherwiſe than well; they would give a Prince to the Commonwealth, yet ſo, as he therewith added ſeveral Names, out of which they ſhould make choice. But the Succeſſion fell upon Hadrian his Kinſman, who was born at Rome, in the year that Veſpaſian the Seventh, and Titus the Fifth time were Conſuls, but had his Original alſo from Italica. It was given out that Trajan adopted him before his Death, and ſome name the day whereon he ſhould receive Letters which certified him of ſuch Adoption. But moſt agree that for it he was obliged to Plotina the Empreſs, and Eutropius writes, That Trajan refuſed to adopt him, though the Son of her that was his Couſin German by the Mothers ſide, whereas others ſay, That his Father Ælius Adrianus, Sirnamed Aſer, was his Couſin German, and ſo related. Dio writes, That he was joyned to Trajan in Affinity, as well as Conſanguinity, having Married his Brother's (ſome ſay his Siſter's) Daughter, and lived with him continually. He advanced him to ſeveral Offices in the State, and ſeveral Military Commands in the Wars, which he himſelf managed in perſon. Being ſent his Prætorian Legate into the lower Pannonia, he reſtrained the Sarmatæ, ſupported Military Diſcipline, bridled the Extravagancy of Procurators, and for this obtained the Dignity of Conſul. He was ſupported by Sura the Emperor's Favourite, and Plotina the Empreſs, who procured him, after Sura's Death, his ſecond Conſulſhip, and to be deſigned Legatus in the Parthian Expedition.

Quits all beyond Euphrates and Tigris.

Is Popular.

20. When her Husband was dead, with the aſſiſtance of Attianus his Countryman, ſhe procured him to be Emperor, being in love with him, and incouraged, by reaſon he was not far off, and had great Forces. Dio tells us, He had it from Apronianus his Father, who governed Cilicia, who told him all the particulars, and that eſpecially how Trajan's Death was concealed for ſome days, that the Adoption might proceed, which was diſcovered by her Subſcribing the Letters ſent in his Name to the Senate, which had never been practiſed before. Spartianus writes, That ſome reported how by Plotina's means he was adopted after the Death of Trajan, one being ſuborned to counterfeit his weak voice. After his having obtained the Empire at Antioch, he ſet himſelf to govern it in a peaceable manner. Therefore the Barbarians rebelling, whom Trajan had ſubdued, and ſtirs happening in ſeveral other Provinces, he reſolved to quit all beyond Euphrates and Tigris, following therein the Example of Cato, as he ſaid, who declared the Macedonians to be free, becauſe they could not be held in ſubjection. At firſt he ſtudied to ſhew himſelf addicted to Clemency. He begged pardon of the Senate, that he had not made them Judges concerning his Succeſſion, and excuſed it by the ſuddenneſs of his being ſaluted by the Soldiers, becauſe the Commonwealth could not be without an Emperor. The Senate having decreed a Triumph to him, which was due to Trajan, he refuſed it, and cauſed Trajan's Image to be drawn in a Triumphal Chariot. The Title of Pater Patriæ being given him, both at firſt and afterwards he refuſed, ſaying, That it was late before Auguſtus deſerved it. The Aurum Coronarium he remitted to Italy, and leſſened it in the Provinces, yet ſetting forth the difficulties at large under which the Treaſury laboured. A Conſpiracy was hatched againſt him by Negrinus whom he had deſigned for his Succeſſor, but being diſcovered he was put to Death, and ſo were his Complices, Palma, Celſus, and Lucius, by command of the Senate, but againſt his will, as he wrote in his own life. But he was ill ſpoken of for putting to Death theſe four Perſons of Conſular Dignity; and to cauſe it to be forgotten, he came to Rome, where he gave a double Congiary to the People, and in the Senate he ſwore, having excuſed what was done, that he would never puniſh a Senator but by the Sentence of the Fathers themſelves.

21. That the Magiſtrates might not be charged with the Curſus Publicus, he laid the burthen upon the Treaſury, as ſoon as he came to the Government. To obtain a good name, he remitted to private Debtors dwelling in Rome and Italy, an infinite Sum of Money, and vaſt Arrears to others in the Provinces, cauſing the Bonds whereby they ſtood engaged, to be burned in the Forum of Trajan. The Eſtates of condemned Perſons he forbad to be brought into his private Fiſcus, but to be accounted for in the publick Ærarium. He increaſed the liberality of Trajan, to Boys and Girls that wanted maintenance. To Senators who were decayed, not by their own faults, according to their charge of Children, and their quality he gave allowances for life. Moſt of the Senators he admitted to familiarity. The Circenſian Games decreed to him, he refuſed, but only on his Birth-day, and ſaid often both in the Aſſembly of the People, and in the Senate, that he would ſo govern as the Intereſt in the State being that of the People, and not his. When he had entred his third Conſulſhip, he made many Conſuls the third time; but a vaſt number he honoured with the ſecond; and his third Conſulſhip he held only four months, during which time he often ſate in Judgment; when the Senate was legally aſſembled, either in the City or without, he was always preſent, and promoted the honour of it all he could, eſpecially taking care, that the Dignity ſhould not be cheap, for he difficultly admitted any into it. Yet would he venture to make himſelf rather cheap in viſiting ſick Perſons twice or thrice a day, though but Equites, or even Libertini; he would comfort, relieve, and adviſe men of ſuch quality, and take them to his Table, doing all things like a private man. Travelling into Gall, he was as liberal to all that had need of his liberality.

22. Thence he paſſed into Germany, and there, though he was more deſirous of Peace than War, ſo exerciſed his Soldiers, as if ſome War and Expedition had been at hand. He taught them to bear and endure hardſhip, and that by his own Example; for living himſelf like a Soldier amongſt the Manipulares, he publickly fed upon Military Fare, which was Lard, Cheeſe, and that they called Poſca, or Water & Vinegar, as did Scipio Æmilianus, Metellus, & Trajan. On ſome he beſtowed Rewards, on others Honours, to make them more willingly undergo what he ſeverely impoſed. Indeed Spartianus tells us, He reſtored the Diſcipline of the Camp, which had decayed by the careleſsneſs of other Princes, ordaining Offices and Allowances. That this is true, in part we have ſome reaſon to believe from what other Hiſtorians alſo write of Trajan; Vegetius mentions Hadrian's Conſtitutions about Military Affairs; Dion Caſſius tells us, That his Rules and Orders were to his time obſerved for Laws; and Caſaubon mentions a Coin, on the Reverſe of which Diſcipline was ingraved. He was alſo ſo extraordinarily Skilled in the Art Military, that he wrote a Book of Tacticks, which lying long obſcure, at length ſaw the light in the days of Aanſtaſius, by means of Urbicius, who to his Obſervations, and the Experiences of the ancient Captains, added others of his own time, as Salmaſius hath obſerved. But what Spartianus writes of his reſtoring, we muſt not believe; as if he alone reſtored the Diſcipline which had been decaying from the time of Auguſtus; for, Galba was careful this way, though he had ſmall time to make reformation, it being a common word amongſt the Soldiers, That They muſt mind their Duty, for it was Galba, not Getulicus. Veſpaſian alſo was a good Soldier, and no doubt careful this way. To be ſure ſo was Trajan, who alſo, as appears from Vegetius, publiſhed many Conſtitutions upon this Subject.

Hadrian* wrote a Book of Tacticks.

Diſcemiles militare, Galba eſt non Getulicus.

23. But Spartianus, the better to make good his Aſſertion, proceedeth and telleth us, That he never ſuffered any Soldier, without warrantable Cauſe, to be abſent from his Colours; when this happened, uſually the Tribunes were in fault, by giving leave upon frivolous pretences; but, Tribunes in his days were commended for their worth, and not by the favour of the Soldiers, or their commendation to the General, as had been practiſed toward the end of the Commonwealth, when they were not choſen by the People in the Comitia. To excite them to Travel, he himſelf would march on foot, armed as he was, twenty miles; for it was the uſual and ordinary Cuſtom, for the Soldiers to Travel five hours every day, in which ſpace they got twenty or four and twenty miles; twenty miles in the Law being eſteemed a Journey, and called Militaris gradus; as twenty four, gradus plenus. He cauſed to be pulled down all arched Gave his Soldiers good Examples.

He further reforms them.

Rooms, Galleries, and ſuch Coverings as the Soldiers made o're their Tents, for keeping off the heat of the Sun; The Army in Summer was Exerciſed in the Field; in Winter, if it rained or ſnew, under Coverings, and then only; and for this purpoſe they made Porticus's or Galleries, but theſe were more for Neceſſity; ſuch as Hadrian pulled down were rather the green Porticus's made againſt Heat, and for pleaſure, by them when Idle and Extravagant. Frequently he went meanly clad, which is to be underſtood when he was in the Camp; for that he uſed Gold in his Ornaments, and firſt of all Princes in that ſort called Mantilia, ſome Authors wrote, The Belt he wore was without Gold; whereas it was the cuſtom for the Roman Captains to have them ſparkling both with Gold and Gems. The Hilt of his Sword was ſcarcely of Ivory, though this was deſpiſed in thoſe days. Soldiers that were Sick, he viſited at their Lodgings. He himſelf would chuſe the ground where the Camp ſhould be, though this was the Duty of the Metatores. He choſe no Centurions but thoſe that were Robuſt, and of good Repute; neither made he a Tribune that had not a Beard, or was not of ſuch an Age as his Prudence and years might be equal to the Charge. Nothing did he permit the Tribune to receive from the Soldier, though there was an ill Cuſtom, for the Officers to ſell leave to the Soldiers of being abſent from their Colours, and to convert their Pay and Allowances to their own Uſe. All delicacies he removed, and reformed what was amiſs in their Arms and Furniture.

He comes into Britain.

Goes into Gall.

Into Spain.

24. He made inquiry into the Age of the Ordinary Soldiers, ſuffering none to ſerve who was of leſs than Valour required, nor of greater than Humanity would ſuffer, or the Ancient Cuſtom; and he made it his buſineſs to know them both as to their Perſons and their Number. He was alſo diligent to underſtand what Military Proviſions for Horſe and Man were laid up in the limitaneous Cities; he curiouſly inquired into the Revenues of the Provinces, that if any thing was wanting, he might ſupply it. No man ever took ſuch care not to buy or feed any idle thing. His Soldiers being thus brought to imitate their Emperor, he came into Britain, and here correcting many things out of order, he firſt of all others raiſed a Wall eighty miles long, to divide the Barbarians from the Romans. Septicius Clarus the Præfectus Prætorio, and Suetonius Tranquillus his Epiſtolarum Magiſter, he removed from their Places, for being more familiar with his Wife Sabina, than he commanded, or the reverence due to his Court required; and he ſaid, That had he been a private man he would have put away his Wife, as moroſe and froward. And he was not only curious as to matters of his own Houſe, but in ſuch as related to his Friends; ſo as by the Frumentarii he diſcovered all things; neither did they underſtand that the Emperor knew how they governed themſelves before he let them know how they did it. Having ſetled his Affairs in Britain, he returned into Gall, being troubled to hear of the Sedition at Alexandria, which was raiſed by occaſion of their God Apis, who having been found after many years, the People fell into a Tumult about the placing of him: At Nemauſus he raiſed a Baſilica of admirable work, in honour of Plotina. After this he went into Spain, and wintered at Tarraco (now Arragon) where at his own Expence he re-edified the Temple of Auguſtus; for the Inhabitants of that place raiſed Temples to him amongſt the reſt. He called a meeting of the Spaniards at this place, at which they of Italian Extraction endeavouring in jeſting wiſe to draw their Necks from Burthens, and the reſt in good earneſt, he ordered his matters very prudently.

His Travels.

25. In thoſe days in many places where the Barbarians were divided from the Romans, not by Rivers, but Limits made by Art, he raiſed a ſort of Rampart with pieces of Timber in the manner of an Hedge or Wall. Over the Germans he ſet a King; he appeaſed the motions of the Mauri, and had Supplications decreed him by the Senate; Afterward he compoſed the War of the Parthians by a Conference. He travelled out of Spain into Africk, and ſo into Ægypt and Syria, with the reſt of Aſia. Coming into Achaia, he was at Athens initiated in their Myſteries called Eleuſinia; after the Example of Hercules and Philip; many favours he beſtowed upon the Inhabitants, and having been formerly their Archon he preſided at their Solemnities, as Agonotheta; and in Achaia it was obſerved, that it being at their Sacred Solemnities, the Cuſtom for thoſe that were preſent to have Knives about them for fear of Treachery, none that were ſo armed entred with Hadrian. After this he went into Sicily, and there up to the Hill Ætna, to ſee the Sun riſe in form of a Bow. Thence he came to Rome, and from Rome paſſed again into Africk, where he conferred many benefits on the Provinces, as the Coins ſtill bear witneſs, in ſome of which he is ſtyled the Reſtorer of Africk. Spartianus adds to theſe his Narrations, that ſcarcely any other Prince travelled with ſuch ſpeed through ſo many Countries. As to this, Caſaubon obſerves, that he was accounted another Hercules, for his travelling ſo aſſiduouſly through the Roman world, and doing good in his paſſage. For Victor tells us, That he had his Troops of Smiths, Architects, and other Artificers, not unlike the Military Legions diſtinguiſhed into Cohorts, for making or beautifying of Walls. Caſaubon ſaw a Coin in the poſſeſſion of Thuanus, whereon he was both called Roman Hercules, and accoutred like to that Hero. In others he found him ſtyled Soter, or Saviour, becauſe going about the Provinces, he ſeverely puniſhed Governors thereof, whom he found faulty, who were often more cruel than any Monſters. But whereas Spartian adds ſcarcely, this Learned man thinks he doth it, becauſe of Julius Cæſar, who like Lightning ran through the Provinces, and illuſtrated moſt of them by his Victories. Next to him was Auguſtus, who yet as Suetonius confeſſeth, came not in Africk nor Sardinia, though in all the other Provinces. All the other Princes, Trajan excepted, were in a manner Homelings. But as for Hadrian, Dion Caſſius in this reſpect prefers him before all the other Emperors without exception.

26. Having returned from Africk to Rome, he went again into the Eaſt, and took Athens in his way, where he perfected the works he had formerly begun, and dedicated the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, and an Altar to himſelf; and in the ſame manner paſſing through Aſia, he Conſecrated Temples of his own Name. Then did he receive from the Cappadocians, Slaves, for the Service of the Camp. Of old when the Roman Diſcipline was vigorous, the Soldiers were not permitted to have any Slaves to follow them, and when the Cuſtom was come up, yet ſuch Captains as were ſevere, would cauſe them to be diſmiſſed. But afterward it grew to that height, that every ordinary or Common Soldier would have his Slave. Theſe Slaves the Ancients called Calones, and the later Romans Galearii from carrying their Helmets, who were wont to dig alſo, to make Trenches, and labour at ſuch works as the Soldier himſelf formerly wrought. Now out of Cappadocia did Hadrian furniſh himſelf, for out of that Country the greateſt part of Slaves proceeded, that People being noted by the Greeks to be of a ſervile Diſpoſition, and ſo much alſo by the Romans, that Cappadox and Mancipium with them, ſignified the ſame. But to purſue our Story, Toparchs and Kings he invited into Friendſhip, and particularly, Coſdroes the Parthian, to whom he reſtored his Daughter taken by Trajan, and promiſed the golden Chair, which had alſo been taken; but performed not his word. Some Kings came to his preſence, whom he treated in ſuch ſort, that it repented the reſt that they did not come: In his Progreſs through the Provinces, he ſo ſeverely puniſhed the offending Officers and Governors, that he himſelf was believed to procure their Accuſers. The Antiochians he ſo much hated (for their lightneſs and prating it's moſt probable) that he determined to ſeparate Syria from Phœnicia, that Antioch might not be called the Metropolis of ſo many Cities. At this time the Jews raiſed a War, becauſe they were forbidden to Circumciſe themſelves. He aſcended the Mountain Caſius, where it is reported, the Sun might be ſeen to riſe at the fourth watch of the Night, to behold this ſight: Now there were two Mountains of this Name; one at Peluſium, at the entrance into Ægypt, and the other hanging over the City of Antioch, where we may perceive Hadrian was about this time. But next to this, Spartian ſubjoyns, that having paſſed Arabia, he came to Peluſium, and built more Magnificently the Monument of Pompey, which Monument was in the other Mountain Caſius adjoyning to Peluſium. As he ſailed through the Nile, he loſt Antinous, a beautiful Youth he had. Some believed that he devoted himſelf for Hadrian, it being a Cuſtom of old to kill one's Self, to prolong the life of a Friend, as they believed they thereby did, one live thing being given for another. Others thought he was killed by him, that by his Entrails he might diſcover future things, as there was alſo a Cuſtom amongſt the Pagans. However here he died, as Spartianus ſaith, devoted to him, the one way or the other; and he loved him exreamly; in ſuch a way it's thought by ſome, as is not to be named, for he was very beautiful, as his Image expreſſed in a Medal doth ſhew, which Caſaubon ſaw amongſt the Rarities of Thuanus, the Preſident. And the Greeks, to flatter Hadrian, Conſecrated him for a god. Having the Town named after him, where he was Buried, he had there, and in many places of Greece Temples and Prieſts, and they ſaid he gave out Oracles, as ſuch as flattered Alexander, ſaid of Hæpheſtion; ſtion, whom he made a god in the ſame manner. Spartian adds, That Hadrian himſelf was reported to compoſe the Oracles of Antinous.

He hated the Antiochians.

Antinous.

Hadrian's various Humour.

27. For he was moſt ſtudious of Poeſy, and indeed of all ſorts of Learning; moſt Skilful in Arithmetick, Geometry, and Painting; to which ſome add, the Art of Medicine. He pretended alſo to have Skill in Singing, being too much given to his Pleaſure in this kind, for concerning ſuch as he loved, he Compoſed many amorous Verſes. As of Arms, and the Art Military he was moſt knowing, he could manage the Weapons of the Gladiators. He was ſevere and merry, fair-ſpoken and grave, wanton and yet ſlow; cloſe-handed, and counterfeiting liberality; cruel and yet merciful, and in all things ever various. He inriched his Friends, and even ſuch as asked nothing, denying nothing to thoſe that did; yet would he hear readily whatſoever was whiſpered againſt them, and there was ſcarcely any either of thoſe to whom he bore the greateſt Friendſhip, or favoured with the greateſt Honours, whom he did not afterwards treat as Enemies. Amongſt others, he compelled Severianus, his Siſters Husband, and one of Ninety years of Age, to die, that he might not over-live him. His Freed-men and ſome Soldiers he proſecuted. Being very ready in Compoſing both Proſe and Verſe, and moſt Skilful in all Sciences, yet, as more Learned, he derided all Profeſſors of Arts, contemned and oppreſſed them. With theſe Profeſſors and Philoſophers, he often would contend by Writing Books or Verſes. Favorinus a famous Learned Man of this Age, having made Uſe of a word which Hadrian reprehended, would not contend but yielded, and being reprehended by his Friends for ſo doing, the word being uſed by good Authors, he made them laugh, by telling them, that They did not well in that they would not ſuffer him to believe him learneder than all others, who had at his Command thirty Legions. He was ſo deſirous of fame, that he delivered Books of his own Life written by himſelf to thoſe of his Freed-men that were Scholars, commanding them to Publiſh them in their own Names. For the Books of Phlegon were ſaid to be of Hadrian's making. He wrote moſt obſcure Books in imitation of Antimachus. He loved the ancient way of ſpeaking. He declaimed Controverſies. He preferred Cato before Cicero, Ennius before Virgil, Cœlius before Salluſt; and in the ſame boaſting manner he judged concerning Homer and Plato.

Amongſt other Sciences, he was skilful in Aſtrology.

28. He ſeemed ſo much to be Skilled in Aſtrology, (by our Hiſtorian called Matheſis) that on the firſt of January at Night, he would write down what would happen to him the whole year; and that year he died, he wrote what he ſhould do to the hour of his Death. But to ſhew more of the ſtrange contrariety of his humour, our Author telleth us, That he was inclined much to reprehend Muſitians, Tragædians, Comœdians, Grammarians, Rhetoricians and Orators; yet he both honoured and inriched all Profeſſors, though he ever vexed them with Queſtions. And notwithſtanding he himſelf was the cauſe that many went Melancholick from him, yet he would ſay, he could not endure to ſee any one ſad. He was very familiar with Epictetus and Heliodorus the Philoſophers, beſides other learned Men of all Profeſſions, but was reported moſt to prize Favorinus, concerning whom we read ſo much in A. Gellius. Such Teachers as ſeemed unable for their Profeſſions, he diſmiſſed both with Wealth and Honour. Them with whom he had been at Enmity whilſt a private Man, being Emperor he ſo far neglected, that to a Capital Enemy when made Auguſtus, he ſaid, Thou haſt eſcaped. Such as he himſelf called to the War, he furniſhed with Horſes, Mules, Clothes, Money, and all Conveniences. He often waſhed publickly, and withal, being a moſt boaſting Lover of the common People. He was ſo great a Lover of Travel, that he had a deſire to ſee all he had read of the ſeveral Places in the World. Cold and Tempeſtuous weather he ſo patiently endured, that he never covered his Head. To many Kings he was very kind, of moſt he bought Peace, and by ſome was deſpiſed: to many he gave great Gifts, but greater to none than him of the Hiberi, to whom he gave an Elephant, and a Cohort of Five hundred men, after many other things. He alſo having received from Pharaſmenes great Preſents, and amongſt them Chlamydes or Soldiers Coats made with Gold, he cauſed Three hundred Malefactors to be put to fight in the Theatre iſed with ſuch Coats, on purpoſe to deride his Preſents.

Aſſiſtants.

29. When he ſate in Judgment, he had in his Council not only his Friends and Companions (Comites) but Lawyers alſo, and eſpecially Julius Celſus, Salvius Julianus, Neratius Priſcus, and others, but ſuch as all the Senate approved. Amongſt other things, he ordained that in no City ſhould any Houſes be demo-liſhed for conveying their Materials to another City. By this paſſage of Spartian, it ſhould ſeem that he made ſome Edict about this matter, but in our Books of Law, no ſuch Conſtitution of his we meet with, and therefore ſeveral Learned men are of opinion, That theſe words of the Hiſtorian relate to a Senatuſconſultum, made in the fifth year of his Reign, and the Conſulſhip of Aviola and Panſa. By this the Fathers ordained, that it ſhould not be lawful to remove ſuch things as joyned to Buildings, in way of Trade; to buy, ſell, or leave them in Legacy, nor to ſell or bequeath an Houſe to be demoliſhed; which thing was alſo forbidden in the days of Veſpaſian. Now this Spartian may mean, though his words do not expreſs the intent or purport of the Senatuſconſultum, a thing uſual in thoſe Writers of the Hiſtoria Auguſta, when they talk of Law Matters. He tells us farther, that to the Children of Condemned Perſons, he granted the twelfth part of their Eſtates. Of the ancient Cornelian Law concerning Proſcription one branch took away all Acceſs to Honours from the Children of proſcribed Perſons; by virtue of the other the Goods of the Father were to be ſold. The firſt branch was taken away by Julius Cæſar, and ſucceeding Princes, and the latter was mitigated by this Law of Hadrian, who yet was not ſo merciful herein as Marcus, who reigned after him. Crimes of Treaſon he admitted not. He refuſed to be Heir to unknown Perſons, neither received he the Inheritances of ſuch as were known to him, if they had Sons. Concerning Treaſure, he ordained that if one found it in his own Ground he ſhould enjoy it, if in that of another man, he ſhould give half to the owner; and if in publick Ground he ſhould divide it with the publick Treaſury. He forbad that Slaves ſhould be killed by their Lords, and Commanded that they ſhould be Condemned by the Judges, if they deſerved it. To a Brothel Houſe-keeper, and a Maſter of Defence, he forbad an He or She Slave to be ſold without a Judge, and the pleaſure of the Owner.

His Laws.

Vide Caſaubon. int. l.

30. Such as had waſted their Eſtates, if they were Men, and at Age when they did it, he Commanded to be diſgraced in the Amphitheatre, and diſmiſſed. But what diſgrace this was is difficult to be underſtood, the word that Spartian uſeth, being variouſly interpreted. Caſaubon will have it ſignifie, that ſuch were led through the Theatre, there to be ſcoffed at, and derided as Criminal Perſons uſually were, both word and Cuſtom being taken from the Greeks. But Salmaſius contends that the word imports a beating betwixt the Neck and Shoulders; a Puniſhment uſual for Malefactors. And a great Malefactor doubtleſs is he, who by waſting his Eſtate, Robs his Wife and Children of what was left them, as well as him, by their Anceſtors. But this puniſhment was to give Example to others, and prevent the like Crime in lookers on, of which there muſt have been Multitudes in the Amphitheatre. More mild and effectual was the other courſe the Roman Law took againſt the Extravagancy of a Spendthrift, by virtue of which the Prætor forbad him the Uſe and Government of his own Eſtate, and aſſigned him a Guardian no otherwiſe than as to a Mad-man. But Spartian in reference to the Laws made by Hadrian, farther tells us, That he took away the Ergaſtula of Slaves and Liberti, or thoſe that once had been ſuch. So now we read it; but in ſtead of Freed-men, Salmaſius will have Freemen to be read. Ergaſtula were places where Slaves or other Perſons were kept in Bonds, and ſet to hard labour for ſome Offence committed. Of theſe ſome were publick, as the Mines, and ſome belonged to private men, unto which, in the Days of Auguſtus, ſome free and ingenuous Perſons were by violence and ſtealth caſt; and in the time of Tiberius, others to ſhun being called to Arms, put themſelves; and therefore both theſe Emperors took care for the ſearching and purging of them. Now Hadrian commanded them to be taken away, whether furniſhed with Slaves or Freemen. Freedmen, indeed, were for their Ingratitude to their Patrons, reduced into the ſtate of Slavery, and afterward might be condemned to the Ergaſtula, but then it was as Slaves, and as he well obſerves, not as Liberti or Freedmen. Spartian adds, that Hadrian ſeparated the Baths according to the Sexes. In former times Men and Women waſhed together without any ſhame, as to nakedneſs; which filthy cuſtom, the Greeks took from the Romans, as Plutarch complaineth. Caſaubon thinks the Cuſtom began when Agrippa firſt of all others, opened publick Baths at Rome. Now Hadrian indeavoured to take it away, but his Endeavour ſucceeded not, or but for a little time. For Marcus after him, made a new Law for this purpoſe, which prevailed, till taken away by Heliogabalus; but Alexander Severus reſtored it by another Conſtitution. Yet Alexander's care had but ſmall Effect; the Catamidiari vel Catomidiari.

Catomis cadi.

Quandoquidem bona tua diſperdis & familiam tuam ducis ad inopiam tibi bonis tuis interdico.

Liberorum pro libertorum.

Ergaſtuli vox non tantum Origine ſed etiam formatione Græca, eamq; ut alias pleraſq; à Siculis Romani ſumpſere. Salm.

the ancient Chriſtians giving way to the Cuſtom, though Prohibited by the Conſtitutions of Clemens. The Fathers in their Synods alſo forbad it, but their Authority was long neglected after the Decree of the Laodicean Council. But at length the Canons got ground, as ſhould appear from a Novel of Juſtinian, by which amongſt others, this is made a lawful cauſe of Divorce, If a Woman without leave obtained from her Husband ſhall waſh with Men. Farther, Hadrian ordained, That if a Perſon was killed in his Houſe, the queſtion ſhould not be put to all his Slaves, but only ſuch as by their nearneſs might know of it. By Queſtion is meant Examination by Torture, as will largely appear in the ſecond Part of this Work.

Hadrian Studies to be Popular.

31. So Popular was Hadrian, that, though Emperor, he would take Inferior Titles, as of Prætor in Hetruria, in the Latine Towns of Dictator, Ædilis and Duumvir. At Naples he was Demarchus, in his own Country Quinquennalis, as alſo at Adria, which was eſteemed as his other Native place, and Archon at Athens. Almoſt in all Cities he built and celebrated Games. At Rome after other vaſt Divertiſements in honour of his Mother-in-law, amongſt other Species which were wont to be given to the People, he gave Spices. In honour of Trajan, he commanded water made of Balſam and Saffron to be ſprinkled on the People, through the Degrees of the Theatre. Though every where he erected infinite Structures, yet he put his Name to none but the Temple of his Father Trajan. At Rome he repaired the Pantheum, the Septa, the Baſilica of Neptune, many Temples, the Forum of Auguſtus, the Bath of Agrippa, and conſecrated them all to their own and ancient Names. All theſe, or moſt of them, had periſhed by Fire in the Reign of Titus, and had been begun to be repaired by Trajan, but were left imperfect. He made a Bridge of his own Name (called Pons Ælius, as appears from Dio) and a Sepulchre by the River Tiber. So writes Spartian, though others will have Hadrian's Sepulchre, which Procopius terms a Tower and a Caſtle, to have been built after his Death by his Succeſſor Pius. Marius Maximus ſaid he was Cruel by Nature, and therefore did many things piouſly, that what was the lot of Domitian might not alſo happen to him. Though he rejected Titles, and would not have his Name ſet upon Buildings; He named, Spartian ſaith, many Cities after himſelf Adrianople, as Carthage it ſelf, and part of Athens; beſides an infinite number of Aquæducts, he diſtinguiſhed by the ſame Name. Yet Salmaſius tells us, That uſing his utmoſt diligence, he could find but Nine Cities of his Name, whereof two were moſt known, and by no other; to the reſt remained their other Names, though their Inhabitants boaſted themſelves for Hadrianopolitæ, and ſo would be called. One of theſe was in Cyrenaica; and the other in Thrace, Twenty four miles diſtant from Plotinopolis. Further, Hadrian firſt ordained the Officer called Advocatus Fiſci, whereas, as Caſaubon notes, the Affairs of the Treaſury were managed formerly by the Procurators of the Cæſars.

Many Cities called by his Name.

He made the Advocatus Fiſci.

Had a vaſt Memory.

32. He had a vaſt Memory, and a great readineſs of Speech; for, he dictated himſelf his Orations, and anſwered to all things when he was ſaluted by the Common ſort on certain Days, he would return their Names to many without a Nomenclator, though he had heard them but once, and ſpoken all together; ſo as he would correct the Nomenclators often when miſtaken. He could tell the Names of the Veterane Soldiers whom he had diſmiſſed from Service. Books which he had never ſeen before, and haſtily read, he would repeat by heart. At one and the ſame time he wrote, dictated, heard, and diſcourſed with his Friends. Of all the publick Accounts he was ſo much Maſter, as ſcarcely was a Diligent Father of a Family of thoſe of his own Houſe. Concerning the Judges or Governors of Provinces, he ſought what he could by Inquiry, and ſo long till he found out the Truth. His Freedmen he would neither have known in publick, nor be thought to have any power with him, being wont to impute to the preceding Princes the faults of all this ſort of men that ſerved them, and condemning all of his own that made their boaſts of him. Such Cities, and Perſons as were afflicted with Famine, Peſtilence, and Earthquakes, he relieved. He gave the Privilege of Latium to many Cities; whereby we may underſtand, that it was not he that made all the Subjects of the Empire free Citizens of Rome. Under him were no troubleſom Expeditions, and Wars were in a manner paſſed over in ſilence; yet was he beloved by the Soldiers for his extraordinary care of the Army, and for being moſt liberal to them. The Parthians he always had his Friends, becauſe he took away their King whom Trajan had impoſed on them. He permitted the Armenians to have a King, whereas under Trajan they had but a Legatus, or Lieutenant. From the Meſopotamians he exacted not the Tribute impoſed on them by Trajan; but why ſhould he meddle with Armenia or Meſopotamia, when theſe Provinces and Aſſyria, at the beginning of his Reign he had quitted and reſigned up to the Parthian, perceiving them not capable to be held by him. The Albani and Hiberi were his mighty Friends; becauſe he had been liberal to their Kings, though they would not come at him. The Kings of the Bactrians in an humble manner ſent Ambaſſadors to deſire his Friendſhip.

The Friendſhip of his Neighbours how he obtained.

His care about Habits.

33. He himſelf often aſſigned Tutors. Enacting Civil as well as Military Diſcipline, he commanded Senators and Equites, ever to wear their Gowns in Publick, except they returned from Supper; and he himſelf always wore the Gown in Italy. It ſeems he re-enforced Auguſtus his Law, which took in the common People alſo, though by Hadrian they were left to their liberty. Before this Reſtraint of his, both Senators and Equites would uſe the Penula and Lacerna in Publick. But Marcus was ſo great a lover of the Gown, that he always uſed it himſelf in Italy, and commanded his Soldiers alſo to be Gowned, wherein his Son Commodus alſo was ſo much concerned, that ſome he cauſed to be killed who met him in a Barbarian's Habit. But Hadrian required it not when they returned from Supper, becauſe then they wore their Garments proper to eating; ſo they had Clothes proper for the time of Bathing, and from the Baths they might return in ſuch. He received the Senators when they came to Feaſt with him, ſtanding; and always when he lay down to Meat, was either clothed with the Pallium, or Gown put from his right Arm toward the left Shoulder; which he did, by his Example, to Correct the Extravagancy of the Romans, who in thoſe days when they went to meat, were wont to change their Shoes for Sandals, and their Gowns for Senatorian Weeds, which were ſo large, that in nothing they more ſhewed their Luxury. But he either wore the Pallium, which left the Arms at liberty, or elſe had his Gown removed from his right Arm, which he muſt neceſſarily have looſe and free.

Againſt exceſſive Feaſts.

And he not only regulated the manner of Eating, but the Expence thereof, by direction from the Governors of Provinces, and reduced it to the ancient Cuſtom, by recalling the Sumptuary Laws; not the Lex Faunia, or Licinia, (ſo Salmaſius thinks;) which, were too ancient and unſuitable to thoſe times, but the Julia; by which it was ordained, that not above Two hundred Seſtertii ſhould be laid out upon a Supper; on the Kalends, Ides and Nones Three hundred and on other Feſtivals, and a Thouſand at Weddings, and the like.

34. Carriages with great Burthens, he ſuffered not to enter Rome, neither Horſes to be ridden in Cities; which Law Caſaubon tells us, was changed for a milder, which permitted one to Ride in Cities on Horſeback, but not in a Chariot, as our Neighbours of Amſterdam, lately Prohibited the Uſe of Coaches in theirs. Before the eighth hour of the Day, he ſuffered none except Sick Perſons to waſh in Publick. The ninth hour at Rome was the uſual time for Supping, and then were opened the Taverns, Baths, and Brothel Houſes; but it ſeems Hadrian would allow the Baths to be ſet open at the eighth. He firſt uſed the Miniſtery of the Roman Equites, for diſpatching Epiſtles and Petitions. He himſelf frequently heard Cauſes both at Rome, and in the Provinces, taking in to his Aſſiſtance, the Conſuls, Prætors, and the beſt of the Senators. He conſtituted four Conſulares, Judges through all Italy. When he went into Africk it rained, which it had not done for five years before, according to our Hiſtorian; and for this the Africans loved him. But it ſeems, his ordering of his Head in Rain was ſuch, that he loved not himſelf. For having travelled through all Parts uncovered, in the Showers and Colds, he fell into a lingring and Conſumptive Diſeaſe. Then being ſolicitous concerning a Succeſſor, he thought of Severianus, and others, but looking upon them as Emperors, he deteſted them, though he repreſſed the force of his natural cruelty, till by a flux of Blood he was almoſt brought to his end. Then did he command Severianus to die, as affecting the Empire; in that he ſent ſome Victuals from Supper to the Emperor's Slaves, had ſet him down in a Royal Seat, placed by the Bed, as the Cuſtom was, and though an old Man of Ninety years of Age, had gone bolt upright to the Stations of the Soldiers; many other being put to Death, either openly, or by cunning and ſecret means. Amongſt theſe, his Wife Sabina was alſo ſaid to have been taken away by Poiſon. Victor the Hiſtorian ſpeaks of her Death as cauſed by him; yet voluntary, writing that Being affronted by almoſt ſervile Injuries, ſhe was compelled to a voluntary Death; and that ſhe openly boaſted how inſufferable an humour ſhe had endured, and had laboured, that ſhe might not be with Child by him, to the Deſtruction of Mankind.

He contracts a lingring Diſeaſe.

Shews his Cruelty.

He Adopts Verus.

Who dying,

He adopts Antoninus.

35. He adopted Ceionius Commodus Verus, the Son-in-law of Nigrinus, who conſpired againſt him, whom formerly he had reſpected for his handſomneſs, and called him Ælius Verus Cæſar. In reſpect to this Adoption, he gave the Circenſian Games, and a Donative both to the People and Soldiers; he honoured him with the Prætorſhip, the Government of Pannonia, and two Conſulſhips. But he was very ſickly, inſomuch that he could not give him thanks in the Senate for his Adoption, which made him often ſay, that he had leaned to a rotten Wall, and had loſt a Thouſand Seſtertia. Having taken too ſtrong a Purge, or ſome other ſort of Phyſick, he died in the Night, through a great Iſſue of Blood which happened to him while he ſlept; Hadrian being wont to foretel his ſhort continuance. He died on the firſt of January, or the Calends, and therefore he forbad he ſhould be mourned for. Though on the third day after the Calends was the greateſt Solemnity for naming Vows for the health of the Emperor; yet the firſt day it ſelf was very Solemn, and ſuch Ceremonies they were generally unwilling ſhould be interrupted, or the Feſtivity leſſened by Mourning. Ælius Verus Cæſar being Dead, he adopted Arrius Antoninus, afterward Sirnamed Pius, but on condition that he ſhould adopt other two, which were Arrius Verus, and Marcus Antoninus. Many were vexed at the Adoption of Antoninus, particularly Catilius Severus, Præfect of the City, who aimed at the Sovereignty; which being diſcovered, he was put out of his place, and deprived of his Dignity. Hadrian weary of his life, commanded his Slave to run him through with his Sword; which being known, Antoninus and the Præfects came in, and deſired him to bear patiently the violence of his Diſeaſe; at which he was angry, and commanded him that had made it known to be killed, but Antonimus preſerved him, who affirmed, that being adopted, he ought not to ſuffer Hadrian to be ſlain; otherwiſe he ſhould be a Parricide. He made his Teſtament, and this done, endeavoured again to kill himſelf, but the Dagger was ſtoln away from him, after wich he grew more cruel; and he demanded Poiſon, of a Phyſician, who that he might not give it him, ſlew himſelf. At length he went to Baiæ, leaving Antoninus at Rome, to govern; where all endeavours for recovery being fruſtrate, having ſent for Antoninus, he died in his ſight on the ſixth day before the Ides of July; and being hated by all Men, was Buried in Cicero's Village at Puteoli.

He made a great Alteration in the form of Government.

36. This is the Account we have from Spartianus, concerning the Reign and Character of Hadrian, and the largeſt we have from any Author now extant, being to our great loſs deprived of ſo great a part of Dion Caſſius his works. And we could have wiſhed Spartianus himſelf had been more copious; for the Reader muſt take notice, that though we have ſuch ſlender Intelligence of the manner of it; yet we are told, That Hadrian made a great alteration in the form of Government, ſo great that he obliterated moſt of that which was introduced by Auguſtus; nay, that the Model, as it ſtood in Conſtantine's time, was moſt of it of his contrivance. Yet when we come to particulars, we find little in Spartian; but that He made four Conſulares Judges, through all Italy. Only Sex. Aurelius Victor tells us much in little, that The Publick and Palatine Offices, as alſo of the Militia, Hadrian put into that form, which a few things being changed, remained in his days. But we cannot be of this opinion, that they were but a few things; For from this time down to Conſtantine, an Alteration crept in by degrees, as all Sublunary things are ſubject to change. But it will not be amiſs to hear what a very great Man, Onuphrius Panvinius ſaith, concerning this Subject. He writes, that there were four Authors of a new form of the Commonwealth in the whole Roman Empire. Theſe were, Romulus, Auguſtus, Hadrian and Conſtantine. That Hadrian made this alteration firſt after Auguſtus; and he founds his Aſſertion on this Affirmation of Victor. Before he comes to demonſtrate it, he premiſeth a Deſcription of the whole Empire, taken out of Appians Proem to his Books of the Civil Wars. Then he renews his Aſſertion, that this Deſcription of the Empire falling chiefly into the Reign of Hadrian, he made a new diviſion of all Nations and Provinces therein mentioned, and ordered the Empire in a far differing manner from that wherein it was conſtituted by Auguſtus. Which diviſion of Provinces, and new Conſtitution of the Empire, he ſaith he will ſuggeſt chiefly out of Sextus Rufus, and begin with Italy, the Lady of all. Italy, and her three Iſlands were diſtinguiſhed into ſeventeen Dioceſes, or Adminiſtrations; The Governors of which were ſome Conſulares, ſome Correctores, and ſome Præſides. There were eight Conſulares, two Correctores, and ſeven Præſides. In Gulls, Aquitaine and Brittain, were eighteen Provinces; in Illyricum ſeventeen; in Thrace ſix, and in Africk as many. As for the diviſion of Aſia, it's wanting.

37. But

Conſulares of Provinces, when brought in.

37. But for Italy, eight Provinces, or Dioceſes as he calls them, had Conſulares, two had Correctores, and ſeven had Præſidents. For thoſe of Spain, Gall and Britain, he ſaith not which had which, ſo bold are ſome in following Victor; they knew not why, as to particulars. Generally Learned men have concluded that the Conſulares, who by that Name and Authority governed Provinces, were inſtituted partly by Hadrian, and partly by Conſtantine. But Salmaſius contends, that the Diviſion of Provinces into Conſulares, and Pro-Conſulares, was not only before Conſtantine, but alſo before Hadrian, he being Conſularis of a Province, who governed it by Conſular Authority. That Hadrian brought not firſt up the Adminiſtration of the Conſulares, but that Italy before his time not being governed by Conſulares, he appointed ſuch Judges to adminiſter Juſtice to all the Provinces of that Country. He fetcheth them from the Inſtitution of Auguſtus, who ſent ſuch Officers to govern ſome of his Provinces when the Partition was made betwixt him and the People. Caſaubon obſerves, that Marcus afterward to theſe Conſulares, ſubſtituted Lawyers, and ſo was Italy governed till the Reign of Macrinus, under whom theſe Juridici failed, as he gathers from the fragments of Dio. Afterwards we ſhall ſee in Conſtantine's Model, that Conſulares were a ſort of Governors, and of the ordinary Governors of Provinces. Hadrian it ſeems did not firſt inſtitute them; but he might introduce ſome things circumſtantial as to their Office. No more did he inſtitute that of Prætor, which was very ancient; but in his time a great Accident happened in reference to the diſcharge of the Prætor's Office, and that poſſibly by his Direction and Command.

The Edictum Perpetuum compoſed in his time.

38. For under him we are told by Eutropius, that the Edict called Edictum Perpetuum, was Compiled by Salvius Julianus. And the Emperor Juſtinian in his Preface before the Digeſts to the Great Senate, attributes this to Hadrian himſelf, ſaying, That what things were every year publiſhed by the Prætors in their Edicts, he comprized in one little Book, taking in excellent Julian to that Enterprize. During the Commonwealth, the Prætors had Power to Correct the Rigor of the Law, and the Ædiles Curules had in certain Caſes authority to make Laws alſo. But as their Offices, ſo their Edicts were but Annual before the Cornelian Law. Now Salvius Julianus, whom Spartian writes to have been one of Hadrian's Councellors, reduced them by his Command into order, and framed out of them a perpetual Edict, to be as a certain Body of ſtanding Law, and to prevent the great Confuſion occaſioned by the New Edicts which each made at the Entrance into his Office. This Edict which was henceforth to be their guide and rule in Adminiſtration of Juſtice, conſiſted of One hundred and ninety Books or Chapters, and being confirmed both by Prince and Senate, was afterward illuſtrated by the Commentaries of two moſt Noble Lawyers, Paulus, and Ulpian, of whom the former Compoſed Eighty Books, and the later Eighty three. And well might they beſtow their pains upon it; for this was the Archetype of the Pandects, the moſt noble Body of the Roman Law, and the Sum of what is left unto us, moſt of the Books now remaining, referring unto it as a Fountain, and the greateſt part of the Digeſts being tranſcribed out of the Volumes written upon this Subject.

Commentators upon it.

Hinc illæ Inſcriptiones in Pandectis, Ulpianus ad Edictum. Paulus ad Edictum.

39. From this time forward it came to paſs, that whereas ſince the Monarchy introduced by Auguſtus, the Prætors had ſtill made their Laws or Edicts; the Lawyers alſo reigned in the Forum, with remarkable Authority, and moderate Princes very often conſulted the Senate upon any new Law to be made (whereupon their Orations in Senate are recited in Books, and have the Name alſo of Senatuſconſulta) after the Publication of this Volume of Edicts, the Prætors no more propoſed any of their own; but like other Magiſtrates, began upon occaſion to conſult the Prince, who ever had at his Hand the beſt Lawyers to adviſe with, as we ſee Hadrian had. And indeed by all of that Noble Profeſſion, the Reign of this Emperor deſerves much to be taken notice of, both in reſpect that the Perpetual Edict was made in his time, and not without good reaſon, Juſtinian in Compoſing his Code, begins with the Conſtitutions made by him, omitting thoſe of the former Emperors; as alſo that now the Power of making Laws remained in the Princes alone; in the Privy and Select Council of whom, all things neceſſary for the Government of the Commonwealth, the State of the Empire, and the Diſcuſſion of Cauſes and Controverſies were handled and debated. But this Salvius Julianus, that eminent Lawyer of Milan, the Scholar of Jabolenus, is thought Author alſo of that called Interdictum Salvianum; as alſo of the New Edict concerning the joyning of other Children with an Emancipated Son. For he was Vide Menagium de Amœnitatibus Juris Civilis, c. 24.

Prætor; he was alſo twice Conſul, and Præfect of the City, beſides ſeveral Governments of Provinces; and which made him more Noble, ſaith Spartian (in the life of Didius Julianus the Emperor his great Gandſon) a Lawyer. He it was that compoſed the perpetual Edict, and not Didius Julianus the Emperor, as Grotius ſtrangely miſtook, being decieved as Menagius believes, by a moſt corrupt place of Aurelius Victor.

In Sparſione florum.

Hadrian concealed his Humour.

40. By all that has been ſaid, we may eaſily perceive that Hadrian was really a great Perſon, as to his Parts and Accompliſhments. But that his humour was compounded, and that he was various, appears from Spartian, who is moſt in his Commendation, and as is abundantly evident from other Writers. They agree that he indeavoured to conceal his Cruelty, and other Vices; but it would now and anon ſhew it ſelf, as it did even at the firſt, though he careſſed the People all he could, to make it have a good Opinion of him; and ſwore to the Senate that he would never puniſh a Senator, but by the Sentence of that Court. But he broke his word toward his latter end, when he put to Death many of that Order, which ſome may charitably attribute to his not being himſelf. He is charged with Envy, and that toward his very Benefactor Trajan. For to this both Eutropius and Sext. Rufus do attribute his quitting Aſſyria, Meſopotamia, and Armenia to the Parthians, and his reſolution to have Euphrates to be betwixt them and the Romans, yet this he might do being of the ſame Opinion as Auguſtus, that the former bounds of the Empire were large enough, and that Trajan did but indanger it by making it greater. This, together with deſire of Eaſe both of himſelf and People, might be the principal Cauſe of his quitting thoſe Countries; for though he underſtood the Art of War, as we have ſeen, very well, yet he had devices to keep it off; and would not fail upon occaſion to do it by underhand Gifts and Preſents he made to Neighbour Princes, and he would boaſt that he did more (this way) for the ſafety of the Empire, than others had done by their Arms. But whereas Spartian talks that there were no heavy Expeditions under him, and that Wars were in a manner tranſacted in ſilence, he wrote it without good Intelligence, or due Conſideration. For beſides that he is ſaid by ſome to have overthrown the Sauromatæ (or Sarmatæ, inhabiting the Countries now called Ruſſia, and Tartary) he had a bitter conteſt with the rebellious Jews.

The Jews again rebell.

41. The principal cauſe of their rebellion was, for that he built a new City, and therein a Temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, where Jeruſalem ſtood, and called the place after himſelf Ælia Capitolina, and he forbad them to be Circumciſed. They were confirmed in their Sedition by one who pretended he came down to them as a light from Heaven to ſave them from ſlavery and bondage, ſaying, he was the Star foretold by Balaam, whence being called Barcocab, he was firſt worſhipped as the Meſſiah, and anointed at Bitter, a City in Africk, but afterwards proving to be an Impoſtor, they called him Barcozba, or the ſon of a lye. Dio wrote, that the whole World was in a manner ſhaken with this Commotion of the Jews. Hadrian ſent the beſt Captains he had againſt them, whereof the chief was Julius Severus, who had at this time governed Britain. Albeit in the end he had the victory, yet would he not have wiſhed for many Triumphs at the ſame rate. For very many of the Romans fell; inſomuch that Hadrian writing to the Senate, uſed not that beginning which other Emperors were wont: Si vos liberique veſtri valetis, Bene eſt; Ego quidem & exercitus valemus. But the extraordinary ſtrength which now apeared in the Jews was given them for their deſtruction. The greater danger their mutiny had occaſioned to the Empire, the greater was the Emperors ſeverity in puniſhing their rebellion paſt, the greater his care to prevent the like in time to come. In Battels and Skirmiſhes were ſlain of them 580000. beſides an infinite number conſumed with Famine and Diſeaſes, during the time of this lingring War, protracted of purpoſe by the Romans, not willing to try it out in open field with ſuch a forlorn deſperate multitude. Dio, who lived not long after this time, emphatically notes, that they were left few in number, their Land laid waſte, fifty of their ſtrongeſt Munitions utterly razed, and Nine hundred eighty five of their Chief, and moſt populous Towns ſackt, and conſumed by Fire. Hadrian after this ſtrange deſolation, by Publick Decree ratified by the Senates conſent, prohibited any Jew to come within the view of Judæa. Before this overthrow they had manifeſt ſigns foreſhowing their Deſolation. Solomon's Sepulchre, which they held in greateſt honour, ſaith Dio, a little before this War fell aſunder of its own accord; Wolves and Hyænaes howled throughout their ſtreets, and devoured them in the Fields. Such Jews as Hadrian

Lib. 69. p. 793.

took Captive, he baniſhed into Spain his own Countrey (this was their Tenth Captivity, ſaith John * Vaſæus) where they had their Synagogues, till the time of Ferdinand and Iſabel, and Emanuel King of Portugal.

* Chron. Hiſp. A. D. 137.

42. The State of the Jews from this time until the expiration of the Roman Empire cannot eaſily be gathered from any Roman Writers, who ſeldom vouchſafe the Jews or Chriſtians any mention, unleſs inforced thereto by ſome famous War or Mutiny, or by ſome other event redounding to the Roman glory. Judæa after this time was not famous for any tumult till the ruin of Romes greatneſs; the Jews wanted ſtrength, and the Chriſtians willing minds to procure the Emperor's glory by Seditions. Hereupon whatſoever calamity either of them ſuffered by the Romans, was paſſed over by Roman Writers, as private wrongs not worthy regiſtring in their Annals. Upon this account 'tis no wonder they took no notice of our Saviour, or his Acts, all tending to Peace and Loyalty. For as Tacitus notes, Judæa was moſt quiet in Tiberius his time, which was the beſt news the Romans cared to hear thence. Yet the general eſtate of the Jews between Hadrian's and Honorius's time, as * one obſerves, may be gathered out of the reverend Fathers of the Primitive Church; who uſually ſtopped the mouths of Heathens, or blaſphemous Atheiſts, by propoſing their condition, then known unto all the World, for ſuch as our Saviour had foretold it. Thus much of the Jews until the ſeries of time and affairs reduce us to them.

* Dr. Jackſon B. 1. Chap. 27. *pag.*114. upon the Creed.

Hadrian's Character.

43. Hadrian, if we look at his natural diſpoſition, was as it were compounded of vice and virtue, yet ſo as he ſeemed to have the command of them, and may be reckoned amongſt good Princes. He was much addicted to ſtudies, and well ſeen in moſt of the liberal Arts; here was his fault, that he deſired to comprehend all, and did not reſerve himſelf for the moſt worthy, being one of the moſt curious men that ever lived. And in him that Saying was ſufficiently demonſtrated, Non eſt curioſus quin idem ſit malevolus. For he was ſo envious that he mortally hated all better Scholars than himſelf, and conſequently the greateſt Profeſſors in all Sciences; but ſuch as were unable for their Profeſſion he would diſmiſs with great rewards, as was ſaid. He killed Apollodorus the Architect for ſhewing him ſomething freely the Errors in his Buildings. One of his Præfects was Similis, who as Dio writeth, getting leave to retire, and live quietly in the Countrey his laſt ſeven years, commanded this Inſcription to be ſet on his Tomb: Here lieth Similis, whoſe life conſiſted of many (or ſixty ſeven) years, yet he lived but ſeven. His cruelty toward his latter end we may in charity impute to his peeviſhneſs contracted by the Dropſie, with which he was ſore vexed in every part. In his time the Church was under ſome Perſecution; for Xiſtus Biſhop of Rome was Crowned with Martyrdom in the tenth year of his Reign, on the eighth of the Ides of April, to whom ſucceeded Teleſphorus, according to Damaſus; but this was rather from the malice of others, and the wicked cuſtom then on foot, than out of his inclination. Being ſomething ſatisfied with the Apologies of Quadratus and Ariſtides, two learned Men, he wrote a Letter to Minutius Fundanus Proconſul of Aſia, which Juſtin Martyr hath exemplified in his ſecond Apology, and from him as it ſeemeth, Euſebius in his Hiſtory, after this manner:

His Letter in behalf of the Chriſtians.

44. The Emperor Cæſar Ælius Adrianus to Minucius Fundanus. I received a Letter from Serenius Granianus, that right worthy man thy Prædeceſſor, the occaſion whereof I cannot with ſilence paſs by, leſt thereby men be troubled, and a gap left open to the malice of Sycophants. Wherefore if your Provincials can prove ought againſt the Chriſtians whereof they charge them, and juſtifie it at the Bar, let them proceed, and not impeach them only for the name with making outcries againſt them. For it is very expedient that if any be diſpoſed to accuſe, the accuſation be throughly known of you and ſifted. Therefore if any accuſe the Chriſtians that they tranſgreſs the Laws, ſee that you judge, and puniſh according to the quality of the offence; But in plain terms, if any upon ſpite or malice in way of cavillation complain againſt them, ſee that by all means you chaſtiſe and puniſh him according to his malice. Hadrian at length by vomiting blood in great quantity, contracted a Dropſie (if Dio writeth Phyſician like) which ſo tormented him, that he deſired death, but could not have it (according to the Prayer of Severianus, whom, though he judged him worthy of the Empire, of late he had put to death) but at length by an ill kind of diet accelerated it, yet ſaying, Multi Medici Regem ſuſtulerunt, and enquiring * of his Soul whither it meant to go. He died on the fourth of the Ides of July, having lived Sixty two years, and reigned twenty one, with eleven Months, in the 891 year of the City, A. D. 138, Sulpitius Camerinus and Quintius

He dieth.

* Animula vagula blandula,
hoſpes comeſque corporis,
Quæ nunc abibis in loca Pallidula, rigida, nudula. Nec ut ſoles dabis jocos?

Niger Magnus being Conſuls. In his time flouriſhed Ptolomy of Alexandria, that great Aſtronomer, Aulus Gellius or Agellius, Juſtin who epitomized Trogus Pompeius, and others.

Antoninus ſucceeds.
Why called Pius.

45. Antoninus ſucceeded his Adoptive Father Hadrian, and was Sirnamed Pius. Concerning the reaſon of this Sirname, ſome fetch it from his Piety to his Father-in-Law, whom Hadrian ſeeing him to lead when old and weak, into the Senate, and to ſuſtain him with his Arm, was ſo taken with him, that thence he was moved to adopt him, as the Senate was to give him this Sirname. But others derived it from his pious and grateful Memory of his Adoptive Father, to whom he not only built a Monument reſembling a Caſtle, at leaſt a Tower, as Procopius deſcribes it; but preſently after his Death, when the Senate was much incenſed againſt him by reaſon of his cruelty ſhewed to ſeveral Members thereof, and refuſed to canonize him for a Divus, or give him, as they worded it, divine Honours, he with much pains obtained it of them: Beſides this, he made him a Sepulchre at Puteoli, ordained Games every fifth year, with Flamines and Sodales, and many other things in honour of him as a Demy-God. Some thought him ſo called, becauſe he ſaved ſuch as Hadrian in his Extremity commanded to be killed; others, becauſe he would not ſuffer him to kill himſelf, and others derive the Sirname from his own innate Goodneſs and Clemency of his Nature. He is called by Capitolinus, who wrote his Life, T. Aurelius Fulvius Boionius Antoninus Pius, deriving his Pedigree by the Father's ſide, from Gallia Tranſalpina, and the City Nemauſus, or Nimes. His Grandfather was Titus Aurelius Fulvius, who through various Honours, arrived at the ſecond Conſulſhip, and the Præfectſhip of the City: his Father Aurelius Fulvius who alſo was Conſul, a temperate and honeſt Man. His Mothers Mother was Boionia Procilla, his Mother Arria Fadilla, and her Father Arrius Antoninus, who was twice Conſul, a Perſon by the Hiſtorian termed Sanctus, who told Nerva in the Senate, That he pitied him for being Emperor. This his Grandſon was born in September, when Domitian the twelfth time was Conſul, together with Cornelius Dolabella.

How he behaved himſelf awhile a private Man.
His Wars.

46. While he was a private man, he moſt commonly lived in the Countrey, but was Eminent where ever he came. He was made by Hadrian one of his four Conſulares over that Part of Italy, where he had moſt Eſtate. To the Italians he reſtored all that Gold called Aurum Coronarium given him upon the account of his Adoption, and half to the other Provincials. He was ſo conſtant, that good Governors of Provinces he kept in their Places ſeven, and nine years. He waged many Wars by his Legates. For he overcame the Britains by Lollius Vrbicus, raiſing another Wall made of Turffs, after the removing of the Barbarians: he compelled the Moors to deſire Peace: by his Legati and Præſidents he alſo reduced the Germans, Daci, Jews, and other Nations which rebelled. Moreover he repreſſed Rebellions in Achaia and Ægypt, and reſtrained the Alani, who often attempted to ſtir. He commanded his Procurators modeſtly to exact the Tributes, heard willingly ſuch as objected any thing againſt them; ſuch as exceeded, he commanded to give account of their Actions, neither ever rejoiced he in any gain, by which a Provincial was oppreſſed. The Imperial Height and Dignity he brought to the greateſt Civility. Being Emperor, he bore ſo much reſpect to the Senate, as when he was a private Man, he deſired ſhould be given to him by the Prince. He ordained nothing concerning the Provinces or other Matters, without the advice of his Friends, and according to their Opnions compoſed his forms. Whereas other Princes were never ſeen but in their Gowns, he would appear to his Friends at home in his ordinary Clothes (as the Tunica and Penula) and about ſome of his Domeſtick Buſineſs. He governed, yet, the Empire with ſuch diligence, that he took care of all Perſons, and all things, as of his own, and all the Provinces flouriſhed under him.

His Mercifulneſs.

47. Confiſcation of Eſtates in his time was more rare than ever, for though ſeveral were found guilty of Treaſon, yet one Perſon was only proſcribed for affecting the Sovereignty, Attilius Tatianus, and that by Decree of the Senate, and yet he would not have him forced to reveal his Complices, and he was ever ready to help his Son in all things. Priſcianus alſo periſhed who was guilty of the ſame Crime, but he killed himſelf, and he forbad the Conſpiracy to be inquired into. His manner of living was ſuch, as there was opulency without reprehenſion, parſimony without ſordidneſs, and his Table was furniſhed by his own Servants, Fowlers, Fiſhers, and Hunters. The Bath he had he let the People make Uſe of without Rent; neither did he change any thing from the quality of a private life. But he took away Penſions from many whom he ſaw idle; affirming, That Nothing was more ſordid, nay cruel, than for thoſe to gnaw upon the Commonwealth, who by their pains contributed nothing to it. The Accounts of the Provinces, and the Revenue he underſtood very well. His private Patrimony he gave to his Daughter: but the Profits of it (but for ſome time ſurely) to the Commonwealth. He ſold things belonging to the Emperor which were ſuperfluous, and often lived on his own Lands, neither made he any Expeditions, but only travelled to his own Eſtate, and into Campania, ſaying, That The Train and Attendance of a Prince, although too ſparing, was burthenſom to the Provincials; and yet was he of great Authority amongſt all Nations; for he reſided in the City, that, as in the middle, he might with more ſpeed receive Meſſages from all quarters. He gave a Congiary to the People, and a Donative to the Soldiers. Beſides many works of his own, and the repairing of others, he aſſiſted many Cities with Money, either to raiſe new Fabricks, or reſtore the old; nay, he would help the Magiſtrates and the Senators of Rome in the diſcharge of their Functions.

Self-denial.

48. He refuſed to be left Heir by ſuch as had Sons. To a good Judge he gave no Succeſſor ſo long as he lived, except to Orphitus Præfect of the City, at his own deſire. For Gnavius Maximus, the Præfectus Prætorio arrived at his Twentieth year under him; a moſt ſevere Man, to whom Tatius Maximus ſucceeded, in whoſe Place, when dead, he ſubſtituted two Præfects, Fabius Repentinus, and Cornelius Victorinus; of whom Repentinus was libelled, as if he came to the place by means of the Prince his Concubine. The ſcarcity of Wine, Oyl, and Wheat he ſupplied out of his own Treaſury, by buying them up, and giving them gratis to the People. For, in his time there was a Famine, the Cirque fell down, and Earthquakes happened, which over-turn'd ſome Towns of Aſia and Rhodes; all which he wonderfully reſtored: There was alſo a Fire at Rome, which conſumed Three hundred and forty Iſlands, or Houſes, as our Hiſtorian explains himſelf, for the Houſes were Inſular, made at diſtance one from another. King Pharaſmenes came to him to Rome, and paid him more reſpect than to Hadrian. He made Pacorus King of the Lazi. He drew back the Parthian King from invading the Armenians, only by his Letters. He took up Controverſies betwixt Kings. The King of Parthia, who deſired to have back the Royal Chair taken by Trajan, he denied. He reſtored Rimithalces to the Kingdom of Boſphorus, having heard the Controverſie betwixt him and the Curator. He ſent aid into Pontus to the Olbiopolitæ againſt the Tauroſcythæ, whom he compelled to give them Hoſtages. Now Caſaubon tells us, that the Olbiopolitæ were Greeks, at leaſt mixt with Greeks; the Tauroſcythæ were Barbarians, either Scythians or Goths, called alſo Getes. The Senate decreed, that the Months of September and October ſhould be called the one Antoninus after him, and the other Fauſtinus, after his dearly beloved Wife Fauſtina; (who died in the third year of his Reign and was made a Diva by the Senate, with a Temple, and other things ſuitable to that Heatheniſh Honour) but he refuſed it. But the Marriage of his Daughter Fauſtina to M. Antoninus, he ſo highly ſolemnized, as to give a Donative to the Soldiers.

How he treated his Miniſters.

49. His Præfects he both inriched and honoured with Conſular Ornaments. If he condemned any of Extortion, he reſtored their Eſtates to their Children, but on condition, that they gave the Provincials back what their Fathers had taken from them. To Pardon he was moſt prone. He converſed with his Friends as a private man, living with them in the time of Vintage. He uſed his Freedmen very ſeverely. To Rhetoricians and Philoſophers throughout the Provinces he gave both Honours and Salaries; though other Writers aſcribe this, to Hadrian who went before, and Marcus who followed after him. He enacted many things, and made uſe of theſe Lawyers, Vinidius Verus, Salvius Valens, Voluſius Metianus, Ulpius Marcellus, and Jabolenus. All Seditions he repreſſed, not by Cruelty, but by Modeſty and Gravity. He forbad the Dead to be Buried within Cities. He ſtated the Charges of the Shows of Gladiators. The Curſus Publicus, or Curſus Vehicularius with great diligence he made leſs burthenſom. Of all things he did, he gave an account in the Senate, and by Edicts. He deceaſed in the Seventieth year of his Age, and yet he was miſſed as if he had been a young Man. He contracted his Diſeaſe by eating Cheeſe at Supper, which Vomiting in the Night, the next day he was ſeized by a Fever. The next day after finding himſelf very ill, he recommended the Commonwealth and his Daughter to M. Antoninus, his Præfects, or Officers being preſent, and commanded the Golden Fortune which was wont to be ſet in the Bed-Chamber of the Emperor to How Learned Men.

He dies.

How Honoured after his Death.

be carried to him. The Tribune according to the Cuſtom coming for the Watchword, he gave him Æquanimity, and ſo turning himſelf as to ſleep, he died at Lorium. When in his Fever he was delirous, he talked nothing but concerning the Commonwealth, and the Kings with whom he was angry. His private Eſtate he left to his Daughter, and Legacies to all his Relations. He was comely and tall of Stature, and when he was old, becauſe he was weak, was ſwadled with ſmall pieces of wood, to make him go upright. In his old Age, before any came to ſalute him, he was wont to eat dry Bread to ſtrengthen his Spirits. He was called Divus by the Senate, every one ſtriving to pay him this reſpect, commending his Piety, Clemency, Ingenuity, Sanctimony; and all other Honours they gave him which were wont to be conferred on the beſt Princes. Capitolinus tells us, he deſerved a Flamen, Circenſian Games, a Temple, and thoſe they termed Antoniani Sodales, being almoſt of all Princes the only man that lived, ſo far as concerned himſelf, without civil and hoſtile Blood, and who might juſtly be compared with Numa, whoſe Felicity, Piety, Security and Ceremonies he always obtained. So much writes Capitolinus concerning this Prince, but whereas he ſaith he died in his Seventeenth year, Caſaubon ſaith it is moſt falſe; for if we reckon from the twelfth Conſulſhip of Domitian, wherein he was born, we ſhall find, he tells us, Seventy and four.

His Edict in behalf of the Chriſtians.

50. Others write, That this Emperor, for the Victories obtained here in this Iſland, had the Sirname of Britannicus, who as * Pauſanias telleth us, fined the Brigantes part of their grounds, becauſe they had fallen with War upon the Genunii, the Allies of the Roman People. And at this time ſaith Cambden, as we collect out of Jabolenus, Seius Saturnius was Archigubernus of the Navy in Britain. But whether by this title he was an Admiral of the ſaid Navy, or a principal Pilot, or the Maſter of a Ship, I would have the Lawyers to tell. Antoninus ruled with ſuch care, moderation, and humanity, that he was called another Numa, all things flouriſhing in calmneſs and tranquility. He repaired ſeveral Cities that had been overturned with Earthquakes, in which and other reſpects Pauſanias giveth him large commendations. He was excellently learned; a ſubtil and deep Philoſopher. He was rendered favourable to Chriſtianity by the Apologies of Juſtin Martyr, and the ſupplications of others in behalf of the faithful in Aſia, which were grieved with all ſorts of contumelies practiſed againſt them by their Provincials. He graciouſly ſent a conſtitution in their behalf unto the body of Aſia, which was read at Epheſus in the audience of this great Aſſembly, and yet is preſerved to our ſight in the end of Juſtin Martyr his ſecond Apology, and by Euſebius in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, according to this tenour. The Emperor Cæſar, Titus Ælius Adrianus Antoninus, Auguſtus Pius, Pontifex Maximus, fifteen times enjoying the power of Tribune, four times Conſul (not thrice, as it is corruptly written in Euſebius) Father of the Country, to the People of Aſia, Health. I know the gods are careful to diſcloſe hurtful perſons. For they puniſh ſuch as will not worſhip them, more grievouſly than you do thoſe whom you bring in trouble, confirming that opinion which they have of you to be wicked and ungodly men. It's their deſire in Gods quarrel, rather to die than live. So that they become conquerors, yielding their lives unto the death, rather than to obey Edicts. It ſhall ſeem very neceſſary to admoniſh you of the Earthquakes, which have and do happen amongſt us, that being therewith moved, you may compare our eſtate with theirs. They have more confidence to Godward than you have, you during the time of your ignorance deſpiſe other gods, contemn the Religion of the immortal God, baniſh the Chriſtians which worſhip him, and perſecute them unto the death. In the behalf of theſe men many of the Principal Preſidents have written heretofore unto our Father of famous memory, whom he anſwered in writing again, that they were not to be longer moleſted, unleſs they had practiſed treaſon againſt the Roman Empire. And many have informed us of the ſame matter, whom we anſwered as our Father did before us. If any therefore hereafter be found thus buſied in other mens affairs, we command that the accuſed be abſolute and free, though he be found ſuch an one, I mean as faulty, and that the accuſer be grievouſly puniſhed. That this Edict was proclaimed at Epheſus in the hearing of the great Aſſembly of Aſia, witneſs is Meliton (ſaith Euſebius) Biſhop of Sardis (who flouriſhed at that time) in his profitable Apology for our Doctrine, delivered unto the Emperor Verus. But Antoninus died on the Nones of March, after he had reigned Twenty two years, ſeven months, and Twenty ſix days, in the firſt year of the 235 Olympiad, the 914 of the City, A. D. 161. In his time flouriſhed beſides many excellent Lawyers, and Juſtin the Chriſtian Philoſopher (the Son of Priſcus Bacchius, and and born in Flavia, a new City of Palæſtine, as he ſaith himſelf) Polycarpus Biſhop of Smyrna, Galen that excellent Phyſitian, and Ælian Writer of the Natural and Various Hiſtories.

* In Arcadicis.

Biſhops.

51. In the firſt year of Pius died Teleſphorus Biſhop of Rome, on the Nones of January; the See was vacant ſeven days (both the terms being excluded) and then Hyginus the ninth Biſhop ſucceeded on the Ides of January, and the firſt feria. In the fifth of Pius died Hyginus, on the third of the Ides of January, and Pius ſucceeded him, when Sex. Erucius Clarus and Cn. Claudius Severus, as Damaſus will have it, were Conſuls; which if it be true, the See was vacant four years. In the thirteenth of Pius died Pius the Biſhop, on the fifth of the Ides of July, and and his ſeat being vacant fourteen days, Anicetus the eleventh ſucceeded him on the twenty fifth of July, the firſt feria. (a) From the Paſſion of our Saviour till the eighteenth year of Hadrian there were fifteen Biſhops in the Church of Jeruſalem, all Jews. In the which year after the utter overthrow, the ſiege and conquering of the City under the ſaid Ælius Adrianus, Jeruſalem was called Ælia, and began to be inhabited of ſtrange Nations. Until (b) wellnigh this time, this Church was called a pure and uncorrupted Virgin; for till about the year 110 there was no falſe Doctrine ſown there. Of the Gentiles (c) Marcus was the firſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem. After Abilius, (d) Cerdo was Biſhop of Alexandria in the firſt year of Trajan, where he continued thirteen years. Him ſucceeded Primus, who continued in the See twelve years. After Primus was (e) Juſtus Biſhop of Alexandria, where he continued eleven years. After Juſtus (f) Eumenes was Biſhop, and ſo continued thirteen years. He was ſucceeded by Marcus, who governed that Church ten years. Then followed (g) Celadion, who continued fourteen years. And in the See of Antioch (that we may ſtill continue the ſeries of Biſhops formerly began) after Heros (who ſucceeded Ignatius) (h) Cornelius was Biſhop about the twelfth of Hadrian.

Damaſus.
(a) Euſeb. l. 4. c. 5, 6.
(b) Idem l. 4. c. 22.
(c) Idem l. 4. c. 6. & l. 5. c. 11.
(d) Idem l. 3. c. 21.
(e) Idem l. 4. c. 4, 5.
(f) Idem l. 4. c. 5, 11.
(g) Idem l. 4. c. 11, 20.
(h) Idem l. 4. c. 20.

Hereticks.

52. After the Biſhops and Fathers of the Church, it's convenient to continue the ſeries of Hereticks formerly laid down, to diſtinguiſh the Tares from the Corn. About the year 110, (a) Thebulis was the firſt Heretick in the Church of Jeruſalem. It's ſaid, that he fell from the Faith becauſe they would not chuſe him Biſhop after Simeon. About the ſame time were certain Hereticks called Ophitæ, who worſhipped a Serpent, and thought that the Serpent which deceived Adam and Eve was Chriſt: they kept a living Serpent, which with opening of the cheſt and charming of the Prieſt came forth, licked the Bread upon the Altar, and wrapped it ſelf about it. Their manner was to kiſs the bread, and ſo to eat, believing verily that the Serpent had conſecrated it. They defended themſelves, ſaying, That the Nicolaitans and Gnoſticks delivered them this ſervice. About the ſame time there were certain Jews, which believing in Chriſt called themſelves Nazaræi of Nazareth. In confeſſing Jeſus Chriſt to be the Son of God they contraried the Jews. But they erred in Chriſtian Religion, in that they addicted themſelves wholly to the whole Law. There were other Hereticks which honoured Cain, and took him for their Father, whence they were called Caini. They highly eſteemed of Eſau, Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, with the Sodomites. They called Judas the Traitor their Couſin, honoured him for betraying of Chriſt, affirming that he foreſaw how great a benefit it would bring to Mankind. They read a certain Goſpel written, as they ſaid, by Judas: they reviled the Law, and denied the Reſurrection. There were others called Sethiani, who derived their Pedigree from Seth the ſon of Adam, whom they honoured, and called Chriſt and Jeſus; they held that in the beginning of the World he was called Seth, but in the latter days Chriſt Jeſus. Epiphanius ſaith, that he diſputed with ſome of them in Ægypt, and that the laſt of them were in his time. Cerdon the Heretick came from Syria to Rome, when Hyginus was Biſhop there. He taught that God preached by the Law and Prophets, was not the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. He ſaid, that Chriſt was known, the Father of Chriſt unknown. He denied the Reſurrection, and the Old Teſtament; he held other things with the Manichies; and Marcion was his Scholar.

(a) Euſeb. l. 4. c. 22.
Epiphan. hæreſ. 37.
Auguſt. l. de hæretib.
Epiphan. hæreſ. 29.
Idem hæreſ. 38.
Aug.
Epiphan. hæreſ. 39.
Aug.
Euſeb. l. 4. c. 10, 11.
Epiphan. hæreſ. 41.

53. In the time of Hyginus, Valentinus the Heretick came to Rome, lived under Pius, and continued till Anicetus. He taught 1. That Chriſt brought his fleſh with him from Heaven, and took no fleſh of the bleſſed Virgin, but paſſed through her as water through a Conduict-pipe. 2. That there are two beginnings of all things, Profundum, i. e. the Deep; and Silentium, i. e. Silence: theſe being married together, had iſſue Underſtanding and Truth, which brought forth Three hundred Æona or Ages, and of theſe were the Devil and others born, who made the Tertullian contra Valentinianos.

Epiphan. hæreſ. 31.
Philaſtius.

the World. In the Reign of Antoninus Pius, Marcion alſo the Heretick began to teach, living in the time of Juſtin Martyr, who wrote againſt him. He was Native of Pontus, firſt a Stoick, then a Chriſtian; he followed Baſilides, Cerdon, and Valentinus, in their Hereſies. Meeting Polycarpus, he ſaid, Knoweſt thou us? Polycarp anſwered, I know thee for the firſt born of Satan. Epiphanius writeth, that being a Biſhop's Son, when he had defloured a Virgin, he was by his own Father excommunicated, and afterwards flying to Rome, becauſe they there admitted him not into the Church, he began to Preach deteſtable Doctrine. He taught, that there were three beginnings, Good, Juſt, and Evil: that the New-Teſtament was contrary to the Old. He denied the Reſurrection. He baptized ſuch as died without Baptiſm, ſaying, that Paul bad him do ſo. He taught that Marriage was unlawful, and that it was a great Sin to Marry. That Cain, the Sodomites, and all wicked men were ſaved, becauſe they met Chriſt when he deſcended into Hell, but the Patriarchs and Prophets are ſtill in Hell, for not meeting Chriſt; for they thought (ſaid he) that Chriſt came to tempt them. Under Anicetus alſo came to Rome Marcellina, a woman which infected many with the Hereſie of Carpocrates, who called himſelf γνωστικός. She is ſaid to have kept and offered incenſe to the Statues and Pictures of Chriſt (which the Gnoſticks ſaid, had been made by command of Pilate) as alſo to others of St. Paul.

Euſeb. l. 4. c. 11, 14.
Epiphan. hæreſ. 42.
Theophyl.
Hieron. cont. Jovinian.
Irenæus l. 3. c. 4, 29.

54. About the nineteenth year of Antoninus Pius, the beginning alſo of Montanus his Hereſie is placed by Epiphanius; but from Euſebius, Cappellus would gather, that the original of it was fifteen years before, becauſe the Hiſtorian writeth, that Apollinaris wrote againſt Miltiades and Montanus the Hereticks, under the Proconſulſhip of Gratus, who ſeemeth the ſame with him, whoſe Conſulſhip is by Caſſiodorus caſt into the fourth of Pius. He thinks therefore, that in the nineteenth year ſome new thing might be attempted by Montanus; as he might this year inſtitute his Propheteſſes. Theſe were his two Country-women, Priſcilla and Maximilla, born at Pepuza a City of Phrygia, upon which account he called Hieruſalem by that name. Cappellus further obſerveth, that of ſuch things as are attributed to Montanus, ſome were truly his, ſome after his death were added by the Montaniſts, and ſome falſely aſcribed to them. Montanus really held, that the Promiſe of ſending the Holy Ghoſt was deferred till his time, and in himſelf fulfilled, becauſe the Church heretofore could not bear the yoak of more ſevere and holy Diſcipline, which he indeavoured to bring in, by appointing the eating of dried meats, faſting, and Monogamy, or ſingle Marriage. The Montaniſts, after their number was increaſed, did thoſe things which Hierome mentioneth, viz. they appointed themſelves Patriarchs, two Cenonæ, which word ſeemeth of Phrygian Original, and three Biſhops. That is falſly imputed to them, which Jerome ſaith others did attribute, but he would not believe, viz. that they pricked an Infant, and with his blood made up the Euchariſt. If this opinion may be attributed to any Hæreſie, or if this prejudice did not ariſe from the imputation of this kind of cruelty by the Heathen to Chriſtianity it ſelf, the Carpocratians rather than the Montaniſts were guilty of it. But becauſe both ſorts were called Gnoſticks (as ſwelling with an opinion of knowledg) what was acted but by one, might eaſily be attributed to the other. So becauſe Montanus, as full of the Holy Ghoſt, called upon men in the name of the Father, he was believed to confound the Perſons of the Trinity into one, which was the invention of the Sabellians a hundred years after. 'Tis further ſaid of him, that he baptized the dead, and not allowing of ſecond Marriages, permitted Married Perſons to be ſeparated when they themſelves would. That he took away repentance, affirming, that Sinners could never have their Sins pardoned by repentance. And that the Apoſtles and Prophets underſtood not any thing they had written, but were Arreptitii. Now to return to civil matters.

Hæreſ. 48.

Ad Marcellam tom. 3. ep. 9.

Marcus Antoninus ſucceeds Pius.

55. Marcus Antoninus, the Succeſſor of Antoninus Pius, a Man who lived as a Philoſopher all his life, and who in Sanctity excelled all Princes in the Opinion of Capitolinus, was the Son of Annius Verus, who died in his Prætorſhip, and Grandſon of Annius Verus, who was both Conſul and Præfect of the City, and brought in amongſt the Patricians by Veſpaſian and Titus, the Cenſors. He was born at Rome in the Gardens on Mount Cœlius, the Six and twentieth of April, his Grandfather being the ſecond time Conſul with Augur, and was thought to derive his Pedigree from Numa. At firſt he had the Name of Catilius Severus, his Great Grandfather by the Mother's ſide. After the Death of his Father, he was called by Hadrian Annius Veriſſimus, to expreſs the veracity of his Nature, and was Adopted and Educated by his Grandfather on the Father's ſide, being called Annius Verus, after he had taken the Gown of a Man. He was grave from his firſt Infancy. And as ſoon as he was taken from Nurſes, was delivered to great Maſters to be taught Philoſophy, whom he much reſpected. He had thoſe that taught him Muſick, Geometry, Grammar, and Rhetorick, both Greek and Latine; amongſt whom, he chiefly reſpected Fronto a Latine Orator, to whom he deſired in the Senate a Statue to be erected; and Proculus, who inſtructed him in Latin Grammar, was ſo dear to him, that he promoted him to the Proconſulſhip, taking the Burthens thereof upon himſelf. Even while yet a Boy, he vehemently ſtudied Philoſophy. When twelve years old he took the Habit of a Philoſopher, and with it the Patient enduring of all things, inſomuch that he ſtudied in the Pallium, and lay on the ground, his Mother hardly prevailing to have him make Uſe of a Couch ſpread with Skins. When he was made Partaker of the Imperial Dignity, yet would he go to hear Apollonius the Chalcedonian a Stoick Philoſopher. He heard Sextus of Chæronea the Nephew of Plutarch, and others, Stoicks; and of Peripateticks Claudius Severus; but eſpecially Junius Ruſticus, a Stoick, he revered and chiefly followed, being very able for Civil Affairs and Matters of War, as well as moſt Skilful in the Stoick Diſcipline. With him he communicated all his Publick and Private Councils, whom he would kiſs even in the preſence of the Præfecti Prætorio, whom he honoured with a ſecond Conſulſhip, and after his Death required of the Senate that he ſhould have Statues. So great Honour he gave to thoſe that taught him, that he kept their Images of Gold in his Lararium or Houſhold Chappel, and always graced their Sepulchres with Porches, Sacrifices and Flowers. Beſides what is mentioned, he ſtudied the Law, and in ſuch labours took ſuch pains, that he diſordered thereby his Body; and in this alone was his Childhood to be reprehended. He frequented the Publick Schools of Declaimers, and his School fellows he ſo loved, that whom he could not prefer to Places in the State, he inriched other ways.

His Gratitude to his School-Maſters.

Moſt prizeth Claudius Severus.

Mæcianus his Maſter for the Law.

Vide Menagium in Amœnitatibus Juris Civilis, c. 5.

56. For ſtudying the Law, the Hiſtorian tells us, That he had L. Voluſius Mæcianus for his Maſter. This is that Mæcianus whom he formerly named as Councellor to Antoninus Pius, who in the Treatiſe written by this Marcus concerning himſelf, and often in the Pandects, is falſely called Marcianus. Being a moſt Learned man, he compoſed many Books, as Sixteen De Fideicommiſſis, Fourteen De Publicis Judiciis, a Book in Greek upon the Rhodian Law, and which muſt eſpecially be mentioned, another De Aſſe, or Diſtribution of an Inheritance, which Cujacius formerly cauſed to be bound up with the Code of Theodoſius, and not long ſince Fredericus Gronovius publiſhed at the end of his Learned Commentary De Seſtertiis. Cujacius, and after him Jacobus Gothofredus commends this Book of Mæcianus, to all ſuch as intend to ſtudy the Law, to be read before Juſtinian's Inſtitutions; for, in vain do ſuch apply themſelves to that labour, who do not underſtand the Diſtribution now mentioned.

He Married Fauſtina the Daughter of Pius.

57. Marcus took his toga Virilis in the Fifteenth year of his Age, and then was the Daughter of L. Ceionius Commodus, by the order of Hadrian contracted to him. Not long after he was made Præfect for the Latine Feriæ, and in that place carried himſelf very diſcreetly. He granted all his Fathers Patrimony to his Siſter, ſaying, when his Mother called him to a Diviſion, That he was content with his Grandfather's Eſtate, and that ſhe, if ſhe pleaſed, might give his Siſter hers too, that ſhe might not be inferior to her Husband. Notwithſtanding his gravity, contracted by the ſtudy of Philoſophy, he was ſo good natured, that he would be drawn to ſee the huntings of the Theatre, and behold the Spectacula, and naturally he loved ſuch Exerciſes. Though the ſtudy of Philoſopy diverted him from all, yet not ſo as to take away his Civility; for he was temperate without Contumacy, baſhful without lazineſs, and without ſadneſs grave. Being adopted by Antoninus, who had Married his Aunt, he was rather afraid than merry, and when his Domeſticks wondred at it, and asked him the reaſon, he argued with them concerning the Inconveniences which attended the Sovereign Command. Then for Annius, he began to be called Aurelius, becauſe of his paſſing into the Aurelian Family of the Antonini. Hadrian being dead, Antoninus reſolved to have him for his Son in-Law, the Contract being diſſolved betwixt his Daughter and Verus, who was not ripe enough for her, and he deſigned him Quæſtor and Conſul with himſelf. He conferred on him the Title of Cæſar, with other Honours, and the Conſulſhip the ſecond time, when he himſelf bore it the fourth. After this, Marrying Fauſtina, Pius his Daughter, and having a Daughter by her, he was adorned with the Tribunitial Power, as alſo with the Proconſular, (which Auguſtus and his Succeſſors took to themſelves, though Antoninus Pius ſeems to be the firſt who uſed the Title of Proconſul) and the Privilege of making the fifth Report, being in ſuch credit with Pius, that he would promote no man without him, neither would give ear to any whiſpers againſt him. For twenty and three years he ſo demeaned himſelf in this his Father's Houſe, that the Old Man's love to him increaſed, neither in all that time did he lye from him above two Nights, at ſeveral times.

He joyns with himſelf L. Commodus in the Imperial Soveraignty.

58. After the Death of Pius, being conſtrained by the Senate to take the Publick Government upon him, he made his Brother L. Commodus Partner with him in the Empire; calling him Lucius Aurelius Verus Commodus; he gave him the Titles of Cæſar and Auguſtus, and thenceforth they began to govern the Commonwealth with equal Right, and the Roman Empire to have two Emperors, upon which account they are in Law-Books known by the Names of Divi Fratres. He himſelf preſently took the Name of Antoninus, and as the Father of L. Commodus called him Verus, and adding that alſo of Antoninus, betrothed to him his Daughter Lucilla, and upon this occaſion, whereas Trajan had given Maintenance to certain Boys and Girls, whoſe liberality had been increaſed by Hadrian; and Pius, in Honor of Fauſtina, had given Alms to Girles, which from her had the Name of Fauſtinianæ; now there were other both Boys and Girls taken in, and allowed Maintenance. Having diſpatched what was to be done in the Senate, and in the Camp with the Soldiers, to whom they promiſed Twenty thouſand Nummi a piece, and to the reſt proportionably (that is, as Caſaubon notes, as mech more to the Centurions, and treble to the Tribunes and Præfects of Alæ) they buried their Father magnificently in the Tomb of Hadrian, and both of them commended him by Funeral Orations, conferring on him the uſual Ceremonies of a Divus. After their poſſeſſion of the Empire, they both carried themſelves ſo civilly, that no man miſſed the lenity of Pius. Still did Marcus follow the ſtudy of his dear Philoſophy, but received ſome diſturbance therein by the riſing of Tiber, which overflowed to ſuch extremity, that it ſpoiled many Buildings, and other Things, drowned many Animals, and procured a moſt grievous Famine; all which miſchiefs they moderated by their preſence and care. The Parthian War alſo now broke out, which Vologeſus had deſigned in the Reign of Pius, but now he declared by driving away Atidius Comelianus, who governed Syria. A War was alſo ready to break out here in Britain, and the Catti made Irruptions into Germany near the Rhine, and into Rhetia. Againſt the Britains was ſent Calphurnius Agricola, and Aufidius Victorinus againſt the Catti. But againſt the Parthian by conſent of the Senate was Verus himſelf ſent, whom Marcus his Brother accompanied as far as Capua, and gave him a Train befitting his Perſon.

Stirs in the Provinces.

59. Verus being come into Syria, lived deliciouſly at Antioch, and Daphne, and exerciſed himſelf with the Arms of Gladiators and Hunting, carrying on the War againſt the Parthians by his Lieutenants; whereas Marcus was no hour free from buſineſs, and partly unwilling, partly content, bore with the voluptuous humour of his Brother. Statius Priſcus proſpered well in Armenia, taking the City Artaxata, whereupon the Sirname of Armeniacus was given to both the Emperors, and Marcus refuſed it at firſt, though he took it afterward, as alſo that of Parthicus upon the ending of that War; and that of Pater Patriæ, he put off till the Return of his Brother. He ordained that all Citizens ſhould within Thirty days enter their Children that were born at Rome, in the Regiſters of the Governors of the Ærarium of Saturn; and throughout the Provinces he brought up the Uſe of the Publick Tabularii (Slaves at preſent, though afterwards Freemen) who ſhould do the ſame there, as the Governors of the Ærarium did at Rome, keeping the Publick Records; ſo that if any one in the Province happened to be queſtioned concerning his Liberty (as whether he was not a Slave) thence he might bring proof, as alſo might any one concerning his Age. About the ſtate of the Dead, whether they were free Perſons, he forbad inquiry to be made after five years. No Prince ever ſhewed more reſpect to the Senate; when he could he was always preſent, though he had nothing to report, if he was at Rome; and if he had any thing to Communicate, he came out of Campania when he was there. And in other Aſſemblies, he would ſtay till Night, neither did he ever go out of the Senate-Houſe (or Curia) till the Conſul ſaid, We ſhall trouble you no farther Conſcript Fathers. He made the Senate to Judg of Appeals from the Conſuls. He uſed ſingular Diligence in Judicial Proceedings, and added Days of Judicature to the former, ſo as in all

he

The Laws of Marcus.

Nihil vos moramur Patres Conſcripti. Hæc erat formula dimittendi Senatum; at Conſcionem, Diſcedite.

he appointed Two hundred and thirty every year for doing Buſineſs, and debating Cauſes. He firſt made the Prætor Tutelaris, or him who had the care of Tutors, that they might more eaſily be obtained, whereas formerly Tutors were wont to be demanded of the Conſuls.

60. The Guardians which governed the Perſons and Eſtates of Children under Puberty, the Romans called Tutors; and ſuch as governed the Eſtates and Perſons of thoſe that were Puberes, but under Five and twenty years of Age, they called Curators. Now as for Curators, whereas formerly they were not aſſigned for wantonneſs or madneſs, but by the Law called Lex Lætoria, he decreed that all that were once Adult ſhould receive Curators without rendring any cauſe why. This Lex Lætoria being alſo called Quinavicenaria, becauſe the Legitimate Age of Twenty five by [illegible]as determined, contained, as Jacobus Gothofredus hath obſerved, certain He[illegible] whereof this was the firſt, to provide Curators for Minors, that were wanton or Spendthrifts, and for thoſe that were Diſtracted: The ſecond ordained that Minors or thoſe under that Age, ſhould not ſtipulate, or oblige themſelves by making Bargains; whereupon it followed, that a Creditor who truſted one under that Age, ſhould loſe his Money, or that wherewith he truſted him. Further, Marcus had a care to leſſen the Publick Charges. He ſet himſelf againſt Calumnies, impoſing a mark upon falſe Accuſers. As for ſuch Accuſations as increaſed the Revenue, he deſpiſed them. For Publick Allowances, he invented many things. He aſſigned Curators out of the Senate to many Cities, that thereby he might extend the Senatorian Dignities; For not only Cities, but Regions and High-ways had their Curators, who took care of them. He provided for the Italian Cities in time of Famine, by Corn given them from Rome, being very careful that Grain ſhould not be wanting. He qualified every way the Shows of the Gladiators, as alſo the Charges of the Stage-Plays, commanding that the Players ſhould receive but five Aurei, and that no Setter of them forth ſhould exceed ten. Now for the Shows of the Gladiators, Caſaubon obſerves, that he qualified them three ways, eſpecially; Firſt, by diminiſhing the Expences of them. Then by commanding that they ſhould be without Blood, at leaſt when He was there, and without killing, their Swords being blunted, or ſo ordered that they could not deadly wound, as the Athletæ were wont to fight. And in the third place he took the Gladiators to ſerve in the Wars, making Soldiers of them, contrary to the old Cuſtom, whom he called Obſequentes, as Capitolinus alſo obſerves; which raiſed a Diſcourſe amongſt the People.

In l. 2. De Donationib. Cod. Th. lib. 8. tit. 22.

Marcus ſets himſelf againſt Accuſations.

Italy had ſeveral ſorts of Governors.

61. He took ſpecial care of the Ways both of the City, and of the Provinces. He provided for Italy by giving it Juridici, according as Hadrian had commanded thoſe of the Degree of Conſulares, to adminiſter Juſtice. Appian writes, That the Conſulares continued not long after Hadrian's Death; and indeed the Juriſdiction in the Provinces of Italy was in various Hands, ſometimes adminiſtred by Conſulares, ſometimes by Juridici, ſometimes by Correctors, and in the time of Conſtantine and afterwards, by Conſulares again, who yet ſeem not to have been of the ſame Dignity with thoſe in the time of Hadrian, to whom Capitolinus gives the Appellation of Conſulares viri. The Hiſtorian farther writes, That Spain being exhauſted, he ſupplied it out of Italy, againſt the Command of Trajan; but he did it modeſtly. As to this, we muſt know, that Italy being much unpeopled by the Civil Wars, Auguſtus repleniſhed it with frequent Colonies, and from him the ſucceeding Princes took it for a Maxim of State, to be ſparing in raiſing Men out of Italy; which was ſo conſtantly obſerved, that the Italians withdrew their minds from War, and applied them to Arts of Peace and Agriculture, as we ſhall ſee more in the ſecond Volume of this Work. The Legions therefore being ever ſupplied with Soldiers out of the Provinces, and eſpecially out of Spain, later Princes were wont to fill up the Towns that were ſo exhauſted with Italian Colonies, which it ſeems Trajan forbad; but Marcus thought fit for all that to do it, but with much Modeſty and Reverence to his Memory.

Laws made by Marcus.

We are told further by Capitolinus, That Marcus added other Laws concerning the Twentieth part of Inheritances, already, and hereafter to be ſpoken of; concerning the Tutelage of Liberti; of the Eſtates of Mothers; of the Succeſſions of Sons for the Mothers part, and that Foreign Senators ſhould poſſeſs a fourth part in Italy. As for the Mothers Eſtate, Marcus introduced new Law, That Children ſhould ſucceed their Mothers which died Inteſtate; and this he did by that which ſometimes is called the Oration of D. Marcus, and ſometimes the Senatuſconſultum Orphitianum, because it was made when Orphitus and Ruffus were Conſuls, as Juſtinian tells us in his Inſtitutions. This year of their Conſulſhip was the Twentieth from that of the Conſulſhip of Fl. Tertyllus, in which was made the Senatuſconſultum Tertyllianum, whereby the Mother was inabled to inherit the Eſtates of her Children, whereas by the Laws of the Twelve Tables, neither of theſe could be. Now this concerning the Succeſſion of Children, is attributed to Marcus, becauſe the Emperors were wont to ſend their Epiſtles or Orations, as they are termed, to the Senate, concerning ſuch or ſuch a matter; which being read, the Senatuſconſulta paſſed, and thereby it came to paſs, that the ſame things were aſcribed both to the Orations and Senatuſconſulta. At length the Emperors Valentinian, Theodoſius, and Arcadius called the Grandchildren alſo to ſucceed their Grandmothers; yet ſo as they ſhould receive one third part leſs than their Fathers or Mothers ſhould have received; but Juſtinian made them [illegible] equal in Right who ſucceeded to one dying Inteſtate. As for Senators having a fourth part of their Eſtates in Italy, there was ſomething of it before, as appears from Pliny Junior, who ſpeaks of a third part; that They which ſtood for Honours might take Rome and Italy for their Country, and not like Strangers for an Inn or Stable.

Scævola his chiefeſt Adviſer in Law-Matters.

62. To the Curators of Regions and Ways he gave Power, either to puniſh, or ſend to the Præfect of the City to be puniſhed, ſuch as exacted any thing from any man beſides the Vectigalia. He rather reſtored Old Law, than introduced New. He had his Præfects with him by the Authority and Præſcripts of whom he dictated always his Laws. Eſpecially he made Uſe of Scævola the Lawyer. This was Cervidius Scævola who flouriſhed at this time, and in all his Anſwers uſed extraordinary Caution to accommodate Law to the condition and quality of the Fact, and therefore was wont to uſe this Clauſe, According as Matters are propounded. Modeſtinus reckons him amongſt the Lawyers of the higheſt Form. But to return to our Hiſtorian, he adds, That Marcus treated the People no otherwiſe than it was wont to be uſed in the Commonwealth. He was in all things moſt Moderate, in deterring men from what was ill, in alluring them to goodneſs, in rewarding and indulging; and he made good of bad; and of good, exceeding good; and bore with Moderation the Reproaches of ſome Perſons. He was of ſo compaſſionate a Nature, that upon occaſion of the Fall of a Dancer on the Ropes, he commanded Mattreſſes to be laid under them when they Danced; whence it came to paſs, that in the time of Capitolinus, Nets were wont to be hung under the Ropes, to keep them from falling to the Ground.

His War with the Marcomanni.

While the Parthian War was carrying on, another aroſe with the Marcomanni, which the Officers upon the Borders for ſome time kept off, till the former could be made an end of. This War of the Marcomanni ſtruck them at Rome with ſo great terror, that he ſent for Prieſts from every place (by reaſon of Sacrifices, Caſaubon thinks) of which he procured ſo great a Number, that he was jeered by the People upon that account; as in caſe he returned Victor, Oxen would fail and be all deſtroyed. He filled up ſtrange Rites, he luſtrated or purged Rome all manner of (Superſtitious) ways; and being kept back from going to the War, he celebrated the Lectiſternia, according to the Roman Rite, for ſeven days. So great a Peſtilence happened, that dead Bodies were carried out in common Carriages. Then were the moſt ſevere Laws of the Antonini made, of Burying and Sepulchres; for they ordained, That every one that would ſhould not build a Sepulchre, as ſaith the Hiſtorian, is obſerved at this very day; poſſibly not with much Coſt and Labour. He was ſo kind, that ſuch as died poor, he commanded to be Buried at the Publick Charge.

Both Emperors undertake an Expedition againſt them.

63. The Marcomanni and Victorali making great diſturbance, both Emperors went out in their Coat-Armour; and time it was; for ſuch Barbarians as were driven out by others, except they were received, made alſo War. And this their Expedition did not a little Good; for being come as far as Aquilcia where they purpoſed to Winter, moſt of the Kings retired with their People, and killed the Authors of the Inſurrection. And the Quadi having loſt their King, ſaid they would not confirm him that was choſen in his room, without the conſent of the Emperors. But Lucius went unwillingly in this Expedition, moſt of the Mutineers ſending and begging Pardon for their Defection; and when Furius Victorinus and Part of the Army was loſt, he was of opinion that they ſhould return home. On the other ſide, Marcus imagining that the Barbarians did but Counterfeit, pretending to fly, that they might decline ſo great a War as they ſaw was coming upon them, was for going forward and puſhing on the Affair. Therefore fore paſſing over the Alps they proceeded further, and ſetled all Matters that tended to the Defence of Italy and Illyricum. Lucius however urged, that having ſent Letters before to the Senate, he might return to Rome, and in the way as he was ſitting with his Brother in the Chariot, he died of an Apoplexy. Capitolinus aſcribes their Return to the deſire Lucius had to be at Rome, it ſeems to enjoy the Pleaſures of the City; but he urged it more after the loſs of the Præfectus Prætorio, and part of the Army. But Galen who was ſent for to Aquileia, gives another account of their Return, That it was by reaſon of the Plague mentioned by Capitolinus, which raged exceedingly both in Countrey and Army. It is written of Lucius, That he had always Learned and Eloquent Men about him, and that he loved his Maſters, and was beloved of them. He demeaned himſelf toward Marcus his Benefactor with indifferent reſpect till his Expedition into Aſia, but living there in a Luxurious manner, after his return he carried himſelf with no great agreeableneſs, and gave himſelf up to all manner of Debaucheries, ſpending his time in continual Feaſting, and other ſorts of voluptuouſneſs, and ordering himſelf according to the Government of his debauched and infamous Freedmen. Some ſuſpected he died by Poiſon; but he lay Speechleſs three days, and being carried to Altinum died there. Marcus having made him Emperor with equal Power, gave him the Name of Verus, transferring upon him his own; whereas before, he was called Commodus. But Valeſius obſerveth againſt Joſeph Scaliger, that of theſe two Brothers who firſt of all governed the Roman Empire with equal Right, him whom the Latine Writers name Marcus, the Greeks call Verus; and him whom the former call Verus, they ordinarily ſignifie by the Name of Lucius.

Lucius dies.

Vide Capitolinum in vita Veri.

*In Annat. Amm. p.*344.

64. But of ſuch Sanctity was Marcus the Surviver, that he concealed what he could, and if he could not, excuſed the Vices of Verus, though they exceedingly diſpleaſed him; and being dead, he conferred on him the title of Divus, with the Honours uſually given to ſuch, and both honoured and provided for his Relations. Now Capitolinus tells us, That there is no Prince, but is ſtruck at by evil Tongues, inſomuch that it was reported, That Marcus took Verus away either by Poiſoning one ſide of his Knife, and giving him a piece of Meat which touched that ſide, keeping to himſelf the other, or by the help of Poſidippus his Phyſitian, who Let him Blood unſeaſonably. But Dion Caſſius relates, that Verus laid in wait to take away the life of Marcus, and was himſelf taken off to prevent it: and not only Dion, but Philoſtratus alſo hints as much, as is obſerved by Salmaſius, writing that Herodes was alſo ſuſpected by Marcus, as being of the Conſpiracy, and that Marcus made choice of ſome of his Athenians to bring Complaints to him of his Tyrannical carriage; and therefore Herodes complained that this he had got by having Lucius for his Gueſt. However, Marcus after the death of Verus, being delivered from the trouble of ſo uneaſie a Partner, with more freedom and vigour applied himſelf to the courſe of Virtue and Philoſophy, being of the Stoick Profeſſion, which he ſo much was Maſter of, that he never changed his Countenance either for Joy or Sorrow; with great Moderation and Benignity he governed the Provinces. He warred proſperouſly againſt the Germans. In particular he himſelf diſpatched the War againſt the Marcomanni in ſuch a manner as had not been known, both in reſpect of Valour and Felicity, and at ſuch a time when the Peſtilence deſtroyed many Thouſands both of the Provincials and the Soldiers. By this means he delivered the Pannonia's from the Marcomanni, Sarmatæ, Wandalls and Quadi, and returned to Rome, with his Son Commodus, whom he had made Cæſar, and triumphed with him. Now in reference to this War with the Marcomanni, though Capitolinus relates ſeveral things betwixt the Death of Lucius, and it; as if Marcus had diſpatched it ſome large time intervening, Salmaſius blameth him for ſo doing; eſpecially for mentioning that Commodus did partake with his Father in his Triumph, before he ſpeaks of the finiſhing of this War. For from Galen he obſerves that Lucius dying, Marcus returned to Rome with his Reliques, which being Buried, and he made a Divus, he preſently undertook again the Expedition againſt the Marcomanni which had been interrupted by his Death. This War was of extraordinary conſequence, both in reſpect of the loſs of the Romans, and the great things performed by Marcus; which if they of this time were to be believed, in an Inſcription in a Stone erected to his Memory after his victorious return, advanced his glory above all the Performances of the greateſt Emperors. But what theſe Performances were we know not. Ammianus Marcellinus toucheth at them; but the place of his Book is ſo corrupted, that though Caſaubon and Salmaſius both have indea-

The War againſt the Marcomanni was of vaſt Conſequence.

vour

voured to amend it; yet Valeſius complains of their ill Succeſs, and plainly tells us, That as Hippocrates forbids Remedies to be applied to thoſe that are deſperately Sick, ſo he is of opinion, that one ought to abſtain from the deſperate places of Authors.

*Lib.*31.p. 445. Edit. Valeſ.

Marcus ſets to Sale his rich Furniture.

65. But this we know from Capitolinus, That having exhauſted his Treaſury in this War againſt the Marcomanni, and not being inclined to lay any extraordinary Impoſitions upon the People, he ſet to Sale in the Forum of Trajan, abundance of rich Furniture, Clothes, and Veſſels of Gold, Silver and other precious Materials which belonged to the Imperial Houſes. The Sale continued for two Months, and ſo much Gold he raiſed as to diſpatch the remainders of the War according to his deſire, and afterwards he gave leave to the Buyers, to bring in what they had bought, and to receive their Money again if they pleaſed; neither did he trouble any that brought the things again, or refuſed to do it. But as we ſaid, ſo great a ſhock he found coming upon him and the Empire, as put him upon very extraordinary Courſes, eſpecially a great Peſtilence raging at the ſame time. This made him call Slaves to take Arms as had been practiced in the Punick War, whom he named Voluntarii, after the example of Volones. He armed alſo the Gladiators, whom as we ſaid, he called Obſequentes. Nay, he made Soldiers of the Robbers of Dalmatia and Dardania. He armed alſo the Diocmitæ, or thoſe that purſued Robbers, the Romans having ſuch diſpoſed in all quarters where the caſe required. He purchaſed the Aſſiſtance of Germans againſt Germans, beſides the Legions, which he furniſhed out with all Diligence. For all Nations from the limit of Illyricum as far as Gall, had conſpired, of whom Capitolinus reckons up Fifteen hard Names, beſides the Marcomanni, whom Marcus overthrew in the Paſſage of the Danube, and reſtored the Plunder they had taken from the Provincials. But ſo with his great labour he overcame moſt fierce Nations, the Soldiers imitating him, the Legati and Præfecti Prætorio leading the Army; and the Marcomanni yielded themſelves to him, of whom he tranſlated many into Italy. He always was wont with the Senators and Great Men to Conſult, not only concerning Military but Civil Affairs, ſaying, That it was more fit that he ſhould follow the advice of ſo many and ſuch Friends, than that ſo many and ſuch ſhould follow his Will and Pleaſure. Many Noble Perſons were loſt in the War, to all whom he Erected Statues in the Forum of Trajan. His Friends often perſwaded him to deſiſt from Wars, and return to Rome, but he refuſed to comply with them, and ſtaid till he had finiſhed all. So that to thoſe that carped at him as by reaſon of his Philoſophy, and being a Scholar, not pliable enough to the labours of War and Government, he might eaſily anſwer by letters, or word of mouth, when as by his very Actions they were confuted.

He changeth the way of the Provinces.

66. Of the Provinces, ſome he changed from Proconſular to Conſular, others if Conſular, he made Proconſular or Prætorian according to the Neceſſity of War. This had been, and continued to be, the Cuſtom of all Princes after Auguſtus. who taking to himſelf at the Diviſion, the unquiet Provinces, made ſome Conſular by his Conſular Legates ſent into them, and gave the quiet to the People, ſome of which were called Proconſular, becauſe Conſuls after the going out of their Offices during the Commonwealth, took the Provinces by lot, and then governed them as Proconſuls. Therefore the Emperors having the Power over the Armies, if Provinces happened to be unquiet, they took them from the People, and from being Proconſular, made them Conſular, and in room of them gave them others, which then from Conſular were changed to be Proconſular. And though at firſt, as Salmaſius obſerves, in the Diviſion of the Provinces, there were but two amongſt thoſe which fell to the ſhare of the People that were Proconſular, and ten that were Prætorian, into which Prætors were ſent, yet afterwards thoſe Prætores and Prætorii were called Proconſuls, and governed them with Proconſular Authority; whereupon it happened, that ſo frequent mention is made of Proconſuls, who never had been Conſuls indeed. Now as the People had for their Governors Proconſuls and Prætors, ſo the Prince had for his, Conſulares and Prætors, which were all properly called his Legati, but the Provinces were ſtill ſtyled Conſular and Prætorian, and ſo Capitolinus is to be underſtood in this place. But Marcus had need to make ſome Conſular and Prætorian, and thereby to take care of them by what the Hiſtorian further tells us, that the Moors waſted almoſt all Spain, though by his Legati he reſtrained them; and that in Ægypt the Soldiers he calls Milites Bucolici did great miſchief, till they were vanquiſhed by Avidius Caſſius. There was alſo diſturbance amongſt the Sequani in Gall, which by ſeaſonable ſeverity and his Authority he repreſſed. To his Son Commodus, having ſent for him to the Limit of Germany, he preſented the Toga Virilis, thereupon gave a Congiary to the People, and deſigned him Conſul before the time. If any one was proſcribed by the Præfect of the City, he did not willingly receive him. He was moſt ſparing in giving away publick Money, (to his praiſe rather than reprehenſion) but yet he was bountiful to good Men, and to decaying Towns, and even remitted Tributes and Cuſtoms, though the Commonwealth ſtood in need of them.

Many Nations revolted.

Marcus reſtrains the Extravagance of pretended Philoſophers.

His Mildneſs.

Chriſtian Soldiers by their Prayers obtain Rain.

Vide Euſeb. in Chron. & Hiſt. lib. 5. c. 5. Tertul. Apol. c. 5.

67. When he was abſent from the City, he took eſpecial care that the publick Shows and Divertiſements ſhould not be preſented but by the richeſt ſort of Men. When he took away the Gladiators to the Wars, there was a Talk went amongſt the People, as if he would take away their Recreations, and compell them to apply themſelves to Philoſophy; for on the Market-Days, he had commanded that Pantomimus ſhould not act till it was late, leſt Trade ſhould be hindered. And a report there was, That as in all times there are many who for Gain and Intereſt apply themſelves to ſuch courſes as they find Princes to be inclined to, ſo now there were many that under pretence of being Philoſophers, were burthenſom to the State, and were troubleſom to private Men; poſſibly by Intruding themſelves into their Houſes, and requiring Meat and Drink, and other Conveniences, which if they could not obtain, they loaded them with Reproaches, carrying themſelves big becauſe of the Pallium they wore, and it might be without the Tunica, as they of the Cynical Seat were wont to go. But Capitolinus ſaith, That Marcus removed this Inconvenience, which poſſibly, as to the Commonwealth, might have extended it ſelf to freedom from being Tutors and Guardians, and other Burthens in the State, to which true Philoſophers might plead ſome Title. It was his cuſtom to puniſh all ſorts of Crimes, more mildly than the Laws ordained, though ſometimes againſt Perſons notoriouſly guilty, and of grievous Crimes he was inexorable. The Capital Cauſes of Men of Reputation he heard himſelf, and that with all fairneſs imaginable; inſomuch that he reprehended a Prætor who quickly diſpatched Trials, and bad him hear them over again, ſaying, That the Dignity of the Perſons was concerned that they ſhould be heard by him who judged for the People: The Prætors were wont to delegate their Juriſdiction to Decemviri or others, to take Cognizance of the Cauſes of Men of Note, which Marcus here reforms; truly affirming, That it concerned their Dignity that they ſhould be judged by them who judged for the People, and not by ſuch Delegates. But ſhewed himſelf mild and civil towards ſuch Enemies as were taken; and of the ſubdued Nations, he planted an infinite number in the Roman Soil. To this Capitolinus ſubjoyns, that he extorted Thunder from Heaven by his Prayers againſt the Device of his Enemies, obtaining Rain for his Men when they were oppreſſed with thirſt. But we are told by Chriſtian Writers, that this was procured by the Soldiers of the Legion called Melitina, being Chriſtians, who fell upon their knees in preſence of their fellow-Soldiers, and in the Name of Chriſt, ſo far prevailed with Almighty God, that preſently abundance of Rain fell, and the Enemy was defeated by Thunder and Lightning. This Legion was thence called Fulminatrix, or Thundering, and obtained by this an honourable Edict in behalf of the Chriſtian Religion, although the Letters which go under Name of this Emperor in reference to this thing, be either counterfeit or interpolated. But what Capitolinus aſcribes to the Prayers of the Emperor, that do Dio and Claudian to the Magi.

68. Marcus intended to have made Marcomannia and Sarmatia both Provinces; but that he was hindered by the Rebellion of Avidius Caſſius, who took upon him the Imperial title in the Eaſt; ſome ſaid at the ſuggeſtion of Fauſtina the Empreſs, who deſpaired of her Husband's life, as others believed, becauſe he thought he would periſh, or had already, in the Marcomannian War. But Marcus was not much moved with the News of his Revolt, neither did he rage againſt his Relations; but he was declared an Enemy by the Senate, and his Eſtate was ſeiſed by the Publick Ærarium. Leaving then the purſuit of the War with the Marcomanni, he went againſt Caſſius; and at Rome there were Tumults, out of fear that the Rebels would come thither in his Abſence. But Caſſius was preſently Slain, and his Head brought to the Emperor, who commanded it to be Buried, not rejoycing at his Death. And Mæcianus the Son of Caſſius, to whoſe care Alexandria had been committed, was killed by the Army.

But Marcus forbad the Senate to proceed againſt any in Extremity, that were conſcious to the Defection; and he deſired, That in his Reign no Senator might be put to Death, leſt thereby it ſhould be polluted: Thoſe that were Condemned to Iſlands, or Deportation he commanded alſo to be recalled, only a very few Centurions being put to Death. He pardoned the Cities that had ſided with Caſſius; nay, he forgave the Antiochians, who prated much againſt him in Caſſius his behalf, from whom he had taken the Spectacula, publick Meetings, and all ſorts of publick Orations, and againſt whom he had ſent a moſt heavy Edict. Though he had refuſed to ſee Antioch when he went into Syria, as he did Cyrrus, the place where Caſſius was born; yet having been at Alexandria, he went thither. He tranſacted many things with Kings, and eſtabliſhed Peace; all the Kings and the Ambaſſadors of the Perſian meeting him. He was moſt dear to all the Eaſtern Provinces, with many of which he left footſteps of his Philoſophy; amongſt the Ægyptians in particular, he carried himſelf like a Citizen and a Philoſopher in all their Temples and publick Places; and whereas they of Alexandria had wiſhed well in ſeveral reſpects to Caſſius, yet he pardoned them all, and to ſhew that he was reconciled, left one of his Daughters with them. As for his carrying himſelf like a Philoſopher, others write, that when he was there, he propoſed his Queſtions to the Philoſophers, and anſwered theirs, as it was the cuſtom for Learned Men to meet in publick Places to confer concerning learned Points, and diſcuſs Queſtions. But well might he pardon them for ſiding with Caſſius, when he bore a mind full of Clemency even to him and his Relations. He ſuffered him to be killed, that is, did not revenge his Death, but commanded it not. Heliodorus his Son was Baniſhed into an Iſland, and others went away into ſore Baniſhment with part of their Eſtates. Other Sons of Caſſius received more than one half of their Father's Patrimony, and were aſſiſted with Gold and Silver; moreover, were the Women with Ornaments. Nay, he grieved that Caſſius was Slain, ſaying, That he would have had his Reign paſſed over without the blood of a Senator.

The Clemency of Marcus.

He loſeth his Wife Fauſtina.

69. In his Winter-Quarters, at the foot of the Mountain Taurus, and a Village called Halala, he left Fauſtina his Wife, who there died ſuddenly; he had had her with him in Summer too, and had given her the Title of Mater Caſtrorum. From Dio it appears, alſo from Coines, that after his Victory over the Quadi, he was himſelf ſaluted the ſeventh time Imperator, and ſhe by this Title of Mater Caſtrorum; for Livia having that given her of Parens Patriæ, afterward this flattery was drawn into Example. And it ſeems Marcus approved it, for Capitolinus tells us further, That having praiſed her, he deſired of the Senate that they would decree her Honours and a Temple, and took it kindly that they made her a Diva; and that he inſtituted a New Company of Girls, called Fauſtinianæ, in honour of her. He made the Village where ſhe died, a Colony (called thence Fauſtinopolis) and built her a Temple; and this he did, though ſhe had the fame of an unchaſt Woman, of which he was either ignorant, or diſſembled it. Indeed ſhe was accounted unchaſte, and Commodus was thought begotten by ſome other Man than Marcus, to whom Julian his Ape in his Tale of the Caſar's objects both his reckoning his Wife amongſt the Heroinæ, and preferring ſo bad a Son; but he makes him excuſe the firſt by Cuſtom, and the ſecond both by Cuſtom, and the Natural Affection which Fathers (ſuch it ſeems he thought him, however he did of himſelf) bear to their Sons. He makes him alleadge, That he was not the firſt that honoured his Wife. To have began ſuch a thing would have been unreaſonable, but to deprive ones neareſt Relations of what is uſual, would come neareſt to Injuſtice. But to return to our Story; having ſettled the Affairs of the Eaſt, he came to Athens, and there was initiated in the Temple of Ceres, to prove himſelf Innocent, and above entered the Sacrarium. For it was the Cuſtom for the Pagan Prieſts when they celebrated their Myſteries, to command all that found not themſelves Innocent, even as far as Purpoſes and Intentions, to get them gone. And they were wont it ſeems, as Caſaubon obſerves from Lucian, to drive away three ſorts of Perſons, Atheiſts, Chriſtians, and Epicureans.

In Pſeudomanti.

70. Returning into Italy, he came by Sea to Brunduſium in a grievous Tempeſt. There he took the Gown, and commanded his Soldiers to do the ſame; neither ever under him were they ſeen to be without them (or Legati) in Italy. Having Triumphed at Rome, he made his Son Commodus his Colleague in the Tribunitial Power, gave a Congiary to the People, and preſented them with

He dies.

Extraordinary Shows. Many things then in the State he corrected. He moderated the Expence of the Shows of the Gladiators. That Saying of Plato was always in his mouth, That States would flouriſh if either Philoſophers Reigned, or Princes would be Philoſophers. He Married his Son to the Daughter of Brutius Præſens, Solemnized the Wedding no otherwiſe than as private Perſons were wont to do, but gave a Congiary to the People. Having formerly ſpent three years in the Wars againſt the Marcomanni, he undertook now another Expedition againſt theſe Northern Nations, and in it died at Sirmium. At the beginning of his Sickneſs, deſpairing it ſeems of Recovery, he adviſed his Son to ſtay and diſpatch the remainders of the War, which he was unwilling to do, pretending fear of the raging Peſtilence. He abſtained from Meat and Drink, deſiring to die, and increaſed his Diſeaſe. On the ſixth day he called his Friends to him, and laughing at the things of this life, and contemning Death, he asked them why they wept for him, and did not rather think of the Peſtilence and Common Death? and when they would be gone, he ſigh'd and ſaid, If you leave me, I bid you farewel, as going before you. The Army hearing he was Sick, grieved exceſſively, for they dearly loved him. On the ſeventh day he grew worſe, and only admitted his Son; whom again he preſently diſmiſſed leſt he ſhould catch the Diſeaſe. And yet we are told that in his Sickneſs he grieved that he ſhould leave ſuch a Son behind him, as ſhould be pernicious to the Empire, and that he wiſhed him dead. It ſeems his Natural Affection prevailed, as Julian makes him ſpeak for himſelf. His Son being gone, he covered his head as going to ſleep, but that Night he died; of the Plague it ſhould appear, by what Capitolinus writes, of ſending away his Son, leſt he ſhould be infected; yet Dion ſaith, that he died not of that Epidemical Sickneſs. Being asked by his Friends, to whom he would commend his Son, He anſwered, to them, if he ſhould deſerve it, and to the Immortal Gods.

Things objected againſt him.

Covetouſneſs.

Anſwered.

71. As for his Faults, it was objected againſt him, That he promoted thoſe that abuſed his Bed; namely, Tertullus, Utilius, Orphitus, and Moderatus, to various Honours; and as for Tertullus, he found him dining with his Wiſe, which the ſevere gravity of the Court would not permit, and for this Indulgence he was jeered upon the Stage by a Mimick, and various talks being raiſed, the People blamed him for his Eaſineſs. But he dreaded nothing more than to be accounted Covetous, which cauſed him by many Epiſtles to purge himſelf of this Vice. And yet he needed not have done it, if raſh and cenſorious Perſons, who think all men as bad as themſelves, or would have them ſo, had conſidered that he did not enrich himſelf by the Eſtates of proſcribed Perſons, as bad Princes were wont to do; yet they took occaſion to rail againſt him, poſſibly from a Law he firſt made, that the Lex Julia Majeſtatis ſhould extend alſo to dead Perſons. And he was very ſparing in Largeſſes, and giving away the publick Money, which opened the mouths of thoſe that were Indigent. But let what Dio writes be conſidered in his behalf, to ſtop the mouths of debauched Perſons, who think none are virtuous, as impure Men and Women believe none are Chaſt. He tells us (as Xiphilin hath Epitomized him) that when he was at Athens, he there hired with Annual ſtipends, Profeſſors of all ſorts to read for the benefit of all Nations. Being returned to Rome when he ſpake to the People, he uſed this Expreſſion, That he had been abſent many years, at which the People cried out Eight, and lift up their Hands to atteſt it, their meaning being that they were to receive ſo many Aurei to Feaſt with. At this he ſmiled, and ſaid alſo Eight, and afterwards gave ſo many to every man, ſo great a Sum as they never had before received. This done, he forgave to all what was due to the Fiſcus or Publick Ærarium within Forty and ſix years, the Sixteen of Hadrian excepted, and all Bills and Obligations relating to them, he commanded to be Burnt in the Forum. To many Cities he gave Money, and in particular to Smyrna, which had been diſtreſſed with a great Earthquake, and committed it to the Care of a Perſon of Senatorian Quality, who had been Prætor, to ſee it repaired. Wherefore, ſaith he, I wonder at thoſe who reprehend Marcus, and deny that he was of a generous Mind. For though he was very frugal, yet he was never wanting to lay out Money when it was requiſite, and in Exacting Money, he was never troubleſom to any, and was at vaſt Expence in other things, though not in what related to his own Family.

Diſſimulation.

72. But there were thoſe alſo that gave out that he diſſembled, and was not ſo plain and clear ſpirited as were Pius or Verus. But Dion Caſſius on the con-

Alſo anſwered.

Arrogancy alſo anſwered.

Lib. 1. c. 13.

Κοινονοημοσύνη.

Χρηστὸν τ' ὄντα ϗ φιλάνθρωπον.

trary affirms, That he did nothing by deſign, but from the Preſcript of Virtue, as appeared, in that though he lived Fifty and eight years, ten Months, and two and twenty Days; and was long a Prince with Antoninus his Father, and reigned himſelf Nineteen Years and eleven Days; yet in all his life he was of an equal and conſtant tenor; neither ever in any thing was he changed. He was truly a good Man therefore, there being nothing feigned or counterfeit in him. To what Dio writes, we can more eaſily aſſent, becauſe in the Book he wrote concerning himſelf, containing his Philoſophical Exerciſes and Meditations, he preſſes ſtill this virtue of Truth, Candor, and Sincerity. But there was another thing ſtill laid to his Charge, and that was, That he confirmed the Arrogancy of the Court, by removing his Friends from his common Society, and from his Feaſts. Indeed he writes in that Book now mentioned, that amongſt other things, he obſerved in, and learnt from his Father, a Moderate condeſcending to other mens occaſions, as an ordinary man (ſo Caſaubon the Son tranſlates that word into Engliſh, which Caſaubon the Father, ſaith is proper to Marcus) neither abſolutely requiring of his Friends that they ſhould wait upon him at ordinary Meals, nor that they ſhould of neceſſity accompany him in his Journies. And this is thought by worthy Men to have been only his fault: He did not require Attendance at his private Repaſts, both giving eaſe thereby to himſelf, and thoſe who were to Eat with him. For Salmaſius obſerves, that beſides at Publick Feaſts, there were thoſe who were compelled to be preſent at this Prince his private Meats, becauſe he could not well be without Company. And this Attendance Marcus remitted, as Galen writes of him, that he remitted him his Attendance, and following of him to the German War, which he attributes to his kindneſs and love to Mankind, agreeable to the other word which the Emperor uſes in expreſſing his Fathers Humanity. As he loved to be true himſelf, ſo, Capitolinus tells us, That he would not eaſily believe ſuch as moved him in buſineſſes, but always was long in ſearching out the truth. Accordingly he himſelf tells us, That this alſo he obſerved in his Father, an Accurate Examination of things in Conſultations, and patient hearing of others: that he would not haſtily give over the ſearch of the matter, as one eaſie to be ſatisfied with ſudden Notions, and Apprehenſions. He ſubjoyns his care to preſerve his Friends; how neither at any time he would carry himſelf towards them with diſdainful Neglect, and grow weary of them; nor yet at any time be much fond of them.

He was a good Husband.

Lib. 1. c. 14.

73. So good an Husband Marcus was, what wife ſoever Fauſtina proved, that ſhe being dead, Fabia (the Siſter of Verus) indeavoured to ſucceed her in his Bed; but Capitolinus tells us at parting, that he took for his Concubine the Daughter of his Wives Procurator, leſt he ſhould bring a Mother-in-law upon ſo many Children. Thus was it uſual we ſee for the Emperors to have Concubines, not only mention being made of this of Marcus, but alſo of the Concubine of Antoninus Pius. However his Wife Fauſtina deſerved it, yet when he wrote that Golden Book of his Meditations ſtill extant, it appears that he had a good opinion of her, for amongſt other things which he aſcribes to the Gods, as having received them from them, this is one, That he had ſuch a Wife, ſo Obedient, ſo Loving, ſo ingenuous. Theſe other things were, That he had good Grandfathers and Parents, a good Siſter, good Maſters, good Domeſticks, loving Kinſmen almoſt all he had, and that he never through haſt and raſhneſs tranſgreſſed againſt any of them. That he was not long brought up by the Concubine of his Father, and that he preſerved the flower of his Youth. That he took not upon him to be a man before his time, but rather put it off longer than he needed. That he lived under the Government of his Lord and Father, who would take away from him all Pride and Vain-glory, and reduce him to that conceit and opinion, that it was not impoſſible for a Prince to live in the Court without a Troop of Guards and Followers, extraordinary Apparel; ſuch and ſuch Torches and Statues, and other like particulars of State and Magnificence; but that one might reduce and contract himſelf almoſt to the ſtate of a private Man, and yet not become the more baſe and remiſs in publick Matters and Affairs, wherein Power and Authority are requiſite. But he had ſuch a Brother, who, by his own Example, might ſtir him up to think of himſelf, and by his reſpect and love, delight and pleaſe him. That he had ingenuous Children, not born diſtorted, nor with any other Natural nor Bodily Infirmity. That he was no great Proficient in the Study of Rhetorick and Poetry, nor of other Faculties, which perchance he might have dwelt upon, if he had found himſelf to proceed in them with Succeſs.

74. Moreover, He accounts it a gift of the Gods, that he ſhould have the Gratitude to prefer by times thoſe by whom he was brought up, to ſuch Places and Dignities as they ſeemed to him moſt to deſire; and that he did not put them off with Hope and Expectation. That he ever knew Apollonius Ruſticus, and Maximus. That he had occaſion often and effectually to conſider and meditate with himſelf concerning that life which is according to Nature; what the Nature and manner of it is. That his Body in ſuch a life had been able to hold out ſo long. That he never had to do with Benedicta and Theodotus, and afterwards when he fell into ſome fits of Love, was ſoon cured. That having been often diſpleaſed with Ruſticus, he never did any thing to him for which afterwards he had reaſon to repent. That it being ſo, that his Mother was to die young, yet ſhe lived with him all her later years. That as often as he had occaſion to relieve any that were poor or faln into ſome preſent neceſſity, he never was anſwered by his Officers, that there was not ready Money enough to do it, and that he himſelf never had occaſion to require the like ſuccour from any others. That he had choice of fit and able Men, to whom he might commit the bringing up of his Children. That by Dreams he had received help, as for other things ſo in particular, how he might ſtay his Caſting of Blood, and Cure his Dizzineſs. That when he firſt applied himſelf to Philoſophy, he did not fall into the hands of ſome Sophiſts, nor ſpent his time either in reading the manifold Volumes of ordinary Philoſophers, nor practiſing himſelf in the Solution of Arguments and Fallacies, nor dwelt upon the Studies of the Meteors, and other Natural Curioſities. All theſe things, he ſaith, without the Aſſiſtance of the Gods and Fortune, could not have been. As for the three Perſons he mentions here, he tells us alſo, for what he was beholding to them, all of them having Contributed to the forming of that excellent Virtuous life, whereby he was ſo Exemplary; but amongſt all the Perſons he mentions to have aſſiſted him, he ſeems chiefly obliged to Ruſticus, by whoſe indeavours amongſt other things; He firſt, he ſaith, entred into the apprehenſion that his life wanted ſome redreſs of Cure. This was a good ſtep to the Cure, that he was convinced of his Want of it, and neceſſary to amendment it was, That he ſhould know himſelf to be out of order.

He was chiefly obliged to Ruſticus.

75. As a Direction to arrive at this amendment and recovery, he propounded to himſelf not to do any even of the leaſt things without Relation unto the end; and the end of reaſonable Creatures he affirms to be this, to follow and obey him, who is the Reaſon, as it were, and the Law of this great City the World: Or as he ſaith in another place, the Providence of Almighty God is the Law, who over-rules all things in the World, and of his infinite Wiſdom diſperſeth all particular Events, to the general Good, and preſervation of the Univerſe. That he might have no Letts or Rubbs in his way to this Recovery, he had a true Senſe and Eſtimation of Sublunary things, and of Humane Affairs, though not to deride them, as Capitolinus writes. He was convinced of the Vanity of earthly Enjoyments, and thence came to know that the Happineſs of a Man muſt be in ſomething higher than in gratifying the ſenſual appetite. For he writes, That The time of Man's life is a point; the ſubſtance of it ever flowing, the ſenſe obſcure, and the whole Compoſition of the Body tending to Corruption. His Soul is reſtleſs, Fortune uncertain, and Fame doubtful; to be brief, as a Current, (or Stream) ſo are all things belonging to the Body; as a dream or ſmoak, ſo are all that (here) belong to the Soul. Our life is a Warfare, and a meer Pilgrimage. Fame after life is no better than Oblivion. What is it then that will adhere and follow? One only thing, Philoſophy. And pity it was that he was not acquainted with the true and only Philoſophy indeed, or the Chriſtian, which would have afforded him both better directions and Helps for to attain doing of Good, and ſhunning of Evil, and that without Vain-glory, the uſual attendant or Shadow of Pagan virtue; as to which, however Marcus, by the goodneſs of his Temper or his Indeavours, might be affected, one who ſucceeded him both in the Empire, and in pretence to Philoſophy, was guilty of it to a Prodigy.

Lib. 2. c. 14.

Lib. 10. c. 34.

Lib. 2. c. 13.

76. But, to Lucius, rather than unto him, is to be imputed the fourth Perſecution of Chriſtian Religion, which in their time, raged throughout the Provinces. Herein ſuffered Polycarp, that famous Biſhop of Smyrna, as is teſtified in the Epiſtle written by his Church to the Brethren in Pontus. He was ordained Biſhop by St. John, and other Apoſtles with whom he converſed, and his Scholar he was as Tertullian, Irenæus, and ſeveral of the Ancients do teſtifie, and had ſerved Chriſt eighty ſix years; for he was elder by much than thus, as the moſt

The fourth Perſecution.

Reverend Vſher * hath Evinced. He cauſed Meat to be ſet before thoſe that apprehended him, and with wonderful Alacrity and Reſolution underwent his Martyrdom by Fire, on the Seventh of the Calends of April, the Nineth year of this M. Aurelius Antoninus, and the CLXIX. of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt, the ſame wherein Lucius died, as ſome Inſcriptions of Gruterus do teſtifie. Now ſuffered alſo Juſtin Martyr, after he had publiſhed his ſecond Apology for Chriſtians, through the Malice of Creſcens the Cynick (whom railing againſt Chriſtianity, he had taxed for his filthy kind of life) as he even foretelleth in his Apology. The Churches of Lugdunum and Vienna in Gall, were eſpecially exerciſed in this Fiery Trial, as is to be ſeen in the Hiſtory of Euſebius. Marcus doth inſiſt upon nothing more in that Book of his new mentioned, than being ſociable and uſeful in this World, which he calls a great City, and in contriving how to contribute to the Good of the Whole, which he makes the duty and end of every particular Member. Now the Whole conſiſts of Parts, an Univerſal of Individuals; and as to ſuppoſe an Univerſal without Individuals is a conceit, and an act of the Imagination, ſo to contrive the Good of the Whole, without that of its ſeveral Parts is meer fancy; a leſs conſiderable part indeed is often in Policy cut off to preſerve the Whole; but the Body of Chriſtians was not in thoſe days inconſiderable, which filled the Court, the City, and all the Provinces, ſo that a Reſolution would have been made to root it out (if it had been poſſible) and the greateſt Perſecutors finding ſtill more and more to preſent themſelves to Tortures, were conſtrained to give over, without hope of Succeſs.

* Enerva conſule de Polycarpo in Diſſert, de ſcriptii illius & Ignatis Euſeb. lib. 4. c. 15, 16, 17. & l. 1. c. 1.

77. But however, as we ſaid, Marcus inſiſts in his Book upon nothing more than that the World is one Society, Commonwealth, and City, and that it's the Duty of every man to regard the Good of the Whole, and to be ſociable. Now Aurelius Victor writes, That in his time the Freedom of Rome was promiſcuouſly given to all, or that all the Subjects of the Empire were made free Roman Citizens. Others write, That this was done by an Ordinance of Pius, and ſome aſcribe it to Hadrian; but though I put no ſtreſs upon it as an Argument, yet it ſomething moves me to be of Opinion, That He might be the Author of this Indulgence, in that theſe ſociable Thoughts ſo much poſſeſſed him; for it's known ſufficiently that he ſquared his Life, and even his Actions relating to Government, by Rules and Principles of Philoſophy; affirming, That then States or Cities (Civitates the Hiſtorian hath it, as he termed the World, and eſteemed the Empire) would flouriſh, if Philoſophers reigned, or Emperors turned Philoſophers. Now for better underſtanding what this freedom of this City anciently was, we are to know, That it was wont to be given either with privilege of Suffrage or without. The firſt that had it without Suffrage, were the Cærites. We underſtand, ſaith Gellius, that the Cærites were firſt made Municipes without the Right of ſuffrage: and that it was granted to them, that they ſhould receive the honour of the Roman City, but be freed from buſineſs, and burthens, for that they received, and kept the Sacra (or Idols) in the Gallick war. Paterculus alſo telleth us, that in the Conſulſhip of Sp. Poſthumius and Veturius Calvinus, Campanis data eſt civitas partique Samnitium ſine ſuffragio, and in the ſame place, M. Curio & Rufino Cornelio Coſs. Sabinis ſine ſuffragio data civitas. What Municipium was, and who Municipes, is worthy of conſideration. In the time of Gellius it appears from him that thoſe words were much in Uſe, but nothing underſtood. For ſuch as were of Colonies would call both themſelves and their Countreymen Municipes, which, ſaith he, is far diſtant from reaſon and truth. Even ſo what Municipia are, and how much they differ from a Colony, we are ignorant, and we think that Colonies are in a better condition than they.

Freedom of the City given to all.

Data cunctis promiſcuè Civitas Romana.

Freedom of the City various.

Lib. 16. cap. 13.

78. Of this opinion ſo full of error Hadrian the Emperor learnedly diſcourſed in his Oration, which he made in the Senate concerning the Italicenſes, or Inhabitants of Italica in Spain, (as they were called) from whom he himſelf deſcended. He wondred that the Italicenſes and other antient Municipia (amongſt whom he named them of Vtica) when they might live according to their own Cuſtoms and Laws, were tickled with a deſire to be changed into the condition of Colonies. He ſaid that the Præneſtines earneſtly deſired of Tiberius to be altered from the ſtate of a Colony to that of a Municipium, and that the Emperor granted it, in conſideration that under the Walls of their Town he had recovered from a deadly Diſeaſe. Municipes therefore (ſo Gellius concludeth) are Roman Citizens of the Municipia, uſing their own freedom and Laws, only partakers of honourable imployment (Muneris honorarii) with the Roman people, from undertaking which imployment (à quo munere capeſſendo) they ſeem to be named, being bound by no other neceſſities, nor by any Law of the Roman People, for as much as their Land never belonged to it. Then proceedeth he to diſtinguiſh in the matter of the Cærites, betwixt ſuch Municipes as had Right of ſuffrage, and not, for if there had been no ſuch diſtinction he would never have ſaid, The firſt Municipes we underſtand to have been made without Right of ſuffrage were Cærites. For a more clear diſcovery of the relations of other places unto Rome, we ſhall obſerve this four-fold diſtinction of privileges. There was 1 Jus Civitatis, 2 Jus Municipii, 3 Jus Coloniæ, 4 Jus Latii. Jus Civitatis was freedom of the City, and we find in Paterculus that it was cum ſuffragio & ſine ſuffragio. Jus Municipii we find in Gellius to have alſo been freedom of the City; for Municipes were alſo called Cives Romani, and were named Municipes, a muneribus capiendis, or capeſſendis; there was alſo, as appeareth from Gellius, Jus Municipii cum, & ſine ſuffragio, Jus Civitatis therefore & Jus Municipii ſeem to have differed little; the former was larger, reſpecting ſingle perſons ſometimes abſolutely conſidered without relation to any place that was related to Rome as a Municipium. For ſingle perſons (Ambaſſadors or others) have had the freedom of the City beſtowed on them primarily without reſpect to any place at all, who perhaps could not be called Municipes, becauſe ſuch ſeem to have been proper, and only Freemen of Municipia, and not otherwiſe than mediately to have been free of Rome. The power or Right of ſuffrage will not ſuffer us to imagine that, becauſe Gellius calleth the imployment of the Municipes, munus honorarium, therefore it was but titular. For by the Right of ſuffrage they had power to aſſemble in the Comitia, and Vote in their Tribes, Centuries, and Curiæ, as the occaſion required: and hence doubtleſs were capable of honourable Offices. And [illegible] word it ſelf, though ſometimes it may be expounded Titular, as the Conſuls [illegible] Conſtantine's time (or rather Conſulares, as they are called in * Caſſiodorus [illegible] their Office Conſularitas) are termed Conſules Honorarii, being but Titular Conſuls; yet it alſo reſpecteth authority and power as well as meer Title, in that the Law of the Prætor (whereof we have formerly ſpoken) is called Jus Honorarium.

The ſeveral ſorts of Privileges.

Jus Civitatis & Jus Municipii.

* Lib. 6. epiſt. 20.

79. As for the Jus Coloniæ, it is ſo termed by Tacitus alſo in thoſe words: At in Italia vetus oppidum Puteoli Jus Coloniæ & Cognomentum à Nerone adipiſcuntur. Gellius diſtinguiſheth it from the Jus Municipii, after this manner. But of Colonies there is another relation or alliance (neceſſitudo.) For they do come extrinſically into the City, neither do they ſtand on their own roots; but are as it were begotten by the State, and have Laws and Inſtitutions, not of their own, but thoſe of the Roman people. Yet this condition, although it be more obnoxious and leſs free, is accounted better and more excellent, for the amplitude and Majeſty of the Roman people; whereof theſe Colonies ſeem to be certain Images and reſemblances: and alſo becauſe the Rights of the Municipia are obſcure and obliturated, which by reaſon of ignorance the owners cannot uſe. From this it appears, That Colonies were free of the City, in which reſpect Paterculus, giving us account of the ſeveral Colonies that were planted till the time of Marius, mixeth with them ſuch places as to which freedom was given, making it as it were the ſame thing. If it had been otherwiſe, there would not have been any compariſon as to privilege betwixt Municipia and Colonies, and it would have ſaved Gellius the labour of proving, againſt the common belief, that the Jus Municipii was greater. Now as for the Jus Latii, Suetonius diſtinguiſheth it from Jus Civitatis, for ſpeaking what Auguſtus did to ſeveral Cities, he hath this expreſſion amongſt the reſt: Latinitate vel civitate donavit. Spartianus in the life of Hadrian ſaith, Latium multis civitatibus dedit. And Tacitus (coming up to our Term) ſaith of Nero: Eodem anno Cæſar nationes Alpium maritimarum in Jus Latii tranſtulit. The Latines were ever counted of the kindred of Rome, the Romans having deſcended from them; and upon this account there was a ſtricter League and Alliance with them, than any other people, which injoyed not the freedom of the City.

Jus Coloniæ.

Lib. 1. c. 14, 15.

Cap. 47.

Annal. l. 15. c. 32.

Jus Latii.

80. The Latines envying the riſing fortune of Rome their Colony, laboured to ſuppreſs it, but ſtill were worſted, and ever forced to ſubmit. Servius Tullius the ſixth King of Rome breathing after glory in future times, in imitation of the Council of the Amphyctiones in Greece, and other publick conventions (as we have formerly ſaid) perſwaded both Nations to build at Rome a Temple or Aſylum out of the common expence, where the Cities meeting yearly, ſhould ſacrifice, hold a fair at certain times, and if any contention hapned amongſt them, it might be compoſed in a religious manner by their fellow Cities. Gathering Money he built the Temple of Diana in the Aventine Mount (the moſt eminent in the City) and wrote down the conditions of the League, with the manner of obſerving the Feaſt and Mart. And that they might not be aboliſhed by the injury of Time, he ingraved the Decrees of the Council in a Pillar of Braſs, and the Cities which were partakers of this Society, which Pillar continueth till our Age, ſaith Dionyſius, dedicated in the Temple of Diana, inſcribed with ſuch Characters as Greece anciently uſed, which is no light Argument that Rome was not built by Barbarians. Tarquinius the laſt King, and Succeſſor of Servius, renewed this League, and taking in the Hernici and Volſci, appointed another place in the midſt of all thoſe Nations, viz. a Mount near to the Albanians, called alſo Mons Albanus, where yearly Feriæ (or a Feſtival) were to be celebrated; and for that time, in reſpect of the Religion of the place, and the Law made for that purpoſe, they were all to abſtain from all manner of violence, and, in common, ſacrifice to Jupiter Latialis, and Feaſt together; it being appointed how much each people ſhould contribute and receive. Of theſe Feriæ, and this Sacrifice were partakers forty ſeven people, and in our age, ſaith the Hiſtorian, the Romans obſerve theſe Feriæ (called Feriæ Latinæ) and ſome contribute Lambs, ſome Cheeſe, ſome a certain quantity of Milk, and others Cakes or Wafers made up with Milk. The Sacrifice is one Bull for all, of whoſe inwards a certain portion is given to every people. They ſacrifice for all in general, and the Romans preſide at the Sacrifice. Thoſe Feriæ at firſt conſiſted but of one day, which Tarquinius appointed. After his Baniſhment the people added another. And about ſix years after, when Peace was compoſed betwixt Patritians and Plebeians, after the Creation of t[illegible]ribuni Plebis, and Ædiles, a third was added; at what time the League was [illegible]enewed with the Latines, becauſe that after the Peace made with them at [illegible]nd of the War with Tarquinius (whoſe part they took) they had continued peaceable and faithful to the Romans during their confuſions and ſeditions.

Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. 4.

The ſtrict League and Alliance betwixt the Romans and Latines.

81. * Dionyſius mentioning the Renewing of this League, giveth us the ſubſtance of it, by which deſcription our deſign is accompliſhed as to the Jus Latii. Theſe things were contained in the League; Let there be mutual Peace betwixt the Romans and Latines, as long as the Heavens and Earth keep the ſame Station: and let neither make War upon the other, nor procure others to do it, nor give free paſſage to ſuch as would, but to the utmoſt help each other infeſted by War, and equally divide the Prey and Spoils. Concerning private Contracts, let the controverſie be judiciarily decided in the Forum of that People where the Contract was made. Let nothing be added to the conditions of the League, nor taken away, without the conſent of the Romans, and all the Latine People. To this purpoſe a League was eſtabliſhed betwixt the parties, and ſworn to by all ſacred things. This near confederacy is to be taken as explanatory of the Jus Latii, including ſuch a ſtrong Alliance as was not made with any, but afterwards according to this Preſcript. In proceſs of time the Latines came to have the freedom of the City. When this freedom was given to them, is ſomething obſcure. Dionyſius ſo relateth the Story of Caſſius (in whoſe ſecond Conſulſhip, according to him, this League was renewed) as if at the ſame time was given to them the freedom of the City; for Caſſius, to curry favour with the Hernici, gave them the ſame league, and when he would have in his third Conſulſhip the Agrarian to paſs, he cauſed the Latines and Hernici to be preſent at the Comitia, to carry it by the greater Number of voices. But if any ſuch thing were, it was done rather by his overforwardneſs to gratifie them, and without the conſent of the State, as thoſe Privileges were which he beſtowed upon the Hernici. However, it appeareth that they had not the freedom till this time; for Caſſius in his flattering ſpeech to the multitude, concerning the excellent acts performed by them in his three Conſulſhips, ſaith, That in his third the ſedition being appeaſed, the Commons were reduced home: the Latines Kinſmen of the Romans, but emulators for Glory and Empire, were received into friendſhip, and into the City, that afterwards they might eſteem Rome as their Country, and not as an Adverſary. Though formerly there was a League with them, yet it ſeemeth they were not received into the City till now, and that rather by Caſſius his flattery; ſo that neither they nor the Hernici retained this privilege, and we do not find that they were admitted into any Tribe, or gave thenceforth their ſuffrages in the Comitia. This confirmeth what we ſay, That * Florus declareth the cauſe of their

* Lib. 6.

The Contents of the League.

Dionyſ. l. 8.

* L. 1. c. 14.

their Revolt afterwards, to have been an emulation for Empire and Magiſtrates, and that contemning the Romans after the burning of the City, they required Jus civitatis amongſt other things.

82. This they did not now obtain, being ſubdued and reduced by War to obedience, and puniſhed ſeveral ways. However the ancient League ſeemeth to have been renewed; at leaſt with moſt of them, who were ſtill called Socii nominis Latini. Often the Jus Civitatis was promiſed them, but ſtill deferred and put off by the Fathers, who alone knew the Secret of Empire, till at length they broke out into the Social War, and yet then were they ſubdued again, and brought under by force, and then was given to them conquered, what they could not obtain by ſtrong hand. After this, the hedge being broken down from about the Roman State, and through the variety of the intereſts of Roman Citizens parties and factions ariſing, Freedom came to be given to other places, one after another, though when, to whom, and by whom, we now muſt not inquire. Auguſtus was very ſparing in the grant thereof; but ſucceeding Princes ſpread this privilege far and wide, till at length Antoninus Philoſophus communicated it to the whole body of the Empire, it being now nothing material, ſeeing that the multitude met not together in the Comitia, to give their ſuffrages, which had by variety of Intereſts, humours and inclinations confounded all things. But to return to our Matter. Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Philoſophus died when he had reigned Nineteen years, on the Seventeenth of March, in the Fifty eighth year of his Age, the Nine hundred thirty third of the City. A. D. CLXXX, Arrius Præſens the ſecond time, and Ælius Gordianus being Conſuls.

Commodus.

Herodianus l. 1. Olymp. 239. an. 4. V. C. 932. A. D. 180.

Commodus his Son (for whoſe ſake Dio maketh the Phyſicians to have killed him) ſucceeded him, having two years before been made a Conſul, through a Diſpenſation with the Lex Annaria, as Lampridius writeth, although it ſeemeth ſomething ſtrange, that this Law could take place upon thoſe, to whom the title of Auguſtus was not denied. Being owned by the Army, for ſome time he governed according to the direction of his Father's friends, but being obnoxious to flatterers by reaſon of his youth, who ſought to make their own ends out of him, he ſhortly after, contrary to the judgment of his beſt Counſellors, made a diſhonourable Peace with the Enemy, and away he went to enjoy the pleaſures of Rome, where he was joyfully received for his Father's ſake, his Beauty alſo much commending him to the eye. For a time he here alſo harkned to his Father's friends, but making one Perennius an old Soldier Captain of his Guards, he being exceſſively covetous, allured him at firſt by pleaſures to idleneſs and neglect of buſineſs, then governing all himſelf, he falſely accuſed them and others of the richer ſort, that he might ſeize on their Eſtates. This his deſign was furthered by Lucilla the Emperor's Siſter, who grudging that Criſpina, Commodus his wife, ſhould take place of her, entered into a Conſpiracy againſt her Brother, and ingaged one Quadratus a young Noble man therein, who perſwaded Quintianus to kill Commodus. But he meeting him, had no power to do the deed, only ſhewing the Dagger, ſaid, The Senate ſends thee this, and ſo was apprehended and put to Death with his Complices. Theſe words concerning the Senate thus fooliſhly ſpoken, never went out of the Emperor's mind, but made him ſuſpect all the Fathers, which advantage Perennius took, and perſwaded him to kill all the chiefeſt of them. This being performed, this man affected the Sovereignty, but was in good time diſcovered, both he and his Sons, whom he had ſent into Illyricum to draw the Legions to revolt, and received their reward.

His difficulties.

84. Commodus, to prevent the too great power of one man, put two into his place, Cleander and Niger, for the time to come; and yet preſently after had more Plots laid for his life. There was one Maternus, who practiſing the Trade of Robbery, got a great company of Highway-men together, and making himſelf Captain of a conſiderable Army, waſted Gall and Spain, and thence repelled, reſolved to venture for the Sovereignty it ſelf. Having but little hope to obtain it by force, becauſe of the People, and the Prætorian Bands, he betook him to his wits. At that time the Annual ſolemnity was kept in honour of the Mother of their gods, wherein it was lawful for Soldiers or any other to imitate Magiſtrates or their Officers. Taking this opportunity, he ſent ſome of his Soldiers privily armed to get amongſt the Sergeants and Officers of the Emperor, and ſo to kill him; but being betrayed by his own Party, he and his Plot both miſcarried. After this ſucceeded a terrible Peſtilence, accompanied with a Famine, which Cleander a Phrygian, one who from a Slave came into greateſt Power, made an occaſion to advance himſelf. He bought up all the Corn, thinking by a largeſs thereof to purchaſe the Empire of the Soldiers and People, but theſe riſing againſt him, as the cauſe of the Dearth and Plague too, after that with great difficulty, by reaſon of his Power, the Matter was revealed to Commodus, he alſo received his reward. Theſe things cauſed the Emperor to be jealous of all men, to caſt off all care of State-affairs, and giving ear to every back-biter, to kill any. Hence alſo no perſons of worth being admitted into his preſence, he was ruled by diſſolute Companions, and fell more and more into diſorder.

Idem ibid.
Oroſius l. 7. c. 16.

85. He turned Chariot-driver, and ſpent his time in killing Beaſts with darts, and other unworthy exerciſes. He was the beſt marks-man that ever was known, ſcarcely ever miſſing any mark he aimed at. He publickly killed multitudes of wild beaſts upon the Theatre, amongſt the reſt a Panther, which juſt being about to devour a man, he hit and ſlew in the nick of time, as ſhe was about to ſeize on him. In ſtead of Commodus the Son of Marcus, he commanded himſelf to be called Hercules the Son of Jupiter. Caſting off the uſual Robe of Princes, in compliance with that name, he would lye on a Lions Skin, and have a Club in his hand; yet he would wear Purple Garments and Cloth of Gold. To his former title he added Amazonian, and Conqueror; Rome he ſtyled Immortal and Fortunate, and the World His Colony. A great fire happened in the City, which burned that excellent Library gathered by his Predeceſſors, with the Temple of Peace, and other Buildings, which accident as the People accounted an ill Omen, ſo they laid the guilt upon him, knowing well his Practices, which he never ſtrove to conceal. Though his throwing of Darts upon the Theatre much derogated from the Imperial Majeſty, they were indifferently pleaſed with it; but when he came Naked upon the Stage and acted the Common Fencer, it ſeemed intolerable. At length at the Feaſt of Janus reſolving not to proceed from his Palace as Emperor, but as Fencer from the Fencing-School, attended with ſuch like to the view of the People, this occaſioned his end.

His carriage.

86. For, this his reſolution being known to his Friends, Martia his beloved Concubine, Lætus his General, and Electus his Chamberlain, laboured with all intreaties to divert him from ſo ſhameful a thing. He herewith extreamly diſpleaſed, betook himſelf to his Chamber, where in a roll he wrote down the Names of ſuch as he would have killed, and amongſt them thoſe three in that order we mention them had the firſt places; then followed a great number of Senators, the Goods of whom he intended to diſtribute amongſt the Fencers and Soldiers, to purchaſe mirth and jollity from them, and defence from theſe. This writing he laid upon his Bed, where he did not ſuſpect that any would come at it. But a little Boy with whom he was wont to play, coming thither, took it up, and went out with it in his hand, whom Martia meeting, and taking up in her arms, fearing it might be ſomething of conſequence, read it, and thereby diſcovered the matter, which ſhe preſently imparted to the other two. They all concluding that haſte was to be made, Martia gave him Poiſon, and when that ſucceeded not, they hired one Narciſſus to ſtrangle him. So Commodus died, who by his Lieutenants overthrew the Moors and Dacians, and bridled Pannonia, Germany, and Britain, which would have thrown off the yoak. He died on the laſt day of the Julian year; the Thirty ſecond of his Age, when he had Reigned almoſt Thirteen years. A.V.C. 945. A.D. 192, he himſelf the ſeventh, and Helvius Pertinax the third time being Conſuls.

Lege Herod. ubi ſupra.
Eutrop. l. 8.
Xiphil. ex Dione.
Aurel. Victor.

He is murdered.

Herodian. l. 2.

87. The Conſpirators did not make known his death, till they had made means for a Succeſſor; and then gave out that he died of an Apoplexy, which was eaſily believed, becauſe of his voluptuous life. He upon whom they pitched was Helvius Pertinax, an old Soldier, who had done good Service in Britain, where he was near killing by his Soldiers, but ſeverely corrected their inſolence. He had been thrice Conſul, yet being thus delivered from the danger he was in by Commodus, conſidering the meanneſs of his Birth, he would have declined the burthen, but it was put upon him by the Senate, and the Army acknowledged him. He gave great hopes of an excellent Prince, behaving himſelf modeſtly and ſuitably towards all men. He reſtrained Promoters, took away divers Tolls and Gabels lately impoſed, and reſtrained the Rapines and Inſolence of the Soldiers. This troubled the Guards exceedingly, who being ſo much the more ſenſible of the change brought upon them by ſtrict diſcipline, as they remembred the liberty given them by Commodus, reſolved to make tryal of another, and an end of Pertinax.

Helvius Pertinax.

Olymp. 242. an. 4.
V. C. 445.
A. D. 192.

Pertinax. In the ſtrength of this reſolution they ſet upon and killed him, though he had, like ſo excellent a Perſon, gravely and ſtoutly admoniſhed them of their Duty. He died in the Eighty fifth day of his Reign; and the Sixty ninth year of his Age. Q. Soſius Falco, and C. Julius Eructus Clarus being Conſuls.

Biſhops.

88. Now, that we may briefly carry on the ſeries of Eccleſiaſtical matters, whence we left them. In the ſecond year of M. Aurelius Philoſophus died Anicetus the Biſhop of Rome, and Soter being the 13th. of this See ſucceeded him, according to Damaſus. In his 10th year Soter died, & was ſucceeded by Eleutherius. In the 6th of Commodus died Eleutherius, on the Seventh before the Calends of June, Maternus and Bradua being Conſuls, in which year Commodus and Cleander to overturn the Power of the Conſulſhip created Twenty five Conſuls, for which Cleander was afterwards puniſhed, being carried to Rome amongſt the worſt ſort of Slaves. In the following year Eleutherius was ſucceeded by Victor an African, Commodus the fifth time, and Glabrio being Conſuls. Touching the purity of the Church of Rome at this time Ægeſippus thus wrote. (a) When I came to Rome I ſtayed there till Anicetus was choſen Biſhop, whoſe Deacon was Eleutherius, whom Soter ſucceeded, and after him Eleutherius. In all their ſucceſſions, and in every one of their Cities it's no otherwiſe than the Law and the Prophets, and the Lord himſelf preached. Irenæus alſo wrote: Now (b) Eleutherius was the Twelfth Biſhop from the Apoſtles, after the ſame order, the ſame Doctrine and Tradition of the Apoſtles truely taught in the Church, at this day continued in our time. From Marcus the firſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem from amongſt the Gentiles, ſome reckon Thirteen Biſhops unto Narciſſus, of whom are many things reported. He (c) was accuſed of an heinous crime, and although he was innocent, yet left he his Church, and fled into the Wilderneſs, where he continued a long time. In the mean while his Accuſers were wonderfully plagued from above, to the example of all perjured perſons. After his departure Dios was Biſhop unto the Reign of Severus, as is gathered from Epiphanius. After Cornelius was (d) Theophilus Biſhop of Antioch, he wrote of Elemental Inſtitutions, and dedicated them to Autolycus. Alſo againſt the Hereſie of Hermogenes and Marcion. After him followed Maximinus, and then (e) Serapion. After Celadion in the Church of Alexandria, (f) Agrippas was Biſhop about the Eighth year of Marcus, and governed Twelve years. Him ſucceeded (g) Julianus in the firſt of Commodus, and governed Ten years. Then followed (h) Demetrius, who continued Forty three years.

(a) Euſeb. Hiſt. lib 4. cap. 22.
(b) Euſeb. l. 5. cap. 6.
(c) Idem lib. 5. cap. 11. lib. 6. c. 8, 9.
(d) Idem lib. 4. c. 20. 24.
(e) Idem lib. 5. c. 19 22.
(f) L. 4. c. 20. l. 5. c. 9.
(g) L. 5. c. 9. 20.
(h) L. 5. c. 22. l. 6. c. 26.

Councils.

89. During the Reign of Commodus were ſeveral Synodes or Councils held againſt the Hereſie of Montanus, and about the Celebration of Eaſter. Becauſe before this time Councils were but few, we would not give any account of them in a ſcattered manner; but now ſhall briefly recite from the firſt of all ſuch as happened until the end of Commodus. The (a) Apoſtles immediately after the Aſcenſion of our Saviour returned from Mount Olivet to Jeruſalem, and there aſſembled together for the election of one to ſucceed in the room of Judas the Traitor, where they choſe Matthias. This is the firſt Council. The (b) ſecond was ſummoned of the Apoſtles and Diſciples at Jeruſalem, about removing the Tumult riſen betwixt the Græcians and Hebrews about their Widows, wherein they choſe ſeven Deacons, as they are called by Eccleſiaſtical Writers. The (c) third was held by the Apoſtles, Elders, and Brethren at Jeruſalem, concerning Circumciſion and Obſervation of the Law, where it was reſolved, That the faithful ſhould abſtain from blood, from that which is ſtrangled, and from fornication, the which they publiſhed by their Letters unto the Churches of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia. The fourth was held by James Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Paul, and the Elders at that City alſo, where for removing of Suſpition, and winning of the Brethren, it was decreed, that Paul ſhould clear and purifie himſelf according to the Law, yielding for ſome time to the Ceremonies of it. After the death of James, the Apoſtles from every quarter (e) gathered themſelves together at Jeruſalem for the Election of a Biſhop, and choſe Simon Cleopas. In an aſſembly of the Apoſtles, certain Canons were agreed on, and publiſhed by Clemens, as 'tis ſaid. But (f) thoſe that now go for them, are corrupt, the corruption of the Apoſtolical conſtitutions, and of Ignatius his Epiſtles having proceeded from the ſame hand, as Reverend Uſher ſheweth in his Diſſertation concerning the ſaid Epiſtles, who as to this matter is therein moſt worthy to be conſulted. About the time of Nerva the Emperor were two (g) Synods ſummoned in Aſia, for Reformation of the Churches, and Conſecration of Biſhops, where St. John the Apoſtle, being ſent for, was preſent. About the beginning of Marcus Antoninus, was a Synod at (h) Ancyra in Galatia, where the

(a) Acts 1.
(b) Acts 6.
(c) Acts 15.
(d) Acts 21.
(e) Euſeb. l. 3. cap. 11.
(f) Concil. tom. 1.
(g) Euſeb. l. 3. c. 23.
(h) Idem l. 5. cap. 16.

ſigments of Montanus were confuted by Apollinarius. And there were held in Aſia ſundry Synods in which Montanns was excommunicated, and his Hereſie condemned. The brethren in (i) France alſo aſſembled together, and cenſured the opinions of Montanus, writing to Eleutherius Biſhop of Rome, that he would maintain the Peace of the Church there againſt ſuch Hereticks. (k) Serapion alſo Biſhop of Antioch held a Synod there about the middle of Commodus his Reign, where together with many other Biſhops he condemned the Montaniſts, or their Hereſie called the Phrygian Hereſie, becauſe Montanus was of that Countrey. Not long after was held a Council at (l) Rome by Victor the Biſhop, about the Celebration of Eaſter; in Palæſtine alſo, in Pontus and Gall were Synods called about the ſame matter.

(i) Lib.5.c.3.
(k) Lib.5.c.19.
(l) Idem l. 5. cap. 23.

Controverſie concerning Eaſter.

90. This controverſie about Eaſter, is mentioned by Euſebius not till the laſt year of the 243 Olympiad, which fell in with the fourth of Severus; but Cappellus thinketh it firſt aroſe in the firſt of the 242 Olympiad, and the tenth of Commodus, wherein this Feaſt was Celebrated by the Jews, and the Churches of Aſia Minor, at a wrong time, as Theophilus Biſhop of Cæſaræa thought, viz. by the Jews on the fifteenth of Niſan, March 20. but by the Chriſtians of Aſia on the fourteenth of Niſan, March 19. on the fourth Feria, three days before the Vernal Æquinox. Theophilus ſuppoſing that the Æquinox happened on March the 25. and that ſo it ever did; and for this cauſe that the Sun was on that day created, and that Chriſt aroſe again the ſame day, as alſo that the Lord's Supper was inſtituted on the 22 of March, contended that it was utterly againſt reaſon to prevent the Epoche of the Æquinox ſo many days, and the day whereon the Lord's Supper was inſtituted. Wherefore he procured the Fathers of Paleſtine aſſembled in a Synod, to make theſe Canons: 1. That never, except after March 21. 2. That never but after the fourteenth Moon. 3. That never after April 24. 4. That never except on the Lord's Day, Eaſter ſhould be celebrated; on that day which next followed the fourteenth Moon hapning next after March 21. Hereby he hoped it would come to paſs, that Eaſter would ever be obſerved within the Month of Aries. In the Synode of Palæſtine where theſe Canons were made, the aforeſaid Theophilus Biſhop of Cæſarea, and Narciſſus of Jeruſalem preſided. Of that at Rome, Victor the Biſhop was Preſident. In that of Pontus, Palmas, as the moſt ancient, did govern. In that of the Biſhops of Gall, Irenæus preſided. There was another of the Biſhops throughout Oſtroena, and the Cities therein contained; and eſpecially held by Bauchillus Biſhop of Corinth, with many others; all which, ſaith Euſebius, with one and the ſame Sentence and Judgment ordained the ſame Decree. With thoſe alſo conſented Caſſius Biſhop of Tyre, and Clarus Biſhop of Ptolemais. They affirmed that it was the Apoſtolick tradition and cuſtom as yet retained, that the faſting days ſhould be broken up on no other day than that wherein our Saviour aroſe from the dead. And the Church of Alexandria celebrated Eaſter on the ſelf-ſame day with them.

Beda de natura rerum cap. 28. 46. & de Æquinoctio.

91. But all the Churches throughout Aſia, as of an ancient Tradition thought good to obſerve the high-feaſt of Eaſter in the fourteenth Moon, on which day the Jews were commanded to offer their Paſchal Lamb. As much as to ſay, That upon what day ſoever in the week that Moon fell, the faſting days were finiſhed and ended. Polycrates of Epheſus, chief of theſe Biſhops, in his Epiſtle to the Church of Rome, ſheweth the cuſtom of Aſia obſerved unto his time, in theſe words: We obſerve the unviolated day of Eaſter, neither adding any thing thereto, neither taking any thing from it. For notable pillars of Chriſtian Religion have reſted in Aſia, which ſhall ariſe at the laſt day when the Lord ſhall come home from Heaven with glory, and reſtore all the Saints to joy. Philip, one of the twelve Apoſtles now lying at Hierapolis, and his two daughters, who kept themſelves Virgins all the days of their lives, the third alſo after the end of her holy converſation reſted at Epheſus. John alſo, who lay on the Lord's breaſt, and wore the Prieſtly Attire, both a Martyr and a Doctor ſlept at Epheſus. Moreover, Polycarpus Biſhop of Smyrna, and a Martyr. Thraſeas an Eumenian, both a Biſhop and a Martyr ſlept at Smyrna. What ſhall I ſpeak of Sagaris, both a Biſhop and a Martyr lying at Laodicea? Alſo of bleſſed Papirius and Melito an Eunuch, who was led and guided in all things he did by the holy Ghoſt, and now reſteth at Sardis, waiting the meſſage from Heaven when he ſhall ariſe from the dead. All theſe celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter, according to the Goſpel, in the fourteenth Moon, ſwerving no where, but obſerving the rule of faith. To be ſhort, and I Polycrates the meaneſt of you all do retain the tradition of my forefathers, of which alſo I have imitated ſome. For there were ſeven Biſhops before me, and I am the Eighth which always have celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter on that day day in which the people remove the leaven from amongſt them. I therefore (my brethren) who now have lived ſixty five years in the Lord, have conferred with the brethren throughout the World, and have read, and over-read the holy Scriptures, yet will not be moved at all with thoſe things which are made to terrifie us. For my Anceſtors and Elders have ſaid, That we ought rather to obey God than men. Afterwards he ſpeaketh of the Biſhops that conſented, and ſubſcribed to his Epiſtle, after this manner: I could repeat the Biſhops that were preſent, whom you requeſted me to aſſemble, whom alſo I have aſſembled together, whoſe names if I ſhould write would grow unto a great number; they have viſited me a ſimple Soul, and a man of ſmall account, and have conſented to this Letter. They alſo know that I bear not theſe gray hairs in vain, but always have had my converſation in Chriſt Jeſus.

Victor Biſhop of Rome ſharply reprehended.

92. Immediately upon this, Victor Biſhop of Rome went about to ſever from the unity in the Communion all the Churches of Aſia, together with the adjoyning Congregations, as ſavoring not aright, and inveyed againſt them in his Epiſtles, and pronounced flatly all the Brethren there for excommunicated Perſons. But this not pleaſing all the Biſhops, they exhorted him to ſeek after thoſe things which concerned Peace, Unity, and Love between Brethren. Their words are at this day extant (ſaith Euſebius) that ſharply reprehended Victor. Of which number Irenæus in the name of all the Brethren in Gall that were under his charge, wrote, and allowed the ſame Sentence, viz. The Myſtery of the reſurrection of our Saviour to be celebratod on the Sunday only. Yet as it was very meet he put him in mind at large of his Duty, that he ſhould not eſtrange, or cut off all the Churches of God, which retained the Tradition of old Cuſtom. He told him, That there was not only a controverſie about the day, but alſo the kind or manner of Faſting, that this variety began long before their time; yet for all this they were at Unity one with another, for this variety of faſting, ſaith he, commendeth the unity of Faith. He told him, That his Predeceſſors in the See of Rome, Anicetus, Dius, Hyginus, Teleſphorus, and Xiſtus, neither did ſo obſerve it themſelves, neither left any ſuch Commandment unto Poſterity, and yet they were at unity with them which reſorted to them from other Churches, and did obſerve the ſame. Polycarpus being at Rome in the time of Anicetus, they varied between themſelves about trifling matters, yet were they ſoon reconciled, and not a word of this matter. Neither was Anicetus able to perſwade Polycarpus that he ſhould not retain that which he had always obſerved with John the Diſciple of our Lord, and the reſt of the Apoſtles with whom he had been converſant: neither did Polycarpus perſwade Anicetus to obſerve it, but told him he ought to keep the Antient Cuſtom of the Elders whom he ſucceeded. Theſe things being at this point, they communicated one with another. And in the Church Anicetus granted the Euchariſt unto Polycarpus (or as Ruffinus underſtandeth it, granted the Miniſtration of the Communion to him) for the reverence he owed him, and in the end they parted in peace; and all ſuch as retained contrary obſervations throughout the whole univerſal Church held faſt the bond of Love and Unity. Thus Irenæus, not degenerating from the Etymology of his name, and paſſing all others in the gift of reconciling the Brethren, practiſed for Eccleſiaſtical Peace. He wrote not only to Victor, but alſo to ſundry Governours of divers other Churches, in ſeveral Epiſtles concerning the ſaid Controverſie.

93. Thus do we ſee the firſt controverſies about this Feaſt of Eaſter. Although the Hypotheſes of Theophilus concerning the Æquinoctial will not abide tryal, yet doubtleſs, thoſe had more reaſon on their ſide, who intending to celebrate the Reſurrection of Chriſt, refuſed to do it, but on that day he roſe from the dead; the other practice ſeeming to have riſen from a Cuſtom of keeping the Paſſeover at that time, by ſuch as were originally of the Jewiſh Nation. Notwithſtanding they differed about time and manner, yet before the Government of Victor, we ſee they agreed in Brotherly love. And it appeareth that the Cuſtom of obſerving this Feaſt, was moſt ancient, even in the Apoſtles days, as appeareth from what is ſaid by Polycrates, and by Irenæus, in behalf of Polycarpus. Though they differed in the manner about keeping it, yet we do not find that any denied it was to be kept at all, although they were alſo for the true and ſpiritual obſervation of it, and againſt Abuſes, as all good Chriſtians have reaſon to be. But (that we may conclude this Controverſie) in proceſs of Time, both they of Aſia, and others, leaving their own Cuſtoms, admitted of the Paſchal Canons, made by the Orientals, eſpecially by thoſe of Paleſtine and Alexandria. At length few Diſſenters remaining, a neceſſity of Obedience was impoſed by Conſtantine, who herein followed the Judgment of two Synods, viz. that of Arelatum or Arles, A.D. 314, and the other of Nice, A. D. 325. But (that we may note thus much by way of Anticipation) The ancient Britiſh Church, as it ſeemeth ſubmitted, not to thoſe Decrees, obſerving Eaſter from the fourteenth to the twentieth Moon, which computation, ſaith (a) Beda, is contained within the Circle of Eighty four years. And for this, when they would not comply with Auguſtine the Monk (who had been ſent from Gregory the Great Biſhop of Rome to convert the Saxons, and was made by him the firſt Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury) who ſought to draw them to Uniformity, twelve hundred Monks of Bangor were put to the Sword (whether through procurement of Auguſtine or no, I ſhall not now determine) by King Ethelfrid, A. D. 603, the Scots alſo then inhabiting Ireland obſerved Eaſter at the ſame time as the Britans did, to whom therefore Laurentius the Succeſſor of Auguſtine in the See of Canterbury wrote, to drive them from their ſingularities. But how much he hereby profited, the preſent times do yet declare, ſaith (b) Beda, who lived A. D. 700.

When Britain received the Chriſtian Faith.

94. And being thus occaſionally brought to Britain, we muſt obſerve in behalf of our Native Country, that the thick miſts of Superſtition being ſcattered, in the Reign of Commodus (not under M. Aurelius and L. Verus, as Beda writeth) when Eleutherus was Biſhop of Rome, the heavenly light and brightneſs of Chriſtianity, by the means of King Lucius, ſhone upon this Iſland. This Prince admiring the holy life of Chriſtians, made Petition unto Eleutherus by mediation of Elvan and Meduan, Britans, that both himſelf and his Subjects might be inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion. He ſent forthwith Fugatius and Donaitanus, two holy Men, with Letters, which at this day, ſaith Cambden, be extant, and, as very many be perſwaded, not forged, but Authentical, as bearing date when L. Aurelius Commodus the ſecond time, and Veſpronius were Conſuls. This Veſpronius was Veſpronius Candidus, whom Onuphrius and Baronius make the Collegue of Commodus in the firſt year of his Father's Reign, though an Inſcription of Gruterus mentions Aurelius Verus; ſo that, to the very firſt beginning of Commodus, the Preaching of theſe Men is to be aſcribed. Theſe holy Men inſtructed the King and others in the myſteries of Chriſtian Religion. Hereupon Ninnius writeth: King Lucius is ſirnamed Lever Maur, that is, a Prince of great glory, for the Faith which in his time came. Now ſuch as call the Being of this King into queſtion, for that they think there was at this time no King in Britain, which was wholly and fully reduced into a Province before; Cambden wiſheth to remember, That the Romans had by ancient Cuſtom in their Provinces, Kings, as the Inſtruments of their Bondage, that the Britans even then refuſed to obey Commodus, and that they themſelves poſſeſſed and held freely thoſe Parts of the Iſland, which were beyond the aforeſaid wall, and had there Kings of their own, and that Antoninus Pius a few years before, having put an end to War, permitted Kingdoms to be ruled by their own Kings, and Provinces by their own Comites. He citeth Tertullian, who much about this time wrote, That thoſe places amongſt the Britains which yielded the Romans no acceſs, are now ſubdued unto Chriſt. Britain is incloſed within the compaſs of the Ocean. The Nation of the Mauri, and the barbarous Getulians are beſet by the Romans, for fear they might paſs beyond the limits of their Countries. What ſhould I ſpeak of the Romans, who with Gariſons of their Legions fortifie their Empire? neither are they able to extend the power of their Dominion beyond theſe very Nations. But the Kingdom and Name of Chriſt reacheth further ſtill, it is believed in every place, and is worſhipped of all thoſe People above named, &c.

95. But our Eccleſiaſtical Writers (thus Cambden proceedeth) who have imployed both time and diligence in the conſideration of this point, endeavour and labour to prove, and that out of ancient Fathers of credit, that before this time, in the very dawning and Infancy of the Church, Britain had received Chriſtian Religion: and namely, that Joſeph of Arimathea, a Noble Senator, ſailed out of Gall into Britain, and that Claudia Rufina the Wife of Aulus Pudens (which woman, as is credibly thought, St. Paul nameth in his latter Epiſtle to Timothy) and whom the Poet Martial ſo highly commendeth, was a Britain born. They cite the teſtimony of Dorotheus, who commonly goeth under the name of the Biſhop of Tyre, who in his Synopſis hath recorded, That Simon Zelotes having travelled through Mauritiana, was at laſt ſlain and buried in Britain, as alſo that Ariſtobulus, whom St. Paul mentioneth in his Epiſtle to the Romans, was made Biſhop of (b) ubi ſupra c. 4.

Britain

(a) Eccleſ. Hiſt. Angl. l. 2. c. 2.

Britain (to which Nicephorus inclineth) notwithſtanding he ſpeaketh of Britiana, and not of Britania. They report likewiſe upon the authority of Simeon, that great Metaphraſt, and of the Menology of the Greeks, that St. Peter came hither and ſpread abroad the Light of God's Word: out of Sophronius alſo and Theodoret, that St. Paul after his ſecond Impriſonment in Rome, viſited this our Country. Whereupon * Venantius Fortunatus wrote of him, (except he ſpeaketh of his Doctrine) if he may be believed as a Poet. But to this purpoſe, ſaith our Author, maketh eſpecially that which ere-while I alleged out of Tertullian, as alſo that which Origen recordeth, how, The Britains with one conſent imbraced the Faith, and made way themſelves to God by means of the Druidæ, who did always beat upon this Article of Belief, That there is but one God. And verily of great moment is that with me, which Gildas writeth, after he had mentioned the Rebellion of Boodicia, and treated of the revenge thereof. In the mean while, ſaith he, Chriſt that true Sun ſhining with his moſt glittering brightneſs upon the univerſal World, not from the temporal skie and firmament, but even from the higheſt cope of Heaven, exceeding all times, vouchſafed firſt his beams, that is to ſay, his Precepts and Doctrine, in the time, as we know, of Tiberius Cæſar, unto this frozen Iſland full of ice, and lying out as it were in a long tract of earth remote from the viſible Sun. Chryſoſtome likewiſe, to note ſo much by the way, writeth of the Chriſtian Religion in this Iſland as followeth. The Britiſh Iſlands ſeated without this Sea, and within the very Ocean, have felt the power of the Word (for even there alſo be Churches founded, and Altars erected) of that Word I ſay, which is planted in the Souls, and now alſo in the Lips of all People. And the ſame Chryſoſtome in another place: How often have People in Britain fed of man's fleſh? but now with faſting they refreſh the Soul. Likewiſe St. Hierome: The Britain divided from our World, if he proceed in Religion, leaving the Weſtern Parts towards the Suns ſetting, will ſeek Jeruſalem, a City known to him by form only, and relation of Scriptures.

* Tranſiit Oceanum & qua facit inſula portum. Quaſque Britannus habet terras, quaſque ultima Thule.

Hereticks.

96. As for Hereticks which lived in the time with the forementioned Biſhops, and the Reigns of Marcus and Commodus: There were the Secundians, called ſo from Secundus, who together with Epiphanes and Iſidorus taught the ſame with Valentinus. In life they were beaſtly, all Women among them were common: they denied the Reſurrection of the Fleſh. Ptolomæus of whom were named the Ptolomæi, taught the Heretical Opinions of the Gnoſticks, and of Valentinus, adding thereunto of his own, certain Heatheniſh doctrines out of Homer. Marcus of whom the Marcoſii, Colorbaſus of whom the Colorbaſii, and Heracleon of whom the Hereticks were called Heracleonites, ſacrificed with Witchcraft; to amaze their Auditory they pronounced Hebrew words. Many Women coming to Church, under colour of receiving the Power of Prophecy from them, confeſſed they were abuſed by them. Marcus ran away with another man's Wife. They poured oyl and water upon the head of the deceaſed, hoping ſo to redeem them. They ſaid, that the life and generation of man conſiſted in ſeven Stars: that Chriſt ſuffered not indeed, and that there was no reſurrection of the fleſh. Alcibiades refraining the Uſe of God's Creatures, was reformed by Attalus the Martyr. Archonitici, Hereticks in Paleſtine, referred all things unto man's Powers. They ſaid, the Sabbath was the God of the Jews, and the Devil the Son of the Sabbath. (b) Tatianus the Scholar of Juſtin Martyr gave original to the Encratitæ, ſo called from Continency. For they abhorred Marriage, forbad the Uſe of living Creatures, offered Water inſtead of Wine in the Sacrament, and denied that Adam was ſaved. Severus, of whom were named the Severians, added to the opinions of Tatianus, reviling Paul, rejecting his Epiſtles, and the Acts of the Apoſtles. He ſaid, That a Woman was of the Devil, that Man from the middle upwards was of God, and beneath of the Devil. Apelles, Pontinus, and other Marcionites; about this time alſo diſturbed the Peace of the Church.

Epiphan Auguſt. de hæreſibus. Euſeb.

Euſeb. l.5.c.3.

(b) L.4.c.27.

97. There were alſo certain Hereticks of Galatia and Cappadocia called Pepuzians, as alſo Quintiliani and Priſcilliani, becauſe they ſaid, that Chriſt in form of a Woman being the Bed fellow of Quintilla or Priſcilla, revealed unto her Divine Myſteries. Women were Prieſts amongſt them, and their ſacrifices were alike to the Montaniſts, of which Sect they ſeem to have been, ſeeing alſo his Propheteſſes were of the Town Pepuza. Artotyritæ were Hereticks which offered Bread and Cheeſe in the Sacrament. Alogi denied Chriſt to be the Word, condemned John's Goſpel, and ſaid, that Cerinthus the Heretick wrote the Revelations. Theodotus a Montaniſt through Sorcery took his flight towards Heaven, but down he fell and died miſerably. Adamites deviſed a Church after the faſhion of an hot-houſe, to keep them from cold for the ſpace of an hour, or Service time: they were all naked, Men and Women: Virgins preached unto the reſt: their Church they called Paradiſe, and themſelves Adam and Eve. (a) Florinus and Blaſtus fell from the Church, and taught at Rome, That God was the Author of Evil, whom Irenæus confuted. (b) Theodotus a Tanner, denied the Divinity of Chriſt: He was the firſt Author of the Hereſy of Artemon, for which cauſe Viator Biſhop of Rome excommunicated him. Artemon his Diſciple accounted Chriſt but a bare and naked man. He lived in the time of Victor and Zephyrinus. His Companions were Aſclepiodorus and Natalius, who repented and fell at the feet of Zephyrinus Biſhop of Rome, for Abſolution. (c) Marcianus the Heretick maintained an Heterodox Opinion, out of the pretended Goſpel of Peter, whom Serapion Biſhop of Antioch confuted. (d) Noetus denied there were three Perſons, ſaying, All three were one. He called himſelf Moſes, and ſaid, Aaron was his Brother. He ſaid, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, ſuffered in the Fleſh.

Epiphan. Aug.

(a) Euſeb. Eccl. Hiſt. l. 5. c. 14, 19.

(b) L. 5. c. 28.

(c) Lib. 6. c. 12.

(d) Epiphan. Hæreſ. 57.

CHAP. VI.

From the Death of Pertinax, and the expoſing of the Empire to ſale, the Death of Maximinus the firſt elected Emperor without Conſent of the Senate; the ſpace of 45 years.

Herodian. l. 2.

1. THE Soldiers having murdered Pertinax, got them to their Camp, and ſet the Empire to Sale, Proclaiming, That they would prefer him that ſhould offer moſt. Two there were found who bade Money for it: Firſt Sulpicianus, a man of Conſular Dignity, Governor of the City, and Father in Law to Pertinax, and Didius Julianus of the ſame Degree, a great Lawyer, and exceeding rich. The Soldiers being jealous leſt the former ſhould have an intention to puniſh them for the Murther of Pertinax, accepted the offer of Julianus, who promiſed what they would ask, having, as he ſaid, treaſures of Silver and Gold. Being by a Ladder received up to the Wall, and ſo into the Camp, he promiſed to reſtore the Honours and Statues of Commodus, to grant them what Liberty they enjoyed under that Prince, and to give them more than they could ask or expect; he was carried into the Palace, the people by the way curſing and upbraiding him with his purchaſe. Having thus invaded the Empire, he gave himſelf up to all Luxury, but being unable to perform his promiſe to the Soldiers, loſt their favour, and fell into the contempt of all men, the People deſiring another Prince. At this time Peſcenninus Niger was Governor of Syria, who as well for the greatneſs of his Place (his Province containing all from Phœnicia unto Euphrates) as for his Popularity, was moſt eminent: him did the People extol, and they implored his aſſiſtance. He being glad of this opportunity, eaſily perſwaded his Soldiers to accept of him for their Emperor, and entertained Ambaſſadors which now had recourſe to him as the lawful Prince. But then giving himſelf up to idleneſs, he neglected to ſettle and confirm his Eſtate by going to Rome, and (what was more) by drawing the Army in Illyricum to his ſide. and ſo loſt all.

Didius Julianus purchaſeth the Empire.

2. At this time governed both the Pannoniaes L. Septimius Severus, an African born, a man forward and crafty, who ſeeing the Roman Empire thus obnoxious to every man's Catch, reſolved to venture for it amongſt the reſt, eſpecially in regard that of thoſe two who had ſeized on it, the one was negligent and ſecure, the other hated and deſpiſed. Being alſo incouraged by ſome dreams, he firſt of all inveighed againſt the Prætorian Bands which had killed Pertinax, whom knowing to be much beloved by his Soldiers, he highly extolled him, and eaſily perſwaded them to revenge his Death, who once was Lieutenant of the Forces in Illyricum. Then preſently (though he pretended he ſought it not) was he ſaluted Emperor, and took upon him the name of Pertinax, which he knew was acceptable to all. After this he marched with great ſpeed to Rome, the Italians (who ever ſince the days of Auguſtus had not been uſed to War) receiving him in all places, and Julianus his Soldiers very ſlowly providing for reſiſtance, though he had now diſtributed to them all the Money he could by any means compaſs. Severus conveyed his Soldiers in a diſguiſed manner into the City, which was full of them, privily armed, e're Julianus or the People were aware; whereupon Julianus wrote to him, to ſignifie he was willing to receive him into participation of the Empire, and afterwards deſired he might reſign it. For the Senate ſeeing him ſo timorous, and the other now at hand, being called together according to the ancient Cuſtom by the Conſuls, decreed death to him, and the Empire to Severus. Julianus held the Dignity ſeven Months, having purchaſed death at an exceſſive rate.

Severus obtaineth it.

3. Severus having thus obtained the Empire, that he might not at firſt crack his credit by falſifying his word, got thoſe Soldiers into his Power that had ſlain Pertinax, and making them be ſtripped of their Military Cloaths, baniſhed them a hundred Miles from the City. Then entring the Court, he promiſed great things to the Senate, profeſſing his intention was to govern after the Preſcript of Marcus, and not only to take the name, but alſo diſpoſition of Pertinax, although there were ſome who ſo well knew him, that they could not be deceived. After this he prepared for an Expedition againſt Niger, but fearing to leave an Æmulator at his back, he endeavoured to prevent him. This was Clodius Albinus, who at this time governed Britain, was of Patrician rank, and had a ſtrong Army at his Command. He flattered him with the title of Cæſar, beſeeching him, as the fitteſt perſon, to take care of the Empire, for that he himſelf grew old, and his Children were Infants. Albinus overjoyed that he ſhould obtain what he had deſired, without any trouble, fooled himſelf in his vain confidence, eſpecially for that Severus had written to the Senate in the ſame ſtrain, had ordered Money to be ſtamped with his Image, erected him ſome Statues, and did him Honour otherwiſe, to deceive him.

Olymp. 243. ann. 1. V. C. 946. A. D. 193.

4. Niger much troubled at his coming towards him, took care for ſecuring the paſſages into Aſia, gathered together all the Forces in thoſe Parts, obtained aid from the Parthian and Atrenian Kings, ſeized on Byzantium, and fortified the ſtraights of the Mountain Taurus. Severus therefore directed not his courſe towards Byzantium, but marched for Cyzicus, where Æmilianus General to Niger met him, and either for that he was over-matched, or deſirous to ſave his Children (whom Severus, as alſo others of his Adverſaries had got into his hands) betrayed his truſt, and loſt his Army. Then did Severus invade Bithynia, wherein they of Nicomedia revolted to him; but the Inhabitants of Nice ſtuck cloſe to Niger: thence he proceeded into Galatia, and ſo into Cappadocia to paſs over Taurus. The paſſage was ſo fortified and defended, that no hope there was of breaking through, till abundance of Rain-water falling down from the Mountains broke down the Wall, whereupon the Defendants fled. Then came Niger with an Army very numerous, but not to be compared with the Legions of Illyricum for Skill and Valour; and they met at Iſſus, where Darius was overthrown by Alexander. Here Niger had the ſame fortune in a great and bloody Battel, after which going back to Antioch, and being purſued by a Party of Horſe, his Head was cut off, having brought himſelf to this end by his delay and idleneſs. Severus having thus removed him, now caſt his Thoughts towards his friend in Britain.

Lege Herodian. lib. 3. Eutrop. lib. 9. Aurelium Victorem. Xiphil. ex Dione. Oroſium lib. 7. cap. 17.

Suppreſſeth Niger.

5. He now conſulted how he might ſecure the Empire to his Family, which could not be done as long as Albinus continuing Cæſar had ſome title to it, and to whom in his abſence the great ones had demonſtrated their affections, as to a man of great Nobility, and far more worthy of the Sovereignty than he who at preſent poſſeſſed it: He therefore reſolved to remove him out of the way. By open War he thought it not convenient to do it, and therefore at firſt attempted his Deſign by Treachery, ſending ſome, who under colour of bringing Letters, ſhould make him away. Albinus having warning to beware of him, this ſucceeded not, ſo that he betook himſelf to force, and with incredible expedition returned into the Weſt. Albinus terrified at his haſty retreat, made all poſſible Proviſion for reſiſtance, and paſſed over into Gaul, where after many Skirmiſhes they joyned in a pitcht Battel near Lugdunum. Victory at the firſt ſo far inclined towards Albinus, that Severus caſt off his Robe, and hid himſelf, but by the coming in of Lætus, who deſigned to deſtroy them both, and ſet up for himſelf, the fight was ſo changed, that Albinus was routed, and flying to the City, there had his Head ſtruck off. Then returned Severus to Rome with all his Army, which to reward, he not only beſtowed Money upon them, but alſo ſuch Privileges, which though to him they might procure reſpect and ſervice, yet proved the bane of the Commonwealth.

And Albinus.

For the Soldiers having formerly through the looſneſs and neglect of ſome Emperors, contracted ſloth and covetouſneſs, were thence more animated to violate the Sovereignty, to depoſe, and ſet up whom they pleaſed. Now he adding more fuel to this flame increaſed their allowance of Corn, gave them licenſe to wear Rings of Gold as Knights, and to Marry and maintain Wives, which broke in pieces the Reliques of the ancient Diſcipline, and effected, that we ſhall hear more of them upon very ſad occaſions.

His ſucceſs in the Eaſt.

His Vices.

The fifth Perſecution.

Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l.6. c. 1, &c.

6. He made another expedition into the Eaſt, to be revenged upon ſuch as had aſſiſted Niger. Piercing into Arabia he beſieged Atræ the Metropolis of the Atrevi, but found ſuch entertainment as glad he was to retreat without any thing performed, and only by chance, as ſome ſay, ſaved his Reputation. For in his return being driven by Tempeſts into Parthia, he was conſtrained to Land near Cteſiphon, the chief City where Artabanus the King then reſided. Artabanus ſtruck with the ſuddenneſs of the thing, fled amain, and Severus taking the City with eaſe, got great Treaſures, with multitudes of Captives, and returned to Rome in a Triumphant manner, having more by good fortune than policy atchieved this Enterprize. When he had done theſe great things abroad, and (conſidering the Princes by him defeated, and the wonderful Expedition he uſed at all times) had approached near unto the greateſt Military glory of the moſt famous Captains, he lay idle at home, or, ſpending his time in judicial affairs, he let fall the vizard of goodneſs, which in the beginning he had put on. His extraordinary covetouſneſs increaſed his innate cruelty, ſo that under pretence of taking off his Enemies, he put to death unheard forty three Perſons of chiefeſt Rank. In deſpite of the Senate, he Canonized Commodus for a God, caſt Narciſſus, who ſtrangled him (as he had deſerved) to the Lions, called himſelf his Brother, and to his Son Baſſianus, whom he made Partner with him in the Empire, he gave the Sirname of Antoninus. His cruelty was alſo extended to the Church, againſt which he raiſed the fifth Perſecution in the Tenth year of his Reign, wherein periſhed many.

Coming into Britain.

Here he dieth.

7. Severus after the overthrow of Albinus, ſent firſt Heraclianus to ſeize upon Britain, and to rule it: then Virius Lupus as Proprætor and Lieutenant (whom Ulpian the Lawyer calleth Preſident of Britain) who being wearied with the Inrodes and Inſolences of the Maata, ſent for the Emperor himſelf over. He was glad of this occaſion, not only for deſire of glory, but alſo to draw away with him his two Sons from the City, where they gave up themſelves to licentious riotting, and exerciſed irreconcileable enmity betwixt themſelves. The Britains ſent Ambaſſadors to him to beg Peace, but he detained them till he had made ſufficient Proviſion for War, and then diſmiſſed them without granting their requeſts. Leaving his Son Geta (whom at his arrival he alſo created Auguſtus) in the hithermoſt part of the Province (which continued in obedience) for the civil Juriſdiction and Adminiſtration of affairs there; he himſelf with Antoninus went into the further parts, where being buſied in cutting down Woods, making Bridges, and drying up the Meers, he fought no Battel, but what with the Enemies Ambuſcadoes, and with Sickneſs, loſt Fifty thouſand Men, according to Dio. Herodian writeth, That the Britans found him work enough, being able to retreat where the Romans could not follow by reaſon of the Fens, which the Natives eaſily paſſed, being naked, very nimble and skilful in the places, ſo that by Ambuſcadoes laid in the Caledonian Foreſt, and through the unwholſomneſs of the Meeriſh Grounds he loſt many Thouſands of his Men; but he forced them to Peace with delivery of a good part of their Countrey and their Arms. For theſe Victories he ſtamped certain pieces of Money with this Inſcription, Victoria Britanica, aſſumed the Sirname of Britanicus Maximus, and his Son Geta was alſo Sirnamed Britanicus, as appeareth by his Coins, ſaith Cambden. But ſhortly after they revolted, whereupon he brake out into ſuch a rage, that he gave his Soldiers charge to make a general Maſſacre of them all, and returning, though much tormented with the Gout, againſt them raiſed a Wall a hundred and thirty miles in length croſs the Iſland, to ſeparate betwixt the Barbarians and Romans, which Baſſianus afterwards increaſed. When he had in ſome ſort repreſſed the Rebels, he ſickned, not ſo much out of any bodily Diſtemper, as for grief, and ſorrow of mind, by reaſon of the deſperate and unreclaimable demeanour of his Son Antoninus, who once or twice gave the attempt to kill him with his own hand. Theſe were his laſt words: A troubled State of the Commonwealth I found in every place, but I leave it in peace and quietneſs even amongſt the Britains. He died at Eboracum, now called York (having tried as he * ſaid all ſorts of lives, and condemned all of vanity) on the day before the Nones of February, having Reigned Eighteen years, and almoſt lived Sixty ſix. A.V.C. 964. A.D. 211. Q. Epidius Rufus and Pomponius Baſſus being Conſuls.

* Omnia fui & nihil expedit.

8. Severus his Body was in a Military ſort carried forth by his Soldiers to the funeral fire, and honoured with a ſolemn Juſting and Running at Tilt, performed by his Sons and Soldiers. He was alſo Canonized a god after the ordinary manner of the Apotheoſis of the Roman Emperors, which being not formerly touched, it's convenient in this place to deſcribe, as we have it from Herodian. A cuſtom ſaith he, the Romans have to conſecrate thoſe Emperors that die, their Sons or Succeſſors ſurviving. And whoſoever are thus honoured, be canonized, and regiſtred in the Roll of their Divi, or gods. During this Complement they hold a general mourning through the whole City, and the ſame mixed with a feſtival Solemnity. For the dead Body they Bury with a Sumptuous Funeral, according to the manner of other men. But they frame an Image of wax, reſembling in all points the Party deceaſed, and lay the ſame openly at the Entry of the Palace, upon a moſt ample and ſtately bed of Ivory erected on high, and covered with Cloth of Gold. And verily that Image lieth with a Pale colour like unto a ſick man. About the Bed there ſits a good part of the day the whole Body of the Senate, on the left hand, arrayed in their Blacks; and on the right hand certain Matrones honorable by the Dignity of their Husbands or Parents. And there is not one of them ſeen to wear any Gold about them, nor to be adorned with Jewels, but clad in white and ſlender Garments, they repreſent Mourners. This they do for ſeven days together: during which time the Phyſicians reſort daily to him to feel his pulſe, and conſider of his Diſeaſe, and thereupon as of their Patient judicially pronounce that he groweth worſe and worſe. Then when he ſeemeth to be dead, certain of the nobleſt, and moſt choice young men, as well of Senatorian as Equeſtrian Rank, take up the Bed, and carry it through the Via Sacra into the old Forum, where the Roman Magiſtrates were wont to lay down their Offices. Here on both ſides are certain Steps raiſed in manner of ſtairs; upon which on the one hand are placed a quire of Boys of nobleſt birth and Patritian dignity, and on the other a Company of Women of noble Parentage, Singing in commendation of the deceaſed Prince, Hymns and Sonnets turned to a ſolemn and mournful Note.

Lib. 4. ad initium.

The manner of the Apotheoſis of the Roman Emperors.

9. Theſe things done, they take up the Bed or Herſe again, and carry it out of the City into the Campus Martius, where in the broadeſt place thereof a frame or turret four-ſquare, with equal ſides, is raiſed, and made in manner of a Tabernacle, of no other matter than great pieces of Timber. Now this within is all filled with dry fuel: but without, adorned with rich Hangings interwoven with Gold-wire, with divers Ivory Portraicts of Imagery, and ſundry curious Pictures. Over this frame ſtood another ſomewhat leſs; but in form and furniture like unto the former, with Windows and Doors ſtanding open. And ſo a third, and fourth Turret, ſmaller every one than that next beneath it, and others like it ſtill one after another, till you come to the laſt, which is the leaſt of all the reſt. The manner of this Building you may compare to thoſe Lanthorns, or light Towers ſtanding by Haven-ſides, and commonly called Phari, which give light by fire in the night time, and direct Ships at Sea in their courſe to ſafe Harbours. The Herſe then being mounted up into the ſecond Tabernacle, they get together Spices, and Odours of all ſorts, as alſo all the ſweet ſmelling Fruits, Herbs, Juyces, and Liquors, that the whole World will afford, and thereon pour them by heaps. For there is no Nation, City, or State, nor any Perſon of Rank and Quality, but ſtrive every one to beſtow in honour of the Prince, theſe laſt Gifts and Preſents. Now when there's a mighty heap of Spices raiſed, and the whole Room is therewith filled, then all of Knight's degree firſt ride about the ædifice, marching in a certain meaſure: and therewith in their courſes and recourſes obſerve a Warlike kind of motion round, in juſt meaſure and number. Chariots are alſo driven about by ſuch, as ſitting in them are cloathed in Purple, and repreſent all the famous Roman Captains and Emperors. Theſe things thus performed, he that ſucceedeth in the Empire takes a Torch, and ſets it to the Tabernacle: then all the reſt on every ſide put fire under, and every place being filled with the dry fuel and Odours, inſtantly are taken with a vehement fire. Then preſently from the laſt and leaſt Tabernacle, as from ſome high Turret, when the fire is put underneath, an Eagle is let fly, which is believed to carry the Princes Soul up into Heaven. And ſo from that time forward the Emperor is adored amongſt the reſt of the gods.

Lege Herodian. l. 4. Aurel. Vict. Spartian. Eutrop. l. 9. Dion. lib. 77. Oroſium l. 7. c. 8.

10. Severus left his two Sons Antoninus Baſſianus (called alſo Caracalla, from a barbarous habit he gave to the people, as Spartianus writeth) and Geta equal ſharers in the Empire. They after his death left not off their former contentions, but increaſed them to that height, that they could neither live nor reign together, but thought of parting the Empire betwixt them; but their Mother Julia (Spartianus maketh her the Step-Mother of Antoninus, and to have loved him better than her own Son Geta, nay filthily, inſomuch that ſhe Married him afterwards) by her paſſionate interpoſition hindred it. They then betook themſelves to ſecret Conſpiracies, which ſucceeding not, Antoninus reſolved, though it were by open force, to kill his Brother, whom he perceived to be far better beloved than himſelf, and either breaking into his Brother's Chamber, or getting in by his Mothers means, under pretence of Reconciliation to be made, killed him in her boſom. This done, he ſecured the Empire to him by bribing the Soldiers, to whom he was ſo profuſe, that in one day he beſtowed on them, what his Father had been unjuſtly ſcraping together for Eighteen years. Then falling like a ſavage Beaſt into cruel courſes, he cut off all Geta's Friends and Acquaintance, all the Senators of any conſiderable rank or wealth, the Lieutenants and Governors of Provinces, with the Veſtal Nuns, and ſet the Soldiers to kill the People beholding the Circenſian Games. After this, going into Germany, to pleaſe his Army he lived an hard and laborious life; and thence paſſing into Thrace, he there imitated Alexander the Great, whom he ever much affected to talk of, and pretended to emulate. He went thence to Ilium, where he counterfeited Achilles, and ſo to Alexandria, where he made the Inhabitants dearly repent of their raſhneſs and folly.

Baſſianus having killed his brother, cruelly rageth against others.

Olymp. 247. an. 4. V. C. 965. A. D. 212. Baſſiani 2.

11. Being naturally given to much Tatling, they had formerly railed againſt him for his Cruelty towards his Brother, and deſpiſed him, for that being a man of ſo contemptible ſtature, he compared himſelf to their Alexander. Reſolving then to be revenged on them, he firſt entertained them very plauſibly, but afterwards drawing forth all the youth by a wile, he compaſſed them in with his Army, and killed them all. After this, deſirous to become famous by ſome great Exploit, he ſent to the Parthian for his Daughter, and pretended that he himſelf would come and Marry her, whereby that King being perſwaded to meet him with a great number of People, he fell upon them and made a great ſlaughter, for that they thought it needleſs to come armed to a Wedding; and Artabanus himſelf with difficulty eſcaped. Getting here much booty, and as he thought much glory, he returned into Meſopotamia, where he received puniſhment from above, for his manifold cruelty. There was one Opilius Macrinus an African born, and one of his Captains, whom he unworthily uſed. This Macrinus receiving a Letter from Maternianus, directed to the Emperor (who had commanded him to call together the Magicians, and conſult them about his end, and whether any lay in wait for the Empire) wherein Antoninus was adviſed to cut him off, as aiming at the Sovereignty, when he had ventured to open it, perceived that either he or his Maſter muſt die, and therefore procured one Martialis to kill him. This man being inraged againſt the Emperor, for that he had condemned his Brother without ſufficient Hearing, ſlew him as he was making water, on the ſixth of the Ides of April, after he had reigned ſix years, and two months, in the firſt year of the 249 Olympiad, A. V. C. 970. A. D. 217, Brutius Præſens and Extricatus being Conſuls. Amongſt many others Caracallus put to death Papinianus the great Lawyer, as it's ſaid, becauſe he would not defend his Paricide.

Nomen cum violis roſiſq; natum Hyblam quod ſapit Atticoſq; flores. Nomen Nectare dulcius beato. Nomen nobile, molle, delicatum. &c. Martial. lib. 9. c. 12. Hæc ad Papinian. applicat Martinus libergeus Cenomanus extaſia quadam affectus.

12. Papinian! A Name as fragrant as Violets, as Roſes, the Sicilian and Africk Flowers, ſweeter than Honey, or the moſt delicious Nectar; a Name ſo noble, ſo pleaſant, ſo delicate, as the moſt beauteous words and Flouriſhes of Rhetorick cannot reach it. How have all Ages been enamoured with it? How have all others envied the Happineſs of that which alone enjoyed him in his Perſon? A Lawyer who lived not fully ſeven and thirty years; but a Lawyer ſo learned and every way accompliſhed in his Profeſſion, as before him the world never ſaw the like; neither ever hereafter is like to ſee. He alone was of ſuch Authority, that in a difference of Opinions, his Judgment was moſt commonly preferred before that of any other Doctor. In the number of Sentences, his Voice, by order of Juſtinian, was to go for two; and in reſpect to his Eminency and the excellency of his Writings, as the Students in Arts with us of the third year are called Sophiſtæ, thoſe in Law of the third year bore the

The worth of Papinian.

Nemo unus unquam erit Papinianus. Papinianus omnium qui ſunt, qui erunt, quiq; fuerunt Jurisperitiſſimus. Cujacius.

the Name of Papinianiſtæ. And as the Syracuſians of old, in gratitude to Marcellus, ordained a Feaſt to his memory; by this Emperor's Command, the Name and Memory of Papinian was preſerved in the Schools, in the ſame manner every third year. Spartian the Hiſtorian calls him the Sanctuary and Treaſury of Law, and ſaith, he was Præfectus Prætorio under the Emperor Severus, who uſed him with all reſpect anſwerable to his Tranſcendent merit. But Sons more rarely imitate their Fathers in what is good. Antoninus Baſſianus Caracalla ſucceeding his Father, kills his Brother Geta in his Mothers Arms, and will have Papinian defend the Fact, who refuſing utterly to do it (anſwering, it's ſaid, That It was Eaſier to commit Parricide, than defend it) was by his Command, ſent after him whom he would not, contrary to Juſtice, accuſe. Such were the Heroick virtues of thoſe ancient Lawyers, who when they gave out their Anſwers ſpake as from the Tripos, and being preferred to Places of Truſt in the Commonwealth, by virtue of a more than ordinary Impulſe, and protected by the Murus ahæneus of their own Integrity, ſtood all the Storms of Difficulties and Dangers with undaunted Courage, and by their Virtue and Conſtancy either terrified Tyrants, or conquered them by ſuffering for Truth and Juſtice.

Scholars of Papinian.

13. Now upon this occaſion of mentioning Papinian, it's convenient here and altogether to obſerve further, That out of his School proceeded a little Army of excellent Lawyers, as Paulus, and Ulpian, Antoninus Gordianus, both an Emperor and Emperor's Son, Claudius Venatus, Catilius Severus; Ælius Serenianus, Quintilius Marcellus, and the two Fabii Sabeni, Father and Son. Paulus and Ulpian were the Aſſeſſors of Papinian when Præfect, and according to the Advice of Peſcennius Niger, were afterward Præfects themſelves. For Niger was of ſo great Authority, That he wrote firſt to Marcus Antoninus, and afterward to Commodus, when he ſaw that Provinces were ruined by frequent change of Governors, That a Succeſſor ſhould not be ſent to any Preſident of a Province, a Legatus or Proconſul before five years; becauſe they left their Imployment, before they knew how to manage them. In the next place, That no Upſtarts ſhould be imployed, except in Military Commands. And he adviſed that Aſſeſſors ſhould govern in ſuch Provinces as they had been Aſſeſſors in, which was afterwards obſerved by Severus, and many others, as, ſaith Spartian, the Præfectſhips of Paulus and Ulpian do prove, who were of Council to Papinian: and afterwards, when one had ſerved in the Scrinium Memoriæ, and the other as Libellorum Magiſter, they were both preſently made Præfects. He procured alſo, That none ſhould be Aſſeſſor in his own Province; but at Rome, that none ſhould govern but one whoſe Parents were anciently (or before Antoninus his Law) Roman Citizens. Beſides, he added Salaries to Councellors, leſt they ſhould be burthenſom to them to whom they were Aſſeſſors, ſaying, That a Judge ought neither to give nor receive. This it was convenient to do, becauſe Auguſtus who firſt appointed Salaries to the Preſidents of Provinces, provided nothing for their Councellors or Aſſeſſors. Theſe things though a little out of the way, it's not inconvenient to mention, becauſe relating to the Profeſſion of the Perſons of whom we write.

In Peſcennio Nigro.

Paulus.

Ulpian.

14. Julius Paulus, the Aſſeſſor of Papinian, and of Council to Alexander Severus the Emperor, wrote more Books concerning Law, than any other, of which five of Sentences or Aphoriſms written to his Son, or rather the Epitome of them, are yet extant. As for Ulpian, the other Aſſeſſor, Alexander Severus (that we may a little anticipate, to ſpeak altogether) calls him in a certain Conſtitution both his Præfectus Prætorio, and his Parent. For as Lampridius writes, he took him for his Tutor or Guardian ſorely againſt the will of his Mother, though afterwards he gave him Thanks for ſo doing, and the grateful Prince often defended him from the rage of the Soldiers, by covering him with his Purple Robe. He was born at Syria Phœnice, a famous Colony of the Syrians, as he ſaith himſelf, and having mended ſome things which Heliogabalus had put out of order, was ſlain by the Prætorian Guards, which ſet upon him in the Night, although he fled for refuge to the Emperor and his Mother. There was another great Lawyer, Africanus, whom ſome think to have been a Scholar alſo of Papinian. But they were deceived by a corrupt Place of Lampridius the Hiſtorian, which reckons up many other Lawyers amongſt the Councellors of Alexander, though they died before that Emperor was born, at leaſt e're the Purple came upon his Shoulders. Theſe were Pomponius Alphæus, Macianus, Triphonius, Celſus, Proculus, and others. Indeed there were two Lawyers who had the Name of Africanus, viz. Sextus Cæcilius Africanus, commonly called Sextus Cæcilius, and another ſimply ſo called, both who lived before the time of Alexander. As for Pomponius, he reached (when ever he lived) the Seventy eighth year of his Age, and ſpent all his time in the ſtudy of the Law, and other Parts of good Literature, being much pleaſed with that Saying, That although he had one foot in the Grave, yet did he deſire ſtill to Learn.

The Excellency of the Writings of them and others, out of which the Pandects were taken.

15. Theſe and many more mentioned in the Pandects, were the great and Reverend Sages of the Law, out of the Writings of whom were Collected ſuch Books as are come to our Hands, and have the force and efficacy of Law from Imperial ſtamp and Authority. They were Perſons indued with all manner of good literature, and what ever could render them accompliſhed. Their Writings were not only words, nor only matter, but words and matter both; being ſolid and judicious in reſpect of the one, and elegant, ingenious, rhetorical, and copious in reference to the other. They did not circumſcribe the Law within the narrow bounds of Formes and Cautions; but as their buſineſs was to diſcern betwixt Juſt and Unjuſt, Equitable and not Equitable, Lawful and Unlawful; they took in all manner of knowledg whatſoever, conducing to that great and difficult Deſign, and thought it a point of Diſhoneſty as well as Ignorance, to be unſeen in any thing which tended to the Safety of Men, and the Profit of the Commonwealth. For the Elegancy of the Writings of thoſe who were more ancient, we have Cicero a Competent Judge; who uſually Joyns the Commendation of Eloquence, with that of the Knowledg of the Law. And as for theſe of later times, the Writings of whom Compoſe the Pandects, or Digeſts, Laurentius Valla, one as able to paſs his Cenſure in point of Elegancy and good Latine as any other, thus expreſſeth himſelf in their behalf. 'I lately read 'over and over Fifty Books of Digeſts, taken out of moſt of the Writings of 'Lawyers, and I did it both willingly, and with great Admiration. Firſt, Be'cauſe it's hard to ſay, whether they excel in Diligence or Gravity, Prudence 'or Equity, various Knowledg, or excellency of Language; In the next place, 'every one of theſe Perfections do ſo abound in all of them, that it's 'hard to ſay in whom they moſt prevail. And this increaſeth the Wonder, that 'they lived ſome of them ſome Ages diſtant, although all of them after Cicero, 'and therefore in ſome words they differ from him, as all do who wrote after 'Virgil and Livy. Of S. Sulpitius, and Mutius Scævola, nothing is extant, al'though of a later Scævola there be ſomething. As for the moſt ancient Lawyers, 'therefore, how Eloquent they were, we cannot judge, having nothing left us to 'read of all they wrote. But to ſpeak of thoſe Writings which are come to 'our Hands, in mine Opinion, nothing can be added or taken from them, 'not only in reſpect of Eloquence, which yet that Subject doth not greatly bear; 'but alſo of the Purity and Elegancy of the Latin ſtyle, without which, all 'Learning is blind and Illiberal, eſpecially in the Civil Law. Thus much doth Valla write in behalf of their Language; as for their Matter, and the excellency of that reaſon contained in their Writings, the Practice of the Chriſtian World bears witneſs to it, almoſt all Kingdoms and States receiving them for Law at this very day.

Res & Verba Philippus, verba ſine rebus Eraſmus, Res ſine verbis Lutherus, Nec res, nec verba Caroloſtadius.

Sine qua cæca omnis Doctrina eſt, & illiberalis, præſertim in Jure Civili.

Biſhops.

16. In the firſt year of Severus (that we may continue our method concerning Eccleſiaſtical matters) died Victor Biſhop of Rome, on the fifth of the Calends of Auguſt, and Zepherinus ſucceeded; the fifteenth Biſhop of that See, according to Damaſus. In the laſt of Antoninus Baſſianus, Zepherinus died, on the ſeventh before the Calends of September. The See was vacant five days. Then ſucceeded Calliſtus, who therefore was elected the day before the Calends of September, on the firſt feria. After Dios Biſhop of Jeruſalem, whom the Biſhops of the neighbouring Churches had ordained after the departure of Narciſſus, Germanion ſucceeded; and after him Gordius, in whoſe time Narciſſus ſhewed himſelf again, as if he had been riſen from the dead, and was intreated by the Brethren to enjoy his Biſhoprick, being much marvelled at for his departure, for his Philoſophical courſe of life, and eſpecially for the Vengeance and Plagues of God poured upon his accuſers. And becauſe for his great age he was not able to ſupply the place, Alexander Biſhop of Cappadocia was joyned with him, and governed alone after his death. In the Church of Antioch, Aſclepiades was Biſhop after Serapion, about the firſt year of Caracalla, and was ſucceeded by Philetus about the laſt of that Prince's Reign.

Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 10.

Tertullian.

17. Upon Zepherinus Biſhop of Rome falleth very foul Tertullian a Presbyter or Prieſt of Carthage in Africk, for that he was more ſevere againſt ſuch, as through fear had ſacrificed to Idols, than againſt Whoremongers and Adulterers; wherein not without cauſe truly (ſaith Cappellus) but yet without meaſure he blameth Zepherinus, and the whole Roman Clergy, the manners of whom were even now very corrupt, if we may believe Tertullian. But really not ſo much out of hatred to their Vices, as out of prejudice to the truth he calleth the Roman Clergy Pſychicus, as well in his Book de pudicitia, as in that de monogamia, which he thus beginneth, Hæretici nuptias auferunt, Pſychici ingerunt. He pretendeth therein only to condemn ſecond Marriages, but indeed moſt of his Arguments reſpect both firſt and ſecond, although he himſelf had Married a Wife, and retained her in his Presbytery. But Marriage which he had learnt of the Orthodox to approve, he learnt of Montanus to deſpiſe, to whom he would have more revealed than to the Apoſtles, becauſe they as yet (or for certain the Church) could not bear the yoak of Faſtings and cœlibate which Montanus brought in, and he as a Montaniſt would inculcate. This humour at length ſo poſſeſſed him, that neither content with the title of Chriſtian, nor that of Presbyter, he put on the Philoſophick Pallium, as a token of a more auſtere life, wherein he would be eminent, not only amongſt Chriſtians, but alſo Montaniſts. The Africans either being amazed or laughing at this Novelty, he wrote an elegant but moſt obſcure Book de pallio, which before being miſerably lacerated, hath been of late days reſtored by the moſt learned Salmaſius. He wrote his Book De præſcriptionibus about the eighth year of Commodus, as Cappellus gathereth, becauſe in the end thereof making a Catalogue of Hereticks, he mentioneth Theodotus (who was cenſured by Victor Biſhop of Rome, for holding Chriſt to have been a meer man) but not Artemon the Heretick who appeared ſhortly after.

Clemens Alexandrinus.

Minutius Felix.

18. His Book De corona Militis acquainteth us with the occaſion of the Perſecution of the Chriſtians, in the Reign of Severus. The Emperor e're he marched into the Eaſt (in that Expedition wherein he overthrew the Parthians) made his elder Son his Partner in the Tribunitial Power, and by his liberality pleaſed the People formerly inraged by the many Puniſhments he inflicted. By occaſion of this liberality, as it ſeemeth, a Chriſtian Soldier holding a certain Garland or Crown in his hand, as if it were wickedneſs for him to ſet it on his head as the reſt did, was asked why he did ſo, and anſwered, That he was a Chriſtian. This was the occaſion of the Emperor's rage. About the fifteenth of Severus, he wrote againſt the Marcionites, whom he ſo impugneth, as yet underhand he inculcateth his Montaniſm. For ſaith he: Amongſt us ſpiritual reaſon derived from the Comforter, perſwadeth in the Faith ſingle Matrimony. But we muſt not forget, that about the fourth of Severus, he wrote a moſt excellent Apology for the Chriſtian Faith. At the ſame time with Tertullian flouriſhed Clemens, called Alexandrinus, becauſe a Philoſopher of Alexandria, the Scholar of Pantenus, and Maſter of Origen. Euſebius mentioneth him, and Pantænus in the ſecond of Severus, at which time it's probable he wrote his Stromata; for not intending his Chronology beyond the time of Commodus, he ſeemeth not long after his death to have begun that Work. At this time alſo lived Minutius Felix an eminent Lawyer, and the Author of that excellent Book, intituled Octavius, which, as Lactantius writeth, doth declare how fit an aſſertor of the truth he might have been, had he applied himſelf wholly to that ſtudy. This Book being intended as an Apology for Chriſtian Religion, acquainteth us what thoughts the Heathen at that time had thereof, as alſo do the Apologies of Juſtin Martyr, the Books of Origen againſt Celſus, and eſpecially that of Tertullian. We have already ſhewn the riſe and increaſe of Chriſtian Religion, we have delivered the ſeries of the moſt eminent Biſhops and Fathers thereof, as alſo of the ſeveral Hereticks which from within diſturbed the peace thereof. We have alſo given an account of the ſeveral fiery Trials the Faithful underwent. But what opinions the Infidels had of Chriſtians and Chriſtianity, of what crimes they accuſed them, whence their hatred proceeded, whereupon the Emperors grounded their bloody Edicts: what the Primitive Saints did in the mean time, how they behaved themſelves under theſe preſſures, how they carried it towards their Enemies, how they ſtood affected in duty towards their Princes; in ſum, what their converſations both as Men and Chriſtians were, is moſt worthy to be conſidered, and thoſe things in ſhort out of the Apologies aforenamed, and other Authors, we ſhall endeavour to diſcover.

19. The

An inquiry into the condition of Chriſtians.

19. The firſt thing that the Heathens cavilled at in Chriſtianity (beſides what occaſion was given by Hereticks whom the Church abominated) was the Newneſs of it. (a) St. Paul ſeemed to them to be a ſetter forth of new gods. And there was an ancient Law at (b) Rome which forbad introducing new Ceremonies into Religion, as worſhipping ſtrange Deities, unleſs approved by the Senate, and this was an inviolable Law, which binding Emperors as well as others, Tiberius could not, as he deſired, receive Jeſus Chriſt amongſt their gods; for the Senate would not approve of a God they did not know. This prejudice (which yet in Idolatry often effected nothing amongſt the Romans) was increaſed by a miſapprehenſion of our Lord and Saviour's Sufferings; his being Crucified, made them deſpiſe both him and his. Hence (c) Tacitus telling the original of the Chriſtians, will let the World know, that Chriſt from whom they derived their name, was Tiberio imperitante per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum ſupplicio affectus. And hence Trajan (d) in his diſcourſe with Ignatius, when he would mean Chriſt, called him Crucifixus, the Crucified, in way of contempt. This contempt was increaſed into diſdain, by reaſon that Chriſt would have no other Gods (as they accounted them) ſharers with him in worſhip, and this diſdain was heightned into rage, when Chriſtians preaching this ſaving Doctrine, declaming againſt Idols, proving the Heathen gods to be devils, and ſtriking at the root of Paganiſm, endeavoured to draw even the whole World from Superſtition and Idolatry ſo ancient and univerſal. You ſay, we do not worſhip the Gods, ſaith (e) Tertullian. This was accounted a Crime of Sacrilege, and worthy of death; much more than to diſſwade others from doing it. Quid, homines (ſuſtinebitis enim me impetum ſuſceptæ orationis liberius exerentem) homines (inquam) deploratæ, illicitæ ac deſperatæ factionis graſſari in Deos nonne ingemiſcendum eſt? ſaith (f) Cæcilius, as he is brought in by Minutius. Hereupon the Chriſtians were accounted Ἄθεοι or Atheiſts, and it was a Cuſtom to cry out againſt them, where the Greek tongue was uſed (g Αἶρε τȣ̃ς ἀθέȣς, Take off the Atheiſts, which words they would have had Polycarp utter as a ſign of his Recantation. This by reaſon of the malice of Devils (who were worſhipped under the names of the ſeveral gods) did render them ſo highly impious in the opinion of the vulgar, and ſo inraged the multitude againſt them, that (h) if Tiber over-flowed, if Nile watered not the plains, if Heaven ſtopped its courſe, and did not pour its rains here below, if there were Earthquake, Famine, or Plague; they would immediately cry out Chriſtianos ad Leones, Caſt the Chriſtians to the Lions, as the cauſe (in their opinion) of all the calamities that arrived in the World, and all the evils that people ſuffered.

The reaſon of the prejudice of Heathens againſt them.

(a) Acts 17, 18.
(b) Tertullian Apol. c. 5.
(c) Annal. l. 15. ſ. 44.
(d) Acta Ignatii.
(e) Apol. c. 10.
(f) Minuc. Fæl. Octav. p. 22.
(g) Smyrmenſ. Eccleſiæ epiſt. De S. Polycarpi Martyrio p. 16. & 20.
(h) Tertull. Apol. cap. 40.

20. Prejudice and hatred being riſen thus high, invented falſe accuſations, and caught hold of idle Surmiſes, nothing ill ſeeming incredible concerning thoſe that are already odious. (a) Athenagoras ſaith, that three things they objected againſt Chriſtians: Atheiſm, Thyeſtes his feaſts, and the Copulation of Oedipus. The two latter (whereof as much as concerneth Thyeſtes and Oedipus we have ſpoken above in their due places) (b) Tertullian thus explaineth: 'The Crimes pretended againſt 'us (the horror of which makes us paſs for wicked in the opinion of the people) 'are, that we meet together to Sacrifice a Child; that after we have taken away 'his life by a barbarous ſuperſtition, we devour his body, and when we have eaten 'the fleſh of this innocent, we commit Inceſts. They add, that we have Dogs, 'which ſerve to overthrow the Candles, and doing the Office of thoſe infamous 'Merchants of Modeſty, make us loſe all ſhame in taking the lights from us; and 'covering our actions under the veil of darkneſs, embolden us to ſeek the Uſe of 'ungodly, and ſacrilegious pleaſures. Cælicius maketh beginners initiated by the Blood of an Infant, which they all licking up, and dividing his Members amongſt themſelves, by ſo horrid a Ceremony confirmed their league, and the Covenant of their mutual ſecrecy. 'Theſe Sacra (ſaith he) are more abominable than all 'Sacrilege. And as for their feaſting 'tis known ſufficiently, all ſpeak of it in all 'places; the Oration alſo of our Certenſis doth witneſs it: They meet together 'to eat on a ſet day with all their Children, Siſters, Mothers, Perſons of every Sex, 'and every age. There, after much eating, when the feaſt is now grown hot, and 'the heat of inceſtuous luſt is kindled by drunkenneſs, the Dog that is tied to the 'Candleſtick is provoked, by caſting a piece of meat beyond the length of the 'ſtring by which he is bound, to a violent leap. Thus the conſcious light being overthrown and put out, &c. ſo he proceedeth to the ſame purpoſe, but in worſe terms. And Juſtin Martyr in his Conference with (c) Tryphon the Jew, demandeth of him after this manner: 'Do you alſo believe concerning us that we devour 'men, Malicious ſlanders concerning the manner of their worſhip.

(a) Ἐν πρεσβείᾳ περὶ τῶν Χριστιανῶν. pag. 4.
Ἀθεότητα, Θυέστεια δεῖπνα, Οἰδιποδείους μίξεις. Apol. c. 7.
(c) Pag. 227. B.

'men, and after meat the lights being put out, uſe wicked and promiſcuous Copulation? Laſtly, Theophylus Patriarch of Antioch in his third Book (d) to Antolycus againſt Calumniators of Chriſtian Religion, ſummeth up what we have already ſaid, in theſe words: 'They ſay that our Wives are common, and accuſe us that we uſe 'promiſcuous Copulation. Beſides, they lay to our charge that we do not abſtain 'from our own Siſters, but raſhly dare to violate thoſe with inceſtuous luſt. But this 'is moſt cruel and brutiſh of the Crimes they object againſt us, when with an impious mouth they prate, that we eat man's fleſh: neither do they ceaſe to traduce our 'Religion or Doctrine as of yeſterday, and deſtitute of all truth, which neither we 'our ſelves, if a controverſie ariſe, are able to defend with clear demonſtrations. 'Further, they ſay that our Doctrine is nothing but folly, and meer toys.

(d) Pag. 119. D.

(d) Pag. 119.

21. That malice which invented theſe impious adjuncts of Chriſtian Religion, found out a ſuitable object of worſhip; for the Romans had ſo far forgotten their own ancient Cuſtom of ſerving their Gods without Images, or reſemblances (for Numa, as Plutarch telleth us, and the ancient Romans for many years admitted no Images in their Temples, becauſe the Deity cannot be made out by any external reſemblance) that they thought it impoſſible for any Religion not to be guilty of Idolatry towards ſome viſible thing. Hence came that Fable related by (a) Tacitus (an Author guilty of malice againſt both Jews and Chriſtians) 'That the Jews conſecrated the Image of an Aſs, becauſe (forſooth) being preſſed 'ſorely with thirſt in the Deſerts of Arabia, certain wild Aſſes ſhewed them the 'Fountains where they were wont to drink; although this Author, who ſaith he 'lies not, writeth, that Pompey having taken Jeruſalem, and entred into the Temple to ſee the myſteries of the Jewiſh Religion, ſaw there no Image at all. (b) Tertullian conceiveth, that from this tale ſprung that conceit that the Chriſtians (the Religion of whom was drawn from that of the Jews, and ſucceeded it) worſhipped the Effigies of an Aſs. 'I hear, (ſaith Cecilius) that they worſhip a Conſecrated 'head of an Aſs, the moſt filthy of all ſorts of Cattel, I know not out of what 'fooliſh perſwaſion; a Religion worthy of, and deſcended from, ſuch manners. But he goeth further, and relateth a Report, that the very object of their worſhip was alſo obſcene. (c) Tertullian further writeth, that ſome were of opinion they worſhipped the Croſs, and Cecilius, from the ignominious Death of our Lord, and this inſtrument of it, argueth to the Infamy of Chriſtian Religion in an abominable manner. Tertullian in the ſame place telleth us, 'That ſome with more 'apparent reaſon believed the Sun to be their God, and ſent them to the Religion 'of the Perſians, herein ſuſpecting them for ſo doing, becauſe when they prayed, 'they turned themſelves toward the Eaſt. [And after an anſwer to this lye he addeth:] 'The Calumnies invented to cry down our Religion aroſe to ſuch exceſs 'of impiety, that not long ago in this City, a Picture of our God was ſhewed 'by a certain infamous Perſon that got his living by expoſing to the ſight of the 'people, wild beaſts: who by a ſtrange faculty gotten by him to avoid their bitings, making Uſe of his craft, ſhewed alſo the aforeſaid Picture to all Comers, 'with this Inſcription thereon, This is Onochoetes the God of Chriſtians. This 'ſuppoſed God of the Chriſtians pretended by him, had the Ears of an Aſs, an hoof 'on one of his feet; carried a Book, and was clothed with a Gown: we laugh at 'the barbarouſneſs of this name, and the extravagancy of this figure. Such were the Blaſphemies of Pagans againſt Chriſtian worſhip, and as an Argument for them, they produced the ſecrecy of Chriſtian meetings, which their own cruelty and rage had made neceſſary. 'They (d) talked of nothing more than the exceſs 'of the Tables of the Chriſtians. And after all this they (e) objected, that they 'were not any way profitable in the commerce of the World.

(a) Hiſtor. lib. 5.

(b) Apoll. cap. 16.

And the object of it.

(c) ibid.

(d) Tertul. Apol. cap. 39.

(e) Idem ibid. cap. 42.

22. As to their outward demeanour, they accuſed them of Sedition as well as Atheiſm. Let (a) Tertullian ſpeak upon what frivolous grounds: 'You ſay, we worſhip not the Gods; nor for the welfare of the Emperors, offer ſacrifices to them. 'The one of theſe two Crimes whereof you accuſe us, muſt neceſſarily follow upon 'the neck, or in conſequence of the other: for, being reſolved to render no manner of worſhip to your Deities, we muſt neceſſarily in like manner be reſolved 'not to ſacrifice at their Altars, whether for our ſelves, or for what perſon ſoever 'it be. Hereupon you conclude us guilty of Sacrilege and High Treaſon. Pliny was wont, as appeareth from his Epiſtle to Trajan, to try Chriſtians by Supplications made to the Images of the Gods, and amongſt theſe to the Emperor's Picture by Frankincenſe and Wine. This burning Incenſe was an ordinary tryal in all ages. They were alſo counted ſingular and factious, for that they would not ſwear

(a) Apol. c. 10.

They were accuſed of Sedition.

by the Fortune or Genius of the Emperors. This the holy Martyr (b) Polycarp was bidden to do by the Proconſul a little before his Suffering. Theſe prejudices and falſe opinions being heightned and irritated by the malice of Devils, who found themſelves neerly concerned therein, procured wonderful enmity and malice in the hearts of Pagans againſt the Faith.

23. ‘Is it not ſtrange (ſaith (a) Tertullian) that the hatred wherewith this name is purſued, in ſuch manner blinds the minds of moſt men, that when they witneſs the probity of a Chriſtian, they mix in their diſcourſe as a reproach, That he hath imbraced this Religion. One ſaith, truly, he of whom you ſpeak is an honeſt man, if he were not a Chriſtian, and his life would be free from blame. Another, Do you know ſuch a one, who had the reputation of a wiſe and diſcreet man? he is lately turned Chriſtian. [Again] “Theſe People by an extream blindneſs of hatred ſpeak to the advantage of the name Chriſtian, when they ſtrive to render it odious. For, ſay they, How pleaſant, and of what a good humour was that woman? How ſociable and jovial was that man? ’Tis pity they ſhould be Chriſtians. So they impute the amendment of their lives to the Profeſſion of Chriſtianity. Some of them alſo purchaſe the averſion they carry againſt the name Chriſtian, which we bear, with the price of what is moſt precious to them, rather deſiring to loſe the ſweetneſs of life, tranquillity of mind, and all ſorts of Commodities, than to ſee in their houſes that which they hate. A man who heretofore had his mind full of jealouſie, can no longer endure the company of his wife, what aſſurance ſoever he hath of her chaſtity, after once he perceives her to be turned Chriſtian, and parts from her now when her actions full of modeſty have extinguiſhed all ſuſpitions wherewith he was heretofore moved. A Father who of a long time time endured the diſobedience of his heatheniſh Son, reſolves to take from him the hope of ſucceeding him in his inheritance for turning Chriſtian, when at the ſame time executing his commands without murmuring. A Maſter that uſed his Slave gently when his carriage gave him ſome cauſe of diſtruſt, now puts him far from him for being a Chriſtian, when he hath moſt aſſurance of his Fidelity. ’Tis commiting of a Crime to correct the diſorders of a man’s life by the motions of an holy Converſion to the Chriſtian faith, and the good which is produced by ſo happy a change works not ſo powerfully in the minds of men, as the hatred they have conceived againſt us. Indeed this hatred is ſtrange; and when I conſider that the name of Chriſtian only makes it to be ſo, I would willingly know how a name can be Criminal, and how a ſimple word can be accuſed? Thus much (and enough I ſuppoſe) to diſcover hatred it ſelf.

Hence wonderful hatred.

The ſad effects thereof.

24. And the fruits of hatred abundantly manifeſted themſelves. 1 In faſtning Chriſtians to Croſſes and pieces of Wood. 2. Hanging them up as publick ſpectacles unto all men upon Gibbets. 3. Piercing their Bodies with Irons. 4. Cutting off their heads. 5. Expoſing them to the rage of wild Beaſts. 6. Throwing them into flames. 7. Condemning them to work in Mines; and 8. Confining them to Iſlands; “All which ſorts are expreſſed in one (a) Chapter of Tertullian’s Apology. In another (b) place he thus writeth, “How often do thoſe people being our Enemies, of their own accord, without your Authority, aſſault us with ſtones, or burn us? They are verily ſo inraged againſt us, that during the furies of the Bacchanales, they ſpare not even Chriſtians that are dead, but trouble the Reſt of their Graves, they violate their Sepulchres which are as Sanctuaries of the dead, they draw forth their Bodies not to be known whoſe Bodies they are, after mangled by them, which with extreme inhumanity they tear, and drag in the ſtreets. (c)[Elſewhere:] “How many are there among you, O ye People, that are this way greedy of the blood of Chriſtians? and alſo among you, O ye Magiſtrates, after you appear ſuch Juſticiers by the ſeverity you treat us with, whoſe Conſciences I would ſtrike with true reproaches of having procured the death of your own Children? Yet if you did but ſimply put them to death, it were ſomething; but by a ſtrange exceſs of cruelty you throw them into the water, you expoſe them to the rigour of cold and hunger, and the rage of Dogs; you will not take their lives away with the ſword, becauſe too gentle a death, and which men of the age of diſcretion had rather ſuffer, than any other that hath violence in it.

25. But, when the time of Perſecution drew towards an end, then eſpecially did the Devil rage with variety of torments againſt the Primitive Saints. For beſides thoſe formerly mentioned, (d) Serapion was thrown down, and had his neck

(b) Epiſt. Eccleſiæ Smyrnenſ. de S. Polycarpi Martyrio Pag. 20, 21.

(a) Apol. c. 3.

(a) Cap. 12.
(b) Cap. 37.

(c) Cap. 9.

(d) Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 6. cap. 41.

neck broken. Some having their fleſh rent in pieces with the laſh of the whip; ſome were broyled upon Gridirons; others having their skins razed, and ſcorched being tied by one leg were hanged on Trees with the head downwards. They pulled out the right eyes of others, ſearing the empty place, and ſawing off the left legs of others, ſeared their hams, and condemned them to the mines, which uſage was accounted Clemency. Some they ſcourged to death, cut out their tongues, and ſtrangled them. One Apphianus, being all disfigured with ſtripes, had his feet wrapped in flax oyled all over, which being ſet on fire, it ran over his fleſh and conſumed it, and pierced into the marrow within the bones, ſo that his whole body diſtilled like to melting wax. Three days he was ſuffered to remain in Priſon after this torture, and when by reaſon of his wounds he was ready to yield up the ghoſt, then was he thrown into the Sea. Others were forced by buckling, juſting, and buffeting, to kill one another. Others of mens eſtate were gelded and condemned to the quarries. Others were tormented grievouſly and chaſtiſed with impriſonment and fetters, of which number was Pamphilus, of all my familiars my deareſt friend, a man who among all the Martyrs of our time, ſaith Euſebius, excelled in every kind of virtue. He had his ſides mangled with ſharp razors, and then was ordered to be kept in the noiſom ſtench of the cloſe Priſon, where the reſt of the Confeſſors remained, till at length he was put to death, being a Presbyter of the Church of Cæſarea, concerning whoſe life Euſebius wrote three books, and for his familiarity with, and affection to him, had the ſirname of Pamphilus. This variety of the torments of Chriſtians, appeareth from ſeveral paſſages in the ſeventh and eighth Books of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which ſo far exceedeth all inferiour Puniſhments, or (that I may ſpeak in the phraſe of Lawyers) the diminutiones capitis, that we need not mention how Chriſtians were denied the title of (b) Roman Citizens. But one kind of puniſhment far more grievous than the reſt there yet was, which more tormented Chriſtians than all other tortures put together: and that was the loſs of their chaſtity. This Engine battered the fort of Origen's conſtancy, who choſe rather to ſacrifice to Idols, than be abuſed by an Æthiopian, as Suidas writeth. (c) Tertullian giveth us another inſtance, that we may enquire no further. "And indeed a few days ſince, (ſaith 'he) you condemned a Chriſtian maid to be rather proſtituted to an infamous 'corrupter of her chaſtity, than to be expoſed to the rage of a Lyon; you acknow'ledg there is no puniſhment nor kind of death, which is ſo intolerable to Chri'ſtians, as the loſs of their chaſtity.

(b) Tertul. Apol. l. 36.

(c) Apol. c. ult.

26. Such was the entertainment Chriſtians found in this World; now let us ſee how far they deſerved it, as to their demeanour, and carriage; for there is no need to ſpeak here to the two firſt objections. "The Heathens (a) believe a man 'could not make profeſſion of Chriſtianity, without being tainted with all ſorts 'of Crimes, without being an Enemy to the gods, to Princes, to the Laws, to 'good Manners, and to Nature; and that a Chriſtian could not be acquitted, unleſs he denied himſelf to be ſuch an one. But their carriage was ſo quite contrary to all theſe ſurmiſes, except that concerning the worſhip of Heatheniſh vanities, or Devils, under the name of gods, that they only were the Servants of the true God, they only were free from all ſorts of Crimes, were the beſt friends and Subjects of Princes, of the Laws, good Manners, and Nature, and truly affirming themſelves Chriſtians, might juſtly in this reſpect have been acquitted from theſe accuſations. "They (b) aſſembled together by troops in their Prayers to 'to God, as if thereby they would carry by force the grant of whatſoever Prayers 'were preſented to him, this being a violence agreeable to him; they prayed to 'him for the Emperors, their Miniſters the Magiſtrates that had the exerciſe of 'their Power, for the State, the tranquillity of the Empire, and the retarding of 'the general diſſolution that muſt put an end to all things. They aſſembled together to read the Holy Scriptures, and they read them according to the condi'tion of the times; what ſerved either to admoniſh or confirm the faithful. 'In 'effect, the Scriptures nouriſhed their faith, liſted up, and aſſured the confidence 'they had in God, nevertheleſs they ceaſed not to confirm their diſcipline by the 'ſtrength of Precepts they continually repeated. In theſe Aſſemblies, (ſaith Ter'tullian, for the former are alſo his words) we make exhortations and threatnings, 'and exerciſe Divine cenſure, which baniſheth Sinners, and excludes them from 'our Communion: we judge them with very much circumſpection, becauſe we 'know that God is in the midſt of us, and ſees what we do; and certainly 'it is a great foretelling of the judgment that God will one day pronounce 'againſt

(a) Tertul. ubi ſuprà c. 2.

(b) Idem ibid. c. 39.

The unblameable demeanour of Chriſtians in their Aſſemblies.

‘ againſt the wicked, when the Church moved with the enormity of their Crimes, ‘ darts out upon wilful Sinners the Thunderbolts of Excommunication, and deprives them of the participation of it's Prayers, it's Society, and all ſorts of holy ‘ Commerce with it.

27. ‘ In our Aſſemblies there are Biſhops that preſide, and have Authority over ‘ all the faithful committed to their charge; they are approved by the Suffrages of ‘ them whom they ought to Conduct, and it is not Bribes that acquire them this ‘ honour, but Teſtimonies of their good life. For in the Church of God nothing ‘ is done by the allurement of Gifts; if there be among us any kind of Treaſure, ‘ the Money laid up makes our Religion not aſhamed. And every one contributes ‘ a little Sum at the end of the Month, or when he will; but it is if he will and ‘ can; for none are conſtrained to give. If we get any Alms it is of good will; ‘ riches gathered in this manner, are as the pledges of Piety; we do not confound ‘ them in eating and drinking with exceſs; we make not Uſe of them for the foul ‘ and loathſom exerciſe of Gluttony: but we employ them in feeding the poor, ‘ burying them, in comforting poor Orphans, in helping old men who have ſpent ‘ their beſt days in the ſervice of the Faithful, in helping the poor that have loſt ‘ by Shipwrack what they had, and in aſſiſting them that ſerve in the Mines, are ‘ Baniſhed into Iſlands, or ſhut up in Priſons, becauſe they profeſs the Religion of ‘ the true God, that during the time they ſuffer for the Confeſſion of his Name, ‘ they may be nouriſhed by the ſtock of the Church. But it's a ſtrange thing, that ‘ this charity among us gives occaſion to ſome to blame us. See, ſay they, how ‘ they love one another; this aſtoniſheth them, becauſe they hate one another. ‘ See ſay they, how they are ready to die one for another; but as for them they ‘ are ready to kill one another. [A little after:] As we live with the ſame intelligence, as if we had all but one Spirit and one Soul; we have nothing in particular but our Wives, of all things in the World there is nothing but Wives, ‘ whereof we reject Community; and on the contrary, among them of their Wives ‘ only there is a Community with other men. [Again:] Now ſeeing we live together with ſo much Charity, that all our Goods are common, why ſhould they ‘ wonder if we make good chear? for it's one of the exceſſes you reproach us with: ‘ beſides the infamous Crimes whereof you accuſe our Repaſts, you charge it with ‘ Prodigality.

28. In the ſame place: “But you need but conſider the name given to our ’Αγάπη. ‘ Repaſts, to know the quality thereof. They expreſs themſelves with the ſame ‘ word that ſignifies Love with the Greeks; whatſoever the coſt is that is made, it ‘ is profitable, for they gain always in this expence, becauſe it hath Piety for its ‘ foundation. It's a ſweetneſs wherewith we comfort the want of the poor, but ‘ we do not treat them as you thoſe infamous Gluttons, who glory in ſelling you ‘ their liberty for the price of their good bits, wherewith they fill their Bellies in ‘ the midſt of a thouſand indignities. But we will have the leaſt ſerved with our ‘ goods, becauſe they we know, amongſt all men, are the moſt acceptable unto ‘ God. Then ſeeing our Feaſts have ſo honeſt an end, conſider what our Diſcipline ‘ ſhould be in the reſt of our Actions, even thoſe which more concern the Duties ‘ of Religion; it permits nothing that is diſhonourable, nor far from Modeſty. ‘ Before we go to Table we are fed with Heavenly Meat, which is the Prayer we ‘ make to God; we eat as much as is neceſſary to ſatisfie one's appetite, we drink ‘ as much as is permitted to perſons that have a care of their Purity. They that ‘ ſit there, take their refection with ſo much Temperance, as they may remember ‘ they are obliged to worſhip God even at night. They entertain one another as ‘ People that know God hears what they ſay. After the Repaſt done, they have ‘ waſhed their hands, and lighted the Candles, they are invited to praiſe God, and ‘ ſing Pſalms taken out of the holy Scripture, or Hymns every one compoſeth according to the capacity of his mind. By this it may be known, if they have ‘ committed any exceſs at Table; as the Repaſt began with Prayer, ſo it ends; ‘ they go forth not in divers Troops to defile their hands with the Blood of Men, ‘ not in ſeveral Bands running in the Streets, not to do inſolencies; but with the ‘ ſame care they had in coming in, preſerve their Modeſty and Chaſtity.

29. ‘ Finally, Chriſtians retire with ſo much ſtaidneſs, that we may very well ‘ ſee they are not fed ſo much with corporal Meats, as the ſubſtance of Heavenly ‘ and Holy Diſcipline. Certainly, it were but reaſon that this Society of the ‘ Chriſtians ſhould be reputed unlawful, if it were like to that the Laws forbid; it ‘ were but good reaſon it ſhould be condemned, if it were not different to that ‘which deſerves to be condemned; if one would reproach it with the ſame things wherewith they accuſe factious Societies. But tell me, Did we ever aſſemble to procure the hurt of any one? we are the ſame in a body, as when ſeparated: as we are in particular, ſo we are in general: that is to ſay, in whatſoever eſtate we are found, we injure no body; when any Virtuous or Godly People are aſſociated, when any Pious or Chaſt Perſons aſſemble together, their Union ſhould not be called a Faction, but a lawful Society. Thus Tertullian, to whoſe words, as to the harmleſs carriage of the Chriſtians in their Aſſemblies, Apoſtates witneſſed, as appeareth from what Pliny the younger wrote to Trajan. As for the Crimes ſuppoſed to be committed by them, they ever challenged any witneſs to be produced of them, and ſufficiently confute the vain reports in their Apologies. They laughed at the fiction of the Aſſes head, and ſuch like ſtuff, and as for worſhiping Croſſes, Octavius in his anſwer to Cecilius ſaith, Cruces etiam nec colimus nec optamus. Croſſes we neither worſhip nor wiſh for. Neither did they meet for Seditious ends, as for the alteration of Governments, deſtruction of Princes, or changing of Magiſtrates. Though they, rather than any of late time, might pretend to Saintſhip, yet did they not make it an advantage to raiſe themſelves; whereby they laid no claim to the Riches, Power, or Dominion of the World; they did not hold, That temporal Dominion was founded in Grace, nor that the true and ſpiritual Kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt deſtroyed the Right and Intereſt of earthly Princes. They made no Inſurrections, covered on Rebellious Deſigns with the name of Religion, neither did by violence attempt a Reformation; although they were ſo many Thouſands, as in all probability they might have born down all before them; though they filled all Places, conſiſted of all Degrees, and hereby ſhared in all Intereſts, in Power and Intelligence, and by their Combinations might have taken their Opportunities, and eaſily by force of Arms made way for their Deſigns; yet obedience to their Princes, they ever held moſt inviolable by the Principles of their Religion, and made Uſe of no other weapons than Prayers and Tears, though for their own Safety and Preſervation. Hear to this purpoſe what Challenges Tertullian makes to ſuch, as if he had not had truth on his ſide, would have been ſufficiently ready to inſtance wherein the Chriſtians offended, which they yet never adventured to do.

They were good and Loyal Subjects.

30. ‘In the midſt of all theſe outrages have you obſerved that theſe People, who (as you think) have framed ſo ſtrange a Conſpiracy; and on the other ſide might be animated enough for revenge, by the Puniſhment wherewith you take away their lives, endeavoured any thing againſt you to reſent the evil treating they have received? Think you that they want an Occaſion? when in one Night only a ſmall number of Torches would be enough to ſatisfie their Revenge, if with us it were permitted to render evil for evil; but God forbid we ſhould do ſo. A Religion that is all divine, ought not to revenge by the Inſtigation of Men, and muſt not think it ſtrange to ſuffer that which is made Uſe of to prove them. If we would declare againſt you as open, rather than purſue you as ſecret Enemies, might we not have Forces and Troops enough? It may be the Moors and Marcomanns, the Parthians, or whatſoever People they are ſhut up in the bounds of the Country they Inhabit, make a greater number of Men, than they that are ſpread throughout all the Univerſe, and have no other Limits than that of the World. Our Religion is but of late, and we fill already all that your Power acknowledgeth, Cities, Fortreſſes, Iſles, Provinces, the Aſſemblies of the People, the Armies alſo, the Wards and Tenths of Rome, the Palace, the Senate, and the Publick places; Finally, we leave you but the Temples. What Wars were we not able to undertake? with what readineſs might we not arm our ſelves, although we ſhould be the weaker? we that ſuffer our ſelves ſo willingly to be killed, if in our Religion it were not rather lawful to let our ſelves be killed, than to kill others; we could alſo make War againſt you without taking up Arms, by caſting our ſelves into a revolt; it were enough not to live with you, and to ſeparate our ſelves, our Divorce would print Shame in your foreheads. For, if Chriſtians, who make ſo great a multitude of all ſorts of Perſons, ſhould abandon you, to retire unto ſome Country of the World diſperſed from all Society; truly the loſs of ſo many Citizens, of what condition ſoever, would diſparage your Government, and alſo our retreat would be a rude Puniſhment to you; without doubt this ſolitude that would remain with you, this ſilence of all things, this Tertul. Apolog. c. 37.

‘general aſtoniſhment of Nature, even as if all the world were dead, would ‘ frighten you; you might go ſeek Subjects to Command, there would ‘ remain to you more Enemies than Citizens: now you have more Citi‘zens than Enemies, becauſe there are a greater number of Chriſtians ‘among you.

31. Thus we ſee their peaceable demeanour; how their minds ſtood affected towards their Princes, let Tertullian alſo inform us: ‘As for us, in the Prayers Apol. c. 30.
‘ we make for the Emperors, we call upon the Eternal God, the true God, the ‘ living God, &c. [In the ſame place:] It is to him to whom we Chriſtians ad‘dreſs our Prayers, make them with hands opened and lifted up, becauſe Inno‘cent; the head bare, becauſe no cauſe to be aſhamed when we pray to God:
‘ There is none telleth us the words we are to ſay, becauſe it is our heart that ‘ acteth, rather than our Tongue. We Pray for all the Emperors, and ask of ‘ God that he would give them a long Life, that their Empire enjoy a profound ‘ Peace, their Houſe happy Concord, their Armies be innumerable, themſelves ‘ aſſiſted with good Councils, the People remain in their Duties, no trouble
‘ ariſe in the World againſt their Authority. In Concluſion, we forget nothing
‘ the Prince can wiſh for, either as a Man, or as an Emperor. [A little after:]
‘ Whil'ſt we implore the Grace of God for the Emperors with our hands lifted ‘ up, and ſtretched towards Heaven, let Irons pierce us, let us be put on Gib-
‘ bets and Croſſes, Fires conſume us, Knives cut our Throats, Beaſts devour us:
‘ A Chriſtian while in Prayer lifting up his hands to God, is in a condition fit
‘ to receive all ſorts of Puniſhment; and therefore continue, O Magiſtrates, ſo ‘ affected to Juſtice; raviſh our Souls whil'ſt they are in Prayers for the welfare ‘ of the Emperors, and make a Crime of Truth and the Service of God.
‘ [In the following Chapter:] We intreat them who believe our Religion takes ‘ no care of the preſervation of the Emperors, to examine the Laws of our ‘ God, to read our Books which we hide not, and which by divers accidents ‘ fall into other hands than ours. They will learn there, that it is commanded
‘ by a ſuperabundant Charity, to pray to God for our Enemies, and to wiſh Good Chap. 31.
‘ to them that perſecute us. Now, have we greater Enemies, and ruder Perſe‘cutors, than thoſe who make offended Majeſty the ground of the Crime they ‘ impute unto us? Holy Scriptures content not themſelves with this Com‘ mandment, they have another more preciſe and clearer. Pray, ſay they, for ‘ Kings, Princes, and Powers, that you may live in Peace in the midſt of Publick ‘ Tranquillity. [In another place:] But why ſhould I ſtay longer in making known
‘ with what ſenſe of Religion and Piety Chriſtians honour Emperors? It ſuffi‘ ceth to ſay, we are obliged to render them our Duties, as to whom our Maſter Chap. 32.
‘ hath commanded us ſo to do.

32. As theſe Primitive Saints were good Chriſtians in the exerciſe of their Religion, and dutiful Subjects towards their Princes, ſo alſo good Men, free from vice, and adorned with Virtues; or if any were noted to be of contrary practice they were diſowned, and the Cenſures of the Church cut them off from Chap. 44.
its Society. “We ſpeak as boldly (ſaith Tertullian) of the Chriſtians you put ‘ to Death, for we have an unreproveable Teſtimony of their Integrity, which ‘ we take alſo from your Regiſters. You who are imployed every day in judg-
And good Men. ‘ing thoſe that are kept in Priſons, and who terminate their Proceſſes by the ‘ Sentences you give againſt them, of all the Malefactors accuſed before you
‘ of ſo many ſorts of Crimes, is there any of them charged with Murther, Rob‘ bery, Sacrilege, and other faults, to whom they impute alſo that he is a ‘ Chriſtian? either, when Chriſtians are preſented to be puniſhed as Criminals, ‘ becauſe they are Chriſtians, is there any amongſt them whoſe life is like that
‘ of other Priſoners? all the Malefactors wherewith your Priſons are ſo filled,
‘ that they are overcharged, are of your Religion; they are alſo of your Religion
‘ that make the Mines grone under the weight of their ſtroaks, they are the ‘ wretched Creatures of the ſame Religion you are, wherewith the wild Beaſts ‘ fill their Bellies. All thoſe poor Criminals which your Citizens keep to make ‘ them cruelly kill one another before a bloody People, have the ſame opinion
‘ you have of the Deity. Finally, among all thoſe wretched Creatures there's ‘ not one Chriſtian, unleſs he be charged by juſtice, becauſe of his name Chri- ‘ ſtian: Or if there be a Chriſtian found attainted of the ſame Crime, he hath
‘ no more the name Chriſtian, becauſe he hath loſt that divine quality in loſing
‘ his Innocency. [Elſewhere:] But ſome will ſay, even among us there are a Chap. 46.

‘ People

‘a People that give themſelves the liberty of doing evil, that free themſelves from ‘ſubjection to our Laws, from any whatever exact obſervation of what is legally ‘commanded by us. It is true there are ſome ſuch, but ſo ſoon as they fall into ‘this diſorder, we hold them no more for Chriſtians. The fear of God, and purity of his Precepts conſtrained them to this holy demeanour; for opinion of Men and their Rules, as this our Author obſerveth, cannot reach the heart, nor procure that Virtue which is truly good. “The admirable fruits their Doctrine pro‘duced (the knowledg whereof became Publick by the Commerce they had in the ‘World) made ſo down-right a Conflict with rude Incredulity, that to defend her ‘ſelf ſhe was forced to ſay, That their Profeſſion had no Divine matter in it, but ‘was only a Sect of Philoſophy, that obliged Chriſtians to rank themſelves there ‘in the exerciſe of Moral Virtues.

33. Though there was ſome diverſity of Opinions amongſt them, yet as we ſhewed before, they maintained mutual Love; and that herein they were highly eminent as to all Pious Effects, is already evident. Origen in his Work againſt Celſus (wherein he eſpecially anſwereth to Cavils raiſed againſt the Author and Doctrine of Chriſtian Religion) takes off that prejudice that might ariſe from diverſity of Opinions, by a Compariſon of this difference with the numerous (or rather innumerous) Sects of Heathen Philoſophers. Tertullian layeth the great guilt of Hereſie upon ſuch, who being animated with the Spirit of Philoſophy, infected the Purity of the Goſpel with the corruption of their own Opinions. In the ſame place he acquainteth us what was the Primitive touch-ſtone of Doctrines moſt worthy now to be conſidered. “Theſe People (ſaith he) that are ſeparated ‘from us, have violated the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and we beat down their errors ‘by this only exception, That the true rule of Truth is, that which hath been ‘taught by our Maſter, and tranſmitted to us by thoſe holy Perſons who had the ‘happineſs to hear his Word, and receive his Divine Inſtitutions; we ſhall ſhew in ‘another place, that all which is not conformable to this rule, hath been invented ‘by new Doctors, who came not till after the bleſſed Companions of the Son of ‘God.

They were Eminent for love and unity of Affection.

Apolog. c. 47.

34. All theſe excellent qualities in thoſe Holy Perſons, might have ſufficed to ſtop the mouths of Calumniators, and had weight ſufficient to have moved the minds of all Men to the Truth. But that Victory which Chriſtians obtained over Devils, might much more have convinced them of the Power which was Superiour to that of their falſe Gods. “Chriſtians were wont to drive away theſe ‘Devils from the Bodies of Men, forced them to confeſs that they were no other ‘than Devils, and that Jeſus Chriſt was the Son of God, and his way the true ‘Religion. [As to the former, firſt hear Tertullian:] But if we were not near ‘you, who would ſnatch you away from theſe ſecret Enemies, whoſe Malignant ‘Operations make ſo ſtrange a confuſion in your Minds, and ſo horrible an alte‘ration of your Healths? I have heard ſpeak of the poſſeſſion of Devils, where‘with you are tormented, from whence we deliver you freely, and without re‘ward; if we had the Spirit of Revenge, it were enough to ſatisfie us, that theſe ‘corrupted Spirits might at all times ſeize on your Bodies, and that entrance ‘therein were always open to them. But as you do not think of that you ought, ‘viz. ſo dear a Protection, you ceaſe not to declare a People to be your Enemies, ‘who do you no hurt, whoſe aſſiſtance is ſo abſolutely neceſſary for you. It is ‘true, we are Enemies, yet not of Men, but of their Errors. [In another place:] ‘As for Devils or Genies, we are wont to conjure them, to drive them away from ‘the Bodies of Men, whereof they are ſeized, and render them not the Honours ‘due to God only, by ſwearing by them. [Juſtin Martyr in his firſt * Apology: ‘Δαιμονιολήπτους γὰρ πολλοὺς, &c. For many poſſeſſed with Devils throughout the ‘World, and this your City, whom many Exorciſts, Inchanters, and Conjurers, ‘could not cure, Many of our Men through the Name of Jeſus Chriſt crucified un‘der Pontius Pilate have healed, and now alſo do heal, diſarming and driving out ‘of Men thoſe Devils that had poſſeſſed them. [In his Dialogue with Tryphon the ‘Jew:] Κατὰ γὰρ τοῦ ὀνόματος, &c. For in the Name of this the Son of God, the ‘firſt-born of every Creature, and born of a Virgin, and made a Man ſubject to ‘Suffering, and crucified by your People under Pontius Pilate, who died, aroſe, from ‘the dead, and aſcended into Heaven, every Devil adjured, is overcome and ſubdued. ‘[In another place of this Apology:] And now we who believe in Jeſus Chriſt our ‘Lord crucified under Pontius Pilate, adjuring all Devils and Malignant Spirits, ‘have them ſubject under our Power. He affirmeth the ſame thing in other places.

They forced Devils out of Bodies, and to confeſs the Truth.

Apolog. c. 37.

Chap. 31.

* Pag. 45. totius operis.

Pag. 311.

Pag. 302.

35. That

Apol. cap. 23.

35. That Chriſtians conſtrained Devils to confeſs themſelves ſuch, and to acknowledg the Truth of the Goſpel, in this matter hear alſo Tertullian: "If a man 'ſhould bring before your Tribunals one that were truly poſſeſs'd of a Devil, if a 'Chriſtian ſhould command him to ſpeak, this wicked Spirit will confeſs that he 'is a Devil, with as much Truth as he ſaith falſely at another time he is a god. 'let them preſent any one of theſe they believe to be wrought upon within by a 'Deity; that in the Ceremony of the Sacrafices they offer on the Altars have the 'Virtue of a God, in ſcenting the ſmell which goes out of the Sacrifices; who 'with force belch out words out of their ſtomachs; within breathing declare 'Oracles; if this Heavenly Virgin that promiſeth rain; if this Æſculapius who 'teacheth the Secrets of Phyſick, who preſerves the Lives of them that muſt loſe 'the ſame ſoon after, confeſs not by the mouths of theſe Impoſtors, the feigned 'Inſpirations of whom deceive the World that they are but but Devils, if the preſence of a Chriſtian takes not from them the boldneſs of lying, we are willing, 'that in the ſame place you ſhed the Blood of this Chriſtian, and puniſh him as 'a wicked Perſon. [In the ſame Chapter:] Now ſeeing by our means your gods 'diſcover to you that they are no gods, and that all the other to whom Men erect 'Altars, are none in like manner; but this at the ſame time they make you know, 'who the true God is, if it be this only God whom we that are Chriſtians worſhip, if we muſt believe of him what the Chriſtians believe, if he muſt be ſerved as their Laws ordain. When you conjure your gods in the Name of Jeſus 'Chriſt, Do they ask who is that Jeſus Chriſt? Do they call the Hiſtory 'of his Life a Fable? Do they ſay he is a Man of the ſame Education as 'other Men? That he was a Magician? That after he was dead, his Diſciples 'took away his Body privately from the Sepulchre? And that he is now in 'Hell? Say they not rather, he is in Heaven? That he muſt deſcend to the terror of all the World? with horror to the Univerſe? with the Lamentation of all 'Men but Chriſtians? and that he ſhall come down on the Earth full of Majeſty, 'as the Virtue of God, the Spirit of God, the Word, Wiſdom, Reaſon, and the Son 'of God?

Whence they had this ſtrength againſt them.

36. Whence Chriſtians came to be ſo ſtrong, as to wreſt theſe Confeſſions from them, hear him in the ſame place. "Now all the Power we have of them, 'is the Name of Jeſus Chriſt who gives it us, it is the threatning we give them 'of the evils God is ready to pour on their heads, and which one day Jeſus Chriſt 'muſt declare unto them. As they fear Jeſus Chriſt in God, and God in Jeſus 'Chriſt, they are under the Government of the Servants of God and of Jeſus 'Chriſt: ſo by the only touch of our hands, and breath of our mouths, the Devils ſeized with fear at the ſight of the Flames that environ them are forced to 'obey us, to come out of the Bodies they poſſeſs, in deſpite of them, and with 'murmuring to ſuffer this ſhame in our preſence. You that are wont to believe 'them when they lie, believe them when they ſpeak of themſelves. None will 'tell a lie to get ſhame by it, but rather to gain honour; one will ſooner believe 'them that confeſs againſt their own Intereſt, than thoſe that deny to their Advantage. Theſe Teſtimonies which we have of your gods make Men to be 'Chriſtians; for we cannot give a full Belief to what they ſay, without believing in Jeſus Chriſt our Maſter. Your gods kindle in our hearts the Faith which 'the Holy Scripture teacheth us, they ſtrengthen our Hope, and confirm us in 'the aſſurance we have of our Salvation. As for you, to honour them, you 'offer them alſo the Blood of Chriſtians; and if it were permitted them to lie 'when Chriſtians interrogate them, and labour to make you know the Truth by 'their Confeſſion, they would take good heed of diſcovering your Errors to you, 'as well for keeping the Profit they have of them, and the Honours you render 'them, as for the fear they might have, that in becomming your ſelves Chriſtians, you drive them away as we do, from the Bodies they torment with ſo 'much rage. [In the beginning of the following Chapter:] "We need nothing 'but the acknowledgment we have from your gods, when we make them confeſs 'they are no gods, and when they anſwer us, there is no other God than the 'only God we ſerve, to purge us from the Crimes of High-Treaſon and Impiety 'to the Roman Religion.

37. No wonder then that theſe impure Spirits inraged at Chriſtians, ſought all manner of ways to deſtroy them. But yet in their Deaths they overcame them, and in all ſorts of Indignities and Tortures triumphed over their implacable Adverſaries; for, The Blood of the Martyrs was the Seed of the Church. That this was ſo indeed, Tertullian alſo informeth us, the veracity of whom, as to theſe things alleged is unqueſtionable, becauſe appealing to his Adverſaries, he muſt needs in behalf of his cauſe produce ſuch things as were moſt certain: the contrary whereof would have Apologized ſufficiently for what he laboured to confute. We ſhall with the laſt words of his excellent Apology conclude this moſt delightful Subject. "But do what you pleaſe, all Inventions the moſt

'exquiſite Cruelty can adviſe you unto, are to no purpoſe; ſo far are they from 'Profitting you, that contrarily they draw all the World to our Religion. The 'oftner you make an Harveſt of the Chriſtians, the oftner their Number in'creaſeth: their Blood is a Seed which dies not on the earth, but puts forth
'proſperouſly. Many among you have laboured to perſwade men to ſuffer
'conſtantly Pain and Death, (as Cicero in his Tuſculans, Seneca in his Treatiſe
'againſt caſual things, Diogenes, Pyrrhon, and Callinicus) but Chriſtians have 'better taught Conſtancy, by the Examples they have given, in ſupporting
'patiently ſo many Evils, than all the Philoſophers with all their Diſcourſes.
'This ſame obſtinacy, wherewith you reproach us, is an excellent Miſtreſs of 'Truth, which we believe: for who is there not that ſtriveth with Contem'plation to ſeek what it is, who, after his ſearch made, comes not on our ſide?
'who having imbraced the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, deſires not to ſuffer for him,
'that by his ſufferings he may get the Infinite Treaſures of the grace of God, And 'that in the price of his Blood, they may obtain the Pardon of their Faults?
'for the Remiſſion of all our Sins, is the aſſured recompence of our Puniſh-
'ments. This is the reaſon that when they read your Sentences of Death 'unto us, we render you thanks; becauſe by an happy Emulation that meets
'between the Judgments of God, and the Judgment of Men, at the ſame inſtant
'when you condemn us here below, God pronounceth our Abſolution in 'Heaven.

They triumphed over their Enemies in their very Sufferings.

38. The Soldiers being at a Stand after the Murther of Antoninus Baſſianus, were without an Emperor for two days. Then hearing that Artabanus, the Parthian, was coming to revenge the injury offered to him, they made choice of Ardentius one of their Principal Officers, but he excuſed himſelf by his Age, and the Dignity was conferred on Macrinus, by the eſpecial indeavour of the Tribunes, who alone were conſcious of the fact towards Antoninus. He gave Battel to Artabanus, and made incredible ſlaughter of Men for two days, during which time, the Parthian knew nothing of his Enemies Death, but on the next day being certified thereof by Macrinus, he received the Captives with the Spoil taken in his Country, and making a League with the Roman Emperor, departed into his own Kingdom. Macrinus returning to Antioch, by Letters gave the Senate an account of his Succeſs, and endeavouring to remove all prejudice which might ariſe from the obſcurity of his Birth, promiſed to Rule with as much Moderation as any. He was chearfully owned, not ſo much out of reſpect to himſelf, as hatred towards his Predeceſſor. During the time he Reigned, things were well reformed; but lying idle at Antioch, he gave up himſelf to Pleaſures; and keeping there the Soldiers againſt their Inclination, thereby drew contempt and hatred upon himſelf, which wrought his Deſtruction.

Lege Herodian. l. 4.

Oroſium l. 7. c. 18.

Xiphilin. excerpt. ex Dione.

Macrinus ſucceedeth Baſſianus.

Olymp. 249. an. 1. V. C. 970. A. D. 217.

39. Mæſa a Phœnician, Siſter to Julia the Wife of Severus, had two Daughters, Soæmis and Mammæa. The former had a Son named Baſſianus fourteen years old, and the later one called Alexianus two years younger. Both theſe Boys were Prieſts of the Sun, in the Phœnician Language called Heliogabalus, and the elder being the Chief, was alſo a Youth of an excellent Beauty, and for it was very much admired by the Roman Soldiers. Their Grandmother Mæſa hereat took occaſion to affirm (whether truly or otherwiſe) that they were both the Sons of Antoninus, who had been familiar with both her Daughters, dwelling with her under the ſame roof. Having got great ſtore of Wealth by living at Court in her Siſter's time, ſhe promiſed large Sums to the Soldiers, in caſe the Empire could be devolved upon one of them. The Soldiers gladly cloſing with her Offer, received them into their Camp; which Macrinus hearing of, neglected it, only he ſent Julianus with a Party againſt the Revolters; but this Party allured with the ſight of the Boy and Money together, cut off their Captain's Head, and ſending it back to Macrinus, were alſo received into the Camp. After this a Battel was fought in the Confines of Syria and Phœnicia, wherein Macrinus having the worſt, fled towards Italy, but was taken at Chalcedon, where he fell Sick of his Journey, and his Head was ſtruck off after he had Reigned about fourteen Months. He was more ſharp towards his Soldiers than was ſuitable to his condition, being otherwiſe alſo very ſevere, ſo as he burnt Adulterers quick, with their Bodies joyned together. He was ſlain in the Fifty fourth year of his Age, together with his Son Diadumenianus, to whom he had given the title of Cæſar.

Heliogabalus.

40. Antoninus Heliogabalus ſucceeding Macrinus, continued ſtill in his Office of Prieſt, wearing the Ornaments belonging to it, and Dancing continually in that Antick Habit. He gave up himſelf to all filthineſs, luxury, and uncleanneſs, and killed many that talked againſt his courſes. He Married the Image of Pallas (which never had ſeen light, except when the City was burnt, ſince its bringing from Troy) unto his god, as alſo that of Urania (by which the Africans meant the Moon) reported to be brought out of Phœnicia by Dido. He built a ſumptuous Temple for his god, who was brought into it in a Chariot adorned with Gold and Precious Stones, the Prieſt himſelf leading the Horſes, and going backward all the way. He painted his Face though he had much Natural Beauty, wore Pearls in his Shooes, never Supped under the rate of Thirty pounds, was drawn by Dogs in a Chariot up and down the Palace, always ſate either amongſt Flowers or ſweet Odours, and when he Journeyed had no leſs than Six hundred Carriages in his Train. Being told by the Syrian Prieſts that he ſhould die a violent Death, he provided Silken Halters, Golden Knives, and a Turret floored with Gold and Pearl, ſaying, his Death ſhould be coſtly and luxurious, that it might be ſaid, No man died in ſuch a ſort. Of his Mother he was ſo fond, that he would do nothing without her, and carried her with him into the Senate-houſe. But theſe courſes occaſioned the Ruine of them both.

41. His Grand-mother fearing theſe courſes would bring him into contempt with the Soldiers, prevailed with him, though otherwiſe heady enough, to adopt Alexianus his Couſin German, that all might not miſcarry together with him. She perſwaded him to it, by ſhewing how thereby he might provide for his Pleaſures and attendance on his god, the other taking care of State-Affairs. He ſought to train up Alexianus, now called Alexander, in his own way, and Mammæa having provided him Tutors, able Men to bring him up in good literature, he either put to Death or Baniſhed the chief of them, as corrupting his Son. He preferred none but Players to Publick Dignities, and gave the Governments of Provinces to the filthieſt amongſt his Slaves. By theſe things he drew more and more upon him the hatred of the Soldiers, who all inclined to Alexander as a youth of good hope, who alſo had Money from his Mother for a bait, without which all had been nothing. Antoninus knowing this, endeavoured all ways to Poiſon him, and this ſucceeding not, he gave out he was dead, to ſee how the Soldiers would take it, who hereupon mutined. To appeaſe them, he took him along with him in a Chariot beautified with Pearl and Gold to the Camp. Here was Alexander ſaluted and honoured alone, no reſpect being given to Heliogabalus, who being incenſed thereat, went about to animadvert upon ſuch as made acclamations; but the Soldiers catching at this advantage, ſlew him, together with his Mother, and thoſe that accompanied him; their two Bodies being tumbled up and down the Streets were at length caſt into Tiber. He thus died, having lived Eighteen years, and reigned Five; A.V.C. 975. A.D. 222.

Alexander.

42. Alexander then was received as Emperor, and ruled with great Moderation and Clemency, being kept from ill Company by Mammæa his Mother, and otherwiſe of his own inclination abhorring Blood, ſo that in all his time not any one was put to death innocent and unheard. He carried himſelf with great courteſie towards all; nay, Camillus attempting new Matters, he only thanked that he was willing to receive that burthen which good Men refuſed. His Saying was, Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris. What thou would'ſt not have done to thy ſelf, do not to another. Although the Peace which Macrinus had made with the Parthian was diſgraceful to the Roman Empire, yet it pleaſed not the Parthians, who thought the perfidiouſneſs of Baſſianus deſerved much greater Puniſhment. Thence aroſe diſſatisfaction, contempt, and hatred amongſt the Subjects of Artabanus; the iſſue whereof was, that Artaxares or Artaxerxes ſtirred up the Perſians to the recovery of their ancient Honour, and tranſlated the Kingdom from Artabanus, and the Parthians, upon himſelf, in the fourth year

Olymp. 250.
ann. 2.
V.C. 975.
A. D. 222.
Conſule Herodian. ubi ſuprà.
Lamprid. in Alexand.
Eutropium l. 8.
Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 22.
Oroſium lib. 7. cap. 18.

year of this Alexander, Five hundred thirty eight years after Alexander the Great, or rather in the Five hundred thirty eighth year of the Seleucidæ. Not content herewith, he ſent to Alexander to demand whatſoever the Romans had taken from the Perſians, and having a great ambition to recover what ever had belonged to that Empire, invaded Meſopotamia, giving out he would reduce all Aſia unto his Power. Alexander was conſtrained to march againſt him, and ſo repelled and weakned him, though with great loſs of his own Men, that for divers years no more was heard of him. By his Lieutenants he proſpered in the Wars of Mauritiana, Illyricum, and Armenia, but being called for againſt the Germans who waſted Gall, either becauſe he was deſpiſed for want of Succeſs in this Expedition, for his Severity, or rather for that the Soldiers loved to fiſh in troubled waters, he was Traiterouſly Murdered, together with his Mother, and Maximinus was ſet up in his ſtead. Mammæa his Mother, was firſt inſtructed in Chriſtian Religion by Origen, whom ſhe called to her at Antioch, but afterwards learnt of the Gnoſticks, 1. Openly to deny what ſhe privately owned, and 2. to keep, and worſhip Images of Chriſt. She inſtructed her Son in the ſame Doctrine, who would have made a Temple for Chriſt, and was Prohibited, ſaith Lampridius; that is, would have made one, if he could have done it with the good will of the Romans. Vlpian the great Lawyer was his chief Juſtice, and was ſlain by the Soldiers. Paulus alſo, Pomponius, and Modeſtinus flouriſhed in his time, which abounded with able Men of this Profeſſion. Alexander was ſlain in Gall near Moguntiacum, on the fourth before the Nones of October, having lived Twenty nine years, and reigned Thirteen. A.V.C. 988. A.D. 235. L. Catilius Severus, and L. Ragonius Quintianus being Conſuls.

Maximinus made Emperor by the Soldiers.

Herod.lib.7,8.

Capitolinus Eutropius lib 9. Oroſius lib. 7. cap. 19.

43. Maximinus, by whoſe procurement Alexander was Murdered, was born in Thrace, his Father being a Goth, and his Mother an Alane. Being at firſt an Herdſman, he was for the vaſtneſs of his Body made a Soldier, and by degrees was preferred in the Army. He had been ſet over the new raiſed Soldiers, to Train, and Exerciſe them, and by his great Valour, and enduring all labour and toil together with them, procured their favour, and hereby his own Riſe. As he was a Man of ſtupendous Bulk, and proportionable Diet, ſo alſo of Avarice and Cruelty, to the later whereof he was the more provoked by a Conſpiracy or two; which were diſcovered e're they took effect. He overthrew the Germans, and waſted their Countrey, threatning alſo to ſubdue all the Northern Nations as far as the Ocean, and had his other carriage been anſwerable to his Valour, he might have enjoyed time and opportunity for the Performance of much. This occaſion of revolt from him was firſt given in Africk, by his Officer at Carthage, whoſe rapacity ſo far incenſed certain young Men, that they killed him, and compelled Gordianus the Proconſul to take upon him the Purple, who being of the Age of Eighty years, was joyfully owned both by Senate and People. But he going about to revenge private Injuries, deſtroyed himſelf, by conſtraining Capellianus who governed Mauritiana to come upon him with an Army, wherewith being worſted he hanged himſelf, his Son having periſhed in the Fight at the Age of Forty ſix. They ſcarcely enjoyed the Title Thirty ſix days.

Gordianus.

Maximus and Balbinus.

44. The Senate, that they might have ſome to oppoſe againſt Maximinus, choſe two Emperors, Maximus and Balbinus; but the People not being ſatisfied therewith, and being deſirous to have a Prince out of the ſtock of Gordianus, they gave the Title of Cæſar to Gordianus his Grandſon by his Daughter, a Boy of Thirteen years of Age. A little after it happened that two old Soldiers who had belonged to Maximinus, going to the Senate-houſe to hearken for News, were ſlain by two Senators, which thing raiſing a great Tumult, the Soldiers in Town ſet the City on fire, whereby a great part of it was burnt down, and got them to their Camp. Balbinus was appointed to take care of Rome, and Maximus went into Italy to raiſe Forces againſt Maximinus, who now marched for Rome. Finding no reſiſtance at the Alps, he accounted himſelf moſt ſure of Victory, but found ſo much at Aquileia, as ſtopped his Journey; for the Inhabitants furniſhed by the commodiouſneſs of the place with all ſorts of Proviſions moſt ſtoutly defended themſelves. They threw down ſo much ſcalding Pitch and Sulphur upon his Soldiers, that they were not able to continue the Storms, and the Women, 'tis ſaid, cut the hair from their heads to make Proviſion for Bow-ſtrings. This unexpected Oppoſition drove him to ſuch a rage, that having no Power to torment the Enemy, Maximinus killed by his own Men.

Euſeb. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 29. & in Chron.

he exerciſed his fury upon divers of his Captains whom he put to Death, as if through their lazineſs and neglect the Town ſtood out. This Cruelty, together with the ſcarcity of Victuals in the Camp (for the Beſiegers were ſo Beſieged that all Proviſions were cut off from them) induced ſuch of the Soldiers, as had their Wives and Children at Rome, to conſpire againſt him. Together with him fell his Son, ſuch an one as himſelf, whom he had named Cæſar, the Soldiers crying out, That of an ill Litter not a Whelp was to be preſerved. He alſo perſecuted the Church by the ſixth Perſecution, commanding that Governors only, and the Principal Miniſters of our Saviour's Doctrine ſhould be put to Death. But to ſuch an end came he, being the firſt Emperor created only by the Army without conſent of the Senate, after he had reigned three years, A.V.C. 991, A.D. 238.

Biſhops.

Damaſus. Euſeb.

45. Now to our continuation of Eccleſiaſtical matters. In the firſt year of Alexander, or the laſt of Heliogabalus, the day preceding the Ides of October, Calliſtus Biſhop of Rome was crowned with Martyrdom. The See was vacant ſix days, and then ſucceeded Urbanus the Seventeenth Biſhop, according to Damaſus, on the Twentieth of October, and firſt Feria. In the Tenth of Alexander, on the Eighth before the Calends of June died Urbanus. The See was vacant Thirty days, and then Pontianus ſucceeded on the Eighth before the Calends of July, the ſixth Feria. In the firſt of Maximinus, Pontianus, being Baniſhed into the Iſland Sardinia, there died, on the Thirteenth of the Calends of December, and Autherus ſucceeded him, who in the year following, on the Third of the Nones of January, was crowned with Martyrdom, becauſe he had diligently gathered an Hiſtory of the Martyrs, and laid it up in the Church. The Seat was vacant Thirteen days, and then was Fabianus elected, on the Seventeenth of January, and the firſt Feria, being the Twentieth Biſhop of Rome, according to Damaſus. And about the * Eleventh year of Alexander, Heraclas who once was Origen's Uſher in the School of Alexandria, was Biſhop of that See, where he continued Sixteen years.

* Euſeb. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 15, 26, 35.

CHAP. VII.

From the Death of Maximinus the firſt created Emperor without Conſent of the Senate, to the Monarchy of Conſtantine the firſt Chriſtian Emperor, who reformed Religion, and tranſlated the Imperial Seat to Byzantium, the ſpace of Eighty ſix years.

Herod. Capitol. Zoſimus l. 1. Eutrop. l. 9.

Gordianus.

1. THE news of Maximinus his Death being brought to Rome, filled the City with extraordinary joy, having taken Maximus as he was Liſting Men in Italy, who thereupon went to Aquileia, and received the Army, to which he pardoned all things paſt. Then returned he to Rome, where he and his Collegue managed Matters with Diſcretion enough, could they have agreed betwixt themſelves; but the one being jealous of the other, and both endeavouring to grapple all the Power into their own hands, thereby wrought to themſelves ſudden Deſtruction. The Prætorian Bands hated them both, as created by the Senate, and reſolved, for the removal of ſuch an Indignity offered to the Army, to make them away, which Maximus underſtanding, would have ſent for the Guard of Germans, which he knew both to be faithful to him, and able to reſiſt the Power of the other; but Balbinus ſuſpecting that he intended ſomething againſt himſelf, would not ſuffer it; and ſo the Soldiers entering the Palace haled them out, and after all ſorts of Indignities offered to their Perſons, upon report that the Germans were coming, ſlew them both. Now knowing no fit Perſon whom they might prefer, and being aſſured it would be very acceptable to the People, they made choice of Gordianus, who had been formerly made Cæſar. At his beginning ſo great an Eclipſe of the Sun happened (April 2. on the ſecond Feria, as Cappellus agreeth with Mulierus) that the Day ſeemed to be turned into Night, and nothing could could be done in Houſes without Candles. Sabinianus in Africk attempted new Matters, but was Slain. Gordianus being yet very young, undertook an Expedition againſt the Perſians, over whom Sapores in his Third year began to Reign, having ſucceeded Artaxerxes their firſt King. By the good Conduct of Miſitheus his Father-in-Law he proſpered very well, but he being ſlain or made away, the Soldiers not enduring the rawneſs of Gordianus, tranſferred the Sovereignty unto Philip, and killed him, after he had Reigned ſix years. It's obſerved, that all thoſe Nine that ſlew him periſhed by their own hands, their own Swords, and the very ſame with which they deſtroyed him.

Olymp. 254. an. 2. V. C. 991. A. D. 238.

M. Julius Philippus.

Eutrop. l. 9. Victor. Euſeb. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 34. & in Chron.

2. M. Julius Philippus was by Birth an Arabian of Trachonitis, his Father being a notable Captain of Thieves in that Country. He made his Son partaker with him in the Imperial Dignity. In his fourth year fell out the 1000th of Rome, which was celebrated with great Pomp, and all manner of Games, from April 21 to April 21 of the following year. Euſebius reports of him, that he was the firſt Chriſtian Emperor, and that being deſirous to joyn with the multitude in the Eccleſiaſtical Prayers, he could not be admitted till he had firſt rendred an account of his Faith, and joyned himſelf with ſuch, as for their Sins were examined, and ſet in the place of Penitents; therefore becauſe he was faulty in many things, ſaith the Hiſtorian, he willingly obeyed, and declared by his works his ſincere and religious mind towards God. The Martyrologies will have him and his Son converted by occaſion of the Solemnity of the 1000th year, and being Baptized by Fabianus Biſhop of Rome, after confeſſion of his Sins, to have been admitted to the Communion. But ſaith Cappellus, if any of this had been true, would the Senate that was ſo ſet againſt the Chriſtians have reckoned him amongſt the gods? At leaſt would not Decius have objected this as a Crime againſt him? The Scythians, in his time infeſting the Empire, he repelled by his Lieutenants. Marinus raiſing a Commotion in Pannonia, he ſent Decius to quiet the Soldiers, who put the Purple upon him. Philip then led an Army againſt this Uſurper, and they met at Verona, where the old Emperor was defeated and ſlain, which News coming to Rome, his Son a Child of Twelve years of Age was Murdered by the Prætorian Bands, after they had reigned about five years.

Decius.

Olymp. 257. an. 1. V. C. 1002. A. D. 249. Oroſius lib. 7. cap. 21. Euſeb. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 39. Lege item Zozimum lib. 1. Eutrop. l. 9. Pomponium Lætum.

3. Quinctus Trajanus Decius, as Oroſius calleth him, was born in Pannonia. According to the Cuſtom he aſſumed his Son into participation of the Empire. He quieted at his beginning ſome motions in Gaul, but raiſed a great one againſt the Church, being Author of the ſeventh Perſecution, out of hatred to Philip, or as others ſay, having conſpired againſt Philip, out of hatred to Chriſtianity: by his Edicts many were put to moſt cruel Deaths. He received his reward after a ſhort time; for now the Gothes (originally Inhabitants of Scanzia) invaded Thrace, and other places, both by Land and Sea, becauſe ſuch of them as ſerved in the Wars had been defrauded of their pay. At the deſire of the Senate, to which he commended the Commonwealth in his abſence, he marched againſt and overthrew them in ſeveral Battels (notwithſtanding that he loſt his Son, and Priſcus Governor of Philippi revolted) and had perfected his Victory, but that he was betrayed by Gallus Hoſtillianus Governor of the lower Mæſia. He perſwaded him to fight in a Fenny Ground, and then revealed his intention to the Enemy, by whom he was beſet, and was ſwallowed up in a Bog, ſo as his Body could never be found. He was courteous enough to all but Chriſtians, and gave ſatisfaction to Senate and People. He reigned two years and an half.

Gallus.

Eutrop. l. 9. Pompon. Lætus. Victor.

Æmilianus.

4. Vibius Gallus Hoſtilianus ſucceeded him, both in his Empire, his malice towards Chriſtians, and his puniſhment. He clapped up an ignominious Peace with the Gothes, unto whom he promiſed Money, a thing ſcarcely heard of before amongſt the Romans; and this not being long kept, the Gothes and Scythians made Incurſions into Thrace, Macedonia, and Theſſaly, and alſo into Aſia, making great ſpoils in all places. Many other Nations after their example rebelled, and made havock of the Provinces: the Parthians alſo pierced into Armenia, and thence expelled Tiridates the King. The Scythians proceeded ſo furiouſly, that they ſeemed to carry all before them, till that Æmilianus a Moor, and who commanded the Legions in Pannonia, by promiſes drew on his Soldiers againſt them, and ſo repelled them, that he invaded their Country, for which Service he was ſaluted Emperor by this Army. Gallus hearing of this, went preſently againſt him, but was ſlain, together with Voluſian his Son and Partner in the Empire. Such was the end of him who perſecuted the Church of God, and chaſed away ſuch holy Men as prayed for his peaceable and proſperous Eſtate.

The Perſecutions of the Chriſtians in the dayes of Decius and Gallus were accompanied or followed with a moſt grievous Peſtilence, which ſo vehemently raged, that there was ſcarcely any Province, City or Houſe, but was almoſt waſted and ruined by it. Gallus and Voluſian his Son reigned little more than one year.

Euſeb. Hiſt. l. 7. c. 1.
Oroſius l. 7. c. 21.

5. Æmilianus enjoyed the Dignity not long, for another Army near the Alpes creating Emperor one Valerianus, a Man of noble deſcent, his Soldiers, leſt they ſhould incur any danger or trouble, killed him after three Months. Valerianus then taking the Government upon him in Rhætia, the Senate at Rome gave the title of Cæſar to Gallienus his Son. He was at firſt very courteous to the Chriſtians, and ſo familiarly imbraced them, that his Palace was filled with Profeſſors of the Faith; but afterward, he was perſwaded by the Maſter of the Ægyptian Sorcerers to ſlay them, as Enemies to their Art, and hinderers of its operation in their preſence; ſo that he raiſed the eighth Perſecution, wherein many periſhed. But God avenged the cauſe of his Saints upon him; for going againſt Sapores the King of the Perſians, he was taken Priſoner, and could not be releaſed, notwithſtanding the interceſſion of the Perſian's Confederates, who alleged, that the Romans the more they were overcome, the more vehemently they ever reſiſted. Sapores kept and uſed him as a ſtool to tread on when he got on Horſe-back, and at length pulling his skin over his ears, tortured him to death. Gallienus his Son, who all this time had reigned with him, terrified hereat, ſtopped the Perſecution of the Chriſtians; but many of the Romans who had been the inſtruments of the Emperor's Cruelty, being to be puniſhed as well as he, many Nations fell like a flood upon the Roman Empire, Gallienus giving up himſelf to all wantonneſs and luxury. The Germans over-running Rhætia and part of Italy, came as far as Ravenna, the Allemans alſo waſting Gall pierced into Italy. Greece, Macedonia, Pontus, and Aſia, were overwhelmed with an Inundation of the Gothes and Scythians. Dacia beyond Danubius was perpetually loſt, the Quadi and Sarmatæ ſeized on Pannonia, and the Parthians having got into their hands Meſopotamia, made Incurſions into Syria.

Valerianus.
Olymp. 258. an. 1.
V. C. 1006.
A. D. 253.
Lætus.
Oroſius ubi ſuprà.
Euſeb. Hiſt. l. 7. c. 10.
Gallienus.
Oroſius l. 7. c. 22.
Eutrop. l. 9.

6. Gallienus neglected theſe motions, anſwering always concerning theſe matters, as if notwithſtanding them the Empire might flouriſh and do well enough. He thus little minding the Commonwealth, the Soldiers almoſt in all places choſe them Emperors; ſo that at this time there were no leſs than thirty Tyrants. The moſt notable of theſe upſtarts was Poſthumus, who reigned in Gall with great commendations ten years; he uſed much Moderation, expelled the Enemies, and recovered Provinces. All thoſe Thirty fell at length, either fighting with one another, or with the Emperor. But Gallienus at laſt, being contemned, was ſlain, having reigned ſix years together with his Father, and nine by himſelf, A.V.C. 1021. A.D. 268. His Succeſſor was Flavius Claudius a Dalmatian born, according to his own deſire, and the will of the Senate, who killing of the Gothes and other Barbarians, to the number of Three hundred and thirty thouſand Men, and ſinking Two thouſand Veſſels, the Senate decreed him a Golden Shield to be ſet up in the Court, and a Statue in the Capitol; but to the great loſs of the Commonwealth, he was ſlain at Syrmium, when he had ſcarcely reigned two years. Into his place was advanced Aurelius Quintillus his Brother, an excellent Perſon; but being too good, they that ſet him up pulled him down, becauſe they could not bear his gravity and ſtrictneſs, killing him the ſeventeenth day after, at Aquileia. Then reigned Valerius Aurelianus, born either at Syrmium or ſome place in Dacia, of mean Parentage. Being by Claudius appointed to drive the Gothes out of Thrace, he was after his death ſaluted Emperor. He was an excellent Soldier, and reſtored the Empire well nigh to its former bounds. He drove out the Gothes from about Danubius; then returning to Rome, and there puniſhing ſome Seditious Perſons, he marched into the Eaſt, to reduce thoſe parts to their former Obedience.

Aurelius Victor.
Pollio de 30. Tyrannis.
Oroſius ubi ſuprà.
Pomponius Lætus.
Claudius.
Quintillus.
Oroſius l. 7. c. 23.
Aurelianus.

7. In the days of Gallienus, the Perſians having ſubdued Meſopotamia, and invaded Syria, One Odenatus an Inhabitant of Palmyra, a City of this Countrey, gathering together a Company of Boors, fell upon them, and ſo ordered his affairs, that he beat them out of Syria, recovered Meſopotamia, and incamped before Cteſiphon the Metropolis. Being ſlain after this Conqueſt, Zenobia his Wife in right of her Children kept Poſſeſſion of the Eaſt, together with Egypt. Aurelianus now going againſt her, in his way, in Illyricum, Thrace, and other places, defeated ſuch Enemies as he met, and then entring Syria, after ſome trouble and danger, danger, overthrew, and took the Queen her ſelf near Antioch, and then recovered all her Dominions. But after his departure the Inhabitants of Palmyra killed his Garriſon and revolted, which calling him back, he deſtroyed both the City and them therein, ſparing neither Sex nor Age; and after this recovered Egypt. Then returning into the Weſt, he bent his endeavours againſt Tetricus, who reigned in Gall. Tetricus being vexed by his Seditious Soldiers, deſired him, whom he termed Invincible, to reſcue him from ſuch evils, and betrayed his Army into his hands. Valerian, growing proud upon ſuch ſucceſs, firſt of all Romans ſet a Diadem on his head, and adorned himſelf with Gold and Pearl. He began alſo to perſecute the Chriſtians; but undertaking a War againſt the Perſians, he was ſlain betwixt Byzantium and Heraclea, through the malice of his Secretary, in the ſixth year of his Reign. In his firſt year, Hormiſda the third Perſian King began his Reign, which laſted but one year. Him ſucceeded Varane, and Reigned three years, and him followed Narſes, who continued twenty eight. In his firſt year alſo died Plotinus the Platoniſt, who deriding all Religion, periſhed through the juſt Judgment of God by a filthy and painful Diſeaſe, although he had choſen a pleaſant and wholeſom place wherein to live in Campania. Now alſo flouriſhed Porphyrius his Scholar, who of a Chriſtian became a great Enemy to Chriſtianity, and wrote Fifteen Books againſt it, to which Euſebius anſwered in thirty, of which twenty were extant in the time of Jerome, but at this day not one.

Oroſius.
Euſeb. in Chron.
Zozimus lib. 1.

Victor. Oroſius.

Euſeb. Hiſt. l. 7. cap. 30. & in Chron.

Agathias.

Firmicus lib. 1.

Tacitus.

8. There was an inter-regnum after the Death of Valerian for eight Months, the Senate and Army ſtraining courteſie the one with the other, at length the Senate made choice of Tacitus, a man of Conſular Dignity, who in his ſixth Month died of a Fever at Tarſus. The Senate deſired him, that in caſe he ſhould die preſently, he would not leave his Children his Succeſſors, but ſome man of approved worth and valour, as the neceſſity of the State required. This man was Probus; yet notwithſtanding, Florianus the Brother of Tacitus invaded the Empire, but was cut off by Probus near Tarſus, within the ſpace of two or three Months. Probus unwillingly receiving the burthen upon him, managed the Government with great commendation. He recovered Gall out of the hand of the Francones, a people of Germany, which now firſt ſeized on it, after many bloody Battels, and after this was ingaged in Civil Wars. For Saturninus was ſaluted Emperor in Egypt, who was overthrown alſo, and killed alſo againſt his mind, and the ſame ſucceſs he had againſt Proculus in Gall and Bonoſus a Britain born. He overthrew the Sarmatians, ſubdued ſeveral barbarous Nations about Thrace, by the terror of his name only, quieted all Aſia, and forced the Parthian King to deſire Peace, which he granted. Returning afterward ino Thrace, he planted ſeveral barbarous People within the Roman Empire, whereof ſome revolting, he chaſtized and reduced them. Now all things flouriſhed exceedingly through Peace and Security, which made him ſomething ſlight the Soldiers, who thereupon, as he was marching through Illyricum againſt the Perſians, murdered him at Syrmium, though he fled for ſafety into a fortified Tower. That Saying undid him, Si vixero non opus erit amplius Romano Imperio militibus, a ſpeech of great Deſpair for the Soldiers. Witty and ſharp ſpeeches fallen from Princes have often given fire to Seditions. Surely, ſaith the moſt Learned Viſcount of St. Albans, Princes had need in tender matters, and tickliſh times, to beware what they ſay; eſpecially in thoſe ſhort ſpeeches, which fly abroad like Darts, and are thought to be ſhot out of their ſecret intentions. For as for large Diſcourſes, they are flat things, and not ſo much noted.

Probus.

Oroſius lib. 7. cap. 24.
Eutrop. lib. 9.

Fl. Vopiſcus.

Zozimus.
Pomponius Lætus.

Carus.

9. M. Aurelius Carus, of the Province of Narbon in Gall, ſucceeded him, who, when he had created Cæſars his two Sons, Carinus and Numerianus, reſtrained the Sarmatians, that upon the death of Probus threatned Italy: But going againſt the Perſians, after he had recovered Meſopotamia, and taken the two noble Cities of Parthia, Cteſiphon, and Cochis, he was ſlain by a Thunder-bolt in his Tent near to the River Tigris. Of his two Sons, Numerianus was with him, and Carinus was left behind to look to Gall. Numerianus returning out of the Eaſt as Conqueror, and lying Sick in his Litter, was killed by Arius Aper his Father-in-Law, who gaped after the Empire. Scarcely after ſome days was this wickedneſs detected by the ſtench of the Carcaſs, and then the Author of it being alſo diſcovered, Valerius Diocletianus, Olymp. 265. ann. 3.

V. C. 1036.
A. D. 283.

Oroſius. Eutrop. Vopiſcus.

Diocletian.

tianus, who governed the Family of Carus, was choſen Emperor, and rewarded Aper as he had deſerved. On the Fifteenth before the Calends of December, and ten days after, he entred Nicomedia in Purple. From the beginning of this Diocletian the Egyptians began a new Æra, fetching its Riſe from the new Moon of Thoth the preceding Month (Auguſt 29.) which they called the Æra of Grace, for ſome reaſon or other. Cappellus obſerveth, that the fluctuating and vitious Chronology of Baronius henceforth beginneth to be right. For thinking, ſaith he, that he exhibited the years both of the true, and received Æra of Chriſt, in truth, he exhibited neither the one ſort nor the other. Beginning the Æra of Diocletian from the 284 year of our Lord, it's true, and right, ſo that it be underſtood of the received, not of the true Æra of Chriſt: and the ſame is to be ſaid concerning the years of the following Emperors. But after this, Carinus and Diocletian fought for the Sovereignty, and Carinus after much ado was ſlain by his own Soldiers for his laſciviouſneſs, which made an end of a bloody and laborious War.

10. Diocletian then enjoyed the Dignity alone; but great ſtirs ariſing in Gall, Carauſius alſo, who was ſet to defend the Sea-Coaſts from the Invaſion of the Franks and Saxons, rather taking part with them than otherwiſe, he was conſtrained to create Cæſar, Maximianus Herculeus. He ſuppreſſed the motions in Gall, but commanding Carauſius to be killed, this man put on the Purple, though a man of mean condition, and ſeized upon Britain. Achilleus rebelled in Egypt, Africk was in trouble, and Narſes King of Perſia invaded the Eaſtern parts. Diocletian, awakened with theſe dangers, promoted Maximianus to be Auguſtus, and they two adopted for Cæſars Maximianus Galerius, and Conſtantius Chlorus, who Married Theodora the Wive's Daughter of Herculeus, and by her had ſix Sons, as the other, the Daughter of Diocletian. Carauſius valiantly held Britain for ſeven years, and then was ſlain by Allectus, who having kept poſſeſſion of the Iſland three years, was overthrown by Aſclepiodorus. Conſtantius fighting againſt the Allemans in Gall, at firſt was worſted, but afterwards got a great Victory, wherein Sixty thouſand of them are ſaid to have been ſlain. Maximianus Herculeus reduced Africk. Diocletian himſelf beſieging Achilleus in Alexandria eight Months, at length ſlew him therein, gave up the City to be plundred by the Soldiers, and vexed all Egypt with Proſcriptions and Slaughters. Galerius was overthrown by the Perſian King, and fled to Diocletian, who received him with great diſdain, and made him run in his Purple Robe for ſome miles before his Chariot. Galerius much moved by this diſgrace, recruited his Army throughout Illyricum and Mæſia, and returning againſt Narſes, routed his Army, took his Camp, his Wives, Siſters, and Children, many of his Nobles, and great Treaſure, wherewith returning into Meſopotamia unto Diocletian, he was then received moſt honourably; for he had taken Cteſiphon, ſubdued Aſſyria, and recovered thoſe five Provinces beyond Tigris, which revolted from Trajan.

Oroſius ubi ſupra cap 25. Eutrop. lib. 9. Feſtus Rufus.

The tenth Perſecution.

11. After this were the Carpi, Baſtarnæ, and Sarmatians overthrown, and divers other Nations quieted. Diocletian now ſuffered himſelf to be called Lord, and worſhipped as a God. He in the Eaſt, and his Collegue in the Weſt, raiſed againſt the Chriſtians the moſt heavy Perſecution that ever yet had hapned, both for length and cruelty. The Soldiers were firſt begun with, whereof all ſuch as would not ſacrifice to Devils, were caſhiered; but the Perſecutors proceeded to ſuch cruelty and rage that ſome were Crucified, others Burnt alive, others roaſted with ſlow Fires; and others pulled in pieces by having their Limbs made faſt to boughs of Trees, which being brought together for that purpoſe, were afterwards ſuffered to return to their natural Poſition. Some were ſtarved to death, many ſlain with the ſword, and many devoured of wild Beaſts. Some were flea'd alive, others beaten to death by hot burning Iron Rods, and ſome returned to Priſon after their Torments, there to languiſh away. Women were hung naked by one foot, and ſome had their Breaſts ſeared: no Sex, no Age, no condition was ſpared. A terrible Earthquake followed in Syria, which deſtroyed many Thouſands about Tyre and Sidon. But in the ſecond year of this Perſecution Diocletian perſwaded his Collegue, though unwilling, That they both might reſign the Empire to the two Cæſars; ſo that he being ſeized with a foul Diſeaſe, after he had almoſt reigned twenty years, put off the Purple at Nicomedia, and Maximianus Herculius the ſame day at Milain.

Oroſius ut ſupra. Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 8. c. 3, &c.

The former withdrew to Salenæ into his own Countrey, and the later into Lucania.

The Reſcripts of Diocletian very numerous.

12. Diocletian was ſtill buſied and perplexed with Wars during his Reign, and well might be wearied and content to reſign the Empire, and yet he was alſo extraordinarily taken up with making Laws, being conſulted and Petitioned by multitudes of Perſons upon occaſion, whoſe Names are ſet to his Anſwers, ſtill extant in Juſtinian's Code. And his Reſcripts are rather more numerous than thoſe of any Prince mentioned and recorded for Laws in that Code, except it be thoſe of Juſtinian himſelf. But they, and thoſe of other Princes till Conſtantine, generally concern the Rights of Private Perſons, and belong to the Jus privatum; and therefore are not by us to be handled or conſidered, who write an Hiſtory, not a Book of Law. And thoſe Anſwers are generally directed and Inſcribed to private Perſons conſulting; whereas thoſe made by Conſtantine, and his Succeſſors, as they much appertain to the Jus publicum, and conſequently are Hiſtorical, ſo are they directed to the Præfecti Prætorio, or other great Officers or Governors, either ſerving at Court, or in the Provinces.

Maximianus Galerius, and Conſtantius Chlorus.

Oroſius.

Eutropius l. 10.

13. The two Cæſars, Maximianus Galerius, and Conſtantius Chlorus became Auguſti after the reſignation of their Fathers-in-Law, and firſt of all others parted the Empire between them. To Conſtantius fell Gall, Britain, Spain, Italy, and Africk; to the other Illyricum, with Greece, and Aſia. Galerius created Cæſars his Siſter's two Sons, Galerius Maximinus and Severus. The Eaſt he appointed to Maximinus, and intended Italy for Severus, if he could but take it from Conſtantius. For this purpoſe he kept at Rome, as an Hoſtage, Conſtantine the Son of Conſtantius by Helena a Britiſh Woman, as ſome ſay, which he put away when he Married the Daughter of Maximianus. But Conſtantine made an eſcape to his Father, who died at York in Britain not long after, on the 25 of July, in the third year of his reign, he and his Collegue both the ſixth time being Conſuls, in the 1058 year of the City, the 306 of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt, the firſt year of the 271 Olympiad ending. His Son Conſtantine in Britain was now ſaluted Emperor.

Conſtantine.
Olymp. 271.
ann. 1.
V. C. 1058.
A. D. 306.

Zoſimus lib. 2.

Maxentius Uſurps.

14. The Image of Conſtantine was exhibited at Rome, according to the Cuſtom. But Maxentius the Son of Maximianus Herculius, as Zoſimus writes, thinking it intolerable that he who was born of a Concubine ſhould have his Matters ſucceed according to his Deſire, and he the Son of an Emperor ſhould lye neglected, and his Father's Dominion go to others, with the aſſiſtance of Marcellianus and Marcellus Tribunes of the Army, and Lucianus who provided Hog's Fleſh, allowed by the Treaſury to the Roman People, and of the Prætorian Soldiers, whom he obliged by great Promiſes, took the Title of Emperor upon him. Abyllius Præfect of the City endeavoured to hinder their Proceedings, but was killed by them. Againſt him did Maximianus Galerius, ſend his Nephew Severus; but Maxentius corrupted moſt of his Men, and drew to his ſide Anullinus, the Præfectus Prætorio, and thereby eaſily overthrew him, and forced him to fly to Ravenna. Theſe things coming to the ears of Maximianus Herculius, he was concerned for Maxentius his Son, and leaving Lucania came to Ravenna, whence perceiving that Severus could not be driven out, the place was ſo ſtrong and ſo well victualled, he circumvented him by Oaths, and perſwaded him to go to Rome; in the way whither, when he came to the Tres Tabernæ, he was ſeized by ſome whom Maxentius had ſent to intrap him, & ſtrangled. Now was Maximianus Galerius as much concerned in behalf of his Nephew, as Maximianus Herculius was for his Son, and he reſolved to move from the Eaſt, and revenge his Death upon Maxentius, but coming to the Coaſts of Italy, and finding his Soldiers not firm unto him, he returned into the Eaſt without a Battel. Maximianus Herculius being diſturbed with theſe diſorders, repaired to his old Collegue Diocletian, who then lay at Carnutum a Town of Gall, ſaith Zoſimus, for which Sigonius writes, Carnuntum a place of Illyricum, and endeavoured to perſwade him to reſume the Empire, and not ſuffer that which they with ſo great labours had preſerved, to be expoſed to the youth and madneſs of thoſe who had ſeized it. But Diocletian would not conſent, preferring his Quiet before buſineſs, and perhaps, Zoſimus tells you, foreſeeing how things would be diſordered; as he was a man moſt obſervant of Religion. Poor Chriſtians, indeed, found he was of Paganiſh Superſtition and Idolatry, to their coſt.

Diocletian refuſeth to reſume the Purple.

Maximianus Herculius doth it.

15. Herculius this way fruſtrated, went toward the Alpes, having taken Ravenna in his way, to meet with Conſtantine: And being naturally unquiet and unfaithful, thought to cheat him by giving him his Daughter in Marriage. Thereby he ingaged him to purſue Maximianus Gallerius, now quitting Italy, and to circumvent even Maxentius his own Son. Finding that he would obey him, he departed, and indeavoured to recover the Imperial Power, hoping to beget a quarrel betwixt his Son-in-law, and his Son. While he was indeavouring to bring this about, Maximianus Gallerius being much acquainted with one Licinius, created him Emperor, purpoſing by him to make War againſt Maxentius; but died in the mean time of a Wound which was incurable, and then Licinius managed his own Matters. All this while was Herculius imployed in drawing off the Soldiers from his own Son, and when by Largeſſes and miſerable requeſts he had got them over to himſelf, then began to deal in the ſame manner with his Son-in-law, and tampered alſo with his Soldiers. But he was prevented by his Daughter Fauſtina, who revealed all to Conſtantine her Husband; at which Diſcovery, falling into deſpair, he died at Tarſus of Sickneſs, as Zoſimus writes, but as Sigonius hath it from others, was ſtrangled at Marſeilles by Command of Conſtantine: Maxentius by his Death freed from former Inconveniences thought himſelf ſecure, and ſent ſome into Africk, and to Carthage to carry about his Pictures. The Soldiers in thoſe Parts out of love to the memory of Gallerius, would not permit this to be done, and afterward hearing that he was about to undertake an Expedition to chaſtize them, departed for Alexandria, but meeting with ſuch Forces as they were not able to over-power, returned to Carthage. Now did Maxentius reſolve to go into Africk, and be revenged on them, but the Haruſpices diſcouraging him from what they ſaw by their Birds, and he fearing that Alexander, who in Africk exerciſed the Office of Præfectus Prætorio might withſtand him, thought it ſafeſt to deal firſt with him, and demand of him his Son for an Hoſtage. Alexander ſuſpecting that he would deal perfidiouſly, denied to ſend his Son, whereupon Maxentius imployed ſome to take an advantage and make him away. This being diſcovered, the Soldiers were glad of the occaſion; and rebelling, delivered the Purple to Alexander.

And dies.

Alexander Uſurps in Africk.

16. This Alexander was a Phrygian by deſcent, a Coward, ſlow to all Buſineſs, and beſides, an old Man. At this time a Fire happened in Rome, it's uncertain, Zoſimus ſaith, whether from the Air or the Earth, and the Temple of Fortune was burnt. Great Concourſe being made to quench it, a certain Soldier ſpake ſome Blaſphemous words (Thus Writers term them) againſt the Divinity, and was killed by the multitude, out of Piety to it. Hereupon the Soldiers fell into a Mutiny, and were hardly kept from deſtroying the City, their fury being appeaſed by Maxentius. Now did he look for ſome pretence to make War upon Conſtantine, and pretending to grieve for the Death of his Father, of which he was the Cauſe, purpoſed to take the way leading to Rhætia, as neareſt to Gall and the Illyrican Regions; for he Dream't that he ſhould ſeize upon Dalmatia and Illyricum, by the aſſiſtance of the Military Officers of thoſe quarters, and of the Forces of Licinius. But he reſolved firſt to ſettle matters in Africk, and for this purpoſe he ſent over Rufius Veluſianus his Præfectus Prætorio, with whom he joyned Zenas, a Man moſt famous for his Skill in War, and his gentleneſs of diſpoſition. By them Alexander was eaſily maſtered, taken, and put to Death. The War being in this manner compoſed, a large opportunity was afforded to Calumniators; and all in a manner who were in Africk, conſiderable for Birth or Wealth, were accuſed as having ſided with him, and none were ſpared, ſome being killed, and others deprived of their Eſtates. And a Triumph there was at Rome, for thoſe miſchiefs that were done at Carthage; and Maxentius in Italy, and in the City carried all things on, as ſuited with his Luſt and Cruelty.

Βλάσφημα ῥήματα κατὰ τοῦ θείου τῶν στρατιωτῶν τις ἀφεὶς.

Is taken and put to Death.

17. Conſtantine having the man formerly ſuſpected, now found more reaſon to beware of him, and prepared to make War againſt him. At this time he had his Abode in Gallia Belgica, at Collein, where in his ſecond Conſulſhip, and that of Licinius, he compoſed matters about the Tributes of Gall, and granted Indulgence as to Arrears, particularly through Lugdunenſis Prima (for now there were two Lugdunenſes, though afterwards four) amongſt the Cities, of which was Auguſtodunum, an Inhabitant whereof Eumenius an Orator, gave him thanks in a Panegyrick ſtill extant. Having arrived at the ſeventh year of his Reign, he moved againſt Maxentius, who was in his ſixth, from Gall into Italy, in the Months of Auguſt and September, at the later end of which he there arrived.

Vide Chron. Hiſt. Cod. Theod. ad A.D. CCCXII.

Conſtantine from Gall moves againſt Maxentius.

From this Month, the eighth before the Calends of October, and his arrival and making War againſt Maxentius is the Original of the Indictions to be reckoned, of which mention is made in the Code of Theodoſius. The firſt Law of this Code concerning Tribute, and directed to Antonius Marcellinus, the Preſident of the Province of Lugdunenſis Prima, was made this year alſo, by Conſtantine, and dated at Colein on the firſt of July, as Gothofred ſhewes. Zoſimus writes, That having raiſed Forces out of ſuch barbarous People as he had ſubdued, as alſo from amongſt the Germans, other Celtick Nations, and the Britans, to the number of Ninety thouſand Foot, and Eight thouſand Horſe, he moved from the Alpes into Italy, where, ſuch Towns as yielded he hurt not at all, but ſuch as ſtood out he reduced by force. With Maxentius who was furniſhing himſelf with far more numerous Forces, Eighty thouſand Romans and Italians joyned, and as many of the Tyrrhenians as inhabited the Sea-Coaſt. The Carthaginians alſo ſent him an Army of Forty thouſand, and the Sicilians furniſhed him with Men; ſo that all his Forces conſiſted of an Hundred and ſeventy thouſand Foot, and Eighteen thouſand Horſe.

L. 1. Sine Cenſu Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 3.

18. Such were the Forces on both ſides, when Maxentius, the more to provide for his Security, cauſed a Bridge to be laid over the River Tiber, ſo divided in the middle that it might be drawn aſunder, and the ſides parted upon occaſion; and he commanded the Workmen, that when they ſhould ſee the Army of Conſtantine upon the Joynt of the Bridge, they ſhould draw back thoſe Irons that held it together, and diſſolve it, that as many as were thereon might fall and be Drowned. In the mean time, Conſtantine comes before Rome, and incamps himſelf in a large plain, very convenient for Horſe. Maxentius being Beſieged, ſacrificeth to his Gods, conſults the Extiſpices concerning the Event of the War, and ſearcheth the Sybilline Books, wherein he finds an Oracle, That he who ſhould deſign things tending to the detriment of the Roman People ſhould periſh by a miſerable Death. This he applied to himſelf, as fighting againſt thoſe who attempted to take Rome; and the Event ſhewed the truth. For when he had led his Forces out of the City, and paſſed the Bridge which he had Built, an infinite number of Owles flew and filled the Walls, which being ſeen by Conſtantine, he Commands his Men to be drawn out. The Armies facing each other, he ſent his Horſe to Engage the Cavalry of the Enemy, and then gave the Sign to his Footmen. A Bloody Engagement following, the Romans and Italians their Aſſociates, were ſlow in venturing their lives, hoping to be freed from a Cruel Tyranny; but of the reſt fell an innumerable Multitude, as well trodden down by the Horſe as killed by the Foot of Conſtantine. As long as the Horſe made reſiſtance, ſome hope remained to Maxentius; but it being beaten, he with the reſt thought it beſt to fly over the Bridge into the City. With the weight of them that fled the Bridge was forced aſunder, and Maxentius falling down with the reſt of the Multitude, periſhed in the River. The noiſe of the Victory being brought into the City, none of the Inhabitants durſt rejoyce, for fear it ſhould prove falſe; but when the Head of Maxentius was carried in upon a Pole, they changed their folly for gladneſs. Conſtantine after this Succeſs, puniſhed a few of thoſe that had been moſt familiar with Maxentius, but took off the Prætorian Soldiers, and demoliſhed the Holds where they were wont to lye. And when he had ſetled matters of the City, removed to the Celtæ and Galles. Thus writes Zoſimus.

Who is overthrown and drown'd.

19. Others confirm, that in the ſixth year of his Tyranny, the very day whereon he had Uſurped; the third after he had parted from Rome, he was overthrown near the Bridge called Pons Milnius, by Conſtantine, and by the fall of it was precipitated and drown'd. The day following Conſtantine entered Rome, where he ſtaid about two Months, viz. the later part of October, all November, and the better part of December. As for what he did while in the City, he reſtored Aradius Rufinus to be Præfect, who upon Maxentius his quitting it, had been put out, and Annius Anulleanus placed in his ſtead. And Maxentius being now ſubdued, as the Cuſtom had been of other good Princes his Predeceſſors, he took care for Suppreſſion of Informers, by Penalties inflicted on them which he had formerly ordained, which alſo he inforced the following year, according as Victor the Hiſtorian teſtifies of him, That he ſilenced Calumnies by moſt ſevere Laws. Having ſetled matters at Rome, he went to Milan, where he Married to Licinius, his Siſter Conſtantia, having formerly promiſed her to him when he had a mind to ingage him againſt Maxentius. The year following, we find Conſtantine alſo at

L. 1. de petit. & Delatorib. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 10.

Licinius Marries the Siſter of Conſtantine.

Milan in the Month of March. This year he took care for the Affairs of Africk, both as to Religion by giving Incouragement, and granting Immunities to Chriſtian Clerks and Churches, and alſo by ſetling the Country after the great diſorder there raiſed, by means of Maxentius. Having ſetled matters in Africk and Italy, he departed from Milan, and went into the Lower Germany, where, returning to Triers, he repreſſed the Franks, and other Barbarians, who would have paſſed the Rhine, and continued there in the Months of November and December, making ſeveral Laws for Reformation of Abuſes.

20. In the mean time Diſorder aroſe betwixt Licinius and Maximianus, or Maximinus Cæſar, the Son of Maximianus Gallerius his Benefactor, and it grew ſo high, that it proceeded to a War, wherein at firſt Licinius had the worſt, but preſently again he recruited, and ingaging in another Battel, put Maximinus to flight, who taking his way for Ægypt, came to Tarſus, and there died. By this means came the Empire to be devolved on Licinius and Conſtantine, who alſo after a little time fell out, not for that Licinius, you muſt know, gave any juſt Cauſe, but becauſe Conſtantine ſeemed, according to his Cuſtom, to have obſerved Agreements with little Truth and Fidelity. So Zoſimus is pleaſed to write, and begin his Game of Calumnies againſt Conſtantine, with what Succeſs we ſhall ſee largely hereafter. But beſides this ſeeming or appearing to ſo break Covenants, he adds, That he would alſo have drawn ſome Nations ſubject to Licinius, from their Obedience. Therefore their Diſcord increaſing, they both provided to decide the Controverſie by the Sword. Licinius gathered his Forces together at Cibalis, a Town of Pannonia, ſeated on an Hill, to which lay a way up of the breadth of five Furlongs, but at the end of this paſſage was a vaſt Plain, where he incamped himſelf, near to which adjoyned a deep Fenn. Licinius drew out his Forces in length under the Hill, for the ſtrength of his Wings; and Conſtantine ordered his Battel at the Mountain, and placed his Horſe in the Front, leſt the Enemy ſhould fall on a ſudden on his Foot, which was ſlow in motion. Having this Advantage, he fell with violence upon Licinius his Men, and a Fight was fought, Zoſimus had almoſt ſaid, ſharper than any other. Both having ſpent their Miſſile Weapons, for a long time they diſputed it with their Swords and Pikes. When the Battel had continued from Morning to Night, the Right Wing wherein Conſtantine Commanded, had the better. Therefore Licinius his Legions ſeeing him leaping on Horſeback, and prepared for Flight, durſt not ſtay any longer in that place, nor Sup, but leaving their Sheep and Cattle, and all their Baggage; and taking only ſo much Meal along with them, as would ſerve to drive away hunger that Night, in all haſt they came with him to Sirmium, a City of Pannonia, waſhed on both Sides by a River, which empties it ſelf into Iſter. Licinius ſtaid not here, but broke down the Bridge, and made all the haſt he could to get into Thrace, and there to Reinforce his Troops.

They fall out.

Licinius is worſted at Cibalis.

21. Conſtantine having taken in Cibalis, Sirmium, and all other places in that Tract, which Licinius had forſaken, ſent to purſue him Five thouſand Legionary Soldiers; but they not knowing the ways through which he fled, could not reach him. He repaired then the Bridge over Savus, which Licinius had broken, and marched after him, and coming into Thrace, found him again incamped on a Plain. The ſame Night he arrived, he put his Men into order of Battel, and gave Orders they ſhould be ready againſt the Morning; and Licinius then drew out his Men alſo, being aſſiſted by Valens, to whom he had given the Title of Cæſar, after his Flight from Cibalis. The Armies upon facing each other, plied it with their Arrows, and thoſe and other Miſſile Weapons being ſpent, ingaged with their Pikes and Swords, which while they were doing, that Party which Conſtantine had ſent to purſue Licinius, appeared from an Hill, and were now ready to joyn with their Companions, and incompaſs their Enemies. But Licinius his Men valiantly received them, and bore up againſt them all, and after an innumerable Company was Slain on both Sides, and they were on equal terms, the Sign was given, and the Armies parted aſunder. The day following, they agreed to enter into a Mutual League and Society, the terms of which were, That Conſtantine ſhould hold Illyricum, and other Nations thereabouts; as, Pannonia, Dacia, Mæſia, Macedonia, all the Tract of the Danube, and Greece or Achaia. To Licinius were to remain Thrace, and the Eaſt, and other Provinces; as, Mæſia Minor, Scythia, Aſia, and the reſt. It was agreed that Valens, the lately created Cæſar being accounted Author of theſe Miſchiefs, ſhould

They make an Agreement.

ſhould be removed. This done, and the Agreement confirmed by Oaths, Conſtantine conferred the Dignity of Cæſar on Criſpus his Son, by Minervina his Concubine, who was grown up to be a youth, and on another called Conſtantinus, born not many days before at Arles; and to Licinianus alſo, the Son of Licinius, was given the ſame Dignity.

Conſtantine viſits ſeveral Countries.

22. This War and League following upon it, happened in the CCCXIIII year of our Lord, and the Conſulſhip of Voluſianus, and Anianus, as Gothofred proves from a certain Law, dated on the beginning of March at Theſſalonica, where Conſtantine then reſided, and therefore thoſe Parts muſt then have been in his Power, and the Diviſion been made. Having ſtaid here, and at Heraclea ſome time, he removed from Macedonia into Myſia, Dacia, and the Upper Pannonia, as appears by various Conſtitutions he made for the Advantage of Chriſtian Religion, and removing of Grievances and Abuſes. After this he Travelled into Italy, being found by a certain Law to have been at Aquileia, in the middle of July. From Aquileia he removed to Rome, where, how he imployed himſelf, is to be ſhown in another place; and thence he went to Milan, this being in the fourth Conſulſhip of himſelf, and the fourth alſo of Licinius. Into the following, wherein Sabinus and Rufinus were Conſuls, fell the Celebration of his Decennalia, it being the Tenth year of his Reign. At the beginning of it he had his Abode in Gall, at the City of Triers, and thence removed to Vienna, and Arles, where was born to him of his Wife Fauſta another Son called Conſtantine, who ſhortly after was alſo created Cæſar. This City of Arles being Demoliſhed, he Repaired, and ſome think that he gave to it the Name of Conſtantina. But now he removed out of Gall, whither he never returned, being found at the beginning of December at Serdica, in Dacia. He had much augmented his Diſtrict, which at firſt contained but Gall, Spain, and Britain; and now his Affairs called him Eaſtward. This year died Diocletian, at the beginning of December, at Salonæ. The next year in the Conſulſhip of Gallicanus, and Baſſus, Criſpus, young Conſtantine his Brother, and Licinianus were made Cæſars on the firſt of March; and in this year, in the month of Auguſt, Conſtantius, another Son of Conſtantine ſeems to have been born. The Father lay ſome time at Serdica, and at Sirmium, as appears by ſome Laws.

L. 1. De filiis Min. Apparit.

23. For the year next following, being of our Lord the CCCXVIII. Criſpus Cæſar was Conſul, together with Licinius, who bore that Title now the fifth time; and Conſtantine is found to have been at Sirmium. And for the four following years, he was either in Pannonia, at Sirmium, and Sebaria; or in Dacia at Serdica, and Naiſſus, except he pleaſed to make an Incurſion to Aquileia, which was near to Pannonia. For he was ingaged in War with the Sarmatæ for four years, at Campona, Margus, and Bononia. For this War he called the Sons of Veterane Soldiers into the Field, of whom many throughout Italy declined the Service. Zoſimus writes, That hearing how the Sarmatæ, who lived upon the Fen of Mæotis, paſſed over Iſter, and haraſſed his Dominions, he led his Forces againſt them, and the Barbarians met him under Conduct of Rauſimodus their King. In their way they fell upon a certain Town which was defended by a Garriſon ſtrong enough, and had Walls made of Stone at the botom, and Wood at the top. They thought they ſhould eaſily become Maſters of the place, if they could but burn what was at the top, and they caſt fire on it, and plied with Arrows thoſe that came to make defence. But they within by tumbling down Stones, and otherwiſe improving the advantage which the higher place afforded, killed many of them, and Conſtantine now came in View, fell upon their backs, killed many, took more, and put to flight the reſt. Rauſimodus having loſt the greateſt part of his Forces, took Boat, and paſſed the Iſter, with a reſolution again to invade the Roman Pale, which Conſtantine underſtanding, paſſed the River after him, and fell upon the Barbarians, who had fled to an Hill that was full of Wood, where he ſlew many, and amongſt the reſt, Rauſimodus himſelf. Many he took alive, and received to mercy the Multitude which yielded to him; which done, he returned to his Quarters, with a great number of Captives. Thoſe he diſtributed into the Cities, and came to Theſſalonica. Here he made an Haven, where formerly none had been, and again prepared to make War againſt Licinius. Thus Zoſimus writes of him.

He overthrows the Sarmatæ.

24. All this while he indeavoured to reform the Manners of the Roman People, and reduce them to Piety, Humanity, Peace, and Concord, as well by Edicts directed to the People, as by Conſtitutions ſent to Baſſus and Maximus, Præfects of Takes care for Reformation of Abuſes.

of the City. He moderated the power of Maſters over their Slaves, made Poſſeſſors ſecure againſt violent Intruders, and prevented fraudulent Donations. He reſtrained the levity of Divorces, and gave ſtrength to lawful Contracts and Marriages, and was agreeable to the Sanctity of that Religion which he Profeſſed. He cut off from the Laws many Ambages, and Snares thereby, from the Necks of the Subject, by another moſt merciful Edict directed to the People, and expoſed to the View of all men at Rome. He publiſhed Laws againſt the raviſhing of Virgins, againſt the levity and temerity of Accuſations, and againſt the Uſe of Concubines, all which proceeding from his Zeal to propagate that Sanctity which Chriſtian Religion requireth, are to be treated of in that Part of this Work, which is ſolely appropriate to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs. But his great care for the Incouragement of Phyſitians, Grammarians, and other Profeſſors of Learning, we cannot in this place omit, whereby is made evident what Victor writeth concerning him, That he nouriſhed good Arts, and eſpecially the Studies of Learning, as on the contrary, it is written of Licinius, that he was an Enemy to Learning, which through his Ignorance he termed Poiſon, and the publick Plague, eſpecially the Induſtry of the Law; and no wonder it was when Conſtantine was very Learned himſelf as Sext. Aurelius Victor publiſhed by Schottus doth teſtifie; if now it be lawful to commend him, or ſay with that Author, that for this, and other Virtues, he was extolled. And as he was Learned himſelf, he took care that his Children ſhould be well ſeen in good Letters, for which purpoſe he provided them of the beſt Maſters that were to be found.

He is very favourable to Phyſitians and Profeſſors.

25. Now he that loveth Learning, loveth alſo the Learned, and ſuch as would have either themſelves or others inſtructed, will ſtudy to incourage and reward them that are to do, or have already done it. Conſtantine ſhewed himſelf of this mind by three ſeveral Conſtitutions made in favour of ſuch Perſons. He confirmed whatſoever Privileges had been granted by his Predeceſſors. For, Veſpaſian had firſt of all others allotted Salaries to Profeſſors, and gave them Immunity from Quarter and Perſonal Services, which Hadrian confirmed; But theſe were but Perſonal Services. Conſtantine now made them free not only from Perſonal, but Patrimonial; ſo as their Poſſeſſions ſhould not be liable to Charges in Cities where they inhabited, and yet if they pleaſed they ſhould obtain the Honours thereof, as to be Duumviri, Ædiles, Reſenſores, Gyraſiarchæ, Prieſts, Flamines, Legati; but ſo as to take or refuſe them, whether they pleaſed. More than this, he prohibits that they be incurred by any, or forced to appear by violence in Courts of Judicature, under a Penalty of an Hundred thouſand Nummi to be levied for the Treaſury by the Magiſtrates (as the Decemviri) and Quinquennales of the Municipia, or Cities, who upon default were to forfeit the like Sum. In caſe a Slave do them any Injury, he commands that he be whipped by his Lord, before him whom he injured; and if the Lord was conſenting, he ſhall Pay Twenty thouſand Nummi, and his Slave be left for a pledge till it be paid to the Treaſury. Afterwards he granted to the Archiatri, or the Phyſicians of the Palace, and the Exarchiatri, That they and their Sons ſhould be free from all Duties belonging to the Curiales, Senatores, Comites, and Perfectiſſimi; ſo as not to be forced to the Payment of Gold or Silver, Finding of Horſes, or other Services incumbent on theſe Perſons. And other Immunities he granted to Phyſitians and Profeſſors after the Founding of Conſtantinople; of which at that time we ſhall ſpeak.

L. 1. de Medicis & Profeſſoribus Cod.Th.lib. 13. tit. 3.

L. 2. Ejuſd.tit.

26. After the Finiſhing of the War with the Sarmatæ, for joy thereof Games were Celebrated, called Ludi Sarmatici, in the later end of November, and beginning of December following of the fourth year. At the beginning of the next, Conſtantine was at Theſſalonica in Macedonia. When there he lay, the Goths, breaking through the Limits which were neglected, waſted Thrace, and Mæſia, but for fear of him again retreated, having obtained Pardon by reſtoring Captives; and ſuch of them as were taken Priſoners, were diſtributed throughout the Cities. After this he returned to Theſſalonica, and in February following were Games Celebrated at Rome, called Ludi Gothici. But taking notice how by the Negligence of the Soldiers upon the Limits, thoſe of Thrace and Mæſia had been broken through by the Barbarians; to provide againſt their Incurſions and Depredations, he ſent out a ſevere Conſtitution in the Month of April, whereof we are hereafter to ſpeak. Now this War againſt the Goths, Goths, gave occaſion to another War againſt Licinius. Thrace and Myſia had been waſted by them, and they had been repreſſed by Conſtantine. This Licinius complained of, as againſt the Agreement that the Quarters that were Subject to him ſhould be medled with by another Perſon: And ſometimes ſending ſubmiſſive Letters, but otherwhiles proud and haughty, he excited the Indignation of Conſtantine, who was alſo angry with him, for having lately Baniſhed all Chriſtians out of his Palace, as an Anonymous Author writes, formerly publiſhed by Sirmondus, and ſince by Valeſius, together with his Edition of Ammianus Marcellinus. He adds, That in the mean time while both prepared for another Civil War, Licinius raged in his Diſtrict againſt his Subjects with Wickedneſs, Covetouſneſs, Cruelty, and Luſt; Killing many for their Wealth, and corrupting their Wives. Zoſimus ſtill making Conſtantine the Aggreſſor, tells us, That he provided two hundred Gallies, which carried thirty Oars apiece; and of Ships of Burthen above two thouſand; of Foot-Soldiers an hundred and twenty thouſand; and of Horſe and other Forces belonging to his Navy, ten thouſand more.

Conſtantine and Licinius again prepare for War.

27. Licinius hearing of his Preparations, ſent Meſſengers about to divers Nations, to provide both a ſufficient Navy and Land-Forces. Accordingly were ſent him without delay from Ægypt, eighty Triremes, as many by the Phœnicians; by the Jonians, and the Aſiatick Dorienſes ſixty; thirty by the Cyprians, twenty by the Carians, thirty by the Bithynians; and the Africans furniſhed him with fifty. He had of foot almoſt an hundred and fifty thouſand; and of Horſe fifteen thouſand, ſent out of Phrygia and Cappadocia. The Navy of Conſtantine lay in the Piræus, and that of Licinius in the Helleſpont. Licinius lay at Hadrianople in Thrace. Conſtantine ſent away for his Fleet, which had been for the moſt part raiſed out of Greece, and marched with his Land-Army from Theſſalonica, and incamped himſelf on the Banks of the River Hebrus, which on the left hand watereth Hadrianople. The Author lately mentioned writes, That he ſent his Son Criſpus with a great Fleet to ſeize on Aſia, againſt whom Amandus was imployed by Licinius. That Licinius had ſeized the Roots of an high Mountain about Hadrianople, with a vaſt Army, and that thither marched Conſtantine with all his Forces. Zoſimus makes this Mountain two hundred Furlongs from Hadrianople, where the River Tonus joyns with Hebrus, and then for many days, he ſaith, the Armies faced each other. But Conſtantine, taking notice where the River was the narroweſt, had this Device: He commanded his Soldiers to cut Wood from the adjoyning Mountain, and joyned them with Ropes together, as if he intended to make a Bridge, and by it to paſs over his Forces. Having thus amuſed the Enemy, he aſcended the Mountain, and in the thick Woods where they could not be diſcovered, placed five thouſand Archers, with Eighty Horſemen. This done, he took with him twelve Horſe, and paſſing over Hebrus where it was narroweſt, fell ſuddainly upon his Enemies. Some now were Slain, ſome ran with all ſpeed, and others gaped and ſtared at this ſo unexpected an Onſet; for a mighty Slaughter followed after the reſt of the Horſe, and the whole Army had paſſed the River. Thirty and four thouſand Men were Slain, and at Evening Conſtantine took the Camp; Licinius being fled with as many as he could get together toward his Fleet. The next Morning, ſuch as had betaken themſelves into the Mountain, or Valleys, yielded to Conſtantine, together with ſuch as Licinius had left behind. Such an account Zoſimus gives of Conſtantine his Victory, ſomething odd. The other Writer ſaith in ſhort, That the War being drawn on, though his Men were put to difficulties, by his Military Diſcipline and Felicity, he overthrew the confuſed and diſordered Army of Licinius, receiving a ſlight Wound in his Thigh.

Conſtantine obtaineth a great Victory.

28. Licinius betook himſelf to Byzantium, and thither Conſtantine purſued him, and Beſieged the City. He ſent for his Fleet, which from the Piræus was come into Macedonia; of which his Officers adviſed to ingage in Fight only Eighty of the Swifteſt, which carried Thirty Oars apiece, becauſe of the ſtraitneſs of the Helleſpont. This ſmall number was deſpiſed by the Admiral of Licinius, whom Zoſimus calls Abantus, and Sigonius Abas; and he doubted not but eaſily to Maſter it with his Two hundred Galleys. But coming to Fight, the Commanders of Conſtantine joyntly ſet upon their Enemies, whereas he fell on without Order, and by reaſon of their multitude, his Ships fell foul one of another, and were expoſed to be eaſily Sunk and Deſtroyed by the Enemy. Many men being loſt, the Fight was broken off by the intervening of Night, and the one Party took in to the Port of Elæus in Thrace, and the other into that of Ajax. The day following, when a vehement Wind blew from the North, Abantus got his Ships out of the Port of Ajax, and prepared himſelf for another Ingagement. But the other Galleys of thirty Oars which ſtaid behind, being now come to Elæus, he began to be afraid of the great number of Conſtantine's Ships, and to doubt whether he ſhould ſet upon them. Now about Noon did the Wind turn about into the South, and ſo great a Tempeſt aroſe, that it drove the Fleet of Licinius, lying on the Aſiatick Coaſt, upon the Shoar, or upon Rocks, and with an hundred and thirty Veſſels periſhed five thouſand Men, Licinius in the Veſſels having Tranſported part of his Soldiers into Aſia; becauſe Byzantium was crowded with People. Abantus now being fled with four Ships into Aſia, and the Sea-Fight thus ended; when alſo the Veſſels were come into the Helleſpont, which brought Proviſions for Conſtantine's Army, they all departed with the Fleet to Byzantium, to joyn with thoſe that Beſieged the City, to compaſs it in both by Sea and Land. As for the Forces of Licinius, they not daring ſo much as to look upon them, got Veſſels, and departed to Elæus.

Licinius flies from Byzantium to Chalcedon.

29. Conſtantine prepared Mounts and Turrets, and all things requiſite for inforcing the Siege; at which Licinius being affrighted, reſolved to quit the place, and with the beſt reſolved of his Men to go to Chalcedon, a City of Bithynia, where he hoped to raiſe more Forces, and renew the War. Going thither by Boat, he created Cæſar Martinian his Magiſter Officiorum, to have a Companion of his Fortune, and ſent him to Lampſacus to hinder the Enemy from paſſing from Thrace to the Helleſpont; he himſelf beſtowing his Men in the Hills and Straits about Chalcedon. In the mean time, Conſtantine having a multitude of Ships of all ſorts, but fearing that thoſe of Burthen would not be able to come near the Shoar of Bithynia, prepared light Veſſels and Boats, and paſſed over his Army to the Sacred Promontory, as it was called, at the Entrance of Pontus, and two hundred Furlongs diſtant from Chalcedon. There on certain Hills he incamped himſelf, whom though Licinius perceived to be Maſter of Bithynia, yet being a man exerciſed in all Dangers, he ſent for Martinian away from Lampſacus, and incouraging his Soldiers, drew out of the Town to give Battel. A cruel Battel was fought betwixt the Town and the Fanum, wherein Conſtantine had by far the better, who falling with violence on the Enemy, made ſuch Slaughter, that of an hundred and thirty thouſand Men, ſcarcely thirty thouſand eſcaped. This being done, they of Byzantium opened their Gates, and received him; which alſo did the Citizens of Chalcedon. Licinius thus beaten, with the remainders of his Horſe, and a few Foot fled to Nicomedia.

There receives another great Overthrow.

30. At this time a Perſian, Hormiſda by Name, of the Royal Family, fled over to Conſtantine upon this occaſion: When the Perſian King his Father, was Celebrating his Birth-day, this Hormiſda came to Court, bringing along with him great ſtore of Veniſon. But it ſo happened, that ſuch as were entertained at the Feaſt, neither roſe up to do him Reverence, nor ſhew'd him any other reſpect, at which being Angry, he threatned them with the Death of Marſyas. Moſt of them underſtood not that Speech, as foreign, but a certain Perſian, who had lived in Phrygia, and had heard the Story of Marſyas, told the reſt what it was that Hormiſda meant. They remembring his Threats, when his Father died, made his younger Brother King, contrary to the Law, and putting Chains upon Hormiſda, kept him Priſoner on a Hill near the City, till by the Invention of his Wife he was delivered. She opened the Belly of a large Fiſh, and therein put a File, and ſowing up the Belly again, gave the Fiſh to a Truſty Eunuch, and bad him charge her Husband not to eat the Fiſh when any one was by, that he might make uſe of what he ſhould find in it. This done, ſhe loaded ſome Camels with Wine and Proviſions, and therewith Feaſted thoſe that kept him. While they were buſie at making Merry, Hormiſda opening the Fiſh, found the File, wherewith he filed off his Fetters, and putting on the Habit of an Eunuch, paſſed through the middle of them being Drunk, and taking one of the Eunuchs along with him, eſcaped away to the King of the Armenians, his Friend, and by his aſſiſtance got ſafe to Conſtantine, who received him with all Honour and Reſpect imaginable.

Hormiſda flies to Conſtantine.

31. But Conſtantine purſued Licinius to Nicomedia, and there alſo Beſieged him. He now knowing he had not ſtrength to grapple with him, deſpaired of any Succeſs in Arms, and coming out of the City, preſented himſelf as a Supplicant to Conſtantine, and offering him the Purple, called him Emperor and Lord, and begged his Pardon for what had paſſed. For he had promiſed his Life to his Siſter the Wife of Licinius, and that by Oath. As for Martinian, he delivered him to thoſe of his Guard to be ſlain. Thus much writeth Zoſimus, concerning this War betwixt Conſtantine and Licinius. The Anonymous Author, lately named, writes, That the day following the Victory at Chalcedon, the Wife of Licinius came to her Brother's Camp, and begged her Husband's Pardon, which was granted: That Licinius, now a private Man, was admitted to Conſtantine's Table; and that Mintinian had his life granted him at this time, though afterwards he was put to Death. But ſo became Conſtantine Monarch of the Roman Empire, in (or toward) the Nineteenth year of his Reign, wherein his two Sons, Criſpus and Conſtantius were Conſuls; the third Conſulſhip of whom fell into the CCCXXIIII year of our Lord.

Biſhops. 32. In the ſecond year of Decius, was Fabianus Biſhop of Rome crowned with Martyrdom, on the fourteenth of the Calends of February. The See was vacant for one year, and then was choſen Cornelius, whoſe election diſpleaſing ſome, Novatus ordained againſt him Novatianus. The year following Cornelius was Martyred, on the eighteenth before the Calends of October, and Lucius ſucceeded him, who ſhortly after was baniſhed. In the ſecond of Gallienus was he Beheaded, and after a vacancy of thirty five days, Stephen ſucceeded on the Ninth of April the firſt Feria, who interceding for Baſilides condemned by the Spaniards, they defended their Right againſt him, and condemned his Uſurpation againſt the Africans, as appeareth from Cyprian's Epiſtles, as alſo that the boldneſs of the Roman See, was now checked by all the Provinces. After three years Stephen was Beheaded by the command of Valerian, and Sixtus ſucceeded him, who being Beheaded when Laurence the Deacon was Fryed to death by the command of Valerian, Dionyſius ſucceeded. After him came Felix, and then Eutychianus, who being martyred in the firſt of Carus, after Nine days Caius ſucceeded, December 16. Caius was crowned with Martyrdom in the twelfth of Diocletian, and after eleven days Marcellinus ſucceeded, who through fear offering incenſe to Idols, when he denied it, was overborn by the teſtimony of a multitude of witneſſes, confeſſed his fault, and afterwards redeemed his credit by ſuffering Martyrdom. Marcellus ſucceeded him. After Marcellus ſucceeded Euſebius, and then Miltiades, then Sylveſter, who was Biſhop at the time of the Council of Nice, in the twentieth year of Conſtantine.

33. After Alexander, Mazabanes was Biſhop of Jeruſalem until the reign of Gallus and Voluſianus, after him Hymeneus till the time of Aurelian. Then followed Zambdas and Hermon, according to (a) Euſebius, who writeth, That the See of Jeruſalem was always honoured, and the Succeſſion continued unto his own days. After Hermon, Macarius was Biſhop, and was preſent at the Council of Nice. In the Church of Antioch after Philetus ſucceeded Zebinus, and then Babylas, who died in Priſon, in the Perſecution under Decius. Him followed Fabius, him Demetrianus, and him Paulus Samoſatenus the Heretick, who denying the Divinity of the Son of God, was excommunicated, and deprived by the ſecond Synod held againſt him at Antioch in the days of (c) Aurelianus. And when he would neither depart the Church, nor avoid the houſe, the Emperor was beſought (the firſt application to the Prince in this Nature by the Chriſtians) to interpoſe and command by Edict, that ſuch ſhould have the houſe as agreed in Doctrine with the followers of the Biſhop of Rome and Italy. Domnus was by the Synod appointed to ſucceed him, after whom followed Timeus, Cyrillus, Dorotheus, Tyrannus, Vitalis, Philogonus a Martyr, and (d) Euſtathius, who was at the Council of Nice. He fell into the Hereſie of Sabellius, who being the Scholar of Noetus, taught that the three Perſons of the Trinity were but one; but they differed, in that Sabellius ſaid not the Father to have ſuffered. He was depoſed by a Council held at Antioch. Euſebius Pamphilius Biſhop of Cæſarea confuted him. After his depoſition the See was vacant eight years. In the See of Alexandria after Heraclas, Dionyſius the Scholar of Origen was Biſhop, in the third year of Philip. He reporteth in (e) Euſebius the Peril he ſtood in, and the Perſecution he ſuffered under Decius. He wrote of the Alexandrian Martyrs to Fabius Biſhop of Antioch; and to Novatus the Heretick, who being a Prieſt of Rome, fell from his Order, and calling his Sect Cathari, would not admit unto the Church ſuch as fell after Repentance, and he abhorred ſecond Marriage. Dionyſius alſo wrote to Hermanion, to Steven, and Xiſtus Biſhops of Rome, unto

(a) Lib. 7. c. 19.

Socrat. Scholaſt. l. 1. cap. 9, 13.

(c) Euſeb. l. 5. c. 29, 30.

(d) Socrat. l. 1. c. 9, 23.

(e) Quem vid. l. 6, & 7. paſſim.

Philemon a Miniſter of Rome, and unto Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome. He confuted the Book of Nepos the Chiliaſt, and confounded in open Diſputation Coracion his Diſciple. Hitherto this error of the Millinaries propagated by Papias, had many of the Fathers that adhered to it, who yet held, That Chriſt when he came was to do his own work, without any prejudice to Earthly Princes in the mean time. Some obſerve, That Dionyſius ſtriking at this error, traduceth the Apocalypſe, as alſo defending the diſtinction of Perſons againſt Sabellius, ſeemeth to make three Eſſences. Many betook themſelves to Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome, that he would reclaim him, and obtained it. After he had governed the Church ſeventeen years he died, and Maximinus ſucceeded him, whom followed Theonas, and him Peter, who was martyred under Diocletian. Him ſucceeded Achillas, and then came Alexander, who was at the Council of Nice. He by preaching of the Trinity ſomewhat curiouſly, gave occaſion to Arius one of his Clergy to fall from the Faith, as * Socrates informeth us.

34. In the fifth year of Philip whil'ſt Fabianus was Biſhop of Rome, Donatus the Biſhop of Carthage died, and Cyprian ſucceeded him by conſent of all men except Feliciſſimus, who, whil'ſt the Heathens invaded his Patrimony, endeavoured to deprive him of his Biſhoprick. Feliciſſimus was ordained Biſhop by Novatus, who alſo ordained Novatianus againſt Cornelius Biſhop of Rome. Yet Cornelius favoured Feliciſſimus againſt Cyprian, and would have taken Cognizance of their buſineſs, whereupon Cyprian vehemently rebuketh him, and denies that any one beyond the See hath Right to paſs Judgment upon any Matters concerning Africk. And a little after, the Pride of the Roman See was reprehended by all thoſe of the Provinces, an occaſion being given about Baſilides, who being cenſured in Spain, complained to Stephen the Biſhop of Rome. Cyprian was ſeveral times driven into Exile. (a) Euſebius maketh him to have erred in Rebaptizing Hereticks. In the fourth of Valerian died Origen ſeventy years old, a man of admirable Parts, moſt auſtere life, indefatigable induſtry, and ſtupendious Learning, but of impure Doctrine. Jerome ſheweth how full of portentous Errors his Book περὶ ἀρχῶν is. (b) Auguſtin ſaith, he held the Devil at length ſhould be delivered from Hell, and aſſociated with the Holy Angels, and for this, and other things, eſpecially for holding alternate or ſucceſſive bleſſedneſs and miſery for ever, the Church did reject him. Pamphilus wrote an Apology for him. But his works are to be read with eſpecial care, and eſpecially his Commentaries upon the Scripture, concerning ſome of which Theodore (c) Beza paſſeth this cenſure: Certe hoc auſim dicere ſi hæc ſunt Origenis cujus titulum præferunt, hunc hominem fuiſſe ſelectum Diaboli organum Apoſtolicæ Doctrinæ evertendæ deſtinatum; for he evaporateth the ſolid and ſubſtantial Doctrine of the Goſpel, into Allegorical, and aery Notions.

35. But, God having exerciſed his People by many a fiery trial, was pleaſed to preſerve the buſh unburned, and at length to grant them Peace by Conſtantine, who proved a nurſing Father to the Church, taking away all Penal Laws againſt them, and enacting new ones, not only for their preſervation, but convenience and comfort.

Origen.

* L. 1. c. 5.

Vita & epiſtolæ Cypriani.

(a) Lib. 7. c. 3.

(b) Quem conſule de Civitate Dei l. 21. c. 17.

(c) In Rom. cap. 3. verſ. 14.

FINIS.

The Method and Order of this firſt Volume, whereby ſome miſtakes as to Chapters and Sections may be corrected.

BOOK I.

Chap. I.

From the beginning of the World, to the beginning of the firſt Empire. P. 1.

Chap. II.

The Babylonian Empire, from the firſt founding of it, to its utter deſtruction by Cyrus. P. 10.

Contemporaries with the Babylonian Empire.

Chap. III.

Of Sacred Hiſtory, viz.

Sect. I. From the time of Phaleg, and diviſion of the Earth, to the departure of the Iſraelites out of Ægypt, p. 27.
Sect. II. From the departure of the Iſraelites out of Egypt, to the death of Solomon, and the rent of the Kingdom. p. 34.
Sect. III. From the rent of the Kingdom, to the deſtruction of the Kingdom of Judah. p. 49.
Sect. IV. The Kingdom of Iſrael, from the revolt of the Tribes, to their final Captivity under Salmanaſſer. p. 57.

Chap. IV.

The moſt antient Kingdom of Ægypt. p. 61.

Chap. V.

The moſt antient State and Condition of Greece, with a deſcription of its Kingdoms and Commonwealths. viz.

Sect. I. The State of Greece in general. p. 75.
Sect. II. The Sicyonian Kingdom. p. 77.
Sect. III. The Kingdom of Argos. p. 78.
Sect. IV. The moſt antient Kingdom and Commonwealth of Athens. p. 92.
Sect. V. The moſt antient Kingdom and Commonwealth of Lacedæmon. p. 105.
Sect. VI. The moſt antient Kingdom of Corinth. p. 120.
Sect. VII. The antient Kingdom of Thebes. p. 123.

Chap. VI.

The Original and Kingdom of Rome viz.

Sect. I. The Original of the City of Rome. p. 127.
Sect. II. From the building of the City, to the deſtruction of the Kingdom. p. 132.

BOOK II.

Of the Perſian Empire and the affairs of the World Contemporary with it. p. 177.

Chap. I.

The Perſian Empire, viz.

Sect. I. From the beginning of the Empire of Cyrus, to the death of Cambyſes his Son and Succeſſor. p. 177.
Sect. II. From the death of Cambyſes, to that of Xerxes. p. 181.

Sect. III. From the death of Xerxes, and beginning of Artaxerxes Longimanus, to the death of Artaxerxes Mnemon, containing the ſpace of one hundred and three years. p. 206.
Sect. IV. From the death of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and the beginning of Ochus, to the death of Darius Codomannus, the ſpace of thirty two years. p. 238.
Sect. V. The Policy, Cuſtoms and Manners of the Perſians. p. 262.

Contemporaries with the Perſian Empire.

Chap. II.

The affairs of the Græcians amongſt themſelves. viz.

Sect. I. Of ſuch things as happened from the beginning of this Empire, until the expedition of Xerxes. p. 287.
Sect. II. Of ſuch things as fell out amongſt the Græcians from their Victories at Platæa and Mycale, until the beginning of the Peloponneſian War, the ſpace of fourty eight years. p. 299.
Sect. III. From the beginning of the Peloponneſian War, to the ending thereof, the ſpace of twenty ſeven years. p. 310.
Sect. IV. From the end of the Peloponneſian War, to the reign of Philip King of Macedonia, the ſpace of fourty four years. p. 343.
Sect. V. From the beginning of the reign of Philip King of Macedonia, to the Monarchy of Alexander his Son, the ſpace of thirty one years. p. 370.

Chap. III.

The affairs of Sicily, viz.

Sect. I. The firſt Names and Inhabitants of this Iſland, with a relation of ſuch things as preceded the Perſian Empire. p. 386.
Sect. II. Of ſuch things as were Contemporary with the Perſian Empire. p. 391.

Chap. IV.

The affairs of the Romans, viz.

Sect. I. From the baniſhment of Tarquinius, and firſt change of Government, to the alteration made by the Decemviri, the ſpace of fifty ſeven years. p. 415.
Sect. II. From the Creation of the Decemviri, to the War of Privernæ, which fell out the ſame year that Darius Codomannus died, the ſpace of one hundred and twenty one years. p. 458.

BOOK III.

Of the Empire of the Macedonians, and Affairs of the World Contemporary with it.

Chap. I.

From the beginning of the Monarchy of Alexander to his death, the ſpace of ſix years and ten months. p. 545.

Chap: II.

Of ſuch things as happ'ned after the death of Alexander, amongſt his Captains, till their Cantonizing of his Empire into their particular Kingdoms, and taking the ſtile and title of Kings upon them, the ſpace of ſeventeen years. p. 559.

Chap. III.

From Alexanders Captains taking the title of King, to the death of Seleucus the ſurviver of them, the ſpace of twenty four years. p. 569.

Chap. IV.

The Macedonian Kingdom, from the death of Seleucus, to the Captivity of Perſeus, and end of this Kingdom, the ſpace of one hundred and thirty nine years. p. 574.

Chap. V.

The Aſian and Syrian Kingdom, from the death of Seleucus, to the reducing of Syria into the form of a Roman Province by Pompey, the ſpace of two hundred and twenty years. p. 594.

Chap. VI.

The Ægyptian Kingdom, from the death of Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, to the death of Cleopatra, and the reducing of Ægypt into the form of a Roman Province, the ſpace of two hundred and fifty four years. p. 628.
Contemporaries with the Empire of the Macedonians. p. 650.

Chap. VII.

The Judæan Kingdom, or Principality of the Aſmonæans, from the departure of Antiochus Sideles from Jeruſalem, to the Reign of Herod an Alien, being by Birth an Idumæan, the ſpace of ninety eight years. p. 650.

Chap. VIII.

The Affairs of Sicily, from the death of Timoleon, to the Sicilian, or firſt Punick War, the ſpace of ſeventy three years, p. 668.

Chap. IX.

The Affairs of the Romans, viz.

Sect. I. From the War of Privernum, to the firſt Punick War, wherein the Romans firſt ſet foot out of Italy, the ſpace of ſixty ſix years. p. 681.
Sect. II. From the firſt Punick VVar, to that with Antiochus the Great, in which the Romans firſt invaded Aſia, the ſpace of thirty ſeven years. p. 690.
Sect. III. From the VVar with Antiochus, and the Invaſion of Aſia, to the deſtruction of Carthage, after which the Romans degenerated through ſecurity, the ſpace of fourty five years. p. 711.
Sect. IV. From the deſtruction of Carthage, to the War with Mithridates which afforded the occaſion to the firſt Civil War, the ſpace of fifty eight years. p. 718.
Sect. V. From the War with Mithridates, and the firſt Civil War, to the Combination of Pompey, Craſſus, and Cæſar, termed by Varro, Tricipitina, which proved the ruine of the Popular Government, the ſpace of twenty eight years. p. 728.
Sect. VI. From the beginning of the Tricipitina or firſt Triumvirate to the Civil War betwixt Cæſar and Pompey, the ſpace of eleven years. p. 746.
Sect. VII. Concerning the Civil War betwixt Cæſar and Pompey, to the Abſoluteneſs of Julius Cæſar, the ſpace of five years. p. 798.
Sect. VIII. From the Abſoluteneſs of Julius Cæſar to the end of the ſecond Triumvirate and the Abſoluteneſs of Octavius Cæſar or Cæſar Octavius, the ſpace of fifteen years. p. 832.

BOOK IV.

The Roman Empire.

Chap. I.

From the Abſoluteneſs of Cæſar Octavius Sirnamed Auguſtus to his death, the ſpace of near fourty four years. p. 775.

Chap. II.

From the death of Auguſtus, to that of Tiberius, the ſpace of twenty two years and upwards. p. 831.

Chap. III.

From the death of Tiberius, to that of Nero, the laſt Emperour of Cæſars Family, the ſpace of twenty years. p. 848.

Chap. IV.

From the death of Nero, to that of Domitian, the laſt of the Family of Veſpatian, the ſpace of twenty ſeven years. p. 866.

Chap. V.

From the death of Domitian, to that of Pertinax, and the expoſing of the Empire to publick ſale by the Soldiers, the ſpace of ninty ſeven years. p. 880.

Chap. VI.

From the death of Pertinax, and expoſing the Empire to ſale, to the death of Maximinus the firſt elected Emperour without conſent of the Senate, the ſpace of fourty five years. p. 926.

Chap. VII.

From the death of Maximinus the firſt elected Emperour without conſent of the Senate, to the Monarchy of Conſtantine, who reformed Religion, and Tranſlated the Imperial Seat to Byzantium, the ſpace of eighty ſix years. p. 946.

A Ta-

UMI

A TABLE.

The firſt Number ſheweth the Page, the ſecond the Paragraph.

The Reader is deſired to take notice, that through the Printer's Miſtake, the Folio's from 775 to 850. are double, and diſtinguiſhed by a Parentheſis thus ( ) and obſerv'd throughout the Table. As alſo that by the ſame miſtake, the Titles of a few Chapters and Sections are ſomething altered from the Copy, but ſo, as not in the leaſt to pervert the Sence or method of the Work.

A.

AAron, 33. 19. dieth at the age of one hundred and twenty three 37. 10.
Abas King of the Argives Ruled twenty three years, 81, 9.
Abiah ſucceedeth Rehoboam, 49. 3. Reigneth three years and dieth, ibid.
Abimelech (the baſe Son of Gideon*) maketh himſelf King,* 42. 26. ſlayeth his ſeventy Brethren, and was diſpatched by his Armour-Bearer, being firſt wounded by a woman, ibid.
Abraham born, 27. 3. cometh into Canaan, 28. ibid. recovereth Lot and all the Booty from the four Kings, ibid. 5. ſojourneth in Ægypt, ibid. 4. why called an Hebrew, ibid. 6. Abraham and Sarah, 29. 7. his name changed, and the ſignification thereof, ibid. he dieth, ibid. 9.
Abſalom Rebelleth, 46. 39.
Achelaus Son of Ageſilaus ſucceedeth his Father, 106. 5. dieth without Iſſue, and leaveth his Kingdom to his Brother Lycurgus, ibid.
Accident remarkable by Fire, 378. 23.
Achillas General in the Alexandrian War 645. 39. is ſlain, ibid.
Achilles is treacherouſly ſlain by Paris, 89. 31.
Acoris King of Ægypt, ſtrengthneth himſelf againſt Artaxerxes, 233. 82. &c.
Acriſius King of the Argives, driven out by his Brother, 947. at laſt they agree and Acriſius was kill'd by a blow with a Quoit, ibid.
Acilius the Conſul defeateth Antiochus at Thermopylæ, 711. 3.
Actius Clauſus his ſtory 424. 21.
Adam expell'd Paradiſe. 1. 3.
Adraſtus a Sicyonian King, 78. 3.
Adman the Emperor ſucceedeth Trajan: 888. 19. quitteth all beyond Euphrates and Tygris, and groweth popular, ibid. 20. writeth a Book of Tacticks, 889. 21. giveth his Soldiers good Example, ibid. 23. reformeth them, 890. ibid. goeth into Britain, ibid, 29. his Travels, ibid 25. he hateth the Antiochians, 891. 26. his various humours, 892. 27. he was skilful in Aſtrology and other Sciences, ibid. 28. taketh Lawyers, as Aſſiſtants, into his Council, ibid. 29. his Laws, 893. ibid. ſtudieth popularity, 894. 31. calleth many Cities by his own Name, ibid. maketh the Advocatus Fiſci, ibid. hath a vaſt Memory, ibid. 32. obtaineth the friendſhip of his Neighbours, and how, 895. ibid. taketh care about Habits, and regulateth Expences at Feaſts, ibid. 33. contracteth a lingring, and ſheweth his Cruelty, ibid. 34. adopteth Varus, who dieth, 896. 35. and after him Antoninus, 896. 35. maketh a great Alteration in the Government, ibid. 36. concealeth his humour, 898. 40. his Character, 899. 43. his Letter on behalf of the Chriſtians, ibid. 44. he dieth, ibid.
Æaces ſucceedeth his Father Syloſon in Samus, 289. but is ſoon depoſed, ibid.
Ædilis Curulis created, 434. 44. & 474. 41. and why ſo called, ibid. their Office, 435. 45. ſix of them made at Rome in one year, 833. 3.
Ægeus Governor of Athens begetteth Theſeus on the Daughter of Æthra, 94. 7. throweth himſelf from a Rock headlong, 96. 13.
Ægialea. a City, ſo called from Ægialeus, 77. 1.
Ægialeus the firſt King of Sicyonia, ibid.
Ægydrus, or Ægynus King of Sicyonia 77. 1. Reigneth thirty ſeven years, ibid.
Ægina, an Iſland, its Situation and Circuit, 292. 18.
Ægipetans by giving Earth and Water to Darius incenſe the Græcians, 293. 19.
Ægypt, a very antient Kingdom 70. 29. not the the gift of the Nile, as was generally fancied, 71. 29.

Ægyptian Antiquities far exceed the Novelty of the Græcian, ibid. Colonies pretended to by the Ægyptians, ibid. 31. their Hieroglyphicks 72. 32. they communicated Knowledge to the Greek Poets and Philoſophers, ibid. 33. their antient Government, 73. 35. the diviſions of the Land and Inhabitants, ibid. 36. their Courts of Juſtice, ibid. 37. Particular Laws, 74. ibid. Law-givers, ibid. 40. Particular Cuſtoms, ibid 41. Ridiculous Superſtition, 75. 42. Revolts, 27. 3. they recover Ægypt, ibid. 5. are defeated by Artaxerxes, 233. 89. and their Country made a province after the death of Cleopatra, 844. 39.

Ælius (Gallus) Invadeth Arabia, 792. 41.

Æmilianus, Commander of the Roman Legions in Pannonia, 947. 4. is made Emperor, but enjoyeth it, but three weeks, ibid. 5. and then is ſlain by his Soldiers, 948. ibid.

Æmilius (Paulus) the Conſul, ſubdueth Perſeus, 715. 15.

Æneas arriveth with his wandring Trojans in Italy, 128. 3. ſucceedeth Latinus and Reigneth four years over the Latines 129. 6. is overthrown in a Battle with Mezentius, and never ſeen more, though Honoured with a Chappel dedicated to him under the Title of Jupiter Indiges, ibid.

Ærarium, or Treaſury at Rome, 421. 13.

Ætna breaketh out into flames, 316. 19. again in the time of Hiero, 397. 14. as alſo fifty years after, ibid.

Ætolians refuſe to make a Peace, 587. 34. forced to it by Philip, 588. 36.

Africa, a horrid Peſtilence there, 723. 14. how Affairs went in that Country, 806. 40.

Agamemnon, adopted by Atreus, his Vncle, who obtained Mycenæ, &c. 87. 25

Agathocles, his original, 668. 1. made a Colonel, and liveth in Italy, ibid. is endanger'd at Gela, ſuſpected to affect Tyranny, Baniſhed, recalled, and made General, 669. 2. cauſeth a Maſſacre of the Syracuſians, ibid. 3. taketh the Office of Captain General without a Collegue, ibid. is overthrown by the Carthaginians, 671. 6. reſolveth to Invade Africk, ibid. 7. being landed he burneth his Ships, which at firſt daunted the Carthaginians, whom he overthrew, 672. 8. proſpereth, to admiration in Africk, 673. 10. his Fortune changeth by a Mutiny of his Soldiers, ibid. 12. yet he quieteth them, and defeateth the Carthaginians, 674. ibid. obtaineth another Victory againſt them, and murdereth Ophellas treacherouſly, ibid, 13. taketh upon him the Title of King, ibid. 15. returning from Sicily, his Affairs go down the wind, both there, and in Africk, 675. ibid. maketh a Maſſacre in Syracuſe, ibid. 16 deſpairing of his ſucceſs in Africk, he intendeth to fly with his youngeſt Son, Heraclides, 676. 17. is bound in golden Fetters, but looſed, eſcapeth, ibid. 18. his horrid Cruelties towards Ægeſta, ibid. 19. he rageth againſt the Italians. 677. 20. entereth into ſociety with Demetrius Poliorcetes, ibid. 22. thinks of another Expedition into Africk, but is prevented by Mænon, 678. 23. who poiſoneth him, ibid.

Agelas ſucceedeth Bacchis in the Corinthian Kingdom, 121. 3. Governeth thirty years, ibid.

Ageſilaus ſucceedeth Doriſſus in Lacedæmonia, 106. 5. Invadeth Aſia, 226. 59. is called home through the means of Tithrauſtes, 228. 66. taketh part with Nectanebus, King of Ægypt, 237. 96. obtaineth a Victory againſt the Leaguers, overrunneth Argia, 350. 17. relieveth the Achæans, 351. 81. defendeth Sphodrias, 356. 31. undertaketh a fruitleſs Expedition againſt the Bœotians ibid. 32. dieth, 367, 61.

Ageſilaus, Brother to Agis carrieth the Spartan Kingdom by the Aſſiſtance of Lyſander, 347. 8. is ſent into Aſia, ibid. 9. is Eclipſed by Lyſander, ibid. 10.

Ageſipolis, King of Lacedæmon, is ſent againſt the Argives, 351. 19. againſt the Olynthians, 354. 27. dieth. ibid.

Agilaus ſucceedeth Ixion in the Corinthian Kingdom, 121. 3. Governeth thirty ſeven years, ibid.

Agis ſucceedeth Euryſthenes, from whom the Kings of this Family were called Agidæ, 106. 4. he dieth, ibid.

Agis, the Spartan King, invadeth the Argives, is deſervedly blamed, 325. 46. ſeverely ſentenced 326. ibid. redeemeth his Credit, according to his promiſe, ibid. is repulſed from Athens, 338. 80. and dieth, 346. 8.

Agrarian Law at Rome, 442. 63. republiſhed thirty years after its making with another, 454. 90. Tumults happen about them, 455. 92. but are diverted by War, ibid. 93.

Agrigentum is taken, 691. 3. and deſtroy'd, 692. 5.

Agrippa (Vipſanius) his Parentage, 776. 4. his Advice to Octavius Cæſar, ibid. an anſwer to his Arguments drawn from the Greeks, 778. 8. from the Romans, 779. 10. gaineth the love of the people, 791. 37. adorneth the City with ſeveral Works, 792. 39. among the reſt perfecteth the Pantheon, ibid. diſagreeth with Marcellus, Auguſtus his Son-in-law, 793. 42. is ſent into Syria, ibid. made Governour of Rome, 795. 47. and Marrieth Julia, Auguſtus his Daughter, ibid. his performances in Spain againſt the Cantabri, 797. 50. Moderation, ibid. Example follow'd by the Romans, 800. 57. returneth from Syria, and is ſent into Pannonia 801. 60. in his way falleth ſick at Campania and dieth, ibid. his Commendation, 802. ibid.

Agrippa Poſthumus, the Son of Agrippa by Julia, 802. 60. born after his death, ibid. his Extravagancies, 822. 99. would not be reclaim'd, therefore is proſcrib'd, his Eſtate confiſcated, and perſon baniſhed to Placcaſia near Corſica, ibid.

Agrippa, the Grand-ſon of Herod the Great, by his Son Ariſtobulus, King of the Country of Philip the Tetrach 849. 2. his Dominions are enlarged by Claudius, 851. 8. he dieth eaten up with Worms, ibid.

Agrippa, the Son of Agrippa, but ſeventeen years old, when his Father died, 851. 8, his youth hindred his enjoyment of the Kingdom of Judæa, and therefore Cuſpius Fadus was made Governour thereof, ibid.

Agrippina, Daughter of Germanicus, is married to her Vncle Claudius, 854. 16. whom ſhe poiſoneth 856. 21. falleth at odds with her Son Nero 858. 24. and is made away by him, 859. 27.

Ahab, King of Iſrael, receiveth his Death-wound, Wounds fighting againſt Ramoth-Gilead, 50. 5.

Ahaz ſucceedeth his Father Jothan, 52. 12. dieth having Reigned ſixteen years by himſelf, ibid.

Ahaziah ſucceedeth Joram, who ſcarce Reigned one year, 51. 7. was ſlain by Jehu, ibid.

Alani, Invade Media and Armenia, 875. 23.

Alba deſtroyed, 141. 20.

Alcibiades, when a Child, his Advice to his Uncle Pericles, 309. 31. marcheth into Peloponneſus, 325. 45. being ſuſpected, he is ſent away, and recalled, 328. 53. his Acts againſt his own Country, 331. 62. he flieth from the Spartans, ibid. 63. deſireth to return to his Country, ibid. 64. giveth the Athenian Ambaſſadors, of the four hundred, a croſs Anſwer, 334. 71. overthroweth Mindarus, the Spartan, 337. 78. Beſiegeth Chalcedon with an Army of Athenians, 338. 82. returneth to Athens, 339. 84. leaveth his Fleet to the Management of his Pilot, who, fighting contrary to his order is defeated, and ſlain, 340. 85. for which he is diſcarded, ibid. and made away by the Procurement of the thirty Tyrants, 346.6.

Alcimus made High-Prieſt by Demetrius, 619. 63. he dieth in great Torment, ibid.

Aletes, the Son of Hippotes (Son to Antiochus, and Nephew to Hercules) ſubdueth the Kingdom of Corinth, when Doridas aud Hyanthidas Governed together, 121. 3.

Alexander, the Son of Philip and Olympias, born at Pella ſucceedeth his Father Philip at the age of twenty, 244. 20. beginneth his Reign well, 383. 36. Invadeth Aſia, ibid. engageth with the Perſians at Granicus, 245. 24. ſetteth at liberty all Greek Cities, ibid 26. taketh, aud razeth Halicarnaſſus, ibid. 27. fighteth the Battle of Iſſus with Darius Codomannus, 248. 35. travelleth into Syria, and is met by moſt petty Kings, 249. 37. ſcorneth the Offers of Darius, ibid. marcheth to Byblus, which yieldeth, and then to Sidon, 249. 38. depriveth Strato of his Kingdom, and beſtoweth it on his beloved Hephæſtion, ibid. admitteth Abdalmon, King of Sidon (or Abdalominus) a poor Gardner, ibid. the Syrians ſend him a Crown of Gold, ibid. 39. his great Attempt to Conquer Tyre, 250. 40. which is taken by him, ibid. 42. Invadeth Judæa, reſolving to bring all Palæſtine under his Subjection, 251. 45. & 252: 46. is appeaſed, ibid. Beſiegeth Gaza, ibid. 47. marcheth for Ægypt, 253. 49. foundeth Alexandria. ibid. 50. goeth to the Temple of Jupiter Hammon, ibid 51. cometh to Memphis, and ordaineth his new City to be the Metropolis of Ægypt, ibid. 52. moveth toward Syria, to revenge the death of Andromachus, 254. 53. paſſeth Euphrates and Tygris, ibid. 54. his Soldiers are diſcouraged by an Eclipſe of the Moon, 257. 55. he ſheddeth Tears at the death of Statira, the Wife of Darius, ibid. 56. is declared King of Aſia, ibid. 62. defeateth Darius at Gaugamela, 257. 60. entreth Babylon, ibid. committeth the Caſtle to Agathon, and goeth to Suſa, 258. 63, 64. is oppoſed by Ariobarzanes, ibid. 65. cometh to Perſepolis, 259. 66. cauſeth it to be plundered, ibid. Harraſſeth Perſia and burneth, in a Frollick, the Palace of Perſepolis. ibid. 67. cometh to Paſargadæ, 259. 68. to Ecbatane, 260. 69. purſueth Darius, ibid. 70. upon notice of the Conſpiracy againſt Darius, he maketh haſte, ibid. 72. but upon his approach he was mortally wounded, 261. 73. marcheth toward India, 549. 13. croſſeth the River Indus, 550. 15. and Hydaſpes, ibid. 16. overthroweth and taketh King Porus 551. 17. Sopithes yieldeth to him, ibid. 18. travelleth Eaſtward, and how far, ibid. 19. retreateth and ſaileth down the River Hydaſpes. 552. 19. Combateth the Malli, and Oxydracæ, ibid. 22. caſteth himſelf into extreme danger, through his great Courage, 554. 24. Saileth into Indus, ibid. where he buildeth another Alexandria, and ſubdueth the Country of Muſcanus, 554. ibid. as alſo that of Oxycanus, King of the Præſti, ibid. 26. killeth a Lion in the Forreſt of Bazaria, 547. 9. ran Clytus through, ibid. Saileth to the Iſle Patalena, ibid. 27. paſſeth into the Ocean, 559. 29. and through the Country of the Gedroſians with incredible difficulty, ibid. 31. cometh to Paſargadæ, 556. 32. to Perſepolis, ibid. Marrieth Statira, the Daughter of Darius, ibid. 33. as alſo Roxane the Danghter of Oxyartes, 549. 10. his Soldiers Mutiny, 557. 34. but he is reconciled, upon their Submiſſion, ibid. 35. arriveth at Ecbatane in Media, ibid. 36. at Babylon, 558. 37. falleth into a Fever with exceſſive drinking, whereof he dieth on the eleventh day, ibid. 38. his Iſſue, and Lineage, 559. 1.

Alexander, the Couſin-Germain of Heliogabalus, is received Emperour, 941. 42. he and his Mother are traiterouſly murdered, by the procurement of Maximinus, 945. 43.

Alexander ſucceedeth Algemon in Corinth, and Governeth twenty five years, 121. 3. but is ſlain by Teleſtes, ibid.

Alexander, the Son of Ariſtobulus, is beheaded by order of Pompey, 660. 19.

Alexander, Præfectus Prætorio, in Africk, uſurpeth 952. 15, is taken, and put to death, ibid. 16.

Alexander Balas, vide Balas.

Alexander, King of Epirus, is ſlain in Italy, 681. 2.

Alexander (Jannæus) the Son of Ptolomy Phyſcon, King of the Jews; beſiegeth Ptolomais, 941. 30. & 654. 7. but being known to have murdered his Mother, is expelled his Kingdom, ibid. 31. is defeated by the Arabians, 654. 8. hath Wars with his Rebellious Subjects, ibid. his Conqueſts abroad, 655. 9. his death, ibid. Advice to his Wife near his end, ibid. 10.

Alexander, the Brother of Lathurus, ſucceedeth him, 641. 32, but is expell'd by the Alexandrians, 642. 33.

Alexandra, the Wife of Ariſtobulus, the Son of Hyrcanus, obſerveth his Advice in her Reign, 656. 10. ſhe dieth, 657. 12. her Character, ibid.

Alexandria, when built, 681, 2. its State and Condition, 629. 2. the Pharos there, when built, ibid. 3. the Serapeum what, and whence ſo named, 629. 4. the Libraries there, ibid. Healthfulneſs of the place, 630. 5. Form of the City and Muſæum, or College, ibid. 6. the Soma, or place of Sepulture, deſcribed, ibid. 7. Timonium, what, ibid. Arts there profeſſed, 631. 12. a War there, 818. 69.

Algemon, Brother of Ariſtomedes, and Guardian to his Son, depoſeth him, 121. 3. and holdeth the Corinthian Kingdom ſixteen years, ibid.

Almus,

A Table.

Almus, the youngeſt Son of Siſyphus, (call'd otherwiſe Halmus and Olmus, from Almon or Olmon, a place in Bœotia took its denomination) hath part of the Country of Orchomenians beſtowed on him by Eteocles, the King, who ruled there, 120. 1.

Ambiorix is defeated by Lucius Minutius Baſilius, 779. 90.

Amilcar, the youngeſt Son of Mago, General in Carthage, 396. 13. ſlain in the Sicilian War, ibid.

Amilcar, the Carthaginian, maketh up a Peace, 670. 4. breaketh it, ibid. 5. a great Army is ſhipped for Sicily, under his Conduct, ibid. 6. he overthroweth Agathocles 671. ibid. raiſeth his Siege before Syracuſe, 672. 10. beſiegeth it a ſecond time, 673. 11. is taken, and miſerably tortur'd to death, ibid.

Amilcar (Barcas) troubleth Italy with his Inroads and Depredations, 693. 7. defeateth the Mercenaries, 695. 11. uniteth the Carthaginian Forces, ibid. 13. compelleth Spendius and Mathos to break up the Siege of Carthage, ibid. and utterly defeateth them, 696. 15. his Acts after the end of the firſt Punick War, 701. 30. he is put to flight by Oriſſon, King of the Iberi, and drowned in a River, ibid.

Amnon raviſheth Thamar, 46. 39.

Amon, King of Iſrael, an Idolatrous Prince, 53. 16. after two years Reign is ſlain by his Servants in his own Houſe, 53. 16.

Amphion and Zethus obtain the Kingdom of Thebes, 125. 6. Amphion, an excellent Muſician dieth of the Peſtilence, 125. 6. and Zethus having his young Son kill'd unawares, pineth away for Grief, ibid.

Amphyctiones, the General Council aſſembled firſt, in Theſſaly, and why ſo called, 81. 11. and thence carried by Acriſius to Delphos in Phocis, ibid. they puniſh the Phocians, 379. 26.

Amyclas, the Son and Succeſſor of Lacedæm, King of Lacedæmonia, 105. 2.

Anactorium, a Town ſituate in the Bay of Ambracia taken by the Corcyræans, after the Sea-fight with the Corinthians, betwixt the Iſland Corcyra, and the Continent of Epirus, 305. 21.

Ancus Martius, Elected King of Rome, after an Inter-regnum, 141. 22.

Andromachus, Governour of Syria under Alexander, 254. 53. was burnt alive by the Samaritans, ibid.

Audriſcus, the Counterfeit Son of Perſeus, taken flying to Byzus a petty King of Thrace, 716. 17.

Annibal, the Son of Geſco, 599 20. &c.

Annibal, the Carthaginian General tampereth very deceitfully with the Syracuſians, 680. 29. and is Crucified by his Soldiers after he had received a conſiderable loſs at Sea, 691. 3.

Annibal the Son of Amilcar Barcas, created General by the Carthaginians, 701. 30. ſubdueth the Oleades, ibid. 31. taketh Saguntus, a Town in Spain, Confederate with Rome, 702. ibid. whereupon the ſecond Punick War begun, ibid. 33. Conquer'd all Spain, as far as the Pyrenæan Hills, ibid. paſſeth over the Alps into Italy, 703. ibid. defeateth Scipio the Conſul, and Sempronius, his Collegue, ibid. 34. as alſo Flaminius at the Lake Thraſymene, 704. 36. notwithſtanding Fabius his delays, he gave the Romans a moſt grievous Overthrow at Cannæ, 705. 38. enervateth his Army by wintering at Capua, ibid. 39. goeth down the wind in Italy and Spain, ibid. 4. in Sardinia, 706. 41. gaineth Tarentum, but Beſiegeth the Caſtle in vain, 707. 43. marcheth for Rome, but is hindred from fighting by Tempeſts, and departeth for Rhegium, ibid. 44. dieth, 714. 11.

Andria, what kind of Feaſts they are, 110. 15.

Antalcidas is ſent from the Spartans to Artaxerxes, 229. 70. concludeth a Peace with him, 230. 74.

Antander the Brother of Agathocles Governour of Syracuſe, 671. 7. murdereth the Syracuſians, 676. 19.

Antigonus his ſhare in the Provinces after Alexander's death, 560. 3. is made General againſt Eumenes, 562. 9. thinketh of getting all into his Power, ibid. 11. putteth Pithon the Governour of Media to death, 565. 21. the Captains combine againſt him. 566. 22. he, and the reſt take upon them the Title of Kings, 568. 27. his fruitleſs Expedition againſt Ptolomy, 569. 1. againſt Rhodes, ibid. 2. a Combination againſt him, ibid. he is ſlain, 570. 4.

Antigonus Gonatus, the Son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, obtaineth his Fathers Kingdom, 575. 3. is expell'd by Pyrrhus, 575. 4. recovereth Macedonia and loſeth it again, 576. 6. dieth, ibid.

Antigonus Doſon, King of Macedonia, 577. 9. why ſo called, ibid. is victorious, 579. 14. taketh Mantinea, ibid. 15. defeateth Cleomenes, 580. 16. dieth of a Conſumption, ibid. 17.

Antigonus, the Son of Echecrates, deſtined by Philip to the Kingdom, 592. 51. is killed, ibid. 52.

Antigonus the Son of John Hyrcanus, returneth victorious from the Wars, 652. 4. is murdered by the Command of his Brother Ariſtobulus, 653. ibid.

Antigonus, the Son of Ariſtobulus, Invadeth Judæa, by the procurement of the Parthians, 664. 24. croppeth the Ears of Hyrcanus his Uncle, 665. 30. is taken in Jeruſalem, and Beheaded, 667. 35.

Antinous, the Beautiful Youth of the Emperour Adrian, is loſt, as he ſailed through the Cule, 891. 26.

Antiochus, the Son of Seleucus falleth in Love with Stratonice and hath her, 594. 1. Sirnamed Soter, 595. 2. ſucceedeth his Father, and why ſirnamed Soter, ibid. his Wars, ibid. buildeth a City in Syria, 595. 4. and another, 596. ibid. dieth, ibid.

Antiochus, ſirnamed Theus, and why, 596. 5. ſucceedeth his Father Antiochus Soter, from whom the Parthians and Eaſtern Provinces revolt, and he is poiſoned by his Wife Laodice, Antiochus Hierax why ſo called, 596. 7. Rebelleth againſt his Brother Seleucus Callinicus 597. ibid. is ſlain by Thieves in his flight, ibid. 8.

Antiochus, the Great, ſucceedeth his Brother Seleucus Cerannus, 597. 9. falleth into great Troubles, 598. 10. maketh War on Ptolomy for Coeloſyria, and getteth into Seleucia, 599. 14. with ſeveral other places, 600. 15. is beaten by Ptolomy, 601. 19. maketh an Expedition into the Eaſt, 603. 24. the fruits thereof,

thereof, ibid. he, and the Romans grow jealous one of the other, 604. 7. he marrieth an obſcure Girl at Chalcis, Daughter to Cleoptolemus, his Hoſt, 606. 30. is overthrown at the Straights of Thermopylæ, ibid. 31. his Acts in Aſia, ibid. 32. is ſlain in Elymais in a drunken fit, 609. 38.

Antiochus Epiphanes, why, and by whom ſo called, 610. 40. ſucceedeth his Brother Seleucus Philopater, ibid. ſeizeth on Ægypt a firſt and ſecond time, ibid. 41. his Cruelty and Prophaneneſs againſt the Jews and their Temple, ibid. 42. getteth all Ægypt except Alexandria, into his hands 611. 43. retreateth, ibid. returneth into Ægypt, but is taken off by the Romans from farther Attempts, ibid. 44. perſecuteth the Jews upon the account of their Religion, 612. 45. is enraged at the oppoſition of Mattathias, and Judas, 613. 48. ordereth Lyſias to deſtroy the Jews, and ſendeth ſeveral Captains into Judæa, who are deſtroy'd, as well as Lyſias himſelf, ibid. 49. he, in the interim proſpereth in the upper Countries, ibid. 50. returning breatheth Revenge, but is ſtruck with a foul Diſeaſe, and dieth, 614. ibid.

Antiochus, Eupator, his Son being a Child but nine years old, ſucceedeth his Father, 614. 51. why, and by whom ſirnamed Eupator, ibid. he beſiegeth Bethſhura, and that taken Jeruſalem, 616. 55. but is called away by the motions of Philip, ibid.

Antiochus Sidetes, ſecond Son of Demetrius Soter, enjoyeth his Brother's Kingdom, 623. 72. marrieth Cleopatra, ibid. diſpoſeſſeth Tryphon, her former Husband, ibid. 73. ſendeth Cendebæus againſt the Jews, who is defeated by John, the Son of Simon, 624. ibid. beſiegeth Jeruſalem, ibid. 74. is ſlain by the Parthians, 625. 76.

Antiochus Grypus, Son to Demetrius, defeateth and killeth Alexander Balas, the uſurping Counterfeit, 626. 78. is emulated, and expell'd Syria, ibid. 79. ſirnamed Aſpendius, and why, 626. 80. ſlain by Treachery, 627. 80.

Antiochus, the young Son of Balas, is ſet up againſt Demetrius, for his Father's Kingdom, 622. 69. is kill'd by Tryphon, 623. 71.

Antiochus Cyzicenus, half-Brother and Couſin-Germain to Grypus, after his Expulſion, they divide the kingdom, and both Reign together, 626. 80. he killeth himſelf, 627. ibid.

Antiochus Pius, or Euſebes, the Son of Cizycenus avoideth his ſnares by the help of a Courtiſan, 627. 80. goeth to Aradus, and taketh upon him the Diadem ibid. there is no certainty in Hiſtory concerning his end, ibid. 81. he is outed of all Syria, by Tigranes, ibid. 82.

Antiochus Aſiaticus, the Son of Antiochus Pius recovereth Syria from Tigranes, King of Armenia, 627. 82. is ſpoiled of it by Pompey the Great, and confined to Comagena, whence he, and his Poſterity never ſtirred, which prov'd the Fall of the Kingdom of Syria, 628. ibid.

Antiochus, ſirnamed Dionyſius, the Brother of Philip, getteth Damaſcus into his hands, and warreth againſt the Arabians, 627. 81. is ſlain in a Battle with Aretas, their King, ibid.

Antiochus Comagenus, is reſtored to his Kingdom, and part of Cilicia given him by Claudius, 851. 9.

Antiochus, King of Syria gapeth after Ægypt, 635. 19. his Conqueſts, ibid. 20. marrieth his Daughter to Ptolomy, ibid.

Antipater, left in Macedonia by Alexander, 285. 42. overthroweth the Lacedæmonians, 286. ibid. whether Alexander was poiſoned by his procurement, 558. 38. is choſen General with Antigonus, and Protector of the King, 561: 8. dieth, 562. 10

Antipater, the Son of Caſſander killeth his own Mother, 571. 7.

Antipater, the Idumæan, his Extraction, 657. 13. moveth Hyrcanus to recover his Right, ibid. 14. his great Services to Cæſar rewarded, 660. 20. diverteth his Son Herod from doing miſchief, 661. 22. is poiſoned by Malichus, his Character, ibid.

Antonia, the younger Daughter of Antony the Triumvir, 832. 4. of whom 'tis reported ſhe did not ſpit in her whole Life, ibid.

Antoninus (Pius why ſo called) ſucceedeth Adrian the Emperor, 900. 45. his Behaviour as a private man, Wars, and Mercifulneſs, ibid. 46. & 47. his ſelfdenial and power with his Neighbours, 901. 48. how he Treated his Miniſters of State, and learned Men, ibid. 49. dieth, the Honours confer'd upon him after his Death, 902. ibid. his Edict on behalf of the Chriſtians, ibid. 50.

Antoninus (Marcus Aurelius Philoſophus) ſucceedeth him, 904. 55. his Gratitude to his Schoolmaſters, ibid. his Maſter in the Laws, who, 905. 56. he marrieth Fauſtina, the Daughter of Antoninus Pius, ibid. 57. joyneth Lucius Commodus with himſelf in the Imperial Soveraignty, 906. 58. ſtirs in the Provinces, during his Reign, ibid. his Laws, ibid. 59. ſetteth himſelf againſt Accuſations, 907. 60. more Laws of his, ibid. 61. his chiefeſt Adviſor in Law-Matters, 908. 62. Wars with the Marcomanni, ibid. both he and Commodus the Emperor undertake an Expedition againſt them, 908. 63. Commodus dieth, 909. 63. this War was of vaſt Conſequence, ibid. 64. Marcus expoſeth to Sale his Rich Furniture, 910. 65. changeth the way of the Provinces, ibid. 66. many Nations revolt from him, ibid. reſtraineth the Extravagancies of pretended Philoſophers, 911. 67. his Mildneſs, ibid. Clemency, ibid. 68. loſeth his Wife, Fauſtina, 912. 69. dieth, ibid. 70. his Covetouſneſs and Diſſimulation anſwered, 913. 71. 72. Arrogancy alſo anſwered, 914. 52. ibid, he was a good Huſband, ibid. 73.

Antonius (Marcus) Grandfather to the Triumvir, & an excellent Orator, killed by Marius, 730. 5.

Antonius (Caius) the Collegue of Cicero, overtaketh Cataline, near the Alps, where Cataline is ſlain, 743. 43.

Antonius (Marcus) fighteth under Gabinius in Ægypt, 643. 36. Tribune of the people, he flieth to Cæſar, 792. 5. is Conſul with him ſtirreth up the people againſt the Conſpirator, practiſeth for his own Advancement (840) 17. his hatred advanceth Octavius Cæſar, ibid. 18. followeth Cleopatra into Ægypt, 847. 34. his Carriage in the Eaſt, ibid. 38. doteth on Cleopatra, 844. 26. & vide 648. 46. his Extravagancies in Ægypt, ibid. he and Cæſar quarrel, ibid. 35. they prepare for War, 848. 36. is overthrown at Sea, and his Land-forces yield to Cæſar, ibid. killeth himſelf, 849. 38. & vide 649. 49.

Antonius (Lucius) Conſul, out of Envy to Octavius Cæſar raiſeth the Peruſian War.

Antonius (Muſa) recovereth Octavius of a Diſ- temper, for which he is richly rewarded by him and the Senate, 793. 42.

Apelles, Tutor to Philip, 584. 26. his Treaſon diſcovered, ibid. 27.

Apian's Lye againſt the Jews, 63. 15.

Apios, all the ſpace in the Corinthian Iſthmus, 77. 1. whence ſo called. ibid.

Apries King of Ægypt (call'd in Scripture Pharaoh Hophra and Vaphres*) Invadeth* Phœnicia, 70. 26. making War with the Cyrenæans, flieth, and is ſtrangled by his Soldiers, 70. 26.

Apis, the ſacred Ægyptian Bull, 62. 3.

Apis, King of Sicyonia, reigneth twenty five years, 77. 1.

Apis, King of Argos, turneth Tyrant and commandeth the Peninſula to be called after himſelf Apios, 79. 2. dieth without Iſſue after twenty four years Reign, ibid.

Apotheoſis of the Roman Emperors the manner thereof, 8.

Appius (Claudius) Conſul, 447. 75. his bold and contumelious Speech before the Aſſembly of Tribunes, 448. 76. is commanded to depart, ibid. to be ſent to Priſon, but is defended ibid. 77. is called to anſwer for his Life for croſſing the Agrarian Law, 449. 78. but killeth himſelf before the Trial, ibid.

Appius Claudius, the Decemvir, his Infamous Story, 463. 15.

Arabia ſubdued by Palma, Præfect of Syria, 883. 7.

Arad, King, who Inhabiteth the Southern Parts of Canaan, 37. 10. is defeated, ibid.

Aram, and his four Sons, 5, 13. &c.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, 577. 9. is defeated by the Ætolians, 541. 20. is poiſoned by Philip, 586. 32.

Arbaces made King of Aſſyria, granteth Babylon to Beleſis, 14. 12. leaveth the Dominion of Aſia to the Medes, and the Soveraignty of them to his Son Mandauces, after he had Reigned eighteen years, Arbela, Vide Gaugamela. 262. 76.

Arcadians fall out with the Thebans, 362. 48. ſtirs between them and the Mantineans, 365. 55.

Archagathus, the Elder Son of Agathocles, raiſeth a Mutiny, 676. 18. he and his Brother Heraclides are kill'd by the Army.

Archelaus, the Son of Herod, ſucceedeth him in Judæa, 814. 23. Tyrannizeth for ten years, 793. 42. accuſed by the Jews at Rome is baniſhed to Vienna, and his Goods confiſcated by Cæſar, ibid. 84.

Archidamus, King of Lacedæmon, his prudent Courſe, 307. 27. croſſed by Sthenelaides. ibid. Invadeth Attica, 311. 4. Beſiegeth Platæa, 313. 11. Invadeth Attica the third time, 314. 13.

Archimedes, the Famous Mathematician, 706. 41. witholdeth Marcellus from ſtorming the City of Syracuſe by his Mathematical Engines, ibid. is ſlain, ibid. 42. various Reports of the manner of his death, ibid.

Archon, who among the Athenians, 98. 19. Archons for ten years 99. 19. annual Archons, ibid. 20.

Ardea beſieged, 149. 44.

Areopagus, the Chief Council at Athens, 93. 5.

Argalus ſucceedeth his Father Amyclas in the Kingdom of Lacedæmon, 105. 2.

Argives recover the Democracy and renounce the League with Sparta, 327. 49.

Argonautæ who, and why ſo named, 83. 16.

Argos, the Kingdom, 78. 1. its Antiquity, idid. why ſo called, 79. 1. is divided, 82. 12. an unparalell'd Sedition there, 360. 43.

Argus, King of Argos, Governeth the Argives ſeventy years, 80. 5.

Argyraſpides, Alexanders Soldiers, why ſo named, 553. 23.

Aretas beſiegeth Jeruſalem, 657. 14. is beaten by Scaurus, 658. 15.

Ariarathes the fifth of that Name, King of Cappadocia, marrieth Antiochis, the Daughter of Antiochus the Great, 619. 64. is expell'd by Demetrius, but reſtored by Attalus, 620. 64.

Ariaſpes, ſecond Son of Artaxerxes, poiſoneth himſelf, through his Brother Ochus his means, 238. 98.

Aridæus, the Baſe-Son of Philip, declared King after Alexander's death, 560. 2. is killed by Olympias, 565. 19.

Aridæus, one of Alexander's Captains, choſen, with Pithon, in the room of Perdiccas, 561. 8.

Arimaſpi, or Agriaſpæ, called Euergetæ, why, and by whom, 546. 4.

Ariobarzanes oppoſeth Alexander at the Straights of Perſia, 258. 65.

Arioviſtus, a German King, his anſwer to Cæſar's Demands, 755. 22. they parley, 756. 25. but to no purpoſe, ibid. 26.

Ariſtagoras taketh Sardis, 187. 17. is defeated in his Retreat, 187. 17. and ſlain, 188. 19.

Ariſtagoras, the Mileſian, draweth Jonia into Rebellion againſt the Perſians, 289. 7.

Ariſtides dieth ſo poor, that he ſcarce left enough for his Funeral, 300. 4. his Children are provided for at the Publick Charge, ibid. his Character, 296. 30.

Ariſtimenes is defeated by Alexanders Forces, 251. 43.

Ariſtobulus (ſirnamed Philellen) and why, 652. 4. ſucceedeth his Father, John Hyrcanus, and changeth the Principality into a Kingdom ibid. his Cruelty to his Mother and Brethren, ibid. dieth within a years time, 653. 4.

Ariſtobulus the younger Son of Philellen aſſumeth the Kingdom, 656. 11. diſpoſſeſſeth his Elder Brother Hyrcanus by Battle, 657. 13. is carried Priſoner to Rome by Pompey, 659. 17. eſcapeth, but is taken and ſent back by Gabinius, ibid. 18. is poyſoned by Pompey's Party, 660. 19.

Ariſtobulus, the Son of Ariſtobulus the King and Brother to Mariamne is drowned by Herod, 811. 77.

Ariſtocrates, puniſhed for his Treachery, 119. 43.

Ariſtodemus, killeth his Daughter, 116. 32.

Ariſtogiton, Vide Hipparcus.

Ariſtomedes ſucceedeth Eudemus in Corinth, and Ruleth thirty five years, 121. 3. but is depoſed by Algemon. ibid.

Ariſtomenes manageth the Buſineſs of the Meſſenians in their ſecond War, 118. 39. being of extraordinary Abilities, both of Body and Mind. ibid.

Ariſtonicus, Attalus his Baſe-Son, Conteſting with the Romans for Pergamus is taken, 720. 8. and ſtrangled, ibid.

Ark reſteth on Mount Ararat, 2. 6. where that lieth, 3. 7. God's Ark taken, but returned, 561. 8.

Armenia revolteth, 810. 75. is reduced by Caius, ibid.

Arſaces, afterward Artaxerxes marrieth Statira, 213. 23.

Arſites, the Brother of Darius Nothus revolteth from him, 213. 22.

Aſa ſucceedeth Abiah, 50. 4. dieth in the fourty firſt year of his Reign, ibid.

Aſcanius ſucceedeth Æneas (before called Euryleon*) and buildeth a new City call'd* Alba-Longa, 130. 7. dieth in the twenty third year of his Reign, ibid.

Aſdrubal, Son-in-law to Amilcar Barcas, ſucceedeth him as Commander of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain, 701. 30. is ſlain, ibid.

Aſdrubal the ſecond deludeth Nero, 707. 45. is ordered to march out of Spain into Italy, 708. 47. cut in pieces, with his whole Army, ibid.

Aſdrubal, Mago's Eldeſt Son, General of the Carthaginians, dieth of his Wounds in Sardinia, 396. 13, is publickly lamented, ibid.

Artabanus put to death, 206. 2.

Artabanus, the Parthian King revileth and deſpiſeth Tiberius, 847. 87. but concludeth a Peace with Vitellius, Preſident of Syria by Cæſar's Order, 848. 88.

Artabazes is killed by the Armenians, 796. 49.

Artabazus revolteth from Ochus the Son of Artaxerxes, 239. 3.

Artaxerxes Longimanus, the Son of Xerxes, 206. 1. why ſo called, ibid. 2. gaineth the Perſian Kingdom, 206. 2. his Civil War with Megabyzus, 211. 17. he dieth, 212. 20. various Opinions concerning the time of his Reign, ibid.

Artaxerxes (formerly Arſaces ) Mnemon why ſo called, 214. 25. obtaineth the Kingdom of Perſia, ibid. he and Cyrus joyn Battle, 218. 38. he commandeth the Head and right Hand of Cyrus to be cut off, 219. 41. looketh after Cyprus, 230. 72. turneth his Forces from the Græcians againſt Cyprus. 231. 75. getteth a Victory at Sea againſt Evagoras, ibid. 76. a Peace is made, 232. 78. Invadeth the Caduſians to no purpoſe, ibid. 80. Reigneth fourty three years; having one hundred and fifteen Sons, and but three Legitimate, 237. 97. dieth, his Eldeſt Son Darius being made King by him in his life-time, ibid. his name is put upon his Succeſſors by the Perſians, as a memorial of his mild and proſperous Government, 238. 1.

Artoxares conſpireth againſt Darius, 213. 22. is put to death by Paryſatis, ibid.

Aſtyages, the Son of Cyaxares, Father to Mandane, the Mother of Cyrus, 15. 15. is Governour of Media, 17. 22. & 25. 43. & 26. 47.

Aſſaracus, the Son of Tros, of whom Æneas deſcended, 87. 26.

Aſſyrian Kingdom, its riſe, how, when, and by whom, 15. 17. &c.

Atalante, an Iſland, belonging to the Locrians of Opus, 312. 8.

Athaliah uſurpeth, 51. 7. is ſlain, ibid.

Athenians rebuild their Walls, which troubleth the Lacedæmonians, 292. 2. are eluded by Themiſtocles, ibid. they, by the means of Ariſtides, draw the Chief Power to themſelves, 300. 5. the Original of the Malice between them and the Lacedæmonians, 301. 9. the difference betwixt them and the Corinthians, about Megara, renewed, 302. 11. are forced to make a Truce with the Peloponneſians, through bad ſucceſs, 303. 13. they part with Bœotia, ibid. their Deſign in the Aſſociation with the Corinthians, 305. 20. get the better of them, and cloſely beſiege Potidæa, 306. 4. who ſide with them in the Peloponneſian War, 311. 4. their Proviſions for War, ibid. 5. ſend a Fleet into Peloponneſus to divert their Enemies, 312. 7. eject the Inhabitants of Ægina, and plant a Colony of their own in the Iſland, ibid. their manner of burying thoſe Soldiers, who loſt their Lives in Battle, ibid. 8. Beſiege Mitylene, 314. 13. are much diſturb'd at the loſs of Amphipolis, 319. 30. they, and the Lacedæmonians deſire a Peace, 321. 33. which is concluded, ibid. 34. though ſeveral Cities diſſent, 322. 35. are offended, 324. 41. Incenſed by Alcibiades, who obſtructeth the Peace by a notable Stratagem, ibid. 42. have an eye upon Sicily, and decree Aid to be ſent to the Ægeſtans, 327. 51. are defeated at Syracuſe, 329. 57. and at Sea, 330. 58. are ſorely ſtraightned, ibid. 59. fly, and are forced to yield to Mercy, ibid. 60. Athenian Ambaſſadors of the four hundred come to Alcibiades at Samus, 334. 71. are defeated, and ſeized with great Conſternation, 336. 74. the contrary Diſpoſitions of them, and the Lacedæmonians, ibid. 75. the power of the four hundred abrogated, ibid. they obtain a Victory at Sea, ibid. 76. Ambaſſadors and others ſent by them to the Perſian King, who never come at him, 339. 83. they receive no favour of Cyrus, 340. 85. enter into Society with the Arcadians, 363. 51. and ſtudy how to become Maſters of Corinth, ibid. 52.

Athens, the City and Kingdom founded, 92. 1. ſeveral Cities that go under that Name, 93. 2. is burnt by Mardonius, 200. 58. is the Bulwark of Greece againſt the Barbarians, 299. 3. ſtirs in the City, 290. 9. the Government there changed to Oligarchy, and in the Cities ſubject to it, 333. 68. the Model thereof, four hundred men having the executive Power, who ſend to Agis about a Peace, but he ſlighteth it, and referreth their ſecond Addreſs to Sparta, ibid. & 69. how they ſtood affected to the four hundred, 335. 73. their traiterous Deſign, and the Tumults there, ibid. the City yieldeth to Lyſander, 347. 92. whereupon their Walls are demoliſhed, and Gallies burnt, ibid. a great Famine hapneth there, ſo that they were forced to feed on ſodden Leather, and the Bodies of the dead, 731. 9.

Atlas, the firſt Man reported to Reign in Arcadia, 87. 26. how many Perſons went under that Name, 93. 3.

Atreus, the Son of Pelops, King of Mycenæ and Argos, 86. 24. is ſlain in Combat by Echemus King of the Tegeatæ, in Arcadia, 87. 25.

Attalus, King of Pergamus, or Aſia, 720. 8. leaveth the people of Rome, his Heir, by Will, ibid.

Attica invaded ſeveral times, 313. 9. & 314. 15. & 316. 20. is ſeized with a fearful Plague, 313. 9.

Attilius Regulus, Conſul, ſent into Africk, 692. 4. ingageth with a monſtrous Serpent, whoſe Skin was one hundred and twenty foot long, ibid. 5. defeateth the Carthaginians, and not long after is defeated and taken himſelf, ibid. diſſwadeth the Senate to accept of a

Peace

Peace with Carthage, and for that reaſon, upon his return, to keep his Oath, he is miſerably tormented to death by the Carthaginians, 693. 7.

Aurelius the Emperour.

Aurelius (Quintillus) the Brother of Claudius Flavius the Emperour is advanced to the Empire, 948. 6. but being too good for them, they that ſet him up, pull him down, and kill him, the ſeventeenth day after his Promotion at Aquileia, ibid.

Auteſion, the Son of Triſamenus, a Theban King, leaveth Thebes, and goeth to the Darienſes and Damaſichthon was choſen in his room. 127. 12.

Automenes obtaineth the Kingdom of Corinth after the Murder of Teleſtes, and Ruleth only one year, 121. 3. which time being expired the Bacchiadæ ſeize that Kingdom, and continue ninty years in the way of an Ariſtocracy, only create a Brytanis every year, out of their own Body, in lieu of a King. ibid.

B.

Babel built, 4. 11. the Confuſion of Languages mentioned by Heathens, and their Poetical Fables thereupon, ibid.

Babylon and its Empire, 10. 1. granted to Beleſis, 14. 12. rebelleth againſt Darius, 184. 10.

Bactra, a City, why ſo called, 548. 8.

Bacchiadæ vide Bacchis.

Bacchides, General of Demetrius Soter, is ſent againſt the Jews, 617. 59. againſt Judas Maccabæus, 618. 61. ſweareth, that he will never Moleſt the Jews more, 619. 63.

Bacchis, the Succeſſor of Prumnis, King of Corinth, Reigned twenty five years, and grew ſo Famous that his Succeſſors had from him the Name of Bacchiadæ, though he and his Anceſtors were all called Heraclidæ, 121. 3.

Bagoas, an Eunuch of great Authority with Artaxerxes, 241. 9. taken at the Siege of Bubaſtis Priſoner, ibid. 10, releaſed by Mentor's means, ibid. 11. killeth Ochus, ſets up Arſes and maketh him away alſo in a ſmall time, 243. 16. then ſets up Codomannus, ibid. 17. but Darius compelleth him to drink the Poiſon he had prepar'd for him, whereof he dieth, ibid. 19.

Balaam adviſeth the people to Idolatry, 38. 13. is ſlain, ibid. 14.

Balas, (Balles, or Prompolus) a young Man of baſe condition, is ſuborned by ſeveral Princes to take upon him the name of Alexander, reporting him to be the Son of Antiochus Epiphanes, 620. 65. contendeth for the Kingdom of Syria, 621. 66. fighteth with Demetrius, who is ſlain in Battle, ibid. getteth his Kingdom and marrieth Ptolomie's Daughter, 621. 67. is aſſiſted by his Father-in-law, and ſlain, ibid. 68.

Barat-Anac in the Phœnician Language, what and why ſo called, 769. 59.

Battle at Platæa, where Mardonius was ſlain, 201. 62. at Mycale, 202, 65. at Gaugamela, 258. 60. the Battel fought at Marathon, 295. 26.

Beleſis (or Belochus) conſpireth againſt Sardanapalus, 13. 8. obtaineth Babylon, 14. 12. but how long he held it, or who ſucceeded him, is unknown, 15. 15.

Belgæ, whence deſcended, 757. 29. their Conſpiracy with other Nations, ibid. 30. they Aſſemble together, 758. 31. but retreat, ibid. 32.

Bellerophontes, his Story, 120. 2.

Berenice, the Wife of Ptolomy Euergetes, her Hair feigned to be taken up into Heaven by Conon, the Mathematician, which giveth Name to a Conſtellation, 633. 15.

Beſſus, and others, bind Darius with golden Fetters, intending to deliver him to Alexander if he overtook them, if not to kill him, and ſeize his Kingdom, 260. 71. &c. Beſſus taketh upon him the Royal Robe in Bactria, with the Name and Title of Artaxerxes, King of Perſia, 546. 2. is delivered up to Alexander, 547. 5. and ſtrangely puniſhed for his Execrable Treaſon, 548. 8.

Bible Tranſlated into Greek by the Septuagint, 628. 1.

Bibulus, Conſul, Potent at Sea, 811. 54. he dieth, ibid.

Biſhops, 903. 51. 921. 88. 932. 16. & 959. 32.

Bœotarchæ, their Deſigns fruſtrated, 323. 39.

Bœotians attempt to bring in Democracy; but are diſappointed, 319. 28. they crave Aid of Philip of Macedon, 378. 23.

Bomilcar endeavoureth to Invade the Tyranny at Carthage, but miſcarrieth, 674. 14.

Boodicia, (Bondicia, Vondica and Bunduica) the Wife of Praſutagus King of the Iceni, is whipped by the Romans and her Daughters Deflowred, 860. 29. her Reſolution and Valour in revenge of the Injuries receiv'd by her, ibid. 30. poiſoneth herſelf, ibid. 31.

Braſidas, the Spartan, ſent into Thrace, to moleſt the Athenians, 319. 28. is envied by his own Country-men, 320. 30. ſlain, together with his Adverſary, Cleon, 321. 32.

Britain, the name thereof, whence derived, 766. 55. but lately known by Camdens Arguments, ibid. 56. the contrary aſſerted, ibid. 57. his Arguments refuted, 768. 58. the manner of their fighting from their Chariots, 770. 63. the Druids in Gall had their Learning originally from hence, (777) 85.

Britains grow Tumultuous in the time of Claudius, 851. 9. the Iſland remain'd untouch'd by the Romans from the time of J. Cæſar's Expeditions, 852, 10. for Auguſtus was diverted from it, ibid. 10. Tiberius neglected it, ibid. Caius his rare Exploits and Atchievements againſt it, ibid. &c. they Rebel again, 854. 16. but are reduced, 855. 17. are up again, but ſubdued, ibid. 19. the Time, when it received the Chriſtian Faith, 924. 94. &c.

Brutus (Junius) the firſt Roman Conſul, 417. 5. putteth his Sons to death, he himſelf being preſent at the bloody Spectacle, 418. 8. he is ſlain in a Combat with Aruns, the Son of Tarquin, who died likewiſe, 419. 9.

Brutus (Marcus) one of the Conſpiracy againſt Julius Cæſar, (836.) 10. he and Caſſius take extravagant Courſes for Treaſure, (843.) 24. after a defeat by Antony he killeth himſelf with his Sword, (843.) 25.

Byzus, a petty King of Thrace, 716. 17.

C. Cadmea,

C.

CAdmea, the Citadel of Thebes, whence ſo called, 124. 3. is betrayed into the hands of the Lacedæmonians, 354. 26. recovered, 355. 29.

Cadmus the Son of Agenor, his Story, 124. 2. &c.

Cæſar. C. Julius Cæſar, he putteth Pothinus, the Eunuch to death, 645. 39. and overthroweth the Alexandrians, ibid. expoſeth himſelf to danger, and diſmiſſeth their King, ibid. 40. Aid is ſent to him, ibid. 41. he is oppoſed, but overcometh, 646. ibid. ſtormeth the Ægyptian Camp, and taketh Alexandria, ibid. 42. beginneth to grow Eminent, 744. 44. his Birth, Parentage, and Foundation of his Military Skill, is made Quæſtor, ibid. joyneth with factious Perſons, and is created Ædilis, ibid. 45. getteth by Bribery the High Prieſthood, ibid. 46. goeth Prætor into Spain, 745. ibid. He, Pompey and Craſſus, being reconciled, made the Conſpiracy call'd Tricipitina, ibid. 48. obtaineth the Conſulſhip by the Aſſiſtance of Pompey, and Bribery, 746. 1. his Acts during his Conſular Dignity, ibid. he procureth Gall to be decreed to him, for five years, by Inveigling the people, ibid. 2. marrieth his Daughter Julia to Pompey, and maketh other Proviſions for his own Intereſt, ibid. writeth the Gallick War, 747. 5. his Geography of Gall, 748. 6. is miſliked by Monetus, ibid. 7. he denieth the Helvetians a paſſage, which they deſire, 750. 12. defeateth them, 751. 14. marcheth toward Bibracte, 753. 17. giveth the Helvetians a great overthrow, ibid. 18. forceth them to yield, ibid. 19. undertaketh the Quarrel of the Galles againſt Arioviſtus, the German King, 754. 22. giveth him a notable defeat, 757. 28. as alſo the Belgæ, 759. 35. taketh the Town of the Advatici, 760. 36. defeateth the Veneti, 761. 40. a great confluence of people reſort to him, at Luca, 763. 46. overcometh the Germans, 766. 52. paſſeth the Rhine, ibid, 53. Invadeth Britain, 769, 61. returneth, 770. 63. maketh a ſecond Expedition hither, 771. 66. encountereth with the Inhabitants, 772. 70. his ſucceſs againſt them queſtion'd, 773. 3. goeth again into Gall, 774. 4. relieveth Labienus, who was, at that time, beſiged by the Galles, (776.) 80. quieteth Germany, (779.) 90. taketh Noviodunum (now Vierſon) (781.) 96. Avaricum (now Bourges) (782.) 98. fruſtrateth the Deſign of the Galles, ibid. 100. is repulſed by them, (783.) 101. beſiegeth Aleſia, (784.) 103. his prodigious Works in that Siege, ibid. 104. &c. great Errors in his preſent Copies, as to Names and Numbers, (785. 107. his wonderful Atchievements before that place (787.) 114. taketh the Town, ibid. overthroweth the Galles, (788.) 118. taketh Uxellodunum (789.) 121. whereupon Aquitain ſubmitteth to him, ibid. 122. is honourably received at his return from the Wars in Gall, (790.) 124. his Enemies, are very buſie againſt him, at Rome, ibid. 125. his account of the beginning of the War between him, and Pompey, (792.) 4. the opinion of others, ibid. 5. his Complaints, ibid. 6. which he maketh to his Soldiers, ibid. 7. his anxious Thoughts at the Rubicon, ibid. 8. taketh Ariminum, ibid. cauſeth great confuſion in Italy, ibid. 9. his demands of Pompey, (794.) 10. taketh in ſome Towns, (795.) 11. particularly Corfinium, (796.) 15. followeth Pompey to Brunduſium, ibid. 17. reſolveth for Spain, (798.) 21. goeth to Rome, ibid. 22. leaveth it, and directeth his Courſe to Gall, ibid. 23. beſiegeth Marſeilles, (800.) 26. haſteth into Spain, ibid. Action between him, and the Officers, near Ilerda, (801.) 29. extricateth himſelf out of great difficulties, and his men Rout the Maſſilians, ibid. 30. purſueth Pompey's Army, and ſpareth them againſt the opinion of his own men, (802.) 31. the Soldiers willing to ſubmit to him, are hindred by Petreius, (803.) 33. but his moderation forceth them to yield, ibid. 34. &c. diſmiſſeth them, 804. 35. for which Writers Celebrate his Generoſity, ibid. 36. he is made Dictator, (808.) 46. his Acts, ibid. 47. goeth to Brunduſium, (809.) 49. paſſeth over ſeven Legions to Pharſalus, (810.) 52. taketh in ſeveral Towns, (811.) 53. his other Forces arrive from Brunduſium, ibid. 55. he ſendeth them into the Provinces, (812.) 56. ſtrangely beſiegeth Pompey, the Father, ibid. 58. receiveth a great loſs by Pompey, (813.) 59. altereth the whole courſe of the War, and retreateth to Apollonia, (814.) 60. taketh Gomphi, in Theſſaly, ibid. 61. is lookt upon as loſt by all men, (815.) 62. his order of Battle with Pompey, ibid. 64. the manner of the Fight at Pharſalum, ibid. 65. taketh Pompey's Camp, ibid. 66. arriveth at Alexandria, (818.) 70. whether the Commentaries which go under his name were his, (819.) 72. he is raiſed high from a very low ebbe, (820.) 74. the Senate decreeth him Honours, (822.) 78. he overcometh Pharnaces, (823.) 80. is proud of his Victory, and returneth into Italy, ibid. 81. raiſeth Mony by all poſſible means, (824.) 82. his Soldiers mutiny, ibid. 83. whom he reduceth by giving them the name of Quirites, (825.) ibid. goeth into Africk, ibid. 85. is very much diſtreſſed, ibid. 86. relieved by P. Sittius, (826.) ibid. his great ſucceſs againſt Juba and Scipio, ibid. 87. he puniſheth ſome, but ſpareth more, (828.) 91. hath more Honours decreed him by the Senate, ibid. he laboureth to take off their jealouſies, ibid. 92. Triumpheth, (829.) ibid. feaſteth the people with great Magnificence at 22000. Tables, ibid. 93. maketh Laws, ibid. 94. reformeth the Calendar, and goeth into Spain, (830.) 95. engageth with the Sons of Pompey, ibid. 96. gaineth the Victory, but not without great difficulty, ibid. maketh all Spain ſubmit to him, ibid. 97. giveth great offence, at his return, ibid. Honours again conferred upon him, (831.) 98. and ſoveraign Power beſtowed on him, ibid. he maketh a great change in the Conſulſhip, (832.) 1. createth fourteen Prætors and fourty Quæſtors, ibid. 2. nine hundred Senators, and the Ædiles Treaſurers, ibid. ſixteen Prætors, ibid. 3. for which he was commended, ibid. calleth the Month Quintilis, after his Name, July, (833.) 4. imprudently receiveth many Honours, ibid. 5. incurreth Odium more, and more, (834.) 7. the cauſe of his being mortally hated, (835.) 8. the Conſpirators againſt him draw in Marcus Brutus, (836.) 10. and Decimus Brutus, draweth him into the ſnare, ibid. 11. and diverteth Antony, with a long Speech before he entreth the Senate, 837. 12. whilſt Cæſar himſelf is ſtab'd in the Senate-Houſe with twenty three Wounds, 838. 13. his Character, 839. 14. Te- ſtament, ibid. 15. maketh Octavius, Grandſon to his Siſter Julia, his Heir, ibid. 16.

Cæſo (Fabius Conſul) 444. 68. Fabius is ſent into Hetruria, ibid.

Cæſo (Quintius) the Son of L. Quintius Cincinnatus, was one of the Chief in the Commotions about new Laws, 450. 82. is called to account for his Life, ibid. flieth, and is condemned, 451. ibid.

Cain killeth Abel, 1. 3.

Caius Cæſar born, 796. 48. one of the Sons of Agrippa by Julia, adopted by Auguſtus, his Grandfather, 808. 72. and hath the Prieſthood beſtowed on him, though a Youth, 809. ibid. he reduceth the Armenians, 810. 75. dieth at Limyra, a City of Lycia, in his return to Italy, 816. 86.

Caius (Gracchus) the Brother of Tiberius, patronizeth his Law, 721. 9. getteth the Tribuneſhip, and preferreth Laws diſtaſtful to the Senate, ibid. 10. Tranſlateth the Judicial Power to the Equites, 722. 11. Attempteth other ſeditious Acts, ibid. 12, is deſtroy'd, with his Party, ibid.

Caius (Marcius,) vide Coriolanus.

Caius Emperour, vide Caligula,

Calchinia, the only Daughter of Leucippus, the Sicyonian King, on whom Neptune, or rather Meſapus begat Peratus, 77. 1.

Caleb, 41.22.

Caligula (Caius) ſucceedeth Tiberius, his Story, 848. 1. maketh Agrippa King of Philip's Country, 849. 2. baniſheth Pilate, ibid. beginneth his Reign well, though Intemperate and Cruel from his Childhood, ibid. 3. becometh a Monſter of men, and aſſumſeth divine Honours, ibid. his Vices, 849. & 850. 4, 5. is ſlain by C. Chæreas, the Captain of his Guards, 850. 6.

Calpurnius Flamma, the valiant Roman Tribune, his daring Act, 691. 4.

Calpurinus (L. Beſtia) Conſul, 724. 16. Invadeth Numidia very fiercely, and taketh in ſome Towns, but is ſtop'd by the golden Balls of Jugurtha, ibid.

Calydnus, the firſt that reigned in the Kingdom of Thebes, 123. 1. from whom the Tower of Calydnus took its name, and Calydnæan ſignifieth antient, ibid.

Callicratidas ſucceedeth Lyſander as Admiral, 340. 86. defeateth, and beſiegeth Conon in Mitylene, but is overthrown by the Athenian-Generals, ibid.

Calliſthe, an Iſland lying near Crete, 124. 3.

Calliſthenes Ariſtotle's Scholar put to death by Alexander, together with others, 549. 12.

Cambyſes, Son of Cyrus the Great ſucceedeth his Father, 179. 6. maketh War againſt Ægypt, ibid. 9. paſſeth through the ſandy Deſarts, ibid. 7. his extravagant Practices, 180. 8. his fruitleſs Expeditions, ibid. woundeth the Ægyptian God Apis in the Thigh, of which he dieth, 180. 9. murdereth his Brother and Siſter, ibid. dieth without Iſſue, 181. 4.

Camalodunum, a Colony of the Romans, in Britain, 860. 30 is deſtroy'd, ibid.

Camillus, vide Furius.

Cannæ the great overthrow of the Romans there, 705. 38.

Capitol deſigned by Tarquinius Priſcus and begun by Tarquinius Superbus 148. 41. its deſcription, ibid. finiſhed by the City, 421. 15. dedicated, 422. ibid. ſeized on by the people. 448. 77. and by a Sabine, who ſetteth the Slaves at liberty, 451. 84. but is retaken, ibid.

Capitulations made, in order to the election of a Monarch, in the Perſian Empire, 182. 4.

Capua revolteth from the Romans, 705. 39. is beſieged, 706. 43. yielded up, 707. 44.

Captains under Alexander in his lifetime, a Contention ariſeth among them after his death, 560. 2. the provinces diſtributed amongſt them, ibid. 3. & which is the occaſion of their Civil Wars, 561. 6.

Cracalla, Antoninus Baſſianus, why ſo called, 930. 10. he and Geta, the Sons of Severus are equal ſharers in the Empire, and Caracalla killeth his Brother in his Mother's Boſom, ibid. and putteth the famous Lawyer Papinian to death, becauſe he would not defend his Paricide, ibid. 11. he was ſlain as he was making water, ibid.

Caractacus the Greateſt Prince among the Britains, 855. 17. is betrayed by Cartiſmunda, Queen of the Brigantes and carried to Rome, ibid. 18. his Speech to the Emperour,, ibid. he is pardoned, 855. 19.

Carbo, Collegue in the Conſulſhip with Cinna, 732. 12. after whoſe death he continueth Conſul alone, one whole year, ibid. he and his Companion abrogate Sylla's Laws, ibid. 13.

Carnutes, who, (777) 85.

Carthage, its Original, 392. 4. variety of Opinions concerning its Building, ibid. 5. conſiſteth of three parts, 393. ibid. its form of Government, 394. 7. the Suffetes there, who, the Original of their Name, as alſo the Senate, ibid, 8. the Concio, or Aſſembly of the People, ibid. 9. their Council conſiſting of one hundred and four, 395. 10. Cenſors, Pretorſhip, ibid. Faults in the Commonwealth, good Laws and the Diſpoſition of the people, ibid. 11.

Carthaginians take Selinus, 400. 21. and Himera, ibid. 22. &c. are ſeized by a grievous Peſtilence, 404. 32. receive a great overthrow, 413. 54. and ſend to the Romans for Aid, 680. 29. 30.

Carus, Marcus Aurelius, ſucceedeth Probus in the Empire, 949. 9. ſlain by a Thunderbolt in his Tent, ibid.

Caſſander the Son of Antipater, 562. 10. made Captain General of Europe, 567. 55. dieth, 571. 6.

Caſtor & Pollux begot by Tindareus on Leda, 105. 2.

Caſſandrea why ſo called, 306. 22. the ſame with Potidæa, ibid.

Caſſius aimeth at the Soveraignty, 441. 61. &c. his Deſigns are fruſtrated, 442. 65. is Condemned, and put to death, notwithſtanding the Interceſſion of his Friends, 443. ibid.

Caſſius, one of the Conſpirators againſt Cæſar, 843. 24. killeth himſelf out of miſapprehenſion, ibid.

Cataline's Conſpiracy, 742. 41. a Patritian by degree, but of a debauch'd wicked Life, ibid. he and his Complices are ſlain, 743. 43.

Cato (Porcius) born, and whence named Cato, 699. 22. ſtandeth ſtifly for preſervation of the Oppian Law againſt Women, 710. 54. is ſent into Spain, his Province, ibid. he ever concluded his Speech in the Senate-Houſe with this ſaying, This I think, and that Carthage is to be deſtroyed, 716. 18. dieth being aged eighty five years, 717. 20.

Cato, (Marcus,) Son of Cato Salonianus, and Grand-ſon of Cenſorius, Governour of Utica, (826) 88. killeth himſelf with a Sword, (827) 29.

Cecrops firſt founded the Athenian Kingdom, 92. 1. dieth after he had reigned fifty years, 93. 5. and was ſucceeded by Cranaus, ibid.

Cecrops, the ſecond Son of Erectheus ſucceedeth his Father, 94. 6. dieth at Ægialea, after fourty years Reign, ibid.

Cenſors Created, and a Deſcription of their Office, 466. 21. the duration thereof and power, 467. 23. the effects of it, ibid. 25. Cenſors of private Men the laſt of them, 794. 44.

Cenſorſhip, the various fortune thereof, 468. 26.

Cenſus, Inſtituted by Servius Tullius, what, 145. 31.

Centuries, and Centuriata Comitia, what, 145. 31.

Cham's Portion and his four Sons, 8. 22. &c. he firſt Inhabited Ægypt after the Flood, 61. 1.

Charops, Prince of the Epirots, 591. 42.

Chemia, the ſame with Egypt, 61. 1.

Chimæra, the meaning thereof, 120. 2.

Chriſt, our Lord and Saviour born, 811. 76. great difference about aſſigning the time of his Nativity, ibid. he executeth his Miniſtry, 835. 10. the firſt Paoſſver thereof, ibid. 11. Second, 836. 13. Third, 837. 15. &c. Fourth and laſt, 840. 20. he is Crucified, 841. his Doctrine is defended to be true by Chriſtians. 842. 23. by the Heathen, 843. 26. his Aſcenſion, 846. 33.

Chriſtian Soldiers by their Prayers obtain Reign, 911. 67. an inquiry into the conditions of Chriſtians, 934. 19. the reaſon of the prejudice of the Heathens againſt them ibid. the malicious ſlanders concerning the manner of their Worſhip, ibid. 20. and the object of it, 935. 21. they are accuſed of Sedition, ibid. 22. which procured them wonderful hatred, 937. 23. the ſad Effects thereof, ibid. 24. &c. their unblameable Demeanour in their Aſſemblies, 937. 26. &c. they are good Loyal Subjects, 939. 29. and good Men, 040. 32. Eminent for Love and Unity in Affections, 941. 33. caſt Devils out of Demoniacks, and make them confeſs the Truth, ibid. 34. &c. whence they had this ſtrength againſt them, 942. 36. that they Triumphed over their Enemies, 943. 37.

Chryſis, the Prieſt of Argos, 310. 1.

Chryſorthe, Daughter of Orthopolis, on whom Apollo is thought to have begot Coronus, 77. 2.

Chthonophyle, the Daughter of Sicyon, King of Sicyonia, on whom Mercury begat Polybus, 78. 3.

Cicero (M. T.) his Commendation of the twelve Tables, 461. 9. being Conſul maketh his firſt Oration againſt Cataline, for which he is in danger of loſing his Life, 743. 42. his ſecond, third and fourth Oration, ibid. 43. ſuppreſſeth Cataline's Conſpiracy, ibid. is baniſhed by Clodius, through Envy and Malice, 747. 3. recalled, 747. 4. defendeth Deiotarus, (833.) 4. laboureth for an Amneſty after Cæſar's death, (839.) 15. is proſcribed, through the Importunity of Antony, 842. 21. his Death, Extract, and Commendation, ibid.

Cidaris (or Citaris) in Perſia, what, 212. 21.

Cimbri, who, 725. 21. the occaſion of the War with them, ibid, they are utterly deſtroy'd by Marius, ibid. 22.

Cimbrica, Cherſoneſus now Holſatia, why ſo called, 725. 21.

Cimon, the Athenian, dieth in Cyprus, 210. 13.

Cimon, Son of Miltiades offereth himſelf into Bonds, that his Father might be buried, 296. 29.

Cinna (Cornelius) Conſul recalleth Marius, 729. 4. he and his Collegue rage againſt Sylla's Party in Rome, 730. 5. is run through by his own Soldiers in his fourth Conſulſhip, 732 12.

Ciſus, ſucceedeth Temenus, whoſe Succeſſors had all the Regal power taken from them, and the Kingdom of Argos, in effect, was turn'd into a free State, 91. 37.

Claudius, Caligula's Uncle, ſucceedeth him, 851. 7. putteth Chæreas to death, ibid. 8. reſtoreth ſeveral Princes, 851. 10. ſendeth Plautius to Britain, 853. 13. cometh hither himſelf, ibid. extraordinary Expreſſions of joy at Rome, for his Conquering ſo ſmall a part of Britain, as he did, ibid. 14. he animadverteth on his Wife, Meſſalina, 854. 16. marrieth Agrippina, his Niece, ibid. is poiſoned by her, 856. 20. his Character, ibid. the eccleſiaſtical Affairs that hapned, during his Reign ibid. 21.

Claudius the ſecond, a Dalmatian by Birth, is made Emperor by the Senate, 948. 6. doth great things againſt the Goths, and is ſlain at Syrmium, ibid.

Clearchus is baniſhed Lacedæmon, 215. 27. goeth to Cyrus, ibid,

Clemens Alexandrinus, why ſo called, 933. 18. he was the Scholar of Pantenus, and Maſter of Origen, ibid.

Cleombrotus, King of Sparta, Brother to Ageſipolis, Invadeth Bœotia, 358. 36. is ſlain in the Battle at Leuctra, ibid. 38.

Cleomenes, the Lacedæmonian King, Son of Anaxandridas King of Sparta, Invadeth the Athenians to no purpoſe, 292. 17. dieth of a Phrenſie, 294. 22.

Cleomenes, Son of Leonidas, King of Sparta, killeth the Ephori, and reſtoreth the Laws of Lycurgus, 578. 11. is defeated by Antigonus Doſon, 580. 16.

Cleon, a man of great ſeverity, 315. 15. is ſent into Thrace, 320. 32. ſoon puffed up, ibid, ſlain with Braſidas his Adverſary, 321. ibid.

Cleopatra, Daughter of Ptolomy Auletes, reigneth with her Brother and Husband, Ptolomy Dionyſius, 643. 37. wageth War againſt her Brother, 646. 42. after his death is married to her ſecoud Brother, ibid. 43. hath a Son by Julius Cæſar, ibid. poiſoneth her Brother, 647. 44. cometh to Antony, in Aſia, ibid. their looſe practiſes brought Inconveniences upon them, ibid. 45. War at Rome is decreed againſt her, ibid. 46. maketh Antony engage at Actium, 648. 47. where he is overthrown, ibid. ſhe laboureth to curry favour with Octavius Cæſar, ibid. 48. betrayeth Peluſium, and cauſeth the Fleet and Horſe to revoltto him, 649. ibid. having notice of Cæſar's Intention to deceive her dieth by the biting of an Aſpe, 650. 50.

Cleopatra, Siſter to Alexander the Great, Wife to Alexander of Epirus, and after married to Perdiccas, 568. 27. is murdered by the procurement of Antigonus, ibid.

Cleopatra, Niece of Attalus, is married to Philip, upon the Repudiation of Olympias, 381. 32. is murdered by her, 382. 34.

Cleopatra, Daughter of Antiochus, the Great, is married to Ptolomy Epiphanes, 635. 20, Cleopatra, the Wife of Tryphon, after ſhe was put away from him, marrieth Antiochus, the ſecond Son of Demetrius Soter, 623. 72.

Cleopatra Daughter of Ptolomy Philometor, is married to the Counterfeit Alexander Balas, 621. 67.

Cleopatra, the ſecond Daughter of Philometor, is married to her Uncle Phyſcon, is kill'd by her Son Alexander, 641. 30.

Clodius made Tribune, 746. 3. his malice to Cicero, ibid. baniſheth him, 747. ibid. ſendeth Cato to ſpoil the King of Cyprus

moſt

moſt unjuſtly, ibid. 4. is kill'd by Milo, (780.) 92.

Clyſthenes, changeth the Names of the Tribes in Athens, 291. 14. reſtoreth Solon's Laws, 294. 22.

Cocalus, after the Cyclopes were extinct, made himſelf King of the Iſland of Sicily, 388. 6.

Codrus, the laſt King of Athens, willingly offered himſelf to death for the ſafety of his people, 98. 18.

Commodus, the Son of Antoninus Philoſophus, ſucceedeth him, 919. 83. his difficulties, ibid. Carriage, 920. 85. is poiſoned by Martia, his Concubine, and ſtrangled by Narciſſus, ibid. 86.

Conon, the Athenian, made Admiral to Artaxerxes, 225. 57. obtaineth a Victory againſt the Lacedæmonians, 329. 69.

Conſpirators conſult about a ſettlement after the Magi, in the Perſian Empire, ſlain, 182. 3.

Conſtantine, the Great, the Son of Helena, a Britiſh woman, is kept Hoſtage at Rome, but maketh an eſcape to his Father, in Britain, 951. 13. is ſaluted Emperor here, ibid. moveth from Gall againſt the Uſurper, Maxentius, 952. 17. and overthroweth him, 953. 18. worſteth Licinius, 954. 20. and ſo they agree, ibid. 21.

Conſtantine viſiteth ſeveral Countries, 955. 22. defeateth the Sarmatæ, ibid. 23. taketh care for the reformation of Abuſes, 956. 24: is very favourable to Phyſicians and Profeſſors, ibid. 25. he, and Licinius prepare again for War, and he obtaineth a great Victory over him, 957. 27. Beſiegeth him in Byzantium, ibid. 28. overthroweth him at Chalcedon, 958. 29. entertaineth Hormiſda very honourably, ibid. 30. purſueth Licinius to Nicomedia, and beſiegeth him there, 959. 31. who ſubmits, ibid. is ſole Monarch of the Romans, his two Sons Conſtans and Conſtantius being made Conſuls, ibid.

Conſtantius Chlorus his Father, Adopted by his in-law, 950. 10. he and his Brother Galerius part the Empire, 951. 13.

Conſulares of Provinces, when they were introduced, 897. 3.

Conſuls, whence ſo called, 451. 1. their power, ibid. 2. certain Rites concerning them, 416. 3. the Age capable of the Dignity, 417. 4. its duration, ibid. the firſt that were created, who, ibid. 5. their Acts, ibid.

Corax, King of Sicyonia, Reigneth thirty years, 77. 2. dieth without Iſſue, ibid.

Corbulo proſpereth in the Eaſt, 858. 26. and in Armenia, 859. 28.

Corcyra, a lamentable Sedition there, 315. 17. which endeth at laſt, 317. 23.

Corcyræans are Victorious at Sea in the Promontory of Actium, 305. 19. and enter into Society with others. ibid, 20.

Corinth, its Situation and Original Name, 120. 1. built by Siſyphus, ibid. who gave it the name of Corinth is uncertain, but Aletes named it Corinth of Jupiter, 121. 3. their Colonies, ibid. 4. the beginning of hatred between that City and Athens, 302. 9. Commotions there, 350. 16.

Corinthians are overthrown in a Naval Battle with the Corcyræans, 305. 21. exaſperated by them into a ſecond Sea Fight, 306. 22.

Coriolanus (Caius Marcius) why ſo named, 435. 46. his Advice to Rome, upon the bringing Corn out of Sicily, 437. 57. he putteth all into a flame, ibid, is ſeized on by the Ædiles, and reſcued by the Patricians, ibid. 52. &c. charged with the Affectation of Tyranny, 438. 53. he anſwereth, and is diſcharged with Acclamations, ibid. 54. is charged again by Decius the Tribune, and thereupon immediately condemned to perpetual Exile, ibid. he ſtirreth up the Volſci againſt Rome, 439. 55. Invadeth its Territories, ibid. 56. marcheth toward Rome, 440. 57. &c. is prevailed with by his Mother to Retreat, ibid. 58. and ſlain by Tullus and his Complices, 441. 59.

Cornelius (Gallus) his Story, and violent death by his own hands, 791. 37.

Coronus, a Sicyonian King, 77. 2.

Councils, 921. 89.

Cranaus ſucceedeth Cecrops for want of Iſſue, 93. 5. but is thruſt out, after ſeven years Reign, by Amphyction, 94. 5.

Craſſus, Marcus Licinius, defeateth Spartacus, 738. 29. taketh the Town of Sontiates, 762. 42. giveth the Galles a great overthrow, ibid. 43. he and Pompey obtain the Conſulſhip by force, 763. 46. his Sacrilege and Puniſhment, being ſlain after he had Rifled the Temple of Jeruſalem, 764. 48. & vide 660. 19. he was ſo opulent, that he would have none ſo accounted, but he that could by his own Revenues maintain an Army, ibid. 49.

Creon, the Brother of Jocaſta, ſeized on the Kingdom of Thebes, 125. 8. but Oedipus explaining the Riddle of Sphinx, he held it no longer, ibid.

Cretians their Law-Giver, 95. 9. Form of Government, ibid. 10. &c.

Criaſus, King of Argos, 80. 5. Reigneth fifty four years, ibid.

Crœſus, King of Lydia, ſucceedeth his Father Halyattes, 22. 35. Invadeth Cappadocia, 23. 37. Retreateth to Sardis, but is overthrown and Beſieged, ibid. 38. Condemned to dye, being taken there, 24. 39. but ſaved for calling out of Solon, ibid.

Crotopus, King of Argos, 80. 7. Ruled twenty one years, ibid.

Cryptia, why ſo called, and what, 111. 19.

Curio laboureth hard for Cæſar, being bribed in the difference between him and Pompey, (792.) 3. putteth Varus his Army to the Rout, (807.) 42. but is after defeated and ſlain, 808. 45.

Curule Chair, what it was, 474. 41.

Cuſhan oppreſſeth the Iſraelites, 41. 22.

Cyaxares ſucceedeth Phraortes in the Aſſyrian Kingdom, 17. 21. is forced to raiſe the Siege of Nineveh by the Scythians, ibid, 22. maketh them Drunk, ſlaughtereth them, and ſo recovereth his Dominions, ibid.

Cynortas, the ſucceſſor of his Brother Argalus in Lacedæmonia, 105. 2.

Cyrus revolteth and is recovered, 187. 18.

Cypſelus, why ſo called, 122. 5. his Story, ibid. he enjoyeth the Principality of Corinth and Corcyra thirty years, and then dieth, ibid. 6.

Cyrus, the Son of Cambyſes, his Birth and Fortune, 20. 29. &c. overthroweth his Grandfather Aſtyages, ibid. 31. is provoked by Crœſus, King of Lydia, 21. 32. he taketh Sardis, 23. 29.

ſubdueth, ſubdueth the Ionians, 24. 41. Aſſyrians and Babylonians, 25. 42. abateth his anger againſt Crœſus, 26. 48. and giveth him his liberty, and the City Barene near Ecbatane, ibid. what Beroſus and Abydenus wrote of him, 27. 49. he obtaineth the Empire of the Eaſt, 177. 1. his end is variouſly reported, 178. 3, &c. his Iſſue, 179. 4. leaveth Cambyſes his Kingdom, 179. 5.

Cyrus the Son of Darius Nothus, attempteth his Brothers Death, 214. 25. is pardoned for it, 215, 26. bnt practiſeth new matters, ibid. Marcheth againſt his Brother, 216. 30. &c. is worſhipped as King, 219. 39. and ſlain at Cunaxa in a Battle fought with his Brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, ibid. 40.

D.

DÆdalus, an Athenian of the Family of the Erechthidæ, a Famous Artiſt in all manner of Graven and Carved Works, 388. 6. his Story, Ibid.

Damaſichthon, the Son of Opheltas, choſen King of Thebes in the room of Auteſion. 127. 12.

Danae the Mother of Perſeus, 81. 9.

Danaus King of the Argives, 80. 8. from whom thoſe who formerly had the name of Pelaſgiotæ, were called Danai, 81. 9. Buildeth the Caſtle, Reigneth 50 years, and dieth, Ibid.

Daniel the Prophet, 19. 27. 28. the beginning of his 70 Weeks, 209. 11.

Dardanus ſucceedeth Teucer in his Klngdom, 87. 26. he changeth the Name of his Subjects from Teucri to Dardani. Ibid.

Darius Medus, who, 19, 28. &c.

Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes, obtaineth the Perſian Kingdom, 183. 5. divideth the Empire into 20 Provinces, 184. 9. putteth Intaphernes to death, Ibid. recovereth Babylon after its Rebellion, Ibid. 10. goeth againſt the Scythians, 185. 11. his Retreat, Ibid. 13. ſendeth Forces into Greece, 189. 25. who take Eretria, 190. Ibid. but are overthrown at Marathon, Ibid. 26. he declareth his Succeſſor, and dieth. Ibid. 27.

Darius Nothus (or Ochus) the Son of Artaxerxes Longimanus, Reigneth in Perſia, 213. 21. his Children, Ibid. ſendeth for his Son Cyrus, upon his miſdemeanours, 214. 24. Dyeth, after he had Reigned nineteen years. Ibid. 25.

Darius, the Son of Artaxerxes Mnemon, made King, 237. 97. plotteth againſt his Father, and is put to death for his Treaſon, Ibid.

Darius Codomannus made King of Perſia by Bagoas, 243. 17. ſendeth Sanballat into Samaria, 243. 18. eſpouſeth a Quarrel with Philip, King of Macedon, Ibid. 19. his Lieutenants revolt to Alexander; 249. 37. ſendeth to him, deſiring to ranſome his Wifes Mother, &c. Ibid. is twice overthrown by him at Iſſus, 244. 35. and Gaugamela, where he flieth, 257. 60. is murdered by Beſſus and others, 261. 73.

David anointed King, 45. 36. his Adultery and Murder puniſhed, 46. 39. he numbereth the People, 47. 40. dieth, and eſtabliſheth Solomon in his Throne, Ibid.

Deacons, the firſt ſeaven that mere made, 847. 85.

Deborah and Baruch deliver the Iſraelites, 41. 24.

Decemviri at Rome choſen, 457. 96. this was the ſecond change in the Government, 458. 1. their Acts for the firſt year, Ibid. 2. &c. they add two Tables of Laws to the Ten, 459. 7. their Power, 461. 10. they aſſemble the Senate, Ibid. make uſe of them to their own advantage, 402. 12. lead an Army againſt the Sabines and Æqui, Ibid. 13.

Decius (Mus) the Conſul, devoteth himſelf, and is ſlain, Ibid.

Decius (Mus) his Son doth alſo devote himſelf to the Dii Manes, 683. 6.

Decius (Trajanus) made Emperour, born in Pannonia, 147. 3. aſſumeth his Son into participation with him, Ibid. perſecuteth the Chriſtians, overthroweth the Goths, is betrayed by Gallus Hoſtilianus, and ſwallow'd up in a Bog, his Body never found, Ibid.

Dejoces, King of the Medes, ruleth fifty three years with great ſeverity, 15. 14. and leaveth the Kingdom to Phraortes his Son, Ibid.

Deluge, the univerſal one, 2. 5.

Demaratus, his Birth, 293. 20. is depoſed, Ibid. 21.

Demetrius, the Son of Antigonus, ſirnamed Poliorcetes, 567. 23. is overthrown by Ptolomy, 567. 23. his Attempts againſt Seleucus, Ibid. 25. his Victories againſt Ptolomy, 568. 27. getteth Macedonia, and aſpireth, 571. 9. but loſeth all, 572. 11. forced to yield to Seleucus, 573. 13. dieth, after three years reſtraint. Ibid.

Demetrius, the Son of Antigonus Gonatas recovereth his Fathers Kingdom, 576. 6. and ſucceedeth him, Ibid. 7.

Demetrius Soter, Son of Seleucus Philopator, is an Hoſtage at Rome, 599. 46. deſireth to be reſtored by the Romans to his Fathers Kingdom, but is denied, 614. 51. eſcapeth from Rome into Syria, 616. 57. getteth the Kingdom and killeth Seleucus, 617. 58. courteth the Roman Commiſſioners that he may be owned as King, Ibid. ſendeth Bachides, his truſty Friend, againſt the Jews, Ibid. 59. forbiddeth the Romans to injure the Jews, 619. 63. is ſlain in Battel with Alexander Balas, 621. 67.

Demetrius, the Son of Demetrius Soter, diſpoſſeſſeth the counterfeit Balas, 621. 67. obtaineth, according to his Right, his Fathers Kingdom, 622. 69. is taken by the Parthians, 623. 72. carried about as a laughing ſtock, and impriſoned, Ibid. recovereth all the Kingdom of Syria, 625. 76. is outed of his Kingdom, Ibid. 77. ſlain by the procurement of his Wife Cleopatra, or Zabinas, Ibid.

Demetrius Eucærus, Son of Antiochus Gryphus, 627. 81.

Democraty impracticable in any one, or more large Nations, 777. 7.

Demophon, the Son of Thoas, ſucceedeth him in the Kingdom of Corinth, 121. 3.

Demophoon, the Son of Theſeus, obtaineth the Kingdom of Athens, 98. 17. Reigneth about 34 years, Ibid.

Demophoon, the Prieſt of Alexander, 553. 23. prognoſticateth his great danger, which fell out accordingly, Ibid.

Demoſthenes, the Athenian, hath the command of ſome Ships, 316. 20. is joyned in Com- miſſion with Nicias, 329. 56.

Dercyllidas, ſirnamed Siſyphus, and why, 224. 54. ſucceedeth Thimbro, Ibid. maketh an agreement with Tiſſaphernes, 226. 58.

Deucalion, the Son of Prometheus, 93. 3. the great Deluge in Greece, which happened in his time, Ibid. his Iſſue, 93. 4.

Dictator, who, why ſo called, 427. 17. his various Names, and Power, Ibid. the Bounds of his Office, and Appeals from him, Ibid. 28. &c. the time of the first Dictatorſhip, 428. 30. who was the Perſon variouſly diſcourſed, Ibid. Plebeian Dictator created, which breedeth diſcontent, 477. 46. Dictators, two at the ſame time, 705. 39.

Dido, her Story, 393. 6.

Dimas, together with his Brother Idæus ſucceed Atlas, 87. 26.

Dinah raviſhed, 31. 12

Diocles modelleth anew the ſtate of Syracuſe, 398. 18.

Diocleſian, the Governour of Carus his Family, ſucceedeth his Maſter in the Empire, 950. 9. his Acts, Ibid. 10. createth Maximianus Auguſtus, Ibid. layeth down the Purple in Nicomedia, 11. is ſtill perplexed with War, 951. 12. his numerous Reſcripts, Ibid. refuſeth to reſume the Purple, Ibid. 14.

Dion, the Syracuſian, Son of Hipparinus Invadeth Sicily, 408. 42. expelleth Dionyſius, Ibid. 43. Redeemeth Syracuſe, 409. 44. is envied, Ibid. 45. circumvented by Callicrates, and ſlain, Ibid.

Dion Caſſius, his odd Story of Auguſtus, 804. 64.

Dionyſius inſlaveth Syracuſe, 399. 19. which is done by degrees, Ibid. 20. his Tricks to make himſelf abſolute, 401. 24. a Conſpiracy againſt him is diſappointed, 402. 27, he maketh peace with the Carthaginians, Ibid. another Deſign againſt him fruſtrated, 403. 28. his Wars, Ibid. 29. &c. he ſetteth upon Rhegium ſuddenly, but is repulſed, 405. 34. ſeizeth on Tauromenium, and baniſheth the greateſt part of the Sicilians from thence, Ibid. his ſecond Expedition againſt Rhegium, Ibid. 35. his third, 406. 36. in which he taketh it, Ibid. his Studies, Ibid. 37. he overthroweth the Carthaginians, 407. 38. and is overthrown by them, Ibid. he dieth of a Surfeit at a Feaſt, tranſported with Joy, Ibid. 39. his Wives and Iſſue. Ibid.

Dionyſius the younger ſucceedeth him, Ibid. his diſpoſition, 407. 40. is expell'd by Dion, 408. 43. recovereth Syracuſe, 410. 46. is expell'd a ſecond time to Corinth, 412. 51. where he lived in great contempt and penury. Ibid.

Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, the excellency of his Hiſtory, 466. 21.

Dioſcuri, Caſtor and Pollux ſo called, and why, 105. 2.

Dolabella, Son in Law to Cicero, is beſieged by Caſſius, (841.) 20. cauſeth his Page to take off his Head, Ibid.

Domitian, Son of Veſpaſian, why ſo called, 877. 28. ſucceedeth Titus, and diſſembleth his Vices in the beginning of his Reign, Ibid. his Story and Cruelty, 878. 30. perſecuteth the Chriſtians, and is ſlain by his own Servants, Ibid. the Golden Times after him. 880. 1.

Dorydas and Hianthidas, the Sons of Propodas, Reign together in Corinth, 121. 3. but the Kingdom is ſubdued by Aletes, Ibid.

Doryſſus ſucceedeth his Father Labotas in Lacedæmonia, 106. 4.

Draco, the Athenian Law-giver, 99. 2.

Druids among the Galles, (777.) 84. what Learning they taught, (778.) 85.

Druſus the Tribune laboureth to reconcile the Fathers and Equites, 726. 24. but thereby enlargeth the Breach, Ibid. is ſtabbed, 727. Ib.

Druſus, the Son of Livia, Wife to Auguſtus, 792. 40. he and his Brother Tiberius prove ſucceſsful againſt the Rhætians, 800. 56. their farther ſucceſs, 803. 64. Druſus waſteth ſeveral of the Enemies Countries, and dieth, 804. 64. his Death is variouſly reported, Ibid.

Druſus, the Son of Tiberius, 833. 7.

Dryuſa, vide Sauus.

Dynaſties of the Ægyptian Kings, 62. 5.

E.

EArth, the Diviſion of it after the Confuſion of Tongues, 5. 12. Earth and Water demanded of Amyntas King of Macedon, 185. 13. the meaning thereof, ibid. Earth and Water demanded of the Græcians, 189. 24.

Earthquake, a very dreadful one, 883. 8.

Echeſtratus ſucceedeth Agis in the Kingdom of Lacedæmon, 106. 4.

Eclipſe of the Sun on the third of Auguſt, according to the Julian Account, 312. 8. another on the 21ſt of March, 310. 24. one of the Moon April 25. 340. 86. another of the Sun, which happened on the 24th of Auguſt, 349. 15. the Eclipſe of the Sun at the Death of our Saviour miraculous, and Recorded by Heathens to be ſo, 841. 21.

Ectenæ, who they are, 123. 1. they are conſumed by Peſtilence, and ſucceeded by the Hyantes and Æonæ, Ibid.

Edictum perpetuum compoſed in Adrian's time, 897. 38. Commentators on it. Ibid.

Edom, 31. 14.

Eglon oppreſſeth the Iſraelites, 41. 23.

Ehud delivereth them, Ibid.

Eione, a Town in Thrace, ſituate on the River Strymon, taken by the Athenians, and diſfranchiſed, 300. 6.

Electus, Chamberlain to Commodus the Emperor, 920. 86.

Eleans and Arcadians at variance, 364. 53. they fall on the Picæans, Ibid.

Elephants, the manner of Fighting with them, 601. 19.

Eli, the High-Prieſt, 44. 31.

Epaminondas created General, 358. 37. overthroweth Cleombrotus in the Battle of Leuctra, Ibid. 38. Invadeth Laconia, 360. 44. upon his return is queſtion'd for his Life, 361. 46. Invadeth Peloponneſus, 362. 47. perſwadeth the Thebans to mind Sea Affairs, 364. 54. again invadeth Peloponneſus, 365. 56. ſetteth on Sparta, but returneth to Mantinea, 365. 57. his Horſe are routed, Ibid. his Caſe, as to his Return or Stay, 366. Ibid. he is mortally wounded in the Battle fought at Mantinea, Ibid. 59. expireth, 367. 60. his Character, Ibid.

Ephori, their firſt bringing into Sparta, 113. 24. &c. their Power, 114. 26.

Epicaſte, vide Creon.

Epidamnus, a Colony of the Corcyræans, 304. 18. the Commotions raiſed there, Ibid. they procure a Falling out betwixt the Corcyræans and Corinthians their Founders, Ibid. 19.

Epigoni, who, 126. 10. they make an Expedition againſt the Kingdom of Thebes to revenge their Fathers Death, Ibid. take the City of Thebes, 127. 11. and ſlew or drove away Laodamus, Ibid.

Epopeus, a Theſſalian, ſeizeth on the Sicyonian Kingdom, after the Death of Corax, 77. 2. dieth of the Wounds he received in a Battle with the Thebans, 77. 2.

Equites, how and when that Order came up, 721. 10.

Erichtheus, Son of Pandion, Reigneth 50 years 94. 6. loſeth his Life, Ibid.

Erichthonius, the Succeſſor of Dardanus in his Kingdom, 87. 26.

Erichthonius, the Son of Vulcan and the Earth: Expelleth Amphyction, and Reigneth at Athens 50 years, 94. 6.

Eteocles and Polynices, the Sons of Oedipus, agree to Reign together by turns, 126. 9. but Eteocles having the firſt Courſe, refuſeth to yield up his Power, Ibid. but at laſt they agreed to decide the Quarrel by ſingle Combate, ſo they both loſt their Lives, Ibid. 10.

Eubœa revolteth from the Athenians, 303. 13.

Eudemus ſucceedeth Agelas in Corinth, 121. 3.

Eumenes of Cardia, after Alexanders Death hath the Government of Cappadocia and other places aſſigned him, 561. 4. obtaineth the better in Aſia, ibid. 7. is declared an Enemy, ib. 8. worſted through treachery, 562. 9. Beſieged in Nora, ibid. 10. is enlarged upon the death of Antipater, ibid. 11. Marcheth into the upper Provinces, 563. 13. Fighteth with Antigonus, 564. 16. gets the better of him, ibid. 18. is betray'd and kill'd, 565. ibid.

Evilmerodoch ſucceedeth Nebuchadnezar, his Father, 19, 27. is ſlain, being circumvented by Nerigliſſor, ibid.

Eunomus ſucceedeth Prytanis in Lacedæmon, 106. 5.

Euphrates, ſwelling with rain, breaks down the walls of the City of Nineveh, 14. 11.

Europs, King of Sicyonia, reigneth 45 years, 77. 1.

Eurydice, Wife to King Arideus, her Temper and Actions, 561. 8. &c.

Eurytion (otherwiſe Eurypon and Euryphon) gave the name of Eurytionidæ to the Kings of that Family, 106. 4.

Euryſthenes reigneth at Mycenæ three and forty years, 86, 24. and is ſlain, ibid.

Exiles readmitted rail againſt their Adverſaries, contrary to their Oath, 319. 27.

F.

FAbii war againſt the Veientes, and are ſlain by them, 445. 70. the Vanity of that Tradition, that only one Boy remained of that Family, but what loſt their lives in the Expedition, 445, 71. &c.

Fabius Maximus made Vice-Dictator, by delaying breaketh Annibals ſucceſs, 704. 37.

Faunus, the Son of Picus, his Reigning in Latium is a meer Fable, 128. 2.

Fauſtina, the Wife of Antoninus Philoſophus, 905. 57. dieth, 912. 69. her Honours and Temple after her death, ibid.

Fauſtinianæ, a new Company of Girles conſtituted in honor of Fauſtina, ibid.

Fauſtinopolis, the Village where ſhe died, ſo called by her Husband, and made a Colony, ibid.

Felix, ſent Governor into Samaria, 854. 16. his power extended, playeth the Tyrant, and marrieth ſeveral great Ladies, ibid. Outed of his Office, 858, 26. Accuſed at Rome by the Jews that inhabited Cæſarea, but is pardoned by Nero through the Interceſſion of his Brother Pallas, ibid.

Feſcennine Verſes, what, 699. 22.

Feſtus (Porcius) ſucceedeth Felix in his Government of Judæa, ibid.

Flaminus, (T. Quintius) the Conſul beateth Philip the Nephew of Antigonus, 590. 42. taketh in ſeveral places in Italy, ibid. proſpereth againſt Philip in Macedonia, 710. 53. Overthroweth at Cynoſcephale, and concludeth a Peace with him at his requeſt, ibid.

Flaminius the Tribune his ſeditious Attempts, 698. 25. is the occaſion of the War called Bellum Gallicum Ciſalpinum, 700. 26.

Florianus, the Brother of Tacitus the Emperor, aimeth at the Empire, but is cut off by Probus near Tarſus, 949. 8.

Florus, Procurator of Judæa, his Tyranny proveth the occaſion of the Rebellion of the Jews, 863. 38. upon which enſued a very great Slaughter, 864. 39. his error concerning the ſeparation of the Commons of Rome, 684. 8. as alſo about the place, where Vercingetorix came to ſubmit himſelf to Cæſar, 787. 115.

Furius Camillus made Tribunus Militum, and afterward Dictator, 471. 32. ſurpriſeth Veii, and incurreth the diſpleaſure of the Multitude, ibid. 33, voluntarily exileth himſelf, 472. 34. after he had lived ſome time at Ardea an Exile, is again pronounced Dictator, ibid. 37. he overthroweth the Galls, and reſcueth Rome, 473. 37. defeateth them at the River Aniene, 474. 40. Dieth of the Plague, 476. 45.

G.

GAbinius, the Preſident of Syria, leaveth that Country to the tuition of his Son, a Child, 643. 36. reduceth Ptolomy Auletes into Ægypt, and for that and his Bribery is fined, ibid.

Galatia hath a Roman Governour, 792. 39.

Galba the Conſul proſpereth againſt Philip in Macedonia, 709. 52. his Adventures, 760. 37.

Galba conſpireth againſt Nero, 865. 41. obtaineth the Empire, 866. 1. is murdered by his Soldiers, 867. ibid.

Galenor, King of the Argives; a conteſt happeneth betwixt him and Danaus the Ægyptian, for the Kingdom of Argos, is decided by the People in favour of Danaus 80. 7.

Galerius Emperor, vide Maximinus.

Gallienus, the Son of Valerianus, made Emperor by the Senate, is given to luxury and ſtupidity, neglecteth the publick affairs, ſo that the Soldiers create Emperors every where, 948. 6. he is at length ſlain in contempt, ibid.

Galls beſiege Clutium, 472. 35. defeat the Romans mans at Allia, ibid. 36. come to Rome, and take it, ibid. are overthrown by the Romans, beg a Peace, which is obſtructed by the Conſuls (777) 84. Equites among them, who (778) 86. their Religion, ibid. 87. Colonies of them ſent into Germany (779.) 89. they rebel, (780) 92. revolt again, (781) 94. waſte their own Country, ibid. 97. thrir Generals, (786) 110. are repulſed, ibid. raiſe commotions again. (787) 116. are defeated, (788) 118. but at laſt they ſubmit, ibid.

Gallus (Ceſtius) marcheth into Judæa with an Army, and beſiegeth Jeruſalem, 864. 40. raiſeth the Siege, through impatience, loſeth many Men, and departeth for Antipatris, ibid.

Gallus (Vibius Hoſtilianus) Governour of the lower Mœſia, ſucceedeth Decius the Emperor, is very malicious againſt the Chriſtians, fighteth againſt Æmilianus, Commander of the Legions in Pannonia, 947. 4. there both he and his Son Voluſian are ſlain, ibid.

Games Secular and Tarentine, what, 698. 18. the Original of the Tarentine, ibid. the Secular and they are confounded, ibid.

Ganymedes, the Son of Tros, ſtoln away by Tantalus, the King of Phrygia, for his Beauty, wheence aroſe a War, 87. 26.

Gaus, the Perſian Admiral, marrieth the Daughter of Teribazus, and conſpireth againſt Artaxerxes, 232. 79. is ſlain, 233. 81.

Gaza, a City in Paleſtine, two Miles and a half diſtant from the Sea, of very difficult Acceſs, 252. 47.

Gedaliah, a Prince of the Blood, ſlain by Iſmael, 56. 25.

Gelon of Syracuſe, 391. 1. his Acts and Power, 392. 2. ſucceſs againſt the Carthaginians, ibid. and vide 397. 14.

Germanicus, the Son of Druſus, adopted, and envied by Tiberius, 832. 4. proſpereth in Germany, ibid. he, under pretence of quieting the Eaſt, expoſeth himſelf to Treachery, 835. 5. the following year maketh a Voyage into Ægypt, thence returning into Syria, is ſhamefully affronted by Piſo, ibid. 6. dieth of a lingering Diſeaſe at Antioch, ibid. his Iſſue, ibid.

Germans paſs over the Rhine, (765.) 51. are overthrown by Cæſar, (766.) 52. their Cuſtoms, (778.) 88.

Glaucus, the eldeſt Son of Siſyphus by Meropa, who firſt celebrated Games in the Iſthmus, 120. 1.

Gomer and his three Sons, 7. 18.

Gordianus, the Proconſul, is compelled to take upon him the Purple, joyfully owned; but being worſted by Capellianus, Governour of Mauritania, hangeth himſelf, 945. 43.

Gordianus, Grand-ſon to Gordianus the Emperor, made Cæſar, 945. 44. and Emperour, who maketh War againſt the Perſians, and is by his Soldiers, ibid.

Gorgias, Governour of the Parts about Judæa, fomenteth a continual War with the Jews, 614. 52.

Government Popular reſtored to the Athenians by the perſwaſion of Thraſybulus, 345. 5. its inſufferable inconveniences, (777.) 6. Government Antimonarchial, the Tumults and Diſorders ariſing from thence, (779.) 11. many Changes of Government in 134 years, (780.) ib.

Grecians make a new Election of Captains, Xenophon being one of them, 220. 44. come to Trapezond, 221. 47. return home, 222. 49.

Greece, the ancienter Name of the Country, 75. 1. a general deſcription of it, ibid. its particular ancient Kingdoms, 76. 2.

Greeks, or Γραικοὶ, whence ſo called, 75. 1. whence named Hellenes, ibid. the moſt ancient lived preying upon one another, 76. 2. maintain'd themſelves by Tillage and Depredations in the Trojan War, ibid. 3. the Corinthians firſt eminent at Sea, then others, ibid. 4. had no War by Land to increaſe their Dominions, 77. 4. no written Laws, ibid. the Names of their chief Warriers, 88. 28. they return from Troy, 89. 32. their Preparations for Defence againſt Xerxes, 193. 35. have the better in Battel with Artaxerxes, 219. 41. joyn with Ariæus, and retreat, 220. 42. are purſued by Artaxerxes, but at laſt diſmiſt by him, ibid. 43.

Gyges, King of Lydia, his Story, 21. 33. &c.

H.

HÆmonia, ſince Theſſaly, 127. 1.

Hammon, the ſame with Ham or Cham, 4. 9.

Hanno ſlain in Sardinia, 691. 4.

Hanno, another of that Name, ſent to make up the Breach among the Carthaginian Mercenaries, enlargeth it, 694. 9.

Harmodius, vide Hipparchus.

Harmonia, or Hermione, the Daughter of Mars and Venus, and Wife of Cadmus, 124. 3. whence ſo called, ibid. 5.

Harmonia, a certain Minſtrel, ibid.

Haſidæans, a Sect among the Jews, their Original, and who they were, 652. 3.

Hector ſlain, 89. 30.

Helena raviſhed, 88. 27. her Parentage and Story, 105. 2.

Heliogabalus (Antoninus) ſucceedeth Macrinus the Roman Emperor, his vicious Life, 944. 40. adopteth Alexianus (now Alexander,) his Couſin-German, ibid. 41. he and his Mother are both ſlain by the Soldiers, their Bodies diſgracefully tumbled about the Streets, and then caſt into the River Tiber, ibid.

Hellen, the Son of Deucalion, who Reigned in Theſſaly, 75. 1. the time when, ibid.

Helos, a Town built by Helius, the youngeſt Son of Perſeus, 106. 4.

Helotæ, the Inhabitants thereof, 106. 4. are made Slaves, ibid.

Helvius Pertinax, an old Soldier, though of mean Birth, made Emperor by the Senate, 920. 87. reſtraineth Promoters, taketh away divers Tolls and Gabels, and reſtraineth the Rapines of Soldiers, who therefore ſet upon him, and kill him, 921. ibid.

Hephæſtion, Alexanders Minion, 249. 38. dieth at Ecbatane in Media of a Feaver, contracted by high drinking, 557. 36.

Heraclidæ, the Poſterity of Hercules, their Return, 91. 35. their Deſcent, 106. 3.

Hercules, the Son of Amphytrio and Alcmena, born, 82. 12. how many Perſons there have been of that Name, ibid. 13. his Story, 83. 15. he inſtituteth the Olympick Games, 84. 18. his twelve Labours, ibid. 19. other Acts done done by him, 85. 21. &c. ſubdueth ſeveral Cities in Greece, where he Reigned, ibid. 22. his End, 86. ibid. what happened to his Children after his death, ibid. 23.

Herdonius, a Sabine, ſeizeth on the Capitol at Rome; 451, 84.

Hereticks, ſeveral ſorts of them, 879. 32. 903. 52, & 96. &c.

Hermæ at Athens, what, 328. 53. they are in one night mangled and abuſed, which is look'd upon as an ill Omen, ibid.

Hermes, or Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, 72. 34.

Herod, the Son of Antipater, Governour of Galilee, his notable forwardneſs, 661. 21. is ſummoned to Jeruſalem for killing one Ezechias a Thief, ibid. 22. appeareth with a Guard, and had done miſchief, had not his Father and Brother diverted him, ibid. revengeth his Fathers Death, 662. 24. falleth ſick, 663. 25. his Acts after his Recovery, ibid. he and his Brother are promoted by the ſtirs in Judæa, ibid. 26. Beſieged at Jeruſalem, getteth out of the Place, 664. 28. goeth to Petra in Arabia for Aid, ibid. 29. to Rome, and is there declared King of Judæa, 665. 31. Beſiegeth Jeruſalem, 666. 32. taketh Jericho ibid. goeth to Antony, and being recruited by him, beſiegeth it afreſh, 667. 34. taketh it, and Antigonus there alſo, who was beheaded by Antony, ibid. 35. is Procurator of Syria, 811. 76. deluded by the Wiſe Men, ſeeketh to deſtroy our Saviour, as he did the young Infants in and about Bethlehem, 811. 76. putteth to death forty five of Antigonus his Friends, after he had poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, &c. ibid. 77. is reconcil'd to Cæſar, 812. ibid. killeth his dear Wife Mariamne, ibid. repaireth the Temple of Jeruſalem, 812. 78. accuſeth his two Sons to Cæſar, ibid. 79. his Affairs decline after his rifling Davids Sepulchre, 813. ibid. putteth his Sons to death, ibid. 80. a grievous Conſpiracy againſt him, ibid. 81. he ſickeneth 814. ibid. his ſtrange Diſeaſe, ibid. 82. murdereth his Son Antipater, and dieth, ibid. his Teſtament is renewed, ibid. 83.

Herod Antipas, what part he had of his Fathers Kingdom, 815. 83. is baniſhed by Cajus to Lyons, 849. 2.

Herod Philip, what ſhare he had allotted him in his Fathers Dominions by Cæſar, 815. 83.

Herod Agrippa murdereth James the Brother of John, 851. 8. and ſhutteth up Peter in Priſon, who was delivered by an Angel, ibid.

Herodias, Wife firſt to Herodes Philippus, and then to Herodes Antipas, 849. 2.

Hezekiah ſucceedeth Ahaz, 52. 12. Reigneth 29. years, and dieth, 53. 14.

Hiero, the Son of Hierocles, created chief Magiſtrate by the Syracuſians, 679. 27.

Hieron of Syracuſe, Brother of Gelon, ſucceedeth him, 397. 14. re-buildeth Catana, and changeth its Name to Ætna, his diſpoſition and Death, ibid.

Hipparchus is ſlain by Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, 290. 10.

Hippocrates, the Famous Phyſitian, his Deſcent and Eminency, 368. 63. his Oath, ibid. 65. &c.

Hiſtiæus, buildeth a City of his own in Thrace, 186. 14. ſendeth a Meſſage to Ariſtagoras, Governour of Miletus, ibid. 15. is taken and put to death, 189. 23.

Hiſtrio, whence ſo called, 476. 45.

Homogyrus, kill'd by a Thunderbolt, 79. 5. is worſhipped by the Argives, becauſe he firſt yoaked Oxen in the Plough, ibid.

Horace the Poet dieth in the 57th year of his Age, 808. 77.

Horatius made Conſul in the room of Lucretius, 421. 15. he dedicateth the Capitol, 422. ibid.

Horatius, firnamed Cocles, why ſo called, 423. 18. his Story, ibid.

Hormiſda flieth to Conſtantine, who receiveth him with all Honour imaginable, 958. 30. the occaſion thereof, ibid.

Hortenſian Law, 684. 8.

Hoſhea, the 19th and laſt King of Iſrael, 60. 13.

Hyanthidas, vide Doridas.

Hyrcanus, the Brother of Ariſtobulus, entereth upon the Prieſthood, 657. 13. is ſtirred up to move for his juſt Right, ibid. procureth his Flight to Aretas King of Arabia, ibid. 14. he and his Brother ſend to Pompey to make their Complaint, who ſideth with Hyrcanus, 658. 15. goeth in Embaſſy with Phaſelus to the Parthian General, Barzaphantes; but they are perfidiouſly captivated. Hyrcanus is deprived of his Ears, 665. 30.

I.

Jabin oppreſſeth the Iſraelites and Philiſtins, 41. 24.

Jacob and Eſau born, 29. 9. flieth from his Brother into Meſopotamia, 30. 11. his Iſſue, ibid. his Return, ibid. 12. goeth into Ægypt, 32. 15. dieth, ibid. 16.

Jaddæus, or Jaddus the High Prieſt, refuſeth to break his Faith, 251. 46. goeth to meet Alexander in his Pontifical Veſtments. 252. 46.

James, the Son of Alphæus, firſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem, and firſt of all Biſhops, 847. 85. killed by procurement of Ananus the High Prieſt, 861. 32.

James the Brother of John ſlain by Herod Agrippa, 851. 8.

Janiſcus, or Inachus, King of Sicyonia, Reigneth 42 years, 78. 3. and then dieth. ibid.

Janus the Temple at Rome ſhut up, 698. 22.

Japhet's Portion, and ſeven Sons, 6. 17. owned by the Greeks for their Eounder under the Name of Japetus, ibid.

Jaſon, Prince of Theſſaly, procureth a Truce between the Bœotians and Archidamus, 359. 40. and is preſently after murdered by his Brothers, ibid.

Jaſon rageth at Jeruſalem among his Countrymen, 610. 42.

Jaſus, King of Argos, after whom the City was named Jaſos, and the Citizens Jaſii, 80. 7.

Javan, and his four Sons, 3. 20.

Jehoahaz, the younger Son of Joſias, made King, who continued but three Months in that Dignity, 53. 17. is led away by Pharaoh into Ægypt, 54. ibid.

Jehojakim made King by Pharaoh Necho in his Brothers place, 54. 17. yieldeth to Nebuchadnezar, with his Wife and Children. 55. 22.

Jehoſaphat, ſucceedeth Aſa, 50. 6. Reigneth 24 years, and ſome Months, and then dieth, ibid.

Jepthah overthroweth the Ammonites. 43. 29.

Jericho deſtroyed, 39. 17.

Jeroboam King, 57. 1. ſetteth up two Golden Calves ibid. 2. Reigneth 22 years and dieth, ibid. His Poſterity is utterly deſtroyed, ibid. 3.
Jeroboam the ſecond, 59. 10. Reigneth one and forty years, 60. ibid. dieth, ibid.
Jeruſalem and the Temple burnt, 56. 24. the firſt Temple built by Solomon, 47. 42. the ſecond Temple built there, 178. 2.
Jewiſh Sects, their original, 651. 2.
Jews, their return out of Captivity, 177. 1. they are perſecuted, 634. 18. a diſſention betwixt them and the Samaritans, 638. 28. deluded by a young man of Sidon, who counterfeited Alexander the Son of Herod, 815. 84. Baniſhed Rome, 847. 86. they rebel, 863. 38. the occaſion thereof, ibid. a great ſlaughter among themſelves, 864. 39. they rebel againſt the Romans, 885. 12. rebel again in Adrian's time, 898, 41.
Ilus the Son of Tros, whom he ſucceeded, who built the Chief City, called Troja by the Latins, but by the Greeks, Illium, from K. Ilias, named, 87. 26.
Illyrians infeſt the Italians at Sea, whence ariſeth a War, 699. 23.
Illyrius, the Son of Cadmus, who either gave or took name from the Illyrians, 124. 4.
Inachidæ, their Kingdom very moderate, 91. 38. the Government thereof made Democratical, 92. 32.
Inachus firſt began a Kingdom at Argos, whence the Proverb, 78. 1.
Induciomarus kill'd, (776) 80.
Intaphernes, vide Darius.
Inter-Regnum for a year after the death of Romulus, who died childleſs, 137. 12.
Joas ſucceedeth Ahaziah, his own Servants conſpire againſt him, and murder him on his bed, 51. 8.
Jocaſta, the Mother and Wife of Oedipus, hangeth her ſelf, 126. 9.
Joctan, the ſecond Son of Eber and his 13 Sons, 5. 14. &c. their Seat, 6. 15. &c.
John the Baptiſt beginneth to exerciſe his Miniſtry, 834. 9.
John, Brother of James, baniſhed to Pathmos, 879. 32. his Death, 887. 7.
John, ſurnamed Hircanus, why, 650. his Exploits, ibid. reneweth the League with Rome, and beſiegeth Samaria, 651. ibid. taketh it, ibid. 2. dieth, ibid. 3.
Jonathan, Brother of Judas Maccabæus, choſen Captain in his room, 619. 62. is circumvented and kill'd by Tryphon, 622. 7.
Ionia, it's 12 Cities, 98. 19. revolteth, 203. 66.
Ionian Rebellion, the occaſion thereof, 184. 14.
Ionians aſſiſted by the Athenians, 187. 16.
Joram ſucceedeth Jehoſaphat, and reigneth eight years, 51. 6. then dieth miſerably, ibid.
Joſeph the Son of Rachel born, 30. 11. ſold into Ægypt, 31. 13. is advanced, ibid. 15. dieth, 32. 17.
Joſephus anſwereth ſufficiently the ſlanders of Apion and others againſt the Jews, 61. 16. his Teſtimony concerning Chriſt, 841. 22. his works, when finiſhed, 874. 21.
Joſhuah vanquiſheth the Kings, 39. 18. dieth, 40. 20.
Joſiah, King of Iſrael, fighting with Necho, dieth, 53. 16.
Jotham, King of Iſrael, reigneth 16 years, 52. 11. dieth, ibid.
Iphicrates ſent to aſſiſt the Spartans, his Conduct cenſured by Xenephon, 361. 45.
Irens, among the Lacedæmonians, who, 110. 17.
Iſaac born, 29. 8. marrïeth, ibid. 9. dieth, 31. 14.
Iſhboſheth ſucceedeth Saul, 46. 37. is ſlain after ſeven years reign, ibid. 38.
Iſmael born, 29. 7. dieth, 30. 10. his Poſterity, ibid.
Iſmenias put to death, 354. 26.
Iſraelies oppreſſed in Ægypt, depart thence, 33. 21. their number at that time, 34. 1. they paſs the Red Sea, ibid. 2. their Food, 35. 3. the Decalogue delivered to them, ibid. 4. are commanded to turn back into the Wilderneſs, 36. 8. their Manſions for thirty ſeven years, 37. 9. paſs over Jordan into Canaan, 39. 16. fall to Idolatry, 40. 21. are oppreſſed by the Midianites, 41. 25. delivered by Gideon, 42. ibid. oppreſſed by the Philiſtines and Ammonites, ibid. 27. vexed by the Philiſtines, 43. 30. they deſire a King, 43. 34. are carried away captive, and the Samaritans placed in their room, 61. 13. they are afflicted in Ægypt, 64. 9.
Italy hath ſeveral ſorts of Governors, 907. 61.
Judæa, it's affairs in the time of Ochus, 242. 14. Seditions there, 815. 83. is governed by Deputies, ibid.
Judas (Maccabæus) ſucceedeth his Father, 614. 52. protecteth the Jews, ibid. is victorious, ibid. overthroweth Lyſias and the Scythian Nomades, 615. 53. as alſo Timotheus, &c. ibid. 54. is ſlain in Battel, 618. 61.
Jugurtha, Son of Maſtanabal, and King of Numidia, 723. 15. Conquereth all oppoſers, 724. 17. is humbled by Metellus, ibid 18. overthrown by Marius, and led in Triumph, 725. 20. put to death by order of the Senate, ibid.
Julia, Daughter of Octavius Cæſar by Scribonia, 792. 40. is married, firſt to Marcellus, ibid. then to Agrippa, 795. 47. and after him to Tiberius, 802. 61. her incredible wantonneſs, 810. 74. ſhe is baniſhedi nto Campania by her Father, ibid.
Julia, Daughter to Julius Cæſar, married to Pompey, 746. 2.
Julianus (Didius) purchaſeth the Empire, 926. 1. given up to luxury, and loſeth the favour of the Soldiers, ibid. decreed to death by the Senate, and the Empire to Severus, 937. 2.
Jupiter, ſeveral men of that Name, 79. 3. whence ſo many, ibid. 4.
Jupiter Feretrius, why ſo called, 469. 28.
Ixion ſucceedeth Aletes in the Kingdom of Corinth, who reigned 37 years, 121. 3.

K.

King of Perſia calleth himſelf King of Kings, 262. 1. the Kingdom it ſelf being Hereditary, ibid. 2. the manner of the King's Promotion, 263. ibid. how adored, ibid. 3. Abſolute, ibid. 4. their Ornaments, 264. 5. & 6. Royal Palaces, ibid. 7. their Drink, 269. 8. their Diet and Attendance at Table, 270. 10. Gueſts, 271. ibid. ſeveral Wives, Concubines, and Riches, ibid. 12. their Eldeſt Sons how Educated, 272. 13. their Travels, ibid. 14. the manner of their ſitting in Judgment, and Royal Judges, 273. 15. ſeven in number, ibid. 16.

16. their Rewards of deſerving Perſons, ibid. Hunting, 274. 17. their Kingdom divided into Satrapies, and the Duty of a Satrapa, ibid. 18. a certain Poyſon they uſed, when reſolved to dye, 276.24. where buried, ibid. how their King is ſet out and adorned, 285.47.

L.

LAbdacus, the Son of Polydorus, King of Thebes, ruleth in Thebes, 125. 6. dieth there, ibid.

Labienus defeateth the Treviri, (777.) 83.

Laboroſardochus, the Son of Nerigliſſor, ſucceedeth his Father in the Babylonian Kingdom, 19. 27. is made away by his Relations, ibid.

Labotas ſucceedeth Echeſtratus, 106. 4. dieth, ibid.

Lacedæmon, it's firſt Inhabitants, 105. 1.

Lacedæmonians diſtreſſed, 301. 8. inquire of the Oracle at Delphos about the event of the War, 308, 28. ſend frivolous Meſſengers to Athens, ibid. 29. head both the Parties in the Peloponneſian War, 310 3. what Greeks ſtand with them, 311. 4. deſire a Truce, and ſend to Athens about a Peace, which Cleon croſſeth, 317. 22. vindicate themſelves at Corinth, 322. 37. are kept from the Olympick Exerciſes, 325. 44. ſend to Argos about a Peace, which is obtained, 326. 40. attempt to take Argos in vain, 327. 48. take notice of the League broken with Athens, ibid. 50. ſend to Athens about a Peace, which Cleophas obſtructeth, 338. 99. they are beaten, 357. 33. Commotions betwixt them and the Megalopolitans, 377. 20. make war in abſence of Alexander, but are vanquiſhed by Antipater, his Lieutenant, 386. 42. ſend to him into Aſia to beg pardon, ibid. 43.

Laceſſades, a Sicyonian King, 78. 4.

Lætus, General to Commodus the Emp. 920.26.

Laius, the Son of Labdacus, had the Kingdom of Thebes reſtored to him by the Thebans, 125. 6. marrieth Jocaſta, ibid. is kill'd by Oedipus, ibid. 7.

Lamedon, Son of Coronus King of Sicyonia, 78. 2.

Laodamus, the King of Thebes, ſlain by Alcmæon, 126. 11.

Laomedon, Son of Ilus, ſucceedeth him in his Kingdom, who ſeeking to defraud Hercules of his wages for killing the Whale that ſhould have devour'd his Daughter, was outed both of his Kingdom and Life, 87. 26.

Latins overthrown at the Lake of Regillus, 429. 32. again, 478. 48.

Latinus reigned after Faunus in Latium, 128. 3.

Latium, it's antient Inhabitants, 127. 1. why ſo called, 128. 2. is totally ſubdued, 478. 49.

Law propoſed for Creation of Tribunes in the Aſſembly of Tribes, 447. 74. which paſſeth, 448. 77. another for diviſion of certain Grounds, 453. 88. a New Law, 456. 94. the Senate is perſwaded to ſubmit to new Laws, whereupon Commiſſioners are choſen to fetch ſome out of Greece, ibid. Law Royal, or Lex Regia, 788. 29. a different way of expounding it, and the reaſon thereof, ibid. 30. the Hortenſian Law ſtrangely wreſted, ibid. 31. but all in vain, 789. ibid. Civil Law, its Original and Contexture, 459. 7. &c.

League betwixt the Platæans and Athenians, 290. 8.

Leleges, antient Inhabitants of Lacedæmon, ſo call'd from Lelex their King, and from him the Country was call'd Lelegia and Lelegis, 105. 1.

Leonidas, King of Sparta, ſent by the Council of Athens with 6000 Foot againſt Xerxes, 194. 37. ſlain at the Battel of Thermopylæ, fighting valiantly, ibid. 39. and after his Body being found by the Enemy was nailed to a Croſs, ibid.

Leucippus, King of Sicyonia, reigneth 43 years, 77. 1.

Leutychides put in the place of Demaratus in Sparta, 293. 21. puniſhed for the Injury he offered him, 294. 24.

Licinius marrieth Conſtantine's Siſter, 953. 19. He and Conſtantine are at variance, 954. 20. he is worſted at Cibalis, ibid. they make an Agreement, ibid. 21. he flyeth to Byzantium, and thence to Chalcedon, 957. 28. thence to Incomedia, 958. 31. ſubmits, ibid.

Linternum (or Liternum) a Maritime Town in Campania, 713. 9.

Lipſius his Apologie for Seneca againſt Dio, 862. 35.

Livia Druſilla, Wife of Auguſtus Cæſar, 792. 40. procureth pardon for the Conſpirators againſt him, 819. 92. is ſuſpected to have had a hand in poyſoning her Husband, 829. 112.

Livius Andronicus was the firſt that made Comedies and Tragedies at Rome, 696. 17.

Lucan the Poet, one of the Conſpirators againſt Nero put to death, 862. 35.

Lucius Cæſar, Grand-ſon of Auguſtus, and Son of Agrippa by Julia, is adopted, 808. 72. appointed to go into Spain, but ſuddenly dieth at Marſeilles, 818. 86.

Lucius Quintius, Father to Cæſo; then lately Baniſhed, is taken from the Plough, and made Conſul, 452. 84. his Carriage in his Office, ibid. 85. is made Dictator, ibid. 86. overthroweth the Æqui, ibid.

Lucretia, her Story, 150. 45. killeth her ſelf, ibid.

Lucretius, her Father, choſen Elder Conſul in the room of Brutus, 421. 14. dieth within few dayes after his Creation, ibid. 15.

Lucullus, Lieutenant to Sylla, 731. 10. ſent againſt Mithridates and beſiegeth him, 736. 4. putteth him to flight, and purſueth him into his own Kingdom, ibid. and into Armenia, ibid. 25. where he overthroweth Tigranes who protected him, 737. 26.

Lupercalia, certain Feaſts at Rome, what they are, (836) 9.

Luſtrum what, and whence ſo named, 145. 31.

Lutatius Catulus, Conſul, defeateth the Carthaginians, 693. 7.

Lybian, or African War, whence it aroſe, 694. 11.

Lycidas, a Senator, Stoned, and why, 200. 57. his Wife and Children ſerved ſo alſo by the Women, ibid.

Lycurgus, King of Lacedæmon, 106. 5. is Tutor to Charilaus his Nephew, whom he made King of the Spartans, 106. 5. his Travels, 107. 6. at his return he new modelleth the State, ibid. 8. taketh away the power of Kings, 108. 10. inſtituteth a Senate, ibid. which conſiſted of 28 perſons, 109. 12. what they were, ibid. introduceth an Equality of Poſſeſſions, ibid.

ibid. 14. forbiddeth the uſe of Silver and Gold Coin, and maketh Iron-Money, ibid. 15. provideth for the Education of Boys, 110. 16. and of Virgins, 111. 18. Travel prohibited by him, ibid. 19. Kings, Senate, and People ſworn to obſerve his Laws, 112. 20. he dieth of an Atrophie, ibid.

Lycus ſlain in Battel, 25. 6.

Lydians, their deſcent, 21. 32. whence ſo termed, ibid. their Royal Families, ibid. 33.

Lynceus, a King of the Argives, Governeth one and forty years, 81. 9.

Lyſander made Admiral by the Lacedæmonians in lieu of Cratiſippidas, 339. 84. obtaineth pay of Cyrus for his Sea-men, ibid. his time expired, 340. 86. he is ſent for by the Allies to reaſſume the Government of the Fleet, 341. 89. defeateth the Athenian Fleet at Ægoſpotamos, 342. ibid. putteth all the Priſoners to death but Adimantus, Brother of Polydeſtes, ibid. 90. beſiegeth Athens both by Sea and Land, ibid. 91. as alſo Thraſybulus and his fellows in the Pyræus, 345. 4. Eclipſeth Ageſilaus, 347. 10. is ſlain, 348. 12. his Character, ibid.

Lyſimachus, hath the Government of Thrace after Alexanders death, 560. 3. Combineth with Ptolomy and Caſſander, 567. 25. is ſlain in the Battel againſt Seleucus, 573. 14.

M.

MAcedonia, formerly Emathonia, why ſo called, 370. 1. their ſeveral Kings, ibid. 2.

Macedonians ſeiſed with a pannick fear, 257. 58.

Macrinus ſucceedeth Baſſianus in the Empire, defeateth Artabanus with incredible ſlaughter, but grows in contempt, 943. 38. burneth Adulterers alive with their bodies joyned together, 944. 39. is ſlain with his Son Diadumenius, to whom he had given the Title of Cæſar, ibid.

Mæandrius ſucceedeth Polycrates, who was his Vicegerent, 289. 7.

Mænon the Ægeſtan, a Captive, præfer'd to the ſervice of Agathocles for his Beauty, 678. 23. Concealeth his diſpleaſure for the Calamity of his Country, and his own baſe condition, and poiſoneth Agathocles with a Tooth-pick, ibid. laboureth in vain to get the Tyranny, ibid. 24.

Magas, the Brother of Ptolomy Philadelphus, obtaineth the Government of Cyrene, 632. 13.

Magi conſpire againſt Cambyſes, and uſurp, 181. 11. their impoſture diſcovered, 181. 1. a Conſpiracy againſt them, 182. 2. they are ſlain, ibid.

Mago, the firſt who laid the Foundation of the Carthaginian Empire, 396. 13. leaveth two Sons behind him, Aſdrubal and Amilcar, ibid.

Magog, the ſame with Prometheus, 3. 19.

Man Created, 1. 1. his Fall, ibid. 2. he is expelled Paradiſe, ibid. 3. his Impiety cauſeth a Deluge, 2. 5.

Manaſſes ſucceedeth Hezekiah; Reigneth five and fifty years, and then dieth, 53. 15.

Menetho's Lies concerning the Original of the Jews, 64. 10. &c. his Falſe Chronology, 66. 17.

Manlius Capitolinus aimeth at the Soveraignty, 473. 39. for which attempt he is precipitated from the Tarpeian Rock, ibid.

Manlius, ſirnamed Torquatus, and why, 476. 45.

Manlius (Cneus) Conſul, ſubdueth the Galatians, 713. 7. bringeth Luxury firſt of all to Rome, ibid.

Marcellus, why ſo called, 701. 29. he killeth Virdomarus King of the Gæſatæ, and dedidicateth the third Opima Spolia to Jupiter Feretrius, overthroweth the Galles, and ſo endeth that War, ibid. Beſiegeth Syracuſe in Sicily, 706. 41. jeereth his own Engineers, and calleth Archimedes by the name of Briareus, 706. 42. is ſlain, 708. 46.

Marcellus, Octavius his Nephew and Son-in-Law, 793. 42. is diſpleaſed with Agrippa, ibid. dieth, 794. 43.

Marcius (Lucius) the Tribune, revengeth the death of the Scipio's by a great ſlaughter of the Carthaginians, 706. 43.

Marcus Curtius periſheth to free his Country from a deſtructive Peſtilence, 476. 45.

Mardonius, Son-in-Law to Darius, leadeth Forces unſuccesfully into Greece, 189. 24. perſwadeth Xerxes to undertake an Expedition thither, 191. 29. is left behind him there, 199. 55. burneth Athens, and goeth into Bœotia, 200. 58. is ſlain, 201. 62.

Marius (Caius) Lieutenant to Metellus, 724. 18. made Conſul, ibid. taketh Jugurtha, and leads him in triumph to Rome, 725. 20. made Conſul a ſecond time, and diſpatcheth the Cimbrian War: he, with the Tribune, ſeeking unjuſtly to oppoſe Sylla, is driven from the City, and declared an Enemy, 729. 3. his Cruelty, 730. 5. is ſlain, and his head ſet upon the Roſtra. ibid.

Marius (Junior) Conſul, 733. 14. killeth himſelf, whoſe Head is ſet up in the Pleading-place at Rome, ibid. 15.

Martia, the Concubine of Commodus the Emperor, 920. 86.

Maſaniſſa, the old and conſtant Friend to the Romans, quarrelleth with the Carthaginians, 716. 18. dieth at the age of ninety, 717. 20.

Maſſilians defeated by Brutus, (804) 37. their perfidious humour, (805) 38. are forced to yield, ibid.

Mattathias oppoſeth Antiochus Epiphanes, 612. 46. and Judas, his Son, after him, ibid. 47.

Mauſolus, the Petty King of Caria, his ſtately Monument erected by his Wife Artemiſia, 242. 15.

Maxentius uſurpeth in the time of Conſtantine the Great, 951. 14. but is defeated, 953. 18 and drowned, ibid.

Maximianus Herculeus, Emperor, putteth off the Purple at Milan, 950. 11. reſigneth it, 951. 14. dieth, 952. 15.

Maximianus Galerius and Conſtantius Chlorus adopted, and both Emperors at one time, 951. 13.

Maximinus made Emperor by the Soldiers, 945. 43. his Birth, Parentage and Temper, he overthroweth the Germans, waſteth their Country, and is at laſt kill'd by young men, incenſed at his rapacity, ibid. Galerius createth his Siſters two Sons Cæſars, viz. Galerius Maximinus and Severus, 951. 13.

Maximinus (Balbinus) made Emperor by the Senate 945. 44. a Perſecutor of Chriſtians, 946. ibid. is kill'd by his own men, ibid.

Mazæus, General of the Carthaginians, is Exil'd, 396.

396. 12. and puniſhed for his crimes, ibid.

Mecænas, his Plea to Octavius Cæſar for Monarchy, 776. 5. his advice for the ordering of affairs as to the Magiſtrates of Senatorian dignity, 781. 14. thoſe of Equeſtrian Rank, 782. 16. Education of the Children of Senators and Equites, ibid. 17. the Militia and Money, 783. 18. that Rome ſhould be Adorned, and the Provinces Curbed, ibid. 19. how ſcandalous words are to be taken into conſideration, and Traitors puniſhed, ibid. the Senate to be made uſe of, 783.20. Military men not to be envied, 784. ibid. Rules for Cæſar's good deportment, ibid. 21. deſerving perſons rather to be rewarded above, than below their merits, ibid. he dieth, 807. 70. his Commendation, ibid.

Medes rebel againſt Darius Nothus, 214. 24.

Megalopolis, a Town built by the Arcadians at the Requeſt of Epaminondas, 360.42. whence it was ſo called, ibid. the Time of its building according to Diodorus the Hiſtorian, 362. 49.

Megara, the Inhabitants thereof much diſtreſſed by the ſeveral Inroads of the Athenians, and their own Exiles, whom they had ejected, 318. 26. Great Commotions and Stirs ariſe among them, ſo that they are tired with continual diſturbances, ibid.

Melanthius, a Meſſenian, accepting the Combat againſt the Bœotian King, Reigneth at Athens, 98. 18. dieth, ibid.

Melus, an Iſland ſo called, invaded by the Athenians and taken, 327. 50.

Men Learned and Eminent in ſeveral of the Arts and Sciences, together with an account of the Time when they flouriſhed, 309.32. & 631.11.

Menelaus gaineth the Kingdom of Lacedæmon, through the ſpecial favor of Tyndareus, 105.2. and reigneth there, ibid.

Menenius is fined for the miſcarriage of the Fabii, 446.72.

Meneſtheus, King of Athens, dieth at the Iſle of Melos in his return from the Siege of Troy, who accompanied Agamemnon and Menelaus thither with 50 Ships, 98.17.

Mentor the Rhodian offereth to betray Sidon to Ochus, 240.6. he and Bagoas lay Siege to Bubaſtis, 241. 10.

Menis, or Menas, the firſt Ægyptian King that reigned after their Gods, 63.7.

Meſſenians paſs into Sicily 119. 44. they that continued were made ſlaves, 120. 45. are recalled, and reeſtabliſhed, 360. 42.

Metellus the Conſul defeated the Carthaginians, 693. 6. humbleth Jugurtha, 724. 18.

Miletus beſieged, 188. 21. &c. is taken, 189.23.

Miltiades, his Pedigree and Actions, 295. 27. his fruitleſs Expedition to Paros, 296. 28. he dieth in Priſon, ibid. 29.

Minerva, ſeveral of that Name, 92. 2.

Minoas, an Iſland lying before the Shoar of Megaris, 315.16.

Minos the Son of Jupiter, and Lawgiver among the Cretians, 95. 9.

Minutius Felix, an excellent Lawyer, 933. 18. the time when he flouriſhed, ibid.

Mizriam ſtruck with Leproſie, 36.7. dieth, 37.9.

Miriam and his eight Sons, 9.24, &c. is the Son of Cham, 61. 1. the ſame with Oſiris, ib. 2.

Mithridates, King of Pontus, (ſirnamed Eupator and Dionyſius) his vaſt Deſigns and great Attempts, 728. 1. is oppoſed by the Senate, who reſtored the King he had caſt out, 729. 2. he recovereth many Countries, ib. cauſeth 80000 Italians and Romans to be kill'd in one day, 730. 8. the War with him renewed, 735. 21. overthroweth Murena, whom Sylla, upon his departure for Italy had left in Aſia, ibid. 21. in the third War recovereth Bithynia, 736.20. Beſiegeth Cyzicus a City of Propontis, ibid. 24. forced thence by Lucullus to fly into his own Kingdom, ibid. and from thence into Armenia, ibid. 25. he overthroweth Fabius, and after him Triarius, 737. 27. is defeated by Pompey, 740.35. and flieth to Cholchos, ibid. thence into Scythia, ibid. 36. killeth himſelf by the help of a Gall, after he had poiſoned his Daughter and Concubines, 742.40. his Character, ibid.

Mitylenæans yield to the mercy of the Athenians, 315. 15. a ſevere Sentence againſt them. ibid. but 'tis mitigated by the Clemency of Diodotus, ibid. 15. &c.

Molon rebelleth againſt Antiochus the Great, 598. 11. he and his Army are deſtroyed, 599. 13.

Monarchy, an eminent Paſſage denoting its Excellency, 469. 29. it's Neceſſity, 780. 13. Antiquity and Authority, 781. 13.

Monetus the Jeſuit miſliketh Cæſar's Geography of Gall, 748. 7. reprehendeth him as unskilful, 749. 11.

Moſes born, 33. 18. the meaning of his Name, 32. 18. ſent to Pharaoh, ibid. 20. numbreth the people, 38. 14. dieth, ibid. 15.

Mutius, ſirnamed Scævola, and why, 423. 19. his bold attempt to aſſaſſinate King Porſena, ib.

Mycenæ the Town deſtroy'd, 302. 10.

Mycenæans and Argives fall out, ibid.

N.

NAbis, Tyrant of Sparta, holdeth Greece and Argos in ſlavery, 710. 55.

Nabonaſar, or Nabonaſſar, King of Babylon, 15. 15. his Æra, ibid.

Nabonidus (called alſo Nabonadius, Nabannidochus and Labinytus) a Babylonian, ſet up in the room of Laboroſardochus, who reigned 17. (or as ſome think) 27 years, 19.27.

Nabopolaſſar, or Nabulaſſar, King, 17.23.

Nævius (Cneius) the Roman Poet, 699. 22. publiſheth Plays, wrote the firſt Punick War, leaving a proud Epitaph for himſelf to be engraved on his Tomb, ib.

Narciſſus, the Freedman of Claudius, 856. 30. is murdered by Nero, 857. 24.

Naxians enſlaved, 300. 6.

Nearchus, Alexander's Admiral at Sea in his Indian Expedition, 555.30.

Nebuchadneſar made King, with his Father Nabopolaſſar, 17.23. his Exploits and Fabricks, 18. 24. his Pride and Puniſhment, ibid. 25. what is recorded of him by Heatheniſh Authors, ibid. 26. dieth after he had reigned 43 years, 19. ibid.

Necropolis, or the City of dead bodies in Ægypt, 631. 9.

Nectanebus, or Nectanebis, King of Ægypt, ſent out to ſpie the number of the Perſian Army, 233.84. is ſent againſt the Cities in Syria, 237. 95. flieth out of Ægypt, 241. 11.

Nehemiah obtaineth leave to repair Jeruſalem, 210. 15.

Nero (Claudius) deluded in Spain by Aſdrubal, 707.45. Created Conſul,708. 47. killeth Aſdrubal, and caſteth his head into Annibals Camp, ibid.

Nero, the Son of Domitian Nero and Agrippina, ſucceedeth Claudius, 857. 23. exceedeth all Princes in his firſt five years Reign, ibid. 24. his Mother and he are at odds, 858. ibid. he poiſoneth Britannicus, and beginneth to diſcover his cruel Temper and Inclination, ibid. 25. falleth in love with Poppæa, ibid. 27. cauſeth his Mother to be made away, 859. ibid. is flattered by the Senate and People, ibid. 28. his Enormities, ibid. Marrieth Poppæa, 861. 32. his wickedneſs in ſetting Rome on fire, and accuſing and perſecuting the Chriſtians for the fact, 862. 34. there happeneth a Conſpiracy againſt him, ibid. 35. he putteth ſeveral to death, 863. 36. killeth his Wife Poppæa, ibid. the height of his Impiety, ibid. 37. murdereth himſelf by the help of Epaphroditus his Freedman, 865. 42. Eccleſiaſtical Affairs in his Reign, 866. 43.

Nerva (Cocceius) ſucceedeth Domitian, 880. 1. his good Government, ibid. 2. he adopteth Trajan, 881. 3. and dieth, ibid.

Nicanor, a chief Prince under Demetrius the King, and a bitter Enemy to the Jews, is by him ſent againſt them, 617. 59. at firſt he is much taken with Judas Maccabæus, but he being complained of by Alcimus, ſeeketh his deſtruction, 618. 60. his blaſphemous threats, ibid. is ſlain in Battel, ibid. 61.

Nicias laboureth for a Peace, which Alcibiades hindereth by a ſtratagem, 324. 42. & 43.

Nicopolis, a City of Ægypt, inhabited as far as the Sea, 631. 10.

Nile the River, whence ſo called, 68. 22.

Nimrod and his Kingdom, 10. 1. the beginning and duration of the Aſſyrian Empire, ibid. 2. he is called Belus, 11. 3. whether he built Nineveh, ibid. maketh way to his Kingdom by Hunting, is judged to be the true Bacchus, ibid. 4.

Ninus, Nimrod's Son, ſucceedeth him, his Conqueſts, 12. 5. buildeth Nineveh, and dieth, various reports of the manner of his death, ibid.

Ninyas, Ninus his Son, or Ninus, as ſome call him, ſucceedeth Semiramis, 12. 7.

Noah, 2. 5. &c. the Teſtimony of the Heathen concerning his Flood, 3. 8. his Progeny, ibid. 9. he is compared to Saturn, ibid.

Numa Pompilius, a Sabine, is choſen by the Senate King of Rome, 137. 12. his Religion is much like that of the Pythagoreans, ibid. he Reformeth the year, 138. 14. &c. liveth above 80. Reigneth 43 years, and at his death is buried with great Honours, 139. 16.

O.

OChus vide Darius Nothus.

Ochus (or Achaſueras one of the Legitimate Sons of Artaxerxes) his wicked practices for the Kingdom of Perſia, 237. 98. ſucceedeth his Father, 238. 1. the Husband of Eſther, called alſo Artaxerxes, ibid. his Murders committed, when he was made King, 239. 2. he Invadeth Phœnicia, 239. 4. Ægypt, 240. 8. taketh Peluſium, 241. 10. Rewardeth Mentor the Rhodian, 242. 12. oppoſeth Philip of Macedon, 242. 13, is murdered, 243. 16.

Octavius Cæſar, his Birth and Breeding (839) 16. the occaſion of his preferment (840) 18. is ſlighted by the Senate, which procureth the Triumvirate (841) 19. he returneth to Rome after the overthrow of Caſſius and Brutus (844.) 26. maketh a new agreement with Antony, and prorogueth their power (846) 41. asketh advice of Agrippa and Mecænas, how to manage and ſettle the affairs of the Empire, 776. 4. which he followeth, 785. 23. taketh upon him the Title of Imperator, and ordereth ſeveral matters, ibid. maketh a Luſtrum, ibid. 24. pretendeth in a fram'd Oration to the Senate, to lay down his power, 786. 25. and thereby confirmeth it, ibid. 26. divideth the Provinces betwixt the Senate and himſelf, ibid. is Sirnamed Auguſtus, 787. 28. the whole Power of Senate and People is transferred upon him, 787. 29. by a Law called Lex Regia, ibid. the general courſe of his Adminiſtration, 790. 35. he repaireth the Via Flaminia, 791. 36. reduceth the Rebellious Spaniard, ibid. 38. Ambaſſadours ſent to him from ſeveral parts, 792. 38. ſhutteth up the Temple of Janus, ibid. 39. is honoured by the Senate, ibid. 40. his Wives, and his Daughter Julia, ib. he recovereth of a dangerous Diſeaſe, 793. 42. nameth no Succeſſor during his ſickneſs, to the admiration of all men, but giveth his Ring to Agrippa, ibid. his Generoſity, ibid. 43. more honours are decreed to him, 794. ibid. refuſeth them, ibid. 44. his Condeſcentions, ibid. 45. Conſpirators againſt him puniſhed, 795. ibid. he Travelleth Eaſtward, 796. 48. his Acts abroad, ibid. Ambaſſadors ſent to him out of India, 796. 49. returneth to Rome, ibid. 50. Prorogueth his own and Agrippa's authority, 796. 51. taketh pains in Modelling the Senate, 798. 52. diſgraceth Lepidus, ibid. is tacitly taxed for familiarity with Women, 798. 53. yet he generally pleaſeth the people, 799. ibid. goeth into Gall. ibid. 54. returneth to Rome, 800. 57. is made Pontifex Maximus, 801. 59. mourneth extreamly for the Death of Agrippa, 802. 61. hath other Honours Conferred upon him, ibid. appointeth certain days for the Senate to meet on, 805. 65. maketh Tiberius Conſul, 807. 69. and giveth him the Title of Imperator, ibid. calleth the Month Sextilis, after his own name Auguſtus, and reformeth the year, ib. is grievouſly afflicted at the death of his Favourite Mecænas, ibid. 70. giveth Archelaus half the Dominion Herod enjoyed, and the other half to Antipas and Philip his two Brothers, 815. 83. Regulateth the year again, 816. 87. adopteth Tiberius, 817. 88. ſendeth him into Germany, ibid. a Conſpiracy againſt him, 819. 92. his Legions in the time of Dio. ibid. he erecteth a Military Treaſury, 820. 95. maketh a Speech to encourage the Married Equites, and another to the Batchelours in behalf of Marriage, 823. 101. &c. Enacts divers things, 828. 110. dieth at Nola, 829. 11. his Character, 830. 113. his Body is brought to Rome, and his Will read

read in the City, 831. 1. with four other Writings of his, ibid. 2.
Oebalus, the Son and Succeſſour of Cynortas, King of Lacedæmon, from whom the Country was called Oebalia, 105. 2.
Oedipus, 125. 8. unriddleth the Riddle of Sphinx, 126. ibid. marrieth his Mother Jocaſia, not knowing her, obtaineth the Kingdom of Thebes, ibid. 9. at length all came to light, that he had kill'd his own Father Laius, and married his own Mother, he dieth at Athens, ibid. 9.
Og, King of Baſhan, 38. 12. oppoſeth the Iſraelites and is ſlain, ibid.
Ogyges (or Ogygus) ſucceedeth Calydnus in the Theban Kingdom, 123. 1. from whom Thebes by the Poet is called Ogygian, and that great Ogygian Deluge took its name, ibid.
Oligarchy, ſet up at Sicyon and Argos, 326. 48.
Olympiad, the Firſt, when Celebrated, 112. 21.
Olympias, Daughter of Neaptolemus, King of the Moloſſians, is married to Philip, 373. 11. rejected by her Husband, incenſeth her Son Alexander, 381. 32. her Cruelty to Cleopatra and her young Son, 382. 34. ſhe facetiouſly checketh her own Sons vanity, 253. 51. deſtroyeth Aridæus and his Wife, 565. 19. killeth Nicanor and others, ibid. 20. is murdered at laſt by the procurement of Caſſander, having out-lived her Son Alexander about eight years, ibid.
Olympick Games Inſtituted by Hercules, in honour of Jupiter Olympius, 84. 18. the renewing of them, 112. 22.
Olynthians, their practices, 354. 25.
Olynthus, taken by Olybiades, 355. 27.
Onomarchus, ſucceedeth Philomelus in the Phocian Generalſhip, 375. 17. is hang'd by Philip of Macedon, 376. 18.
Opima Spolia, what, why ſo named, and how often obtain'd, 469. 28.
Oppian Law againſt Women repealed, 710. 54.
Oracle at Delphos, its Original, 374. 14.
Oracles ſilenced at the Birth of our Saviour, 843. 26.
Orates, a Perſian, Governour of Sardis, &c. 289. 6. layeth hold of Polycrates, when he came to Magneſia, and Naileth him to a Croſs, ibid. 7.
Oreſtes, his Life and Story, 90. 33.
Orgetorix, ſtirreth up the Helveſians, and they other people, 748. 8.
Origen, 960. 34.
Ornytion, the ſecond Son of Siſyphus, begat Phocus, who led a Colony into, and gave name to the Country Phocis, 120. 1.
Orontobates, a Perſian, keepeth poſſeſſion of Halicarnaſſus, 245. 27.
Orophernes, of a ſuppoſititious Brood, getteth Cappadocia by the help of Demetrius, 620. 64. but is ſoon after expell'd by Attalus, ibid.
Orthopolis, the XII. King of Ægialea, Reigned 48 years, 77. 1. 2.
Orus (or Horus) the laſt of the Ægyptian Gods, 63. 6.
Oſiris and Iſis in Ægypt, their Renowned Acts, 62. 2. Oſiris is kill'd by Typhon, ibid.
Otho, ſeizeth on the Empire by the help of his Souldiers, 867. 2. is oppoſed by Vitellius, and killeth himſelf, ibid.
Othniel, delivereth the Iſraelites, 41. 23.
Ovation, what, 425. 23. how it differeth from a Triumph, ibid.
Oxyntes, the Son of Demophoon, Reigneth in Athens 12 years, 98. 17.

P.

PActyas, Revolteth from Cyrus, 24. 40. flieth to Cuma, then Mitylene, and thence to the Chians, who ſold him to Mazares, the Mede, one of Cyrus his Commanders, ibid. 41.
Pædonomi, among the Lacedæmonians, who, 110. 17. their Power and Office, ibid.
Pætus, invadeth Comogena, 875. 23.
Pallas, one of the chief Freed-men of Claudius, 856. 20.
Pan, the great God, who died, was no other than Chriſt the true Shepherd, 843. 27.
Panactus, a Town diſmantled by the Bœotians, 323. 40.
Pandects, the excellency of the Writing of thoſe Authors from whom they were Collected, 932. 15.
Pandion, the Son of Erichthonius, ruleth 40 years, 94. 6.
Pandion, the Son of Cecrops the II. ſucceedeth his Father, 94. 6. is expelled his Kingdom by Metion, flieth to Pyla, and there dieth, ibid.
Pannonia and Dalmatia, rebel, 818. 90. but are reduced, ibid. 91. rebel a ſecond time, 822. 97. Pannonia ſubmitteth, 823. 100.
Pantheon, at Rome, whence ſo called, 792. 39. is perfected by Agrippa Vipſanus, ibid.
Papinian, the famous Lawyer, put to death by Caracalla, for his integrity, 930. 11. his worthy Commendation, ibid. 12.
Papinianiſtæ, Students whence ſo called, ibid.
Papyrius (Curſor) made Dictator, 682. 3. is hindred from puniſhing Fabius, ibid.
Parmenio, one of the Favourites of Alexander the Great, 251. 44. is ſlain for Treaſon againſt him, 546. 3.
Paryſatis, the Wife of Darius Nothus, 213. 23. Burieth alive the Mother, Brethren and Siſters of Terituchmes, ibid. rageth againſt thoſe, who had a hand in the death of her Son Cyrus, 223. 51. winneth the Eunuch Megathes from her Son Artaxerxes, who cut off the Head and Hand of her Son, and fleaeth him alive, ibid. 52. Poyſoneth her Daughter-in-Law Statira, by eating the Bird Rhyntaces, ibid. 52. goeth to Babylon, ibid.
Parthenia, vide Samus.
Partheniæ, a Generation of people ſo called, and why, 117. 37.
Parthia, Commotions there, 854. 16.
Parthians, revolt from Antiochus Theus, 596. 5.
Paſſeover, to be Celebrated Annually, 34. 2.
Paterculus (Velleius) the Hiſtorian his groſs flatteries of Tiberius, 817. 88, &c.
Patroclus, one of the Commanders under Achilles, is ſent out with his Myrmidones, putteth the Trojans to flight, 88. 30. is ſlain, 88. ibid.
Paulus Julius, the Lawyer, 931. 14.
Pauſanias, the Lacedæmonian, famous for his Victory at Platæa, his Acts and Story, 300. 4. his End, 301. 7.

Pauſanias, King of Sparta, envieth Lyſander, 345. 5. being condemned, he flieth to Tegea, and there dieth, 349.13.

Pelaſgus, King of Sicyonia, Reigneth 20 years, 78. 4.

Pelaſgus, the Brother of Homogyrus, gave name to the Pelaſgi, a people who firſt inhabited Arcadia, hence named Pelaſgis, and Pelaſgia, 79. 5.

Pelopidas, diſpatcheth Ambaſſadours to Artaxerxes, is in favour with him, 235.88. &c. returneth home, and is put to death, ibid. 90.

Pelopidas, famous in Aſia for his valour, 362. 49. is ſent Ambaſſadour to the King of Perſia, ibid. he gaineth much credit, 363.50.

Peloponneſian, War beginneth with the ſurprizing of Platæa by the Thebans, 310. 2.

Peloponneſians, exaſperated againſt the Athenians, 306.22. are worſted, 316.21.

Peloponneſus, whence ſo named, 77. 1.

Pelops obtaineth Piſa, with the major part of Peloponneſus, where he Reigneth 58 years, 86.24.

Peneleus choſen Captain by the Bœotians, 127. 11. is ſlain in the War by Euryphilus, the Son of Telephus, ibid.

Peratus, a Sicyonian King, who Governeth 47 years, 77. 1.

Perdiccas, King of Macedonia inviteth the Potidæans, with other Towns in Thrace to revolt, 306.22. revolteth again to the Potidæans, and joyneth himſelf with the Corinthian Army, ibid. 24.

Perdiccas, Alexander at his death gave him his Ring, 559. 40. made Protector of Arridæus the King, and Commander of his Forces, 560. 2. ſubdueth Cappadocia, ib. 4. Crucifyeth Ariarathes their King, ibid. goeth againſt Ptolomy, 561. 6. is ſlain, ibid. 7.

Pergamus, the Kingdom, it's Original, 595. 4.

Periander, the Son of Cypſelus, King of Corinth, ſucceedeth him, 122. 7. his ſtory, ibid. Reigneth near 40 years, and then dieth, 123. 8.

Pericles, the Son of Xanthippus, reduceth Euboea, 303. 14. is victorius in Samus, ibid. 15. Samus yieldeth to him, 304.16. adviſeth the Athenians to the Peloponneſian War, 308.30. dieth of the Plague, 313. 12. his Commendation, 314. ibid.

Perillus, the Athenian Statuary, and his brazen Bull, 389. 9.

Perinthus, a City of Thrace, 243.20. is beſieged, ibid.

Perpenna, murdereth Sertorius, 735.21.

Perſecution, the firſt againſt the Chriſtians, 862. 35. the ſecond, 879.23. the third, 885. 14. the fourth, 915.76. the fifth, 928. 6. the ſixth, 946.44. the ſeventh, 947.3. the eighth, 948. 5. the ninth, 949. 7. and the tenth, 950. 11.

Perſeus, the Son of Danae and Jupiter, the Fable of him, 81. 9. he Marrieth Andromeda, ibid. 10. killeth his Grand-father Acriſius unawares by the ſtroak of a Quoit on his Foot, ibid.

Perſeus, getteth his Father Philips Kingdom of Macedonia, 592. 52. reſolveth to War with the Romans, ibid. his bad Carriage toward Eumenes declareth him an Enemy, 593. 53. his Conſternation of mind, 593. 54, and 715. 15. he is overthrown by Æmilius the Conſul, and yieldeth, 594. 55. dieth two years after in Cuſtody, ibid.

Perſia, the Empire thereof, 177. 1.

Perſian Kings their Pompous Title, vide King, Perſian Ambaſſadours kill'd, 186. 13. their Satrapies what, and Satrapæ who, 274. 18. Præfects of a City, ibid. 19. their Phrurarch, Chiliarch and Treaſurer, 275. ibid. the horſe-guard call'd Immortals, and other Satellites, ibid. 20. the Magiſtanæ, Surenas and other names of Dignity, ibid. 21. Dorekeepers and Admiſſionales, with others, generally Eunuchs, ibid. 22. Scribes, who wrote their Edicts, 276. 22. Phyſicians and Poſtage, ibid. 23. their way of Education 277.25. the Liberal Forum among them, and its diſtinction, ibid. 26. the good Examples given by their Maſters, 278. 27. their way of Inſtruction by Fables, ibid. 28. to be in Debt a fault next to Lying among them, Ingratitude, ibid. Diſobedience to Parents, ibid. 29. Education of young Noble Men, ibid. 30, &c. the practice of Men, and particularly thoſe of fifty years old, 279. 31. other cuſtoms among them, ibid. 32. ſumptuous Aulæa or Hangings, 280. 34. Promiſcuous Luſt, ibid. 36. Weddings and Gardens, 281. 37. Cloaths, ibid. 38. ſeveral ſorts of capital Puniſhments and leſſer Cenſures, ibid. 39. of High Treaſon, 882. 40. their Coin and Burials, ibid. Antient Perſians a Warlike people, ibid. 41. their Cardaces, what and why ſo called, their Horſe, ibid. 42. their Arms, ibid. 43. their Fight in Chariots, 28.45. Order of March, ibid. 46. the manner of their Incamping, 285. 48. Muſtering, ibid. 49. Proceeding to Battle, 286. 50. their way of Attacking Towns, ibid. 51. of contracting a League, ibid. 53. ſeveral things and words came out of Perſia into Europe, 286. 54, and 287. 55.

Perſians overthrown in Greece, both by Sea and Land, 299. 1. driven abſolutely out of Europe, ibid.

Pertinax, Emperour, vide Helvius.

Petaliſme of Syracuſe what, and why ſo called, 397. 16.

Peter Saint, concerning his being at Rome, 857. 22.

Phæſtus, a Sicyonian King (vulgarly accounted the Son of Hercules*) after eight years Reign, he went over into* Crete, and built a City of his own Name, 78. 3.

Phalaris uſurpeth at Agrigentum in Sicily, 389. 8. his Birth and Parentage, ibid. obtaineth a Victory over the Leontines, ibid. his diſpoſition, 390. 10. he periſheth by the fury of the multitude after he had plai'd the Tyrant 16 years, ibid. 11.

Phalces, King of Argos, ſeizeth on Sicyon with the aſſiſtance of the Dores, 78. 4. thenceforth the Sicyonians became Dores, and were reckoned among the Argives, ibid.

Phaleg, 27. 1.

Pharaoh (Necho) fighteth againſt Nebuchadnezar at Carchemiſh, 54. 18. and there is ſlain, ibid.

Pharnabazus, is defeated, 228. 67. being Son-in-Law to Artaxerxes, made General of his Forces, 233. 82. He and Iphicrates are ſent againſt Acoris, ibid. 83. Emulation fruſtrateth their deſign, 234. 85. his own and Conon's

Acts

Acts againſt the Lacedæmonians, 351. 19. he procureth the Death of Tiſſaphernes, 227. 64.

Pharnaces, the rebellious Son of Mithridates, draweth the Army from him, 742. 40. invadeth ſome Eaſtern Countries, but is defeated by Cæſar, 8.

Phaſelus, the Son of Antipater is made Captain General of Jeruſalem by his Father, 661. 20. retained Captive by the Parthian General, 664. 28. he beateth out his own Brains, 665.30.

Phayllus, ſucceedeth Onomarchus, 376. 19. dieth of a Conſumption, ibid.

Philip, the Son of Amyntas, educated at Thebes, 371. 4. firſt made Guardian of his Nephew, and then King by the people, ib. 5. he Conquereth all difficulties, 376. 6. changeth the name of the Town Crenidæ, calling it Philippi, after his own name, ib. 8. Beſiegeth Methymna, a Town in Magneſia, 376. 17. is twice defeated by Onomarchus, who gaineth Chæronea, but is again utterly routed by him and hang'd, ibid. gaineth Olynthus, 377. 21. lulleth the Athenians aſleep, 378. 24. overthroweth the Thracians, 379. 27. Beſiegeth Perinthus, ibid. 28. Marcheth thence to Byzantium, 380. 28. invadeth the Scythians, ibid. in his return is wounded and diſtreſſed by the Triballi, ibid. obtaineth a Victory over the Athenians, &c. at Chæronea, 381. 30. is made General at Sea for all Greece, againſt the Perſians, ibid. 32. ſtab'd by Pauſanias, 382. 33. his great Atchievements, ibid. 34.

Philip. M. Julius (an Arabian of Trachonitis) ſucceedeth Gordian in the Empire, the Son of a notable Captain of Thieves, 947. 2. maketh his Son partaker with him in the Empire, repelleth the Scythians, is defeated and ſlain by Decius, and his Son murdered by the Prætorian Bands, ibid.

Philip, Son of Demetrius, ſucceedeth his Uncle Antigonus Doſon, 581. 18. Invadeth Ætolia, 583. 24. and Peloponneſus, ibid. 25. his Exploits, ibid. putteth an end to the Social War, 585. 28. ſendeth to Annibal in Italy, ibid. 29. is beaten at Apolonia, 586. 31. he poiſoneth Aratus, ibid. 32. is again beaten by the Romans, 587. 34. his Acts in Greece, ibid. 35. &c. incurreth the odium of the People, 588. 37. Engageth againſt the Romans, 589. ibid. his fruitleſs Expedition againſt Athens, ibid. 39. Courteth the Ætolians to no purpoſe, 590. 40. is overthrown at Cynoſcephale, 592. 45. diſcovereth his Son Perſeus his Device againſt him, and laboureth to diſinherit him, ibid. 51. but dieth of Melancholly, ibid.

Philiſtines overthrown, 45. 34.

Philomelus, Captain of the Phocians in the Sacred War, 374. 13.

Philopœmen, General of the Achæans, Annibal and Scipio Africanus, all three die in one year, 714. 11.

Philotas wrongfully accuſing himſelf, is put to death for Treaſon againſt Alexander, 546. 3.

Phocis, a Country ſo called, and why, 120. 1.

Phorbas, King of the Argives, Governeth 35 years, 80. 6.

Phoroneus, King of Argos, reigneth 40 years, 79. 1. and dieth, ibid.

Phraortes, King of the Medes, reigneth 22 years, 15. 14. and leaveth his Son Cyaxares his Succeſſor, ibid.

Phrynicus ſtandeth in fear of Alcibiades, 332. 64. he laboureth to deſtroy him though ineffectually, ibid.

Phyditia and Syſſitia, what, 110. 15.

Phyla, a Caſtle in the Territories of Athens, 344. 3. is ſeized upon by Thraſybulus, ibid.

Piraſus ſucceedeth Argus in the Kingdom of Argos, 80. 6.

Pirates, their Inſolence, 738. 30.

Piſathnes, the Governor of Lydia, 213. 22. Revolteth from Darius Nothus. ibid.

Piſiſtratidæ in the Government of Athens, who, and their Behaviour, 290. 11. they are baniſhed, 291. 13.

Piſiſtratus, Invadeth the Tyranny at Athens, 103. 30. is expell'd, ibid. 31. reſtored, ibid. 32. forced out again and recovereth the Tyranny, ibid. dieth not long after his reſtitution, 104. 32.

Pithon and Aridæus choſen in the room of Perdiccas, 561. 8. Pithon layeth down his Protectorſhip, ibid. is put to death by Antigonus, 565. 21.

Piſo (Lucius) Governour of Pamphilia, 803. 63. his ſucceſs, ibid.

Platæa yieldeth by Famine to the Lacedæmonians, and is deſtroyed, 315. 16. that and Theſpis both demoliſhed, 357. 35.

Plataniſta, among the Lacedæmonians, why ſo called, 110. 17.

Plato the Philoſopher, 406. 37. ſold by Dionyſius the Tyrant, ibid. returneth to Syracuſe, 407. 40. Plato ſent for by the Thebans and Arcadians, refuſeth to go to them, 360. 42.

Plautius, the Prætor, ſent to Britain, 853. 13. he and Veſpaſian proſper here, 854. ibid.

Plegras, vide Poſidæa.

Pliny, the Elder, Writer of the Natural Hiſtory, is ſuffocated with the ſmoak of the Hill Veſuvius, 876. 24.

Podarces, vide Priamus.

Polybus, King of Sicyonia, 78. 3.

Polycrates, the famous Tyrant of Samus, 287. 1. his exploits and felicity, 288. 4. is greedy after money, 289. 7. maketh a miſerable end, ibid.

Polydorus, the Son of Cadmus, ſucceedeth his Father in the Theban Kingdom, 125. 6. dieth, ibid.

Polyphides, a Sicyonian King, who Ruled 31 years, 78. 4.

Polyſperchon left by Antipater Protector of the Kings, 562. 10. inviteth Olympias into Macedonia, ibid. 12. reduceth her thither, 565. 19. is perſwaded by Caſſander, to make away Hercules, the baſe Son of Alexander, 568. 26.

Pompey (Strabo) Father to Pompey the Great, is Conſul with Cato, 727. 27. doth great ſervice in the ſocial War, 728. ibid. being Proconſul, he was kill'd with a Thunderbolt, 730. 5.

Pompey (after the Great) reſtoreth the Prieſthood to Hyrcanns, 659. 17. and carrieth Ariſtobulus, and his two Sons in Triumph to Rome, ibid. joyneth with Sylla, 729. 3. is ſent into Africk againſt Carbo, 733. 16. his other Acts againſt Sylla's Enemies, 735. 21. ſcoureth all the Seas about Africk of Pirates, 739. 32. defeateth Mithridates, 740. 35. rereduceth Syria into a Roman Province, 741. 37. invadeth Judæa, 742. 41. he and Craſſus obtain the Conſulſhip by violence, 763. 46. Pompey is ſole Conſul (780) 92. ſendeth to Cæſar (794) 10. he and the Senators leave Rome and go to Capua (795) 13. followeth the Conſuls to Dyrrachium (787) 19. his flight cenſured, ibid. 20. the occaſions of the Civil War between Pompey and Cæſar (798) 2. his affairs how they ſtood in Spain (800) 27. his Officers endeavour to remove the War (802) 31. his party hath the advantage by Sea (809) 50. he getteth out of Cæſar's Fortifications, and Incampeth on the Sea (813) 59. the Order of his Army before the Pharſalian Battle (815) 63. he flieth, 816. 66. his Soldiers ſubmit to Cæſar (817) 67. he flieth into Ægypt, and is there treacherouſly ſlain, ibid. 68. his Head is brought to Cæſar (821) 76.

Pompey (Sextus) his Son hath ſucceſs at Sea (812) 57. cauſeth a great Famine (845) 29. which procureth an agreement with him, ibid. the peace with him is broken (846) 30. he is overthrown by Cæſar, ibid. 32. is killed, 847. 33.

Pontius Pilate made Governour of Judæa in the room of Gratus, 834. 9. condemneth our Saviour, and delivereth him to the Soldiers to be Crucified, 840. 20. maketh report unto Tiberius of the Perſon and works of Chriſt, 846. 31. is ſent to Rome to give an account of his ſlaughtring the Samaritans, 847. 86. is baniſhed to Vienna, 849. 2. and two years after murdereth himſelf, ibid.

Pontus, a Country of Aſia, why ſo called, 728. 1.

Porſena maketh War againſt the Romans, 422. 17. a Peace concluded with him, 423. 19.

Porus, the Indian King is defeated, 551. 17. and taken by Alexander of Macedon, ibid.

Poſthumus made Emperour by the Soldiers in the reign of Gallienus, ruleth in Gall 10 years, 948. 6.

Pothinus, the Eunuch, 643. 33. cauſeth the Alexandrian War, 644. 38. is put to death by Cæſar, 645. 59.

Potidæa, a Town of Pallene, formerly call'd Plegra, afterward Caſſandra, and why, 306. 22. is a Colony of the Corinthians, aſſociated with the Athenians, ibid. delivered up to them, 313. 10.

Praxitus, Governour of Sicyon for the Lacedæmonians, obtaineth a Victory, 350. 16.

Prætor Created, his Office, 474. 41. the cauſes of his Creation, 475. 42.

Prætus, King of Argos, forced by his Brother to fly, but after they both agreed and divided the Kingdom, 81. 9.

Prexaſpes murdereth Smerdis, the Son of Cyrus, 180. 9. his violent death, 182. 3.

Priamus (Sirnamed Podarces) ſucceedeth his Father Laomedon, 87. 27. his Riches, large Dominions, Wives and Iſſue, ibid.

Priene, a Town in Ionia, under the Mountain Mycale, 305. 15.

Probus the Emperour, his Story and Acts, 949. 8. is ſlain by his Soldiers at Syrmium, ibid.

Procles and Euryſthenes obtain Sparta, 106. 3. both the Kings Reign with equal Power, ibid. 4.

Prodicus, among the Lacedæmonians, who 108. 11.

Prumnis ſucceedeth Agilaus in Corinth, reigneth 35. years, 121. 3.

Prytanis ſucceedeth Eurytion, 106. 4. dieth, ib.

Pſammenitus, Son of Amaſis, ſucceeded his Father in Ægypt, 70. 28. but loſt all, and Ægypt became a Province, ibid.

Pſammeticus, the Son of Gordias, Brother to Periander, held the Corinthian Kingdom after him, 123. 9. and then the people made themſelves a Free-ſtate, ibid.

Ptolomy, the Son of Lagus, 559. 2. getteth poſſeſſion of Ægypt, 560. 4.

Ptolomy Ceraunus, the Son of the former, by Euridice flieth into Ægypt to Seleucus, and killeth him, 574. 15. getteth Macedonia, and is kill'd by the Galles, ibid. 1.

Ptolomy Philadelphus made Co-partner with his Father in the Kingdom, 628. 1. how he came by the Sirname of Philadelphus, 631. 13. he maketh a confederacy with Rome, 689. 17.

Ptolomy Euergetes, revengeth the death of his Siſter Berenice, 599. 6. is invaded by Seleucus, ibid. 7. his Wars with Antiochus Theus, 632. 14.

Ptolomy ſirnamed Philopator, and why, 633. he dieth, 634. 18.

Ptolomy Epiphanes ſucceedeth the former, 634. 19. Contracteth Amity with the Achæans, 636. 22. is at laſt poiſoned, ibid.

Ptolomy Philometor, the Son of Epiphanes, ſucceedeth his Father, 636. 23. prepareth for Cœloſyria, but is prevented, ibid. outed of his Kingdom, 637. ibid. Expel'd by his rebellious Brother, is reſtor'd, ibid. 25. dieth of his wounds, fighting in vindication of Alexander Balas, his Son-in-Law, 622. 68. and 639. 27.

Ptolomy Phyſcon (ſirnamed alſo Euergetes and Cacergetes) and why, made King after the Expulſion of his Brother 637. 24. complaineth to the Romans, there being a Conteſt about the Kingdom between him and his Brother, and hath relief, ibid. 25. his Cruelty after he had unjuſtly obtained the Kingdom, 639. 27. ſuborneth a perſon againſt Demetrius Nicanor, 640. 28. dieth, ibid. and leaveth Ægypt to the diſpoſal of his Wives, ibid. 29.

Ptolomy Apion, the Baſe Son of Phyſcon, left by his Father's Will King of Cyrene, 640. 28.

Ptolomy Lathurus (or Lathyrus) goeth to relieve Syria with 6000 men 626. 80. is expell'd Ægypt by his Mother, ibid. recall'd by her, 640. 29. invadeth Judæa, but his projects are ſpoil'd by his Mother, 641. 30. and 653. 6. is reſtor'd, ibid. 31. entertaineth Lucullus the Roman, ibid. dieth, 641. 32.

Ptolomy Alexander the firſt, being known to the people to have killed his Mother, flieth, 641. 31.

Ptolomy Alexander the ſecond, enjoyeth the Kingom, ibid. 32.

Ptolomy (ſirnamed Auletes) and Dionyſius who ſucceedeth him, is expell'd by his rebellious Subjects, and betaketh himſelf to Rome, 642. 33. where getting no relief he departeth for Epheſus, 643. 34. hireth Gabinius to reſtore him, ibid. 35. dieth, ibid. 36.

Ptolomy Dionyſius his Eldeſt Son ſucceedeth him, with his Wife and Siſter Cleopatra joyntly, 943. 37. a War betwixt them, 644. 39, &c.

he

he is drowned in taking Boat to eſcape, 646.42.

Ptolomy, the ſecond Son of Auletes, married alſo to his Siſter Cleopatra by the means of Cæſar, ibid. 43. She murdereth her Brother, 647.44.

Ptolomy, the Mathematicians Catalogue of Babyloniſh Kings, 15.15.

Ptolomy ſucceedeth Damaſichthon in Thebes, 127.12.

Ptolomy, one of the Aſſociates of Apelles, is put to death for Treaſon, 585.28.

Publicans, why ſo named, 722. 11.

Pylus a ragged Promontory, anciently belonging to the Meſſenians, 316. 20. is ſecur'd, 317. 22.

Pyrrha, the Wife of Deucalion, 94. 3.

Pyrrhus, the Son of Æacidas King of Epirus, gaineth Macedonia, 573. 11. is called into Sicily by the Syracuſians, 679.29. proſpereth, but by his cruelty afterward loſeth himſelf, and departeth, ibid. 26. defeateth Lævinus by the help of his Elephants, 686. 11. marcheth toward Rome, ibid. 12. hath very ill ſucceſs, and paſſeth over into Sicily, 687. 14. returneth with difficulty, 688. 15. is defeated by Curius Dentatus the Conſul, ibid. 16. is expelled, by Lyſimachus, 573. 14. expelleth Antigonus Gonatas, and recovereth Macedonia, 575. 4. he endeavoureth to reſtore Cleonymus the Spartan, 576. ibid. is ſlain at Argos, ibid. 6.

Pythodorus, Archon at Athens, 310. 1.

Q.

Q*Uæſtors, when firſt made, and their number*, 420. 13. their duty, 421.13.

Quails and Manna rained down upon the Iſraelites, 35. 3.

Quintillus, Emperor of Rome, vide Aurelius.

Quirinus, vide Romulus.

R.

RAchel dies, 31. 13.

Rameſſes, the chief City of Goſhen, built by the Iſraelites in Ægypt, 34. 2.

Rape of the Sabine Virgins, 135. 7.

Reaſons for the Lies raiſed by the Ægyptians and others againſt the Jews, 66. 16.

Red-Sea (or Erythræan and Edomæan Sea) whence ſo called, 31. 14.

Regillus, a Lake in the Country of Tuſculum, known at this day by the name of Il Lago di Santa Severa, 429. 32.

Rehoboam ſucceeds Solomon, and the Ten Tribes deſert him, 49. 1. He and his Subjects rebel againſt God, but humble themſelves, He dies, ibid. 2.

Remus and his Brother grow ſucceſsful, 130. 9. their contention about the Building of a City, 131. ibid. Remus is ſlain in a Combat, ibid. 10.

Rhea the Daugther of Numitor bringeth forth Twins, Romulus and Remus, 130. 9.

Rhyntaces, a Perſian Bird, 223. 52.

Riſe of Sabbatical years and Jubilies, 40. 20.

Romans make the firſt League with the Carthaginians, 422.16. the firſt time of their applying themſelves to Sea, 691.3. wreſt Sardinia from the Carthaginians with more Tribute, 696, 16. make preparations for war againſt the Galles, 700. 27. ſoon recover their courage after their Defeat at Cannæ by Annibal, 705.40. Beſiege Capua, 706. 43. which is yielded, 707. 45. fight ſucceſsfully againſt the Galles, 711. 55. ſubdue ſeveral Nations, 714. 12. The Grandeur of the Roman Empire, 775. 1. it laboureth under its own weight, ibid. 2. under diſtempers, 776. 3. which Monarchy could only cure, ibid. 4. Stirs in the Provinces, 891.97.

Rome ſeated in Latium on the River Tiber, 127. 1. ſeveral opinions concerning it's Builder, 131. 10. variety of opinions concerning the time of its Building, 132. 12. the Foundation thereof and by whom, ibid. 1. why ſo called, ibid. great Commotions there, 430. 35. diverted by war, ibid. 36. the firſt Separation of the Commons there, ibid. a great Dearth cauſeth a Sedition in the City, 436. 48. Stirs and Commotions made there, 444. 67. a moſt grievous Plague, 449. 79. Luxury firſt brought thither from A*ſia by the Army of* Cn. Manlius Conſul, 713. 7. is divided into fourteen Regions, 808. 71. a great Famine there, 821. 96. Diſorders at Rome and in Italy, 822.79.

Romulus and Remus kill Amulius, and reſettle their Grandfather in his Kingdom, 130. 9. they lead out a Colony, 131. ibid. he foundeth Rome, and when, 132. 1. the number of the Colony he brought with him to plant it, ibid. 2. the diviſion and diſtinction of the Citizens made by him, ibid. Patrons and Clients 133. 3. he chooſeth a Senate, and cauſeth the Curiæ to make election of Celeres, and who they were, ibid. 4. appointeth the Office of King, Senate and People, 134. ib. maketh Laws, ibid. 5. his Defenſive Wars, 135. 7. groweth tyrannical, 136. 11. made away by the Senators, ibid. the Senators perſwade the multitude he was taken up among the Gods, that he would be a Propitious God unto them under the name of Quirinus. Lived 55 years, and reigned 37. dieth on the Nones of Quintilis, afterwards July, named Nonæ Caprotinæ from the place where he vaniſhed, &c. 137. 11.

Roſtra at Rome, whence ſo called, 478. 49.

S.

SAbines, beg peace of the Romans, 422. 23.

Sabinus, his good ſucceſs, 762. 41.

Salamina, the Iſland, its ſituation not far from Athens, revolteth to the Inhabitants of Megara, 99. 22. the Fight there betwixt the Greeks and Xerxes, 193. 36.

Salome, the Siſter of Herod, 812. 78. perſwadeth him to put his Wife Mariamne to death, ibid.

Salonæ, the valour of the Inhabitants there, 810.52.

Samaritans burn Andromachus, the Governour of Scythia alive, 254.53.

Samo-Thracia, a certain Iſland in Thrace, whence ſo called, 87.26.

Samnites, why ſo called, 477. 46. is defeated by the Romans, ibid. again, and deſire peace, 682. 4. put the Romans under the Yoke, 683. ibid. yet are often beaten by them, ibid. 6.

Sampſon, 43. 36.

Samuel, 44. 32.

Samus, an Iſland in the Mediterranean, 288. 3. Stirs there, 303. 15. the Army enraged at Athens, Athens, 333. 69. taketh an Oath againſt them, 334. ibid.

Sanballat, buildeth a Temple on Mount Gerizim, 251. 45.
Sanhedrim of the Jews, what, 36. 6.
Sarah dieth, 29. 8.
Sardanapalus (or Tonos-Concoleros) by the Greeks and Romans ſo termed, 13. 8. is conſpired againſt, ibid. he obtaineth three victories over them, yet is twice worſted, ibid. 9. burneth himſelf in his own Palace, 14. 11.
Sarmatæ, invade the Romans in Mæſia, 871. 14. and waſte the Countries adjacent by Fire and Sword, ibid.
Saturninus his ſedition, 726. 23. he is ſlain with his Complices, ibid.
Satyre among the Romans, what, 697. 17.
Saul, King, 45. 34. raiſeth the ſeige at Jabeſh-Gilead, ibid. 36. his three Sons are ſlain, 46. 37. he killeth himſelf, ibid.
Saul Converted, afterward Paul, 847. 85.
Scipio (Publius) Conſul is worſted by Annibal, and protected by the valour of his young Son, afterward Sirnamed Africanus, 703. 34. he and his Brother conquered the major part of Spain, 706. 43. but are both deſtroyed by dividing their Forces, ibid.
Scipio (Cneius) Brother of Publius, is ſent by him into Spain, 703. 35. he routeth Annibal and proſpereth, ibid.
Scipio (Sirnamed afterward Africanus) the Son of Publius preſerveth his Father in a dangerous condition, 703. 34. taketh upon him, though young, the Government of Spain, ibid. 45. and proſpereth exceedingly, ibid. ſubdueth Spain, 708. 48. is made Conſul, ibid. paſſeth into Africk, ibid. where he ſorely diſtreſſeth the Carthaginians, ibid. 49. who are thereupon forced to recal Annibal, 709. 50. whom he alſo defeateth, ibid. obtaineth the honorable Sirname of Africanus, ibid. 51. goeth Lieutenant under his Brother into Aſia, 712. 4. is called to account by the Tribunes, 713. 8. his high ſpirit ſhewn upon his accuſation, ibid. 9. is not condemned, through the mediation of Tiberius Gracchus, ibid. dieth at Linternum, whither he withdrew himſelf, 714. 11.
Scipio (Lucius) afterward Sirnamed Aſiaticus) Brother to Africanus, is made Conſul, 712. 4. and obtaineth Greece for his Province, ibid. ſubdueth Antiochus the Great, ibid. 5. taketh upon him the Sirname of Aſiaticus, ibid. is Fined, 713. 10.
Scipio Naſica (Corculum) ſubdueth the Dalmatians, 716. 17. earneſtly oppoſeth Cato in the Senate-houſe, about the deſtruction of Carthage, ibid. 18.
Scipio Naſica (Serapion) procureth the deſtruction of Gracchus, as he was ſpeaking to the people in the Capitol, 720. 7.
Scipio Æmilianus ſent into Spain, 716. 16. ſecureth the Army through his Wiſdom and Courage, 717. 20. is made Conſul, though under age, ibid. 21. taketh Carthage, ibid. 22. is Created Conſul, the ſecond time, 719. 3. beſiegeth Numantia, ibid. 4. and taketh it, ibid. dieth, 729. 9.
Scopas, the Ætolian, invadeth Macedonia, 583. 23. plotteth againſt the King and State, 635. 21.
Scribonia, the firſt Wife of Auguſtus, 792. 40. goeth voluntarily into baniſhment, 810. 74. was divorced from him the day ſhe brought forth Julia, ibid.
Scythians enjoy the Dominion of Aſia 28 years, 17. 21. and loſe it, ibid. 22. their manners and cuſtoms, 185. 12. they mock Darius, ibid. are overcome by Philip, 380. 29.
Secundianus, after the murder of Xerxes, becometh King, 212. 21. loſeth the favour of the Army by cauſing the Eunuch, Bagorazus, to be ſtoned, and his Brother murdered, he is ſent for by Ochus , and deſtroyed, ibid. reigned ſix moneths and twenty days, 213. 22.
Sejanus (Ælius) the great favourite of Tiberius, his Original and Parentage, 833. 7. Fortune and End, 834. ibid.
Seleucus, Governour of Babylon, flieth into Ægypt, 566. 21. recovereth Babylon, and the Eaſtern parts, 567. 24. is ſlain, 574. 15.
Seleucus (Sirnamed Callinicus and Pogon) ſucceedeth his Father Antiochus Theus, 596. 6. dieth with a fall from his Horſe, 597. 8.
Seleucus (Ceraunus) ſucceedeth his Father Callinicus, 597. 9.
Seleucus Philopator, ſucceedeth his Father Antiochus the Great, 39. 40. but is ſlain by the Treachery of Heliodorus, 30. ibid.
Seleucus, the Son of Demetrius Nicanor, is kill'd with a Dart by his Mother Cleopatra, 625. 78.
Seleucus, the eldeſt Son of Antiochus Gryphus, ſucceedeth his Father, &c. 627. 80. flieth to Cilicia, is received of the Mopſueſtians, but exacting mony from them, they burned him quick, with theſe about him, ibid.
Semiramis, the Wife of Ninus, 12. 6. perſonateth her Son Ninyas, ibid. 7. her Acts under that diſguiſe, ſhe is ſlain by her Son, ibid.
Sems Inheritance, and five Sons, 5. 12, &c.
Senate, at Rome, voteth an Amneſty (839) 5. the authority of the Senate, 805. 66. the place wherin they uſed to Aſſemble, 806. 67.
Seneca, the Philoſopher, School-maſter to Nero, 858. 24. conſulteth about the killing of Agrippina, Nero's Mother, 859. 28. is put to death by his Pupil, the Emperour, 862. 35. Lipſius his apologie for him, ibid.
Septuagint, their Tranſlation of the Bible into Greek, 628. 1.
Sertorius riſeth in Spain, 734. 20. is murdered by Perpenna in his Cups, 735. 21.
Servius (Tullius) his Deſcent and Education, 144. 28. obtaineth the Roman Kingdom, ib. 29, &c. Clippeth the Kingly Power, 146. 36. is murdered by his Son-in-Law, and his own Daughter, ibid. he reigned 44 years, 148. 39.
Seth, his Birth and Poſterity, 2. 3.
Severus (Septimius Lucius) an African born, is Governour of both the Pannonia's, 926. 2. obtaineth the Empire, 927. 3. ſuppreſſeth Niger, ibid. 4. and Albinus, ibid. 5, his ſucceſs in the Eaſt, 928. 6. vices, ibid. he cometh into Britain, ibid. 7. and for grief dieth at Eboracum, now York, ibid. the honours conferred upon him after his death, 929. 8.
Shamgar Judgeth Iſrael, 41. 44.
Sheba's Conſpiracy among the Iſraelites, 46. 39.
Sibyls, 149. 42. their Books, ibid. number, ibid. 43. Teſtimony concerning our Saviour, 844 28.
Sicanl, who, 387. 4. whether they came out of Spain, ibid.

Sicily,

Sicily, the Commotions there, 316.18. enjoyeth an univerſal peace, 318. 24. its names, and why ſo called, 386. 1. the old inhabitants there, ibid. 2. Greek Colonies there, 387. 3. Giants, ibid. 4. Corn brought thence to Rome, 436. 50. a Sun-dial brought from Catania in that Country to Rome, 690.2. Barbers fetcht from Sicily to Rome, ibid.
Sicima, a City of the Samaritans, ſeated on the foot of Mount Gerizim, 252. 47.
Sicyon, a City in the Bay of Corinth, 77. 1. why ſo named, 78. 3.
Sicyonia, the Soveraignty thereof obtained by the Prieſts of Apollo Carinius, 78, 4. Sicyonian Kingdom, it's great Antiquity, 77. 1.
Siccius Dentatus his Atchievements, 454. 90. a plot againſt him, 456. 93. revengeth himſelf on the Conſuls, ibid. 94. is murdered by the Decemviri, 462. 13.
Sidon, taken, and burnt by the Inhabitants, 240.7.
Sihon, King of Heſhbon, 38.12.
Simon, the Benjamite, his treachery againſt both his Religion, and Country, 609. 39.
Simon, choſen Prince and High-Prieſt of the Jews, 623.32. he and his two Sons are murdered by Ptolomy the Son of Abubus, his Son-in-law, 624. 74.
Simony, whence ſo called, 857. 22.
Siſygambis, the Mother of Darius Codomannus, taken by Alexander, 248. 36.
Smerdis, the Son of Cyrus, murdered, 180. 9.
Smerdis, the Magician (called Mardus, Sphendadates, and Oropaſtes) uſurpeth, 181. 1.
Sodom, &c. deſtroyed, 29. 7.
Solomon, the ſecond Son of Bathſheba, 46. 39. made King by his Father David, 47.41. putteth Adonijah, and others to death, ibid. the Building of his Temple, ibid. 42. his Navy, ibid.43. Buildings, 48. 45. Incontinency and Idolatry, ibid. 46. and Death, ibid.
Solon, one of the ſeaven Græcian Sages, 99.21. how he became Eminent at Athens, 99.22.&c. Reformeth the Common-wealth, 100. 24. Instituteth a Senate conſiſting of 400 perſons, 101. 24. that of the Areopagus, ibid. 25. the Aſſembly of the People, ibid. 26. Courts of Judicature, ibid.27. his particular Laws, 102.28. Travels, ibid. 29.
Soſthenes is overthrown by Brennus, and deſtroy'd, 375. 2.
Sous ſucceedeth Euryſthenes, 106. 4.
Sparta, whence ſo called, 105.1. is unwall'd 111. 19. Stirs there, 293. 19.
Spartans, in the Iſle Sphacteria, yield to mercy, 317. 23. their Behaviour after the Battel of Leuctra, 359. 39.
Spartacus, a Thracian Fencer, 738. 28. is defeated by Craſſus, ibid. 29. and ſlain, ibid.
Spendius and Mathos provoke the Multitude among the Carthaginians, 694. 10. they beſiege Carthage, 695.13.
Sphodrias invadeth Attica, 356.30.
Spurius (Mælius) affecteth the Kingdom at Rome, 469.27. is killed in the Forum by Ahala, ibid.
Stagira, the Native City of Ariſtotle, Alexanders Maſter, 382. 35. for his ſake is re-edified, 383. ibid.
Statira, Wife of Darius, dieth a Priſoner, 249.38.
Sthenelas reigneth 11 years in the Kingdom of Argos, 80.7.
Strato, King of Sidon, in Alexanders time, 249.38.
Suetonius, in Britain, ſubdueth the Silures, 859. 29. his Province revolteth, ibid. he defeateth the Britains in Battle, ibid. 31.
Suffetes, among the Carthaginians, who, 394.8.
Sulpitius, one of the Complices of Marius, 729.3. is found out, and put to death, ibid. 4.
Syloſon ſucceedeth Mæandrus, in Samus, 289.7.
Sylla (Lucius Cornelius) Quæſtor to Marius, in the War with Jugurtha, 725. 20. his Lieutenant in the Cimbrick War, ibid. 22. endeth the Social War, 728. 27. hath the charge of the War againſt Mithridates, 729. 3. taketh Athens, &c. 731. 9. overthroweth the Kings General Archelaus once, ibid. a ſecond time, ib. 10. forceth Mithridates to beg peace, ib.11. Fimbria's Army revolteth to him, 732. 12. he marcheth for Italy, ibid. landeth at Brundulium, and defeateth Norbanus the Conſul, ib. 13, entreth Rome, 733. 14. gaineth all Italy, ibid. 15. publiſheth Tables of proſcription, and rageth cruelly againſt perſons and Cities, ibid. 16. maketh himſelf Dictator in perpetuum, 734. 17. his actions during that Office, ib.18. he layeth down his power, ib. dieth at Puteoli of the Lowſie diſeaſe, ibid. 19. a difference ariſeth among the Conſuls about his Burial, and the Confirmation of his Acts, ibid.
Syracuſe, or Ortygia, its Original, 391. 2. is beſieged by Mago and Amilcar, by Sea and Land, 404. 3.
Syracuſians ſtand on their guard, 328.54. and are aided by the Corinthians and Spartans, ibid. recover their liberty, 397. 15. the form of their Common-wealth. ibid. 16. their Petaliſm, ib. Wars, 398.17. their State is new-model'd, ib. 18. they beg aid of the Corinthians, 411.50.

T.

TAbernacle reared, 36. 6.
Tachos, King of Ægypt, ſtrengtheneth himſelf, 236. 94.
Tacitus, a Man of Conſular dignity, is made choice of for Emperour after a ſix months Interregnum, 949. 8, but dieth within ſix months of a Feavour at Tarſus, ibid.
Tantalus, King of Phrygia, 87. 26. is beaten out of Paphlagonia, ibid.
Tarentines, their Original, 685.9. the deſcription of their City, Government and Converſation, ib. the cauſe of their War with the Romans, ibid. 10. they ſend for Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, ib.
Tarentum taken, 689. 17.
Tarquinius (Priſcus) his Pedigree, 142.24. King of Rome, ibid. 25. his Wars, ibid. 25. increaſeth the number of the Senate, 142. 26. and of the Veſtal Nuns, &c, ibid. is murdered, 143.27.
Tarquinius Superbus, his Original, and Carriage, 147. 37, &c. he buildeth the Capitol in part, 148.41. is baniſhed, 152. 50. his endeavours to recover his Kingdom, 426. 25. a War is made with the Latines on his behalf, ibid. 26. who are overthrown, and he dieth in Campania, 430.34. charity may be allowed him, ibid.
Tarquinius (Sextus) his Son Raviſheth Lucretia, 150. 44.
Tarquinius (Titus) his other Son, 429. 32.
Tarquinius (Collatinus) one of the two firſt Conſuls, 417. 5. is ſuſpected for endeavouring to bring in Tarquin, 419. 8. being generally hated by the people, he voluntarily layeth down his Office, ibid.

Targetius, a Noble-man, and lover of Cæſar, 774.75. Governour of the Carnutes, a people in Gall, ibid. 76.

Tatius, by agreement to Reign with Romulus, 136.9. is knock'd on the head, ibid. 10.

Telchines, King of Sicyonia, Governeth 20 years, 77. 1.

Teleſtes, the Son of Ariſtomedes ſlayeth Alexander the King of Corinth, and obtaineth his Fathers Kingdom, 121. 3. is ſlain by Arieus, and Perantas his Kinſmen, ibid.

Teleutias, ſent by the Spartans againſt the Olynthians, is ſlain, 354. 27.

Temenus, obtaineth Argos, 913. 7.

Temple of Juno, at Athens, burnt, 320. 31.

Temple built to God at Heliopolis, by the procurement of Onias, 616. 56. is ſpoiled by Lupus Governour of Alexandria, 874. 20. and abſolutely deſtroyed by Paulinus his ſucceſſour, ibid.

Tennes, King of Sidon, 239. 5. joyneth with Mentor to betray Sidon to Ochus, 240. 7. is ſlain, ibid.

Terentia, the Wife of Mecænas, intirely beloved by Auguſtus, 779. 55.

Terah, 27.2.

Terituchmes falleth in love with Roxana, 213.23.

Tertullian the Carthaginian Presbyter falleth foul on Zepherinus Biſhop of Rome, and the whole Roman Clergy, 933. 17.

Teucer, the Son of Scamander King of Teucris, 87.26.

Teucris, taketh its name from him, ibid.

Teuta, Queen of the Illyrians, obtaineth a peace from Rome, 699. 24.

Tigranes, King of Armenia obtaineth Syria, 627. 81. receiveth and protecteth Mithridates, his Father-in-Law, 736. 24 is overthrown by Lucullus, 737. 26. he waſteth Cappadocia, ib. 27. ſubmitteth to Pompey, 740. 36. the conditions ſet him by the Conquerour, 741. ib.

Tigranes, the Son rebelling againſt his Father flieth to Pompey, ibid.

Timoleon, is ſent to the aid of the Syracuſians, 411. 50. recovereth Syracuſe, and ſettleth the ſtate there, 412. 52. putteth Hicetas, Mamercus, and Hippo to death, 414. 55. ſtrippeth Nicodemus and Apolloniades of their power, ib. 56. his death, glory and honour, ibid.

Tiſamenus ſucceedeth Oreſtes, 90. 34, is turned out by the Heraclidæ, ibid.

Tiſamenus, the Son of Therſander, reigneth at Thebes, 127. 12.

Tiſſaphernes marrieth the Daughter of Artaxerxes, 220. 43. entrappeth the Græcian Officers, ibid. 44. is impeached by Pharnabazus, 225.58. reneweth the War with the Peloponnеſians, 332.66. ſecureth Alcibiades, 337.78. is put to death, 227.64.

Titus, Largius, Flavus, the firſt Dictator, 429. 31.

Titus, the Son of Veſpaſian, vide Veſpaſian.

Titurius, with Cotta, defeated and ſlain, (775) 77.

Tolah judgeth Iſrael, 42.26.

Tomyris, Queen of the Maſſagetes, killeth Cyrus, 178. 3.

Trajan, ſucceedeth Nerva in the Empire, 881. 4. maketh war on the Daci, 882. ibid. and maketh a ſecond Expedition, ibid. 5. cauſeth a Bridg to be made over the Danube, ibid. 6. his familiar Converſation, 883. 7, warreth againſt the Parthian King, ib. 8. taketh in Adiebene, a part of Aſſyria, 884. 9. ſaileth to the Ocean, ib. 10. maketh a fruitleſs Expedition againſt the Agareni in Arabia, ib. 11. perſecuteth the Chriſtians, 885. 14. diſcourſeth with Ignatius Biſhop of Antioch, 886. 14, and afterward cauſeth him to be devoured by wild Beaſts at Rome, ibid. Mitigateth the Perſecution of the Chriſtians, ibid. 15. dieth, 888. 18.

Trapezond, a Græcian City ſituate on the Euxine Sea, 221. 47.

Tribuni Plebis, why ſo called, 433. 41. their Number, Power and Priviledge, ibid. the Ballance to their power, ibid. 42. the Extraviganсy thereof, 434. ibid. ſeveral other ſorts of Tribunes, ibid. 43. their Plot diſcovered by the Conſul, 451.83. their number increaſed to ten, 453. 87. their Incroachments, ibid. 88.

Tribuni Militum, the third great Change of Roman Government, 466. 20. they endeavour to revenge the death of Mælius by bringing in Tribunes Military again, 469. 28. the firſt Plebeian among them, 470.31.

Tricipitina, what, and by whom made, 745.48.

Triopas, King of the Argives, 80. 6. he ruleth 36 years, ibid.

Triumviri, Condemn the Eſtates of Women to get money, (842) 22. fall out (845) 29. are reconciled, and a new Agreement made, ibid.

Trojans, their Original, 87.26. the Trojan War, ibid. 25. they land at Laurentum, and pitch their Tents in Troy, 129. 5. and upon what occaſion, ibid.

Tros, the Son of Erichthonius, ſucceedeth him, 87.26.

Troy, when built, and why ſo called, ibid. taken by the Greeks, 89. 31.

Tryphon ſetteth up Antiochus, the young Son of Balas, againſt Demetrius, 622. 69. but intendeth himſelf to get the Kingdom, ibid. 70. killeth Jonathan, ibid. and Antiochus the new King, 623.72. is diſpoſſeſſed, and flieth, ib. 73. ſlain at Apamea, his own Country, ibid.

Tullus Hoſtilius created King of Rome, 139. 17. his War with the Albans, ibid. reigneth 32 years, 141. 21. and dieth, ibid.

Turnus the Fugitive his Story, 129.6.

Turpilianus ſucceedeth Suetonius in Britain, 861. 31. but proveth very negligent and ſloathful, ibid.

Tyndareus, the Son of Oebalus, contendeth for the Kingdom of Lacedæmon, 105. 2. is worſted, baniſheth himſelf, and is reſtored by Hercules, ibid.

Tyrant, whence derived, and it's ſignification, 287. 1. & ibid. 2. &c.

Tyrants at Athens, their number and actions, 343. 1. they fill all places with Murders and Rapines, 344.2. their power is abrogated, 345. 3. they ſend for Aid from Sparta, ibid. 4.

Tyre, built, and by whom, 251. 42. is taken by Alexander, 250. ibid.

Tyrtæus, the Athenian lame School-Maſter and Poet, 118. 40.

Teutanus, the Aſſyrian King, ſlain, 13.7.

Thais, the Courtiſan, cauſeth Alexander to burn the Palace of Perſepolis, 259. 67.

Thaſians are envied by the Athenians for their Mines, 300. 8.

Thaſus

Thaſus, whence ſo called, 124. 3. is Inhabited by a Colony of Parians, 314. 29.

Thebans, they deſtroy the Town called Orchomenus, 364. 54. fall upon Alexanders Garriſon in Cadmea, 384. 38.

Thebes, the Metropolis of Bœotia, 123. 1. the Builder thereof is not certainly known, ibid.

Thelxion firſt King of Sicyonia, worſhipped as a God after his death, 77. 1. cometh to Crete, and killeth the Minotaure, 96. 13.

Themiſtocles, and Ariſtides, a ſhort Character of them, 296. 30. the Acts of Themiſtocles after the flight of Xerxes, 301. 7.

Theramenes, one of the 30 Athenian Tyrants, is poiſoned, 344. 2.

Thermopylæ, the only paſſage out of Theſſaly into Greece, 194. 37. a great Fight there, ibid. 39.

Thero, his Parentage, 391. 1. he Tyranizeth at Agrigentum, ibid.

Therſander, the third Son of Siſyphus, 120. 1.

Therſander, the Son of Polynices, placed in the Kingdom of Thebes, by the Epigoni, 127. 11. he Saileth with Agamemnon, toward Troy, and is kill'd in Myſia by Telephus, ibid.

Theſeus born, 94. 7. arriveth at Athens, &c. ib. 8. his Acts, 95. ib. he gathereth the Athenians into one City, 97. 14. his exploits, ib. 15. exile, ib. 16. is made away by Lycomedes, being thrown by him from a Rock, 98. 16.

Theutobochus, King of the Cimbri, 725. 22. is taken Priſoner by Marius, and his Army totally routed, ibid.

Thimbrio is ſent to aſſiſt the Greek Cities, 224. 54. he falleth on Magneſia, ibid, is ſent alſo into Aſia, 346. 7.

Thoas, the Son of Ornytion, obtaineth the Kingdom of Corinth, 121. 3.

Thrace, the affairs thereof are very Obſcure and intricate, 723. 15.

Thraſybulus, the Athenian, perſwadeth the Army to reeal Alcibiades, 334. 70. his Acts, 338. 81. he oppoſeth the 30 Tyrants at Athens, 344. 3. is ſent againſt the Lacedæmonians, 352. 21. and ſlain, ibid. 22.

Thraſybulus, the Brother of Hieron, ſeizeth on the power of Syracuſe, 397. 15. flieth into Locri, and murdereth himſelf, 397. 15.

Thucydides, the Hiſtorian, is General of the Athenians, 319. 29.

Thurimachus, King of Sicyonia, 77. 1. Reigneth 54 years, ibid.

Thymœtes, the 15th King of Athens, a Baſtard, murdereth his Brother Aphidas, 98. 17. Reigneth 8 years, ib. and then is depoſed, ib. 18.

Tiberianus, his Letter to Trajan, the Emperour, concerning the Chriſtians, 886. 15.

Tiberius (Gracchus) raiſeth a ſedition about the Agrarian Law, 719. 5. propoſeth another for the diviſion of mony, 720. 7. he and his Complices are kill'd, ibid.

Tiberius Nero, granteth his Wife Livia Druſilla, to Octavius Cæſar, 792. 40.

Tiberius, his Son, is ſent by Auguſtus againſt Artabazes, 796. 49. his performances, and Conceits, ibid. hath good ſucceſs, with his Brother Druſus againſt the Rebels to the Roman Empire, 800. 56. quieteth all in the Eaſt, 804. 64. Warreth againſt the Germans, and hath the Title of Imperator conferred on him by Auguſtus, 807. 69. withdraweth to Rhodes upon diſcontent, 809. 72. leadeth a private life there, ibid. 73. requeſteth leave to return, but is denied, 815. 85. recalled by Caius Cæſar's Permiſſion, 816. 86. adopted, 817. 88. ſent again into Dalmatia, 825. 104. compoſeth the War, 826. 105. honours voted to him and others, ibid. Invadeth Germany to ſmall purpoſe, 828. 109. his Birth, Education and Temper, 832. 3. obtaineth the Empire, ibid. diſſembleth his vices, ibid. 4. envieth Germanicus, ibid. his Cruelties and Character by his Maſter, 834. 8. endeavoureth to have Chriſt our Lord Regiſtred among the Roman Deities, 846. 31. he dieth, 848. 88.

V.

Valerianus, a man of noble Deſcent, created Emperor by his Army near the Alps, 948. 5. he perſecuteth the Chriſtians, taken Priſoner by the Perſians, uſed as a Footſtool to tread on, hath his skin pull'd over his ears, and ſo is tortured to death, ibid.

Valerius Aurelianus made Emperor, 948. 6. of mean Parentage, but an excellent Soldier, beateth the Goths, perſecuteth the Chriſtians, is ſlain in the War againſt the Perſians, 949. 7.

Valerius Corvinus why ſo called, 476. 45.

Valerius Lævinus recovereth all Sicily, 708. 46.

Valerius Poplicola, Conſul in the room of Collatinus, 419. 9. is ſuſpected, but cleareth himſelf, ibid. 10. his Conſtitutions, 420. 11. Death, Lamentation, and the Honours beſtowed upon him, 425. 22.

Varro (Terentius) Conſul, overthrown by Annibal at Cannæ, 705. 38.

Varro, the greateſt Scholar among the Greeks or Romans, 735. 21. his actings againſt Cæſar, (805) 39. is forced to ſubmit, ibid.

Varus (Quintilius) and his Legions moſt ſhamefully deſtroyed by the Germans, 827. 107. which extremely afflicted Auguſtus, ibid. 108.

Vedius (Pollio) his Wealth and Cruelty, 808. 56. he dieth and leaveth Auguſtus a good part of his Eſtate, ibid.

Veii, a powerful people in Hetruria, overcome, 136. 10.

Veii the City, after ten years Siege, taken by Furius Camillus, 471. 33.

Veientes pierce within two miles of the City of Rome, 446. 72.

Ventidius, Lieutenant to Marc Antony, proſpereth againſt the Parthians, (845) 30.

Verulamium, a Municipal City of the Romans in Britain, deſtroy'd by the Natives, 860. 30.

Vercingetorix, the Son of Celtillus, (781) 94. perſwadeth the Galles to waſt their own Country to cut off all Forrage from the Romans, ib. 97. Comforteth the Galles for the loſs of Avaricum, (782) 99. prepareth to oppoſe Cæſar at the Siege of Valeſia, (784) 103. is taken by Cæſar at that Siege, (787) 114.

Veſpaſian (Flavius) put upon ſeeking the Empire of Rome, 868. 5. his Acts in Judæa, ibid. 6. ſubdueth all that Country except three Caſtles and Jeruſalem, 869. 8. the Armies in the Eaſt declare for him, ibid. 9. the Senate decree him the Empire, 870. 10. Lex Regia renewed on his behalf, 874. 22. ſeveral of his Acts, 875. 24. his Character, 876. ibid. he dieth of a Flux, ibid.

Veſpaſian (Titus) ſent by his Father to Alexandria to ſuppreſs the Jews, 864. 42. Beſiegeth Jeruſalem, 872. 16. breaketh into it, ib. 16. the Temple is burnt, 873. 18. he commandeth the Temple and City to be razed, ibid. 19. ſucceedeth his Father, 876. 25. his admirable Virtues, ibid. 26. ſeveral Calamities in his time, 877. ibid. dieth, ibid. 27.

Victor, Biſhop of Rome ſharply reprehended, 92.

Vindex conſpireth againſt Nero, 865. 41.

Virginius killeth his own Daughter to prevent her Violation by Appius Claudius the Decemvir, 463. 15.

Vitellius (Lucius) Preſident of Syria, expelleth Pilate, 847. 86. depoſeth Joſeph, ſirnamed Caiphas, from the Prieſthood, 848. 88.

Vitellius (Aulus) Son of Lucius, oppoſeth Otho, 867. 2. though deteſted by the people, owned Emperor, ib. 3. is very vitious, ibid. 4. Cruel, 868. 5. kill'd in a moſt Ignominious manner, and thrown into Tiber, 870. 10.

Ulpianus, the Lawyer, 931. 14.

Voluſian, the Son of Gallus Hoſtilianus, ſlain in the Battle with Æmilianus, 947. 4.

Utica, whence ſo called, 395. 5. its Antiquity, ib.

Uxellodunum, a Town of the Cadurci, taken by Cæſar, (790) 121.

Uzziah, King of Iſrael at 16 years of age, he invading the Prieſt-Office, was ſtruck with Leproſie, which occaſioned his death, 52. 10.

W.

W*Ar with the* Argives, 112. 21. with the Meſſenians, 114. 27. &c. War of the Lacedæmonians with the Argives, 116. 33. War with the Meſſenians renewed, ibid. 34. the end of the firſt Meſſenian War, 117. 36. the ſecond Meſſenian War, ibid. 38. the end thereof, 119. 42. War Theban, 126. 10. the end of the Sabine War, 136. 10. Median War endeth after two years, 203. 67. the Laconick or Bœotian War ended, 235. 91. Civil Wars betwixt Iſagoras and Clyſthenes of Athens, 291. 15. War betwixt the Athenians and Æginetans, 295. 25. the Phocians and Dorians, 302. 12. the Social War, 372. 9. Phocian or Sacred War, 374. 13. War of the Romans with the Sabines, 424. 21. Latins, 426. 26. with the Volſci, 435. 46. the Æqui and Volſci, 449. 80. with the Samnites, 477. 46. the Privernates, 479. 50. the Lamian War in Greece, 560. 4. War betwixt the Ætolians and Achæans, 577. 9. the Social War of Greece and its Original, 541. 18. War Alexandrian, 644. 39. War decreed againſt the Palæopolitans, 681. 1. with the Samnites a ſummary account thereof, 683. 6. War Macedonian, 709. 52. with Perſeus 714. 12. Pretences for the third Punick War, 716. 18. a ſervile War in Sicily, 719. 4. the Allobrogick War, 723. 14. occaſion of the Social War, 727. 25. Preparations for it, ib. 26. Civil Wars betwixt Pompey and Cæſar, the grounds and occaſion thereof (798) 2. Cæſars account (792) 4. what others wrote thereof, ibid. 5. the beginning of that War, ib. 6. War in Germany, (807) 69. Roman War with the Jews finiſhed by Sylva, 874. 20. the Peruſian War betwixt Cæſar and the Brother and Wife of Marc Antony (844) 27.

Wiſe Men of Greece, their Names and Number, 298. 33. ſeveral other Wiſe Men, and the time when they flouriſhed, ib. 34. 35.

Writers, what they ſay of Cæſar, (808) 47. what of the War between Cæſar and Pompey, (820) 74.

X.

XAnthus, the laſt King of Thebes, ſlain by Melanthus the Meſſenian in a ſingle Combat, 127. 12. after whoſe death the Thebans ruled in a Democratical way, ibid.

Xenophon's Cyropœdia ſumm'd up, 25. 43. Marcheth with Cyrus the younger againſt his Brother, 220. 44. is choſen Captain in Proxenus his room, his antient Friend and Gueſt, ibid. the Excellency of his Conduct in the Retreet of the Greeks, 223. 50. more of him, and his Commendation, 369. 66.

Xerxes the Son of Darius by Atoſſa, ſucceedeth his Father in the Perſian Empire, 190. 28. recovereth Ægypt, 191. ibid. Conſulteth about renewing the War with Greece, ibid. 29. &c. Wintereth at Sardis, 191. 30. paſſeth over into Europe, 192. 32. the prodigious number of his men, 192. 34. invadeth Greece, 194. 38. flieth, and he and his Army are totally routed, 199. 53. his incontinence, 204. 69. the length of his Reign, 205. 74. is ſtrangled in his Bed, ibid.

Xerxes, the Son of Artaxerxes Longimanus, ſucceedeth his Father, and is murdered by his Baſe Brother, Secundianus, 212. 21.

Z.

ZAbinas, (or Zabinæus) ſuborned by Ptolomy Phyſcon, getteth the Kingdom of Syria, 625. 77.

Zaleucus, the Lawgiver of Locri, his Model of Government, 410. 47. the form thereof, ib. 48. &c.

Zamolxis, the Getan Lawgiver, 35. 4.

Zathrauſtes, a Lawgiver among the Arimaſpians, ibid.

Zealots, horrid outrages committed by them in Jeruſalem, 869. 7. they fall out among themſelves, 872. 15.

Zedekiah made King over the Jews by Nebuchadnezar, 55. 23. dieth miſerably, 56. ibid.

Zeno, the Sitiean, the Father of the Stoicks, when born, 369. 66.

Zethus, vide Amphion.

Zeuxippus, Son of Apollo by the Nymph Syllis, King of Sicyonia, reigned four years, 78. 4.

Zopyrus, Son of Megabyzus, one of the chief Commanders in Darius his Army, by mangling his face, and cutting off his ears and noſe, recovereth Babylon, 184. 10.

Zoroaſtres, (or rather Oxyartes) King of the Bactrians, 12. 5.

Zoroaſtres the Magician, ibid.

Zorobabel layeth the Foundation of the Second Temple at Jeruſalem, 178. 2.

FINIS.

AN INSTITUTION OF General Hiſtory, OR THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD.

The ſecond Part.

v. 2, part 1

CONTAINING

That of the Roman Empire, its flouriſhing Condition, its Middle or Neutral State, and its Ruine and Downfal in the Weſt.

FROM

The Monarchy of Conſtantine the Great to the taking of Rome by Odoacer King of the Heruli, and the Erecting of a Kingdom of Barbarians in Italy.

WITH

An Account of the Polity of the Empire, and of the ſeveral Laws of Moment made, during the Reigns of the Emperors, both in Eaſt and Weſt to this Period.

By WILLIAM HOWEL, LL. D. ſometimes Fellow of Magdalen College in Cambridge.

LONDON,
Printed for Thomas Baſſett, at the George in Fleetſtreet, William Crook, at the Green Dragon without Temple-Bar, and William Cademan at the Pope's Head in the New Exchange. 1680.

UMI

Whitehal,

THis Second Part of Doctor William Howel's Inſtitution of General Hiſtory, or Hiſtory of the World, beginning from the Monarchy of Conſtantine the Great, and continued to the taking of Rome by Odoacer King of the Heruli and the Deſtruction of the Empire of the Weſt :

Is Licenced to be Printed by the Conſent and Direction of the Right Honourable Henry Coventry Eſquire, His MAJESTIE'S Principal Secretary of State.

Jo. COOK.

AN INSTITUTION OF General Hiſtory, OR THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD.

The ſecond Part.

v. 2, part 1

CONTAINING

That of the Roman Empire, its flouriſhing Condition, its Middle or Neutral State, and its Ruine and Downfal in the Weſt.

FROM

The Monarchy of Conſtantine the Great to the taking of Rome by Odoacer King of the Heruli, and the Erecting of a Kingdom of Barbarians in Italy.

WITH

An Account of the Polity of the Empire, and of the ſeveral Laws of Moment made, during the Reigns of the Emperors, both in Eaſt and Weſt to this Period.

By WILLIAM HOWEL, LL. D. ſometimes Fellow of Magdalen College in Cambridge.

LONDON,
Printed for Thomas Baſſett, at the George in Fleetſtreet, William Crook, at the Green Dragon without Temple-Bar, and William Cademan at the Pope's Head in the New Exchange. 1680.

X 909
H839i
1680
v.2
cop2

TO THE KING.

May it Pleaſe Your Majeſty,

I Here moſt humbly Preſent to Your Majeſties Patronage a Second Volume, or Continuation, of that Hiſtory which Your Majeſty was Pleaſed formerly to Accept, and to Incourage. The Extent of it is not ſo large as that of the former, as to Time; but it is rather Superior to it, in reſpect of the Matter which it handles. Here is preſented to View, the greateſt Empire, or the Roman, in its full Latitude and Proportion; as to its Polity, and manner of Government, both Military and Civil. And here is Vindicated one of the greateſt Monarchs it ever produced, Conſider him in all Circumſtances; ſo much Your Majeſties Predeceſſor, that in this Your Kingdom he had his Original, not only of Empire, but Life alſo, as is moſt Probable, and was the firſt Defender of the Faith; the true Reaſon of all the Calumnies raiſed againſt him. This Volume alſo Contains that great Revolution of the Ruine of the Roman Empire in the Weſt; by what means and methods it was accompliſhed. All which the Author lays at Your Majeſties Feet, being

Your Majeſties

most Loyal Subject

William Howel.

¶

854714

PREFACE.

THE Author having already given an Account of the Occaſion of his Undertaking this Work, as alſo of the Uſefulneſs of the Subject; yet finds himſelf obliged here to have ſomething ſaid which may contribute to the Reader's benefit in the Peruſal of this Second Volume, and that Reader who is utterly unacquainted with the State and Condition of the Times on which it inſiſts.

In his Preface to his Elements of Hiſtory in Latin.

Such an one having Peruſed the Firſt Part of this Work, and conſidered the Method of its Books and Chapters, the Diſpoſition thereof, the Synchroniſms and Conjunction of the Empires and Contemporaries, will be prompted thence to look for the ſame in this, and, perhaps, tax the Author for want of Skill or Diligence; when the want is only in his own Head, of due Knowledg and Conſideration.

For upon ſearch, he will diſcover the then known World, poſſeſſed and governed in a manner by one Empire; and ſuch Kingdoms as were at the ſame time in Being, to have had little obſervable, and upon Record, but in relation to this Empire, as ingaged in War or otherwiſe concerned, with it. From the Monarchy of Auguſtus, till the Taking of Rome by the Heruli, and the Diſſolution of the Empire in the Weſt, there are otherwiſe no Contemporaries conſiderable. Perhaps the Names and Succeſſion of ſome Perſian, or of other barbarous Princes may be found, mentioned by the way, of which it would be imprudent ſeparately to Treat, till theſe Northern barbarous Nations be found fixed and grown to ſome conſiderableneſs, by their Eſtabliſhing of Kingdoms in the Roman Soil. Then the Reader will have them (being the Beginnings of theſe Modern Powers he ſees in Chriſtendom and elſewhere) deſcribed as to their Original, Progreſs and Polity, in the ſame Method as he beholds the firſt Volume; as Contemporary with the Roman Empire ſtill ſubſiſting, though under a new and ſecond Head, in the Eaſt.

Farther, the Author upon ſome Intelligence of late received, doth fancy he ſees ſuch a Reader, taking his Proſpect of this Book from the laſt Page thereof, inſtead of that of the Title, and turning to the End inſtead of looking at the Beginning, with a Queſtion, How far down doth it come? and poſſibly concluding his Survey with this Expreſſion of Diſappointment, What no further? And his haſte to make the Diſcovery, he imagines, may be ſo great, as not to conſult this Preface in his way, and thence to take his Meaſures, whereby his Queſtions and Wonder might be prevented.

But the Author thinks it the beſt ſort of Remedy in this caſe, to drive out a leſſer Wonder by a greater, by telling him, That he is very ſorry for his Miſtakes; but exceeding ſorry that this Second, and the other Volumes now in a manner ready to come forth, reach ſo far as they do. His Reaſons are, becauſe the Civil State of theſe Times, whereof now he writes, is exceeding Dark. That in the next place, few have undertaken to make them lighter with any great Succeſs. And yet they are ſuch as afforded rather more Copious Matter for Hiſtories, than any other before or ſince. Never ſo ſpacious and Potent an Empire as that of the Romans. Never ſuch Revolutions as in the Cantonizing of this Empire into particular Barbarous Kingdoms; in the Motions of the Goths and Vandals, and other Northern Nations, and their various Attempts often fruſtrated, and at laſt prevailing. What Battels! What Stratagems in War! What Conſultations! What Policies did they procure! How would our Annals have ſwelled with ſuch Paſſages, had the Particulars happened in our days?

How great a Pleaſure would it have been to any that deſire to underſtand the ſtate of former Ages, and the Original of their own Nation, to have had diſcovered how by degrees the poor Britans were Conquered by the Engliſh Saxons, and others, Invaders of this Iſland? Numerous muſt have been the Battels, and various the Arts or Acts which muſt have rooted them out, and driven them out of theſe Parts, into the Mountainous Coaſts, or beyond the Seas. How delightful would it have been to know the Diſtribution of the Conquered Countries, the planting of Colonies, the modelling of theſe petty Kingdoms, the Deſtruction of the ancient Cities and Towns where ſuch quantities of Roman Coins are now digged up, the Building of new, and the way of Governing all?

The Author profeſſeth he cannot travel the Countrey about Salisbury or other Plains, where thoſe Tumuli are preſented to his View (by which he imagines a Battel may be traced, and the Places and Greatneſs of ſlaughter diſcovered, though they be but blind Monuments of the Slain) but he muſt needs ſigh, and apply Horace his Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona, &c. to this and other unhappy Occaſions.

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona Multi, ſed omnes illachrymabiles urgentur, ignotiq; longa Nocte, carent quia vate ſacro. Carm. lib. 4. Od. 9.

Reader, thou can'ſt afford, That the Hiſtory of a few years of Modern Paſſages, (perhaps a Civil War) make up an entire Volume, and not grudge that the Writers dwell upon ſuch things as have in ſome reaſonable manner been handled alſo by others; and is thy Curioſity ſo ſmall, as to be content with ſome Scraps of former Ages, not Barren of great and glorious Things, but rather Barren of ſuch Writers as were able to tranſmit them to Poſterity? Would'ſt thou be content, as to them, with a few Names? a few inſignificant Hints? Deſireſt thou a rough Draught, or rather preferreſt ſome touches, before a Picture? Do'ſt thou covet a Rhapſodie? and art thou in Love with Meagerneſs and Skeletons? Conſider what thou would'ſt have: This ſecond Volume, perhaps, drawn down to the Conqueſt, or thou cared'ſt not if even to our preſent Times. Thou knoweſt not, then, what numerous Kingdoms, States, and Principalities are contained in theſe Centuries. Alas! thou wouldſt be little or nothing bettered in the Knowledge of Times, of Succeſſions, of Myſteries of War and Peace. Such a Book would ſcarcely exceed the worth of the Since's of a Two penny Almanack; perhaps more right in its Chronology, but little more conſiderable for its Materials.

But to give thee ſome Satisfaction in the room of the pleaſing variety of Contemporaries, which here are not to be had; and to quiet thine Imagination, the Author hath done his Indeavour to preſent thee as it were with a Proſpect of a new World. Other ſorts of Perſons, Magiſtrates, Offices and Imployments, thou wilt poſſibly here meet with than thou takeſt notice of in Livy, Florus, Suetonius, or Tacitus. The Author finding thee a Stranger, hath reſolved to take ſuch pains, as a good Governor or Guide, who hath Intereſt and Acquaintance, is wont to do with young Travellers. He will carry thee to Court, and there ſhew thee the Greateſt Monarch in the World, his Perſon, Power, State, and Magnificence. He will labour to acquaint thee with all his Miniſters, and let thee know the Nature and Extent of their Authority and Juriſdictions; lead thee into all their Offices, and ſhew thee the manner of their Proceeding, and expediting their Buſineſs; how they, and thoſe under them, were choſen and admitted to, and how deveſted of their Imployments. From the Court, he will Conduct thee into the Country, and there make known to thee, the Government of the Provinces, how ſubordinate, with the manner and limitations of their Adminiſtration. He would be ſorry to leave thee unacquainted with the Cities and Corporations, their Courts, their Chief Magiſtrates, and Inferior Officers, and that in the Execution of their Powers. He is Ambitious alſo to inſtruct thee in the Diſcipline of the Camp, the Power, Variety, and Subordination of Commanders; in Sum to give thee a full View of the whole Polity, both Military and Civil. This he hath propoſed to himſelf, being of Opinion, That an Hiſtorian's Task, as to Times paſt, is much the ſame with that of a faithful and able Governor of Travellers, as to the preſent.

Not only to ſhow thee a pleaſant City or Country, to give thee opportunity of knowing ſome Stratagems of a Battel, and the manner of Beſieging a Town; but alſo as much apprehenſion, as can be with Conveniency, of the Cuſtoms and Laws of the Country; ſuch Laws as reſpect the Jus Publicum, the Polity, ſtate and manner of Government, not ſo much the Jus Privatum, or that betwixt man and man concerning Contracts, Actions, and manners of Proceedings in Courts, for that would be to ſuppoſe thee rather a Native of the Country, where ſuch Laws are in force, not a Stranger; and for him to write a Book of Law, and not of Hiſtory.

It is to be acknowledged, That he hath not many to imitate in this kind, and that moſt Writers have been ſo ſtrait laced, as if a principal Law of an Hiſtory were to have no Laws mentioned in it. But conſider whether Profit or Pleaſure be the chief end of Hiſtory; if Profit, whether it conſiſt in underſtanding things of leſſer or greateſt Conſequence and Uſe for Humane life. Certainly thoſe of greateſt Conſequence are thoſe which relate to the Publick, which are in the hands and management of Princes, Magiſtrates, and publick Perſons. If Hiſtories be uſeful, becauſe they ſet before us good Patterns and Examples, and ſhew us what Errors and Miſtakes have been committed, and how to prevent or redreſs them, certainly this is moſt deſirable as to the grand Intereſt of a State or Government it ſelf. Now this Law Hiſtory doth perform above all others. Fundamental Laws ſhew the Wiſdom of firſt Settlements, and other Laws occaſionally made, direct how to ſupply ſuch Defects, and Cure ſuch Diſtempers as, through the naughtineſs and frailty of Men, and the viciſſitude of Times and Affairs are incident to all Governments. And as Law-Hiſtory acquaints us with things of moſt Publick and general concernment; ſo of all others it is moſt certain, and leſs liable to Miſtakes. By the Medicine, we may well judg of the Diſeaſe; the Legiſlative Authority being preſumed to underſtand more than a private Man, concerning the Conſtitution and Craſis of a State; as, in a Diſeaſe, the Skill of a practiſed Phyſitian exceeds that of a Perſon whoſe breeding hath not fitted him for ſuch Obſervations.

And however the Practice of Law-Hiſtory hath been generally omitted, and thoſe of a War, or more ordinary things been followed; yet ſome Writers have been ſo far convinced of the Uſefulneſs of it, as, leſs or more, they have made relation of ſuch Laws as have been Enacted in the Times whereof they wrote.

For, the moſt ancient Writings now extant in the World, and which bear the ſtamp of Divine Authority, are of this Nature; even the Pentateuch of Moſes, which is purely Hiſtorical, and in way of Hiſtory delivers the Laws and Conſtitutions made by God himſelf; who was Legiſlator and King of the Jewiſh Nation in its firſt Eſtabliſhment.

As Moſes was learned in all the Learning of the Ægyptians, and mighty in Words and in Deeds; ſo are his Hiſtories of ſuch a Compoſure as none in the following Ages could imitate. Great things performed in the Heathen world were Sung by Bards and Poets, the Deſign of whom being, by relation of ſuch Actions, to excite their youth to imitation, they added Fictions to them; ſuch Lineaments and Colours they gave to their Pictures, as might repreſent them moſt lively: and by contrary Repreſentations, they put more Deformity upon ſuch Perſons and Paſſages as they intended to make odious; and ſo Fiction and Hiſtory continued a long time together.

At length they parted though ſtill they ſhewed ſome Kindneſs for each other; and ſuch as betook themſelves to the Compoſing of Hiſtories, made choice of a pleaſant way of Writing, pleaſant to themſelves, and to ſuch as ſhould read, or rather hear them; ſo as, however their Narrations might be true, yet they produced them in ſuch a dreſs, and ſo ordered them, as to gain Applauſe from popular Aſſemblies; as at the Olympick Games, and other ſolemn Meetings. They left out ſuch things as would trouble both themſelves and others to underſtand. The Story of a War; a Battel; perhaps, of a Truce or League, would take; tickling their Fancies by variety of Stratagems, Devices, and particular Accidents. Whereas the Reaſon and Severity of Laws, would make the Auditors gaze, and ſhrug their Shoulders, neither caring to reach the one, nor loving to meditate on the other. But ſuch was the Cuſtom, at the Olympicks, not only to have exhibited Labours and Dexterities of the Body, but alſo of the Brain; as appears by what is related concerning Herodotus his Hiſtory there recited, and the Æmulation of Thucydides thence contracted, not to mention Dionyſius his ſending his bald Poems there to receive approbation. And that it continued to be the Cuſtom in other Aſſemblies, even to the time of Ammianus Marcellinus, the Reader will perceive by what he finds in this Volume concerning the Perſon and Hiſtory of that Writer.

Sometimes yet, as was ſaid, they would mention Cuſtoms and Uſes, and now and then a Law; in ſhort and by the way, as is the practice of Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, and others concerning the Chaldæans, Ægyptians, and other Nations; but this was towards Strangers; a Cuſtom obſerved generally by Hiſtorians, to relate the Polity, Government, and ſome Laws of Foreigners, but ſcarcely thoſe of their own Countries except Plutarch, as a Græcian, may be ſaid to have done it in the Lives of Solon and Lycurgus. The reaſon was, they wrote not ſo much to benefit Poſterity, as to gratifie the Age in which they lived; to which they thought it would be nothing pleaſing to read ſuch things as they already knew.

Therefore are we more beholding to Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, Plutarch, Dion Caſſius, and other Greeks, for giving us an account of the Roman Polity, ſuch as it was under the Kings, and the Change made by Julius Cæſar and Octavius; rather than to Livy, or other of the Roman Writers. To ſome it became commendable to write conciſely and finely as it was then eſteemed, and to make ſome Flouriſhes and Deſcants upon things, rather than penetrate into the depth of Affairs, and explain the Original and Iſſue of Actions; ſo as to give light and aſſiſtance to Humane life. If this way, even then as well as in later times, gratified not Readers more than Truth it ſelf; Florus, or he that wrote that Book, was vilely miſtaken, who cared not what he wrote, ſo it was Florid, as is evident from the groſs miſtakes he commits, even in moſt known and famous Paſſages, of which the Author hath taken notice upon occaſion; becauſe his Errors are baited by pleaſing Language.

Others were more Grave and Serious, and their Names are never to be mentioned without Honour, for their Skill and Diligence in relating the great Affairs both of Peace and War. But, a very learned Man in the laſt Age complains, that when they touch at Laws, they do it tanquam Canis ad Nilum, as afraid of ſome Rock, of which they clear themſelves as ſoon as poſſible; eſpecially ſuch of them as had not been Educated in matters relating to the Forum; chuſing rather to deſcribe an Army, the form of the Camp, the kind and manner of a Fight, and the number of the Slain, or other matters in a copious and pleaſant ſtyle, than to ſhew the occaſions and fitneſs of Laws. But, ſaith he, ſhall a certain Speech and Aphoriſm be mentioned, and a Noble Law relating to Reformation of Manners, Regulation of Officers, or Mode of Government be neglected? Some notable Deciſion long and often debated, and that publickly, be paſſed by?

Fr. Balduinus De Inſtitutione Hiſtoriæ univerſæ, & ejus cum Juriſprudentia Conjunctione.

Dionyſius and Livy, he adds, deliver the Hiſtory of the change of Government introduced by the Decemviri, copiouſly enough. Being created for the very making of Laws, they tell us, That of Laws they ordained twelve Tables. But what theſe Laws were, or what was written in theſe Tables, they tell us not; which, he affirms, they certainly ought to have done. One Law or two, perhaps, they mention; but why not the reſt, being of ſo vaſt concernment? both as they were the Foundation of the Civil Law, and made ſo great a change in the Adminiſtration of the Commonwealth? Some make mention of the Laws called Voconia, Falcidia, Papia Poppæa, and others; but they explain not one Sentence of them, he tells us, as they ought, nor recite the words without Miſtakes. He proceeds in lamenting, that though Plutarch writes the Lives of Sulla and Cæſar, yet he explaineth not the Cornelian nor Julian Laws. Suetonius, Lampridius, Spartian, Capitolinus, and others undertook the ſame for the ſucceeding Emperors, and they ſo relate their Acts, Sentences, Apothegms and Practices, as pretending alſo to recite their Judgments, and Conſtitutions. But he bewails that their Relations are confuſed, jejune and mutilated; that what they deliver is lame and miſtaken, being unskilfully delivered by thoſe who underſtood not that whereof they wrote, which is to be amended and ſupplied out of the very Books of Laws themſelves.

But he acknowledgeth that one Perſon, and he an extraordinary one, there was, who is ſaid to have been exact in the way of writing Hiſtories. This was Atticus that dear Friend of Cicero, concerning whom Corn. Nepos in his Life reports, That being a Lover of Antiquity, he ſo exactly underſtood it, that he expoſed it all to View, in a Volume he wrote of this Subject, wherein there was no Law, no Peace, no War, nor any other memorable thing of the Roman People, but he took notice of it; being herein, it ſeems, moſt Conformable to Moſes, of all others. And ſo the lately mentioned Writer affirms, every one ought to do, who pretends to Compoſe an Exact Hiſtory, not only to take notice of ſuch Laws as reſpect the Government and Polity, but even of thoſe alſo which belong to the Jus Privatum, when by reaſon of the want of knowing them, Hiſtory it ſelf; That is, ſaith he, the State and Condition of the Commonwealth at that time, the form of Judgments and Cuſtoms cannot be known. This courſe the Author hath indeavoured to imitate in this Second Volume, ſo far as was convenient, and to ſupply in large Additions, what time and his Health would permit, during the Reprinting of the firſt, which he wrote at ſuch an Age, as the Laws could not be well known unto him, as neither the World ſo well, as now, though of the World he wrote; but what otherwiſe might be wanting, he indeavoured to ſupply with Care and Induſtry.

As the Method thereof was wholly his own, without the leaſt hint or ſuggeſtion from any others, except he could receive any inconſiderable one from reading St. Auguſtine De Civitate Dei, where he joyns together in time the Kingdoms of the ancient Greeks, and the ſtate of the Iſraelites; ſo there are few of the Claſſical Authors but he diligently read, and as occaſion required, abbreviated them ſo as to ſerve his purpoſe. And as he omitted not conſulting Modern Writers, the neglect of whom would have argued both great Imprudence and Arrogance; that he may acknowledge from whom he received moſt aſſiſtance; as to pointing to Matter, and Matter it ſelf, he had much help from the Annals of Biſhop Uſher, but eſpecially from the Chronicon of Dr. Simſon, an Excellent Book, though written in that way of Annals. And as to this ſecond Volume for Illuſtration of the Laws, and often of Hiſtory, he acknowledgeth the great Information and Aſſiſtance he hath had from the Commentaries of James Gothofred, an extraordinary Perſon, for ſo far as the Code of Theodoſius doth extend.

And the Author being now in the way of giving every man his due, is joyful of this opportunity long look'd for, to diſcharge a Debt, wherein the Reader himſelf is concerned, if he receive any benefit, by the inlargement and continuation of this Work. This is to the Memory of that truly Honourable and Learned Perſon Sir Orlando Bridgman, late Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England. Of all ſorts of Injuſtice, that of Ingratitude is moſt black and ugly, being by the Perſians eſteemed the greateſt Crime of all others. Indeed they and all other Nations have accounted Undutifulneſs to Parents, and Neglect of Maſters, or thoſe that brought us up, who ſpent much time and pains upon us, and indeavoured to make us both good and knowing, the worſt ſort of Ingratitude, ſuch being never too much requited, in the Opinion of good and generous Perſons. Yet though to them we owe our Beings, and what is more, our truly well Beings; yet a third degree of Reſpect and Acknowledgment is due to thoſe, who by ſome extraordinary Acts in the Turnes, and Occurrences of our Lives, contribute to the prevention or removal of ſome notable Impediments to the comfortable injoyment of them, or elſe conſiderably to the addition of our Conveniences. Such Favours he muſt ever acknowledge to have received from that worthy Perſon, whoſe Kindneſs had that Advantage which gives the greateſt Relliſh to all Acts of Generoſity that it was ſeaſonable. So ſeaſonable it was in reference to this Work, that it muſt have miſcarried, had it not had his aſſiſting hand. The Effects of his Kindneſs were very conſiderable to the Author; and that they were not more, the fault was in ſome other Men. May theſe Papers, if they ſhould have the good Fortune to Survive, contitinue to be the Monument of Sir Orlando Bridgman's Merit, and the Acknowledgment of the Author, who ſtill ſhall ſay, as that Noble Emperor Gratian wrote, when out of Gratitude to Auſonius his School-Maſter, (after many Acts of Bounty to him) he conferred on him the Conſulſhip, the higheſt Dignity of which a Subject was capable; I have Paid what I ought, and I ſtill owe what I have Paid.

The Author having made his due Acknowledgments, is now much at Eaſe, notwithſtanding the Riſque he runs even by his Indeavours to ſerve the Publick. He is now a little acquainted with the World. He is ſenſible how an inferior ſort of Men, big with Buſineſs, indeavour to render as unſerviceable thoſe that are given to Books; and would have the Study of good Letters to be Uſeleſs. And it is to be expected that in the next Ragguagli di Parnaſſo, we ſhall hear that Apollo hath found a blot in the Eſcocheons of Xenophon, Epaminondas, Alexander, Cæſar, Julian, and other Perſons of greateſt Eminency in all Ages; for management both of Civil and Martial Affairs, for being Scholars, and very many of them, Writers too.

But beſides the Danger he incurrs ipſo facto, by being Bookiſhly affected, and that as far as Authoriſm it ſelf, though not given to Play, he has heard of the Game of Hot-cockles, how he lyes down that Writes a Book, and whoever pleaſes takes the liberty of Striking. He is ſenſible of the great Diſadvantage of Expectation, and that ſecond Attempts often prove unſucceſsful, in point of Reputation; not but that the Authors are the ſame, or more able than before; but the Reader himſelf is in fault, as well in unadviſedly raiſing his Expectation, as not at all conſidering the Subject or Matter handled, but expecting the ſame Copiouſneſs and Variety in barren, as in fruitful Grounds, being of the ſame humour with ſome ſtrangely conceited People, who being to chooſe a Chaplain, pick out the moſt abſtruſe Text they can find in the whole Bible, the moſt obſcure and leaſt ſignificant place, and expect he ſhould be as ready, diſcourſe as Learnedly, Copiouſly, and Profitably upon it, as upon any the moſt Pregnant in Holy Writ. In Concluſion, he is not unacquainted with the Paſſions of thoſe, who in ſome Countries have Traded in Books, who overgrown with Wealth, or Angry that they were not imployed; imagining they carried the Life and Death of a Book upon the Tip of their Tongue or Pen, have upon asking for a Treatiſe newly Publiſhed, turned the Face aſide, look'd Grave, and dropt this Expreſſion, It doth not anſwer Expectation; or ſuch others, as Avarice or Envy have Extorted.

Such Accidents as theſe, and other things conſidered, have ſometimes put the Author into a fit of Muſing; and he hath often complained, That the ſame Fortune hath befallen him in this long and laborious Work, as uſually attends Builders. Such, ſeldom or never come off with the Double or Treble of that Trouble, Coſt, and Expenſe which they firſt deſigned. At firſt they propoſe to themſelves a Conveniency; but are farther drawn in, either by their own Fancy, or the Tricks of Artificers; ſo far, as not ſeldom to complain, That they can neither go back, nor well proceed; but are driven into ſuch Inconveniences, that the Family is often indangered to Erect the Houſe. At firſt, the Author deſigned only a Convenience for a ſingle Perſon; but the Structure is grown a burthen inſupportable to him, as any who know him in all Circumſtances of Health, and other Abilities, and the Nature and Condition of the Charge, will eaſily judge.

However, as to what is paſt, there is no way but to be animated both againſt the former uſual Accidents, and even his own Defects. Of the later, he is very ſenſible, and is more apt than any other to think meanly of his own Performances, in which he can never ſatisfie himſelf; and yet without ſome ſtock of Confidence, no work beneficial to Mankind can ever be begun or carried on. He prays thee at parting to take theſe few hints along with thee. Firſt, That his way and Method in this Work is new, and not formerly practiſed, and therefore, if it be not ſo exact, but have ſome Miſtakes, good natur'd Perſons will Eaſily excuſe his well-meaning Deſign, who may ſhew the way to others to do better, and from his Experience could eaſily amend what in the firſt Attempt cannot but be more Defective. Therefore if thou find'ſt in this Volume, a greater number of Conſtitutions or Edicts mentioned than was intended, and poſſibly concerning the ſame Subject, conſider that in ſuch a multitude as he ran through, his firſt Choice and Survey, could not be ſo regular and exact. But though they may ſeem many upon the ſame Subject, and often relating to Officers about the Court and Country; yet there is ſcarcely any one but hath ſomething new, ſomething obſervable more than that preceding it; and the ſubject is Roman, belonging to the Roman Empire; The Laws, Language, Cuſtoms, Antiquities, and even particular Remarques of which, the World hath thought fit to value as Learned, and to be had (eſpecially by all Scholars) in great Eſteem.

The Reader muſt alſo know, That the Author at firſt deſigned to add Eccleſiaſtical Affairs to thoſe of the State, and to joyn them in one Volume; but upon ſecond Thoughts concerning due Method, hath found it neceſſary to reſerve his Collections to a Volume by themſelves, to which this ſecond will afford great, and even neceſſary, Light to the underſtanding of the Eccleſiaſtical Polity; Church and State having been as Twins, and imbraced the ſame Modes of Government. But it will be moſt profitable to have them treated of apart, eſpecially after Conſtantine's time, when the Polity was grown up, and plentiful matter was afforded for Hiſtory from the Actions of Chriſtians amongſt themſelves, and eſpecially from the Struggling of Chriſtianity with Paganiſm, its great Endeavours to ſuppreſs it, the manifold Edicts and Conſtitutions of Emperors, publiſhed to this end and purpoſe. Theſe afford noble Matter for a Treatiſe, chiefly to be wrought out of the Body of the Theodoſian and Juſtinianæan Codes.

Something at laſt ſhould be ſpoken concerning the Language and Style of this Volume; but the Reader cannot be ſuppoſed ſo Ignorant, as not to diſtinguiſh Habits; what is fit for an Hiſtory, and what for a Poem or Romantick Story. Each Subject hath its proper dreſs; as to which, though the Author poſſibly hath not been ſo exact as he ſhould, or poſſibly could have been, and even to hit the humour of the Times, which ſtill will be making Modes and Dreſſes, yet he deſpairs not of Excuſe from thoſe that are more underſtanding and learned. Such Perſons will remember, That the Ancients accounted Perſpicuity to be the greateſt Virtue of Speech.

T. P. T. A. H. M.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE,
From the MONARCHY OF Conſtantine The Great,
TO THE
Taking of ROME by ODOACER, and the Ruin of the EMPIRE in the WEST.

CHAP. I.

The Vigorous Eſtate or Condition of the Empire, during the Government of Conſtantine and his Family. From his Monarchy to the Death of Julian; With an Account of the Polity of the Empire.

Sect. I.

From the Monarchy of Conſtantine to his Death; the ſpace of Thirteen Years and odd Months.

Conſtantine now Monarch.

A. D. 323.

1. Conſtantine having overthrown and wholly ſubdued Licinius, his Enemy, (both as Chriſtian and Emperour) obtain'd the Sovereignty of the whole Roman World, in the Eighteenth year of his Reign, the fourth of the two hundred ſeventy fifth Olympiad, the thouſand ſeventy ſeventh of Rome, and the twelfth Indiction, A.D. CCCXXIII; his two Sons Criſpus and Conſtantine (Cæſars) both of them the third time being Conſuls.

Criſpo & Conſtantino (Cæſaribus) 3 Coſs.

Comes to Theſſalonica with his Priſoner Licinius, and makes ſeveral good Laws.

Repeals thoſe of Licinius.

2. Having Compleated his Victory at Nicomedia, (the moſt Eminent City of Bithynia, and all thoſe quarters) he there continued near five Months, as well for the re-ſettlement of his Affairs, as the Love he bore to the Place; and then return'd with Licinius, his Priſoner, into Macedonia; and came to (a) Theſſalonica, where he made ſeveral Laws, both for the Security of his Eſtate, and the general Welfare of his Subjects. The Army he obliged, by ordering the Privileges of the (b) Veterans, or old Emerit Souldiers, to be Recorded in that they called Encauſtum, or Ceruſſe, after the moſt durable manner. The burthen, which during the Tyranny of Licinius, had lain upon the Inhabitants of Chalcedon and Nicomedia by unequal Impoſitions of (c) extraordinary Charges, he took off, by referring things of this nature to the Diſcretion of the Governours of the Cities. Then did he by another (d) Edict repeal all the Laws and Conſtitutions of Licinius, which were contrary to the antient Laws, or his own Decrees, as it was the conſtant cuſtome of Emperours to reverſe all things that had been Enacted by thoſe they called Uſurpers or Tyrants, either preſently after their Fall, or as ſoon as a fit opportunity preſented it ſelf; and as he formerly had dealt about the Ordinances of Maxentius. Now for our Underſtanding

(a) l. 4. de Navicularìis C. un. de his qui veniam ætatis.

(b) l. 1. de Veteranis Cod. Th.

(c) l. 4. de extraordinariis, ſive ſordidis, Cod. Theod. Tit. 16. lib. 11.

(d) Remotis Licinii Tyranni Conſuetudinibus l. 1. de infirmandis &c. l. 5. Tit. 14. l. 1.

A. D. 324.

ing what theſe Illegal Edicts of Licinius were, (a) Euſebius, the Author of Conſtantine's Life, tells us of three or four ſeveral unjuſt Conſtitutions made by him. As that none of their Friends or Kindred ſhould relieve ſuch as were Committed to Priſon, upon pain of having the like Puniſhment inflicted upon them. Another whereby he diſanull'd the old Roman Laws concerning Marriages, in the room whereof he made barbarous and bloody Statutes. A Third, by which he Innovated in Matters relating to the Dead. Moreover, he laid moſt grievous Taxes on all his Subjects, ordaining new ways of Oppreſſion, by Surveying of Lands, and Penalties impoſed upon the Eſtates of thoſe who were long before deceaſed.

(a) Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 10. C. penult. vitæ Conſtantini. l. 1. C. C. 47, 48.

3. Licinius, for the ſake of Conſtantia his Wife, was permitted to live a private Life, and for the ſecurity thereof, had the Oath of Conſtantine her Brother: but this cannot but be ſuppoſed to be conditional; if he received Protection, his quitting all hoſtile Deſigns muſt at leaſt virtually have been included in the Agreement; none being obliged to cheriſh a Viper in his Boſome, or preſumed to bind himſelf by Oath to Preſerve another to Deſtroy himſelf. Therefore, when he could not forbear his wonted Practices againſt the Perſon and Government of Conſtantine, but, as ſome Writers affirm, again endeavoured to raiſe War, and to procure the barbarous Nations to Invade the Empire, having from long Experience of his turbulent Humour and implacable Malice, ſufficient reaſon to deſpair of his Amendment, he cauſed him to be put to Death. That this is not incredible, nor any ſevere Cenſure upon the memory of Licinius, the Character given him by Aurelius Victor may perſuade the Reader, who calls him the moſt Covetous of all Men, a Leacherous Perſon, Fierce, and very Impatient, and an Enemy to all Learning, which out of his groſs Ignorance he termed the Poiſon and Plague of the Commonwealth, but eſpecially the Practice of the Law. He adds, That he was a Clown, and by reaſon of his Clowniſh Birth and Breeding, a Friend to ſuch; but a moſt Severe Exactor of Military Diſcipline, and an Enemy to Eunuchs and Courtiers, whom he called the Moths and Rats of the Palace. He being gone, Conſtantine, to aboliſh all he had done, having formerly Repealed his Laws and Conſtitutions, now by another Edict makes null all the Publick Acts both of him and his Judges. This was no new thing, nor practiſed only by the Roman Emperours; the Athenians after the deſtruction of the thirty Tyrants, adjudged null and void whatſoever had been done and determined under them, in relation either to publick or private Matters. But whereas the nulling of all private and voluntary Contracts, with Legal Proceedings, during Uſurpations, muſt neceſſarily tend to Confuſion and Diſorder, by unravelling of all things belonging to Propriety, he repreſſeth ſuch as would thence take occaſion to renounce Legally determined, or their own not forced Acts; making a difference between ſuch things as had been ſo Tranſacted by the Subject under Licinius, (as Emancipations, Manumiſſions, Donations, Bargains, and the like) and other matters tyrannically practiſed by him or his Judges. Now ſome have been miſtaken in confounding this Edict of Conſtantine with his former, and affirming him, as better adviſed, to have Mitigated the firſt by the Second: for the firſt is only concerning the Conſtitutions and Laws of Licinius, not medling with the Acts of him or his Judges, or with things freely and voluntarily tranſacted by the Subject, and here Excepted.

Puts him to death.

His Character.

The publick Acts of him and his Judges nulled.

Tyranni & Judicum ejus Geſtis infirmatis, nemo per calumniam, vel id quod ſponte fecit, evertere, nec quod legitimè geſtum eſt. Dat. Prid. Id. Febr. Paulino & Juliano Coss. Cod. Th. lib. 15. Tit. 14. l. 2. De infirmandis his quæ ſub Tyrannis, aut Barbaris geſta ſunt. Vide Jacobum Gothofredum in Legem.

Conſtantine reformeth matters in the Eaſt.

4. Conſtantine, by the overthrow and Death of Licinius, remaining Lord of the Eaſt, as well as other parts of the Empire, ſet himſelf to Amend the State thereof, and Correct the depraved Manners of the People by ſeveral Conſtitutions, as in another place we muſt largely ſhew. No practice at this time was more Extravagant and Burthenſom, than that of Uſury, which extended, not only to Moneys, but alſo to Corn, and other Fruits of the Earth, eſpecially in Paleſtine; the Cities of which, and principally Cæſarea, abounded with Wheat, Wine and Oyl. By the Law, for Money the hundredth part could only be taken for Intereſt; yet the Cuſtoms of Places bore down the Authority of the Law. And as for Fruits, the Uſury of them exceeded the other of Money, which had this Effect upon Covetous and Griping People, that though they Lent out Money, yet they would make it their bargain to receive the Intereſt of Fruits, which being unlimited, gave occaſion of Intolerable Oppreſſion. Now therefore Conſtantine by an Edict, both ſetled the old Cuſtom of the hundredth part for Money, and firſt ſet bounds to the Intereſt of Fruits; Ordaining that it ſhould not exceed one half of the Principal. So as if one lent two Buſhels of Corn, he ſhould receive back but three; which was afterward altered by Juſtinian, ſo as this Conſtitution is not put into his Code, he reducing the Intereſt of Fruits to that of Money; and though St. Jerome utterly condemns it, yet in reſpect of the former uſual Extortion, it procured great Eaſe to the Subject, and was as great a Reformation as could be wrought on a ſudden. And Reſtrains Uſury.

Centeſima uſura fuit quæ in nummos centenos ſingulos nummos, ſingulis Menſibus præſtaret. Uſuræ quippe olim, ut apud Græcos, ita & apud Romanos menſtruæ. Gothofred. l. 1. de uſuris. C. Th. Lib. 2. Tit. 33. Hæ ſunt omninò uſuræ illæ ἡμιολίας quæ Clericis nominatim interdicuntur hoc ipſo anno 325. Conc. Nic. Can. 17. ut innuit Gothofredus, quem conſule in has Leges.

Invites any to Accuſe his Courtiers.

L.4. de Accuſationibus & Inſcriptionibus. C.Th.l.9.Tit.1.

Ita mihi ſumma Divinitas ſemper propitia ſit, & me incolumem præſtet, ut cupio fœliciſſima & florente Republica, &c.

whereas great Complaints were made againſt his Favourites, and thoſe that were about him, which kind of Men do often great Miſchief, and cauſe a good Prince (otherwiſe) to be ill ſpoken of, and his Government to be traduced by the People; that he might not alwayes be diſquieted with Clamours, and to provide againſt the Ambition and Covetouſneſs of his Courtiers, he Publiſhed another Edict this year (the ſame wherein the Council was held at Nice) from Nicomedia, whereby he gives leave, nay invites any one, freely and without fear, to come forth and Accuſe any of his Friends or Favourites, promiſing Rewards to ſuch as could make good their Accuſations; and concluding his Edict with a moſt Religious Proteſtation. Having made this Law at Nicomedia, where he remained ſome time after his coming from Nice, he took a Progreſs into Thrace, Dacia and Myſia, to Aquæ, or the Waters, whence another Law of his bears Date, concerning the Annonæ, or Proviſions for the Army. What Waters theſe were is not certain, though ſuch a place there was, not far from the City Naiſſus in Dacia (where another of his Laws concerning Witneſſes bears alſo date this ſame year) as appears from Antonine's Itinerary; And there were other hot Waters in Thrace.

Aquæ calidæ.

Makes Conſtantius his Son Cæſar.

Vide Chronicon Legum in Edit. Gothofred. Cod.Th.

L. Lex quæ Tutores 22. Cod. Iuſt. de Adminiſtrat. Tutorum.

Reſtrains Coyners.

L. 3. de falſa Moneta. C.Th. lib. 9. Tit.21. Vide Gothofr. in l.

What Cities had publick Mints.

5. About this time he Conferred the Dignity of Cæſar upon his Son Conſtantius, and ſent him into Gall, to defend that Province againſt the Barbarous Nations. In the beginning of the following year, his Reſidence was either in Thrace, or in Macedonia, (at Heraclea,) whence he removed Weſtward to Sirmium in Pannonia, and by a large Edict to the People of Rome, made proviſion for ſuch as were under Age, againſt the Frauds and ill Adminiſtration of their Guardians, better than was afforded them by former Laws. From Pannonia he moved towards Italy, and in his way took Aquileia and Milain, in both which Cities he made Edicts. In the latter he publiſhed a Conſtitution againſt private Coyners, Confiſcating the Eſtates of ſuch as ſhould procure any Money to be made, but in the publick Mints; in all places Coynage being reckoned amongſt Royalties. Now it will not be amiſs to let the Reader know what Cities of the Empire were privileged with the uſe of Mints. In the Eaſt were Antioch, Alexandria, Cyzicus in Bithynia, and afterward Conſtantinople. In the Weſt, the Notitia of the Empire reckons up ſix ſeveral Mints in the time of Theodoſius Junior, and Valentinian the Third; viz. thoſe of Siſſia in Pannonia, Aquileia, Rome, Lyons, Arles and Triers, every of which had its ſeveral Procurator there mentioned. Theſe were the moſt known and ordinary Places; but that Money was alſo ſtamped here at London, at Verulam, and in other Towns, appears by ſeveral Coins yet Extant.

See Cambden's Brit. and Burton's Comment upon Antonine's Itinerary.

Zoſimus lib.2.

Conſtantine putteth to Death his Son Criſpus, and Fauſta his own Wife.

6. Hitherto we hear no ill of Conſtantine in Particulars, and yet he was a Mortal, and being poſſeſſed of the higheſt Power upon Earth, muſt needs be liable to various Temptations ariſing from the Grandeur of his Eſtate. But now we are told of ſome Acts both Unnatural and Cruel, which ſuppoſed muſt have fallen out about this very time, viz. the putting to death of his Son Criſpus, and other Relations. We ſay ſuppoſed; for, that he put his Son to death ſome Authors utterly deny, although, to ſpeak indifferently, they be over-ruled by the Teſtimony of a far greater number: He that tells the Story firſt with Circumſtance, is indeed a bitter Enemy to Conſtantine, upon the account of Religion, and ſubjoyns a moſt lewd Lye to it, making this the occaſion of his Converſion to Chriſtianity, as we ſhall ſee in a more proper place. He writes, That coming to Rome, being full of Arrogance, he thought he was to begin his Impiety at his own Houſe: for he put to death his Son Criſpus, who was dignified with the Title of Cæſar, becauſe he was ſuſpected to have to do with his Step-mother Fauſta, without having any reſpect to the Law of Nature. And whenas Helena, the Mother of Conſtantine, took it exceedingly to heart, and ſorrowed above meaſure for the death of the Young Man, He, as to Comfort her Salved one Miſchief by another that was greater, cauſing Fauſta to be ſtifled in a Bath heated on purpoſe above the ordinary Cuſtom. Thoſe that moſt oppoſe this Relation are Sozomen and Evagrius, both Writers of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. Evagrius Declaims rather than Argues. Sozomen urges, that Criſpus could not be put to Death, becauſe he lived till the twentieth year of his Father's Reign, and in the mean time made many Laws on behalf of Chriſtians and Chriſtianity; as, both the Dates and Names which thoſe Laws do bear, ſufficiently evince. This Reaſon is rejected as very frivolous by ſome, who, to make way for the Baptiſm of Conſtantine at this time, would have him Guilty of the Death of his Son, or any other thing; but yet there is more in it than they will own: for Zoſimus makes the Death of Criſpus the occaſion of Conſtantine's forſaking Paganiſm, becauſe, forſooth, that could not afford him any Expiation for ſuch Crimes, and of turning to Chriſtianity upon promiſe of Pardon, which its Principles, upon ſincere Repentance, do allow. Now how could the death of Criſpus give occaſion to his Father's Converſion, when by all account of Times, and by the many Laws yet extant, as Learned Men obſerve, it evidently appears, that long before the twentieth year of the Emperours Reign, wherein, or the year preceding, Criſpus was Conſul, both Father and Son were Chriſtians, and vigorouſly by their Edicts promoted this Religion? Conſtantine's Converſion was long before, and it's certain, Criſpus was alive in or about his twentieth year.

7. That which Zoſimus therefore makes the Effect of the death of Criſpus, hence appearing abſurd and ridiculous; the thing it ſelf might well be thought alſo forged, if there were not other Teſtimonies which affirm the Fact, though they are utterly ſilent as to any ſuch thing produced by it. Ammianus Marcellinus, who lived in, or about theſe times, mentions his putting to death, and alſo the Place, which was Pola, a Town of Iſtria. And though the Hiſtory of Euſebius be ſilent as to this matter, which Evagrius urgeth as an Argument againſt Zoſimus, yet to this it is anſwered, that into his Chronicon it is inſerted, if not by himſelf, by St. Hierome, or ſome who publiſhed it near theſe Times. And that not only other Heathen Writers, but Chriſtians alſo, who for the contrary reaſon bore as much reſpect to the memory of Conſtantine, as Zoſimus did Malice, mention it as a Matter they ſufficiently believed. It muſt not be denied, but that at this time Conſtantine was taxed for ſome Severities, and particularly twitted for Cruelty, by a Libel fixed on the Palace-Gate, by procurement of Ablavius, who was afterward Conſul, and at preſent the Præfectus Prætorio. Therefore, granting that Criſpus was put to death, the Cauſe is to be inquired after; for, Puniſhment, except either there be no Cauſe, or a ſlender one, is not to be eſteemed Cruelty. Zoſimus tells us, he was ſuſpected to have to do with his Step-mother Fauſta, thereby poſſibly, both caſting upon him ſome Imputation of Inceſt, and making out the Cruelty of his Father, in that it was but a Suſpicion: for, had it been true and evident, ſuch a Provocation as that of having one's Bed defiled by one's own Son, might have inraged a Man of far more Phlegmatick Conſtitution than was Conſtantine. That his Death hapned by occaſion of Fauſta, is affirmed by all; and the general Opinion is, that it was procured by her ſeeking. But this was not for forcing her, or having to do with her; but as we in charity believe, becauſe he refuſed to do what both Religion, and his Duty to his Father forbad, but ſhe moſt ardently required. When afterward Julian objected this Death of Criſpus, and of other Relations againſt Conſtantine to Artemius the Præfectus Auguſtalis, and Martyr, he is ſaid to have excuſed him in this manner: "As for his Wife Fauſta, he juſtly put her to death, for that "ſhe imitated the antient Phœdra, in calumniating his Son Criſpus for being in love "with her, and offering her violence, as ſhe of old did Hippolitus the ſon of The"ſeus. Firſt, he puniſhed his Son as one who had raged with Luſt towards his "Mother, and he did it like a Husband. Afterwards, when her deceit was diſco"vered, he cauſed to be executed upon her a Sentence the moſt juſt of all others. To the ſame purpoſe, as is farther urged, writes Zonaras, and other later Hiſtorians, though Gregory of Tours, the Hiſtorian of the Francks, will have them both Executed as Traitors: Very probably, it is conjectured, that Fauſta procured the Prince to be put to Death, to make way for the Preferment of her own Iſſue; that ſeveral Courtiers and ſome Relations joyned with her in practiſing thus upon the Credulity of the Emperour, and that he finding how he had been abuſed, at length puniſhed both her and them. For Eutropius writes, that very many of his Friends he put to death, amongſt whom was young Licinius, his Nephew by his Siſter; although it ſeemeth alſo, that the Law we lately mentioned, whereby he invites all men to Accuſe and Convict any of his Friends, or thoſe about him, is hither to be referred; and that there was ſome great Miſcarriage among the Courtiers, ſome Notable thing which he ſuſpected, and endeavoured to diſcover.

Li. 4. ad Iſtriam duxit prope oppidum Polam, ubi quondam peremptum Conſtantini Filium accepimus Criſpum.

Oroſius, Sidonius.

Saturni aurea ſæcla quis requirat? ſunt hæc gemmea, ſed Neroniana. Sidon. Apollinaris. lib. 5. epiſt. 8.

Ut mihi non figuratiùs Conſtantini domum vitamque videatur vel pupugiſſe verſu gemello Conſul Ablavius, vel momordiſſe diſticho tali clam Palatinis foribus penſo. Quia ſcil. prædictus Auguſtus iiſdem fere temporibus extinxerat Conjugem Fauſtam calore balnei, filium Criſpum frigore veneni.

Ex Metaphraſte apud Surium. Vide Baronium ad An. 324. num. 11.

and why.

Gothofred.

8. From Aquileia (not far diſtant from Pola, where we hear Criſpus was put to death, ſaith Ammianus) and Milain, Conſtantine went to Rome, and there continued nigh three Months, viz. July, Auguſt, and September. During his abode in the City, he celebrated his Vicennalia, or Solemn Feaſts and Paſtimes for joy he was arrived at the twentieth year of his Reign, and which he had at the beginning of the year celebrated at Nicomedia, with great Magnificence. But if we may believe Zoſimus, he derided the Proceſſion of the Equites or Knights, which was wont to be made up to the Capitol, at the time of Electing or Approving them, which procured him the hatred and Curſes of the Roman People: and probable enough it is, that there ariſing Diſcontents between him and them upon the account of Religion, and his endeavouring to exterminate Paganiſm, thereupon he took a Reſolution to fix his Reſidence at ſome other convenient place of the Empire. And whereas Goeth to Rome.

There celebrateth his Vicennalia, and diſguſteth the Citizens.

Chron. Legum.

Gothofred.

A.D. 325.

Idem.

Repealeth the Laws of Licinius.

lib. 3. & 4. de infirmandis his quæ ſub Tyrannis &c. ubi Gothofred.

The Navicularii who.

Dicuntur etiam Navarchi, Naucleri, Nautici, Proſecutores.

Vide Paratitlon.

as Licinius in his time had ſubtilly changed ſeveral matters in the City, ſo as to oppoſe the growth of Chriſtianity; now Conſtantine, to hinder the progreſs of Paganiſm, (as we may eaſily gueſs on both ſides without preſumption) made alſo bold to repeal them. The Diſcontent about the Proceſſion hapned, as Gothofred gathers, about the Ides of July; and about the ſame time he publiſhed two Laws for nulling what Illegal things had been ordained by Licinius, and regulated what he had diſordered concerning both Senators and Equites, directing one to the Senate and Præfect of the City, who was Chief of Senators, and the other to the Præfectus Vigilum, who was Principal of the Equites; ſo that this latter Law ſeems to be deſigned againſt the Proceſſion, which on the Ides was to follow. By the other Law, (both of them ſeem to the Commentator to have made up one and the ſame Edict) it appears that Licinius had debaſed Senators, and forced them down to the Employment of Navicularii. Theſe Navicularii were a Body of Sea-faring men, ordained for Tranſportation of Corn and publick Proviſions in ſeveral Quarters of the Empire, being a Set Number, and that at their own Expence, ſucceeding by turns in the Charge and Burthen; their Sons and Heirs were liable to the Burthen, and if any number of the Body fail'd, a ſupply was made by the Præfectus Prætorio uſually, and few were exempted or privileged, not Jews, if they had ſufficient Eſtates. Such as they called Curiales, or bore Office in Cities, were liable, but not Senators ordinarily; yet ſuch as poſſeſſed their Lands or Eſtates, were liable according to what they poſſeſſed. To this Function they were alwayes obnoxious, ſo that ſcarcely could they be Excuſed by any greater Honour obtain'd. They were conſtrain'd to build Ships and Veſſels of certain burthen; yet ſo as the Countrey ſupply'd them with Materials. As their Charge was great, ſo had they very great Privileges conferred on them by Conſtantine (who this very year, for the better ſupply of Rome, encouraged them) and moſt of his Succeſſors, till after Theodoſius the younger, in whoſe Code ſixteen Laws are Extant concerning their Immunities; and by various Conſtitutions on the other ſide, Proviſion was made againſt their Frauds and Negligence, as we ſhall largely find.

Chron. Legum.

Conſtantine removeth to Theſſalonica.

A. D. 327.

Chronic. Alexand. apud Chron. Legum.

Makes a Stone Bridge over Danubius.

Vanquiſheth the Scythians.

9. Such Senators as had been by Licinius debaſed to this Employment, Conſtantine (upon their Petition, and in Conformity to what he granted alſo to Chriſtians, whom Licinius had burthened by other publick Charges) leaves to the Senate it ſelf to be conſidered and reſtored, if their Birth, Manners and Eſtates were Suitable, and ſuch as they ſhould pitch on, were by the Præfect of the City to be preſented to him for his Confirmation, it being the Præfect's Duty of courſe to give in the Names of all New, or Exempt Senators, to the Prince, and that every three Months. But Conſtantine, having ſtaid at Rome the time lately mentioned, took his laſt Farewel of it, and removed at the latter end of September, by the way of Spaletum and Milain to Sirmium in Pannonia, in all which Places he made Edicts, which for urgent reaſons reſpecting Religion, we muſt largely inſiſt on in another place, and therefore in this Volume muſt omit them. From Pannonia he took his way into Macedonia, and there made ſome ſtay at Theſſalonica, the beginning of the following year, which was partly the twenty ſixth and part of the twenty ſeventh of his Reign. A. D. CCCXXVII Conſtantine Cæſar the fifth time, and Maximus being Conſuls. From Macedonia he went into Dacia, and for ſome time reſided at Serdica, whither for ſeveral years following he often had recourſe, having at this time War with the Goths and Taifali, a People inhabited beyond the Rivers Oeſce and Danow, the later of which he often paſſed, and for his Eaſe and better Expedition, cauſed a Stone-bridge to be made over it. Zoſimus inſinuates, according to his Cuſtom of Defaming him, as if lying careleſly and negligent, indulging his Voluptuous Humour, he gave Encouragement to the Thaifali, a Scythian Nation, to Invade the Empire; and that he would, or durſt not fight, but loſt the greater part of his Army, and was forced by flight to provide for the ſafety of his Perſon. Now that this is a great Calumny, theſe things muſt make us believe. For his Sloth and Eaſe, we may be ſatisfied to the contrary by the Laws he made at this time, the Dates whereof, and ſeveral Places where they were made, plainly ſhew, that for theſe two or three years he reſted very little, but was ever moving to and fro upon the Borders, and was much at Serdica. For his Succeſs, other Writers affirm, that he had the better of the Scythians, and not only freed the Roman Empire from being Tributary to them, but forc'd them to ſubmit to that Burthen, which none had done before him. For confirmation of this, there is a Coyn ſtill extant, ſtamped in memory of his Victory over the

A. D. 330.

Goths, which the Reader may ſee Exemplified in Baronius his Annals. But of this more hereafter.

New Rome, or Conſtantinople founded.

(a) Ad an. 330. num. 4.

Upon what Inducements.

Lib. 2. l. 2.

10. The only truth in Zoſimus his Relation is the Circumſtance of time that this War hapned, when New Rome, or Conſtantinople was founded. For now it was that a ſecond Head began to ariſe out of the Neck of the Roman Eagle. We can ſafely believe that Writer as to this Matter, that he might take offence at the Senate and People of Rome for their being averſe to his Religion, and that this was a Motive to his Reſolution of chuſing out ſome other Place wherein to fix his Imperial Seat. But this might not be the only Inducement. Another urgent Reaſon may be fetch'd from the preſent State and Condition of the Empire. The great Dangers that now threatned it, were the Inroads made by the Barbarous Nations inhabiting toward the North-Eaſtern parts of Europe, towards Macedonia and Thrace. Hence it was, that thoſe dreadful, thoſe ravenous Swarms of Locuſts took their flight, which at length over-power'd the Eagle, ſpoiled him of ſome of his beſt Weſtern Plumes, and neſted themſelves in his very Throne. The Provinces lying about Italy and Rome, were at preſent in Repoſe, and what Miſchief hapned afterwards came moſt out of the Quarters but now mentioned. This made the Prince his Preſence very neceſſary in the North-Eaſtern Parts, it not being ſafe, either for the Empire or himſelf, conſtantly to Manage Wars at a great diſtance by Lieutenants, who having got the Command of Armies, commonly uſurped. Conſtantine ſeems to have born greateſt reſpect to Nicomedia, whither often he repair'd, and there drew his very laſt breath. But though being a City of Bithynia, which lies over againſt Thrace, it was not far diſtant from thoſe Quarters; yet being ſituate in Aſia, and over the Sea, a more convenient Place there might be found, the danger lying chiefly on this ſide the Water. Therefore having refuſed Nicomedia, for the ſame reaſon he might reject the Place which Zoſimus tells us he firſt pitch'd upon, betwixt Troas and old Ilium, though already part of the Wall was built, which was ſtill to be ſeen in this Writer's dayes by thoſe that ſailed toward the Helleſpont. Sozomen alſo writes, that in his time the Gates were to be ſeen on an Hill not far from the Helleſpont, and a little above the Tomb of Ajax, where the Greeks were reported to have had their Camp at the Siege of Troy. This might have been one reaſon for fixing his Seat in Thrace. To which may be added, (which is alſo thought) that the Eaſtern Provinces of Aſia being far more diſtant from Rome, and lyable to the frequent Incurſions of the Perſians and others, it was the more requiſite, that for their Supply and Safeguard the Emperour ſhould have his Reſidence nearer hand; and, in reſpect of the Weſtern and the Eaſtern Borders, toward the middle of the Empire.

At what place.

Tom. 3. in Conſtantino Magno.

Vide Excerpta Dionis in Severo & Zonar.

The State of Byzantium.

11. Sozomen tells us, that while he was about building in the Place near to Ilium, God appeared to him by night, and Commanding him to ſeek out ſome other Seat, put him in mind of Byzantium, to fill it with Inhabitants, and call it by his own Name. Zonaras writes, that he firſt had thoughts to build in Serdica, then in Sigæum, a Promontory of Troas, where he was reported to have laid the Foundation, and after that began a Work at Chalcedon; but Eagles were ſaid to have taken up the Ropes or Lines uſed by the Workmen, and carried them over the Streights to Byzantium; which being often done, he concluding it was not without a Providence, went thither, viewed, and approved of the Place. Byzantium was formerly a very eminent City, of great Strength, very well Inhabited, and rendred famous by many Hoſtile Actions, related by us in the firſt Tome of this Work. But nothing more Memorable hapned concerning it, than that ſiding with Niger, it ſuſtain'd a Siege from the Emperour Severus for three years together, who Disfranchized it, as Veſpaſian formerly had done, made it ſubject to Heraclea, and pull'd down the Walls; but after, He, or his Son being reconcil'd, not only reſtored it to its former Privileges, but by Magnificent Works greatly Adorned it, and called it by the Name of Antonina (after the Son) which Name it retained no longer than that Family held the Sovereignty, but received its former of Byzantium. When Gallienus was Emperour, it ran a more dangerous Riſque than ever, being made ſo deſolate by his Army, that ſcarcely any of the Antient Inhabitants remained; yet by the ſame Emperours Law it revived, and Siding with Licinius in the late Civil War, was grown to ſuch Strength, that it could not be Conquered, till after his Overthrow it yielded of its own accord. It was very large, as Zoſimus deſcribes it, and fenced with ſeven Towers, beſides moſt ſtrong Walls; but above all things, for its Situation to be commended: for it ſtood upon an Iſthmus, or neck of Land, formed by that they called Ceras or the Horn, and the Propontis, a Place ſo Convenient, as well as Pleaſant, that without leave from it obtain'd, none could well paſs into Europe, or Aſia, it being as it were the Bridge and the Haven of the two Worlds.

The time of Founding Conſtantinople.

Vide Jacob. Gothofred. Chronicon Hiſtoricum in L.L. An. 328. & 330.

12. Conſtantine, ſatisfied in his Choice, for theſe Reaſons, gave order for the New Work, to enlarge and make of it a New City, the Foundations whereof were laid on the twenty ſixth of November, in the Conſulſhip of Januarinus and Juſtus, in the year of our Lord Cccxxviii; and in the Conſulſhip of Gallicanus and Symmachus, on the eleventh of May, in the third Indiction, A. D. Cccxxx, being the twenty fifth year of his Reign, it was Dedicated, and called by the Name of New Rome, and after him, Conſtantinople. And that it might not bear the empty Name of Rome, he provided both by the Number and Luſtre of the Buildings, and by Imperial Privileges Conferred upon it. As for the former, Zoſimus gives us this Account; “That in the Place where formerly was the Gate of the Old City, he Erected a Forum of a round Figure, which he incloſed with large Porticus's or Galleries and raiſed two mighty Arches each over againſt the other of Proconneſian Marble, through which a Paſſage lay into the Porticus of Severus, and out of the old Town: and to make the Place far larger than it was before, he drew a Wall fifteen furlongs beyond the former, which took in the whole Iſthmus from Sea to Sea. Having thus enlarged it he built a Palace not much inferiour to that at Rome, as alſo a Cirque with all Elegancy imaginable, part of which he made of the Temple of Caſtor and Pollux, and he reckons up other Places wherein he cauſed to be ſet the Statues of the Heathen Gods (which the Author of his Life tells us, was out of Deriſion) and he adds that he built Houſes for certain Senators which followed him from Rome. To ſpeak more Compendiouſly, and yet more to the Purpoſe than Zoſimus, he divided his new City into fourteen Regions, he built a Capitol, fixed a golden Miliarium or a Mark in the middle, whence all Miles were to be meaſured and counted. He made a Circus Maximus, an Amphitheatre, ſeveral Forums, Porticus's and other publick Works, and adorned the City with ſo many Columns, Pyramids, and things of Rarity and Antiquity, that indeed as St. Hierome obſerved as well as others, he ſpoiled all other Places, eſpecially Rome, of their Ornaments to ennoble this; beſides the many Churches, which upon a Religious account he cauſed to be built, which added much to the Luſtre of the City. Above other Curioſities a Column of Porphyry he brought from Rome is moſt valued, which he cauſed to be erected in the Forum, with an admirable Statue of Braſs upon it; that of Apollo as was reported, and firſt fetcht from Ilium; but he Commanded his own Name to be put upon it, and it ſtood in that poſture till the days of Alexius Comnenus, in whoſe Reign it was blown down, and Killed many Perſons that were under it. Hither he is alſo reported to have brought the Palladium from Troy, and many more Rarities which the Reader, if he pleaſe, may find in the Book which Codinus hath written concerning the Originals of Conſtantinople. In concluſion as to this Point Zoſimus further tells us, “That He ſo happily enlarged it, even to the extent of the greateſt City, that the ſucceeding Princes here fixed their Abode, and hither drew a greater multitude of Men than was neceſſary, which flocked to it, either as Souldiers, or Merchants, or for ſome other Courſe of Employment. In ſo much that they enlarged its Bounds, and compaſſed it with far larger Walls than Conſtantine had done before them, and ſuffered the Buildings to be ſo many and ſo thick, that the Inhabitants whether in or out of doores were ſtraitned by reaſon of the vaſt number of Men, and other Animals were perpetually in danger, and no ſmall Portion of the adjoyning Sea became joyned to the Land by Buildings raiſed upon Piles, which of themſelves were ſufficient to make up a large City.

The Buildings

Lib. 3. c. 52.

13. Thus might this City be called New Rome in reference to the Buildings and Ornaments, wherein it fully reſembled the old; but theſe were but as the Carcaſs, which without great Privileges and Encouragements could not long ſubſiſt. Power and Authority, Sovereignty and Dominion muſt give Imperial Life unto it. As to this a very Learned Man obſerves, that at its very Dedication it was made partaker of Empire, and Aſſociate with the other; yet is perſwaded that at the firſt it was not adorned with all the Privileges of old Rome, becauſe by a Conſtitution of Valens (not Valentinian and Valens, as he and others miſtake) long after, the Jus Italicum or Privilege of Italy was reſtored to it. Now if it had been before this poſſeſſed of all Imperial Authority; what could this Jus Italicum have ſignified? what needed it a Pittance of Immunity which was already ſeized of all Rights of Majeſty? Therefore he would fetch the Riſe of its Grandeur from a Law of Theodoſius the Firſt, confirmed afterward by Honorius and Theodoſius the Second. Yet is there Berterius Pithanon Diatriba, 1.

Whether at firſt it was Adorned with all the Privileges of old Rome.

De Jure Italico urbis Conſtantinop. Cod. Theod. lib. 4. Tit. 13.

Sect. 1.

A. D. 330.

no ſuch Law of Theodoſius the Elder extant; he gheſſes only there was, becauſe that Sozomen plainly affirms, that at the time of the firſt Council of Conſtantinople, which was in the very days of Theodoſius the Firſt, this City had not only obtained the Name of New Rome, and in like manner had a Senate, together with the ſame Ranks or Orders of Perſons and Magiſtrates; but uſed the ſame Enſigns or Badges of Authority as the other Rome did, and in both, the Privileges and Honours fully agreed. Now from Themiſtius, it is Evident, that Conſtantinople owed much to Theodoſius the Elder; nay he makes it a Queſtion, whether not as much as to Conſtantine himſelf. But as for what Themiſtius ſpeaks of Theodoſius, he ſpeaks in way of Panegyrick, and it relates to the Buildings of the City. All others generally uſe ſuch Expreſſions as aſcribe the Rights and Privileges to Conſtantine as the Author, who having given Original and Name to the City, muſt have been thought to have had as much kindneſs for it as any other could. Therefore Sozomen (that we may Interpret one place of that Writer by another) having told us how he had beautified it by publick Buildings, adds, that he called it New Rome, and (which Explaines the other) Queen or Miſtreſs of all Roman Subjects Inhabiting in the North, South, the Sun-riſing and the Mediterranean Sea, from the Citie's ſtanding upon Iſter, and Epidamnus with others, ſeated upon the Ionian Bay, as far as Cyrene, and that part of Libya adjoyning to the Place called Borium. He appointed (ſo he proceeds) a great Council, which they call a Senate, and aſſigned to the Senators the ſame Rank, Honours and Feſtivals as belonged to the ancient Romans. In concluſion he endeavoured to make this City called after himſelf, in all things equal to Rome in Italy, neither did his Succeſs fail him, it Increaſing ſo much, as by Conſent of all Men it ſurpaſſed Rome, both in the multitude of its Inhabitants, and in Riches. To this Equality ſo many Authors bear Witneſs, that it would be tedious to produce their Teſtimonies, ſo that when others write he made Conſtantinople equal to Rome in Honour, it was not in empty Honour and Fame, and it was not to no purpoſe that he enacted a Law whereby he gave it the Name of New Rome, and as Socrates tells us cauſed it to be Engraven in a Pillar of Stone placed at the Prætorium near to his own Statue on Horſeback.

Lib. 7. C. 9. ἤδη γὰρ οὐ μόνον εἶχε ταύτην τὴν προσηγορίαν ἡ πόλις &c.

Lib. 2. C. 2. καὶ βασιλίδα κατέστησε ἐφάμιλλον μείζονα συνομολογεῖσθαι.

Lib. 1. C. 12.

14. As for the Law of Valens concerning the Jus Italicum, it gives no new Privilege to the City, but reſtores what it formerly had enjoyned, and was, it ſeems, taken away, as by the words of it expreſly appears. This Jus, Privilege or Immunity of Italy conſiſted in two things eſpecially: viz. a peculiar, eaſie Courſe of tranſacting buſineſs relating to Law Matters, as in Alienations, Mancipations, Uſuscapio and the like, and in Freedom from ſome Tributes, which extended both to the Perſons, and the Soil or Ground, granted long ago to Rome and Italy by a Law preferred by Metellus Nepos, the Prætor. Amongſt the other Privileges of Old Rome this had been Conferred on Conſtantinople by Conſtantine, and taken away lately by Procopius the Tyrant, or Uſurper, who as Themiſtius teſtifies haraſſed, during his Tyranny there, both the Senate and People with Tributes and Exactions, and therefore Valens by this Law puts it but into the State it formerly was in, renewed but its Privilege, and reſtores one of the Flowers of its Imperial Crown; which that it might be faſter ſet, and hold for the time to come, as Conſtantine cauſed the Law of Univerſal Privilege to be Engraven in a Stone-Pillar, he ordaines, that this his Law of Reſtitution, not only be Regiſtred amongſt the Publick Acts, but cut alſo in Brazen Tables with all due Solemnity. This would content the minds of the Citizens, eſpecially thoſe of the inferiour ſort, who would be more ſenſible of the Violation of their Immunity from Taxes than any other, who would little care for the Grandeur of the City in point of Majeſty and Authority, if they were forced to empty their Purſes, and were burthened with Contributions. And this Burthen could not but be more uneaſie to them, becauſe unuſual; and eſpecially for that the Multitude had been drawn to Inhabit this New City, not only by Freedom from Taxes, but by the great Munificence of the Founder, whoſe Deſign it was, that they ſhould, not only ſave their own Money, but receive part of their Maintenance at his Expence. For in the Second Year after the Dedication of the City, for the Encouragement of Builders and Inhabitants, he diſtributed Bread amongſt them of free Gift, amounting to forty thouſand meaſures of Corn daily, which was brought out of Ægypt, and the Allowance was not only continued during his Time, but long after his Death, and was increaſed by ſome of his Succeſſors. Beſides this way of Encouragement he gave great Sums of Money to ſuch as built to defray their Charges, and to his new Citizens great Intereſt in his Demeſne-Lands lying in the Eaſt, in the Dioceſes of Aſia and Pontus; ſo that none but ſuch could hold or Alienate the ſaid Lands; and this he granted by Italici Juris auxilium arbitra æquitate renovamus.

Vid. Gothofred in Leg.

Dio. lib. 37.

Conceſſi igitur gratia beneficii publicis Actibus intimetur, & inciſa Tabulis debita Solennitate permaneat.

Chronic. Alexand.

Zoſimus lib. 2. διένειμε τῷ Βυζαντίων δήμῳ σίτησιν δημοσίαν ἣν ἄχρι τοῦδε διέμενεν ἔχων.

Vide Cod. Th. lib. 14. Tit. 16. lib. 2. & Tit. 17. L.L. Varias. Evagrius lib. 3. c. 41. Novel. Theodoſii Tit. 12. l. 1.

Diſtributes amongſt his Citizens great quantity of Bread.

by a Law, which Theodoſius afterward repealed: the Deſign of Conſtantine, as he ſaith, being already accompliſhed as to the Building of the City, and the Publick Revenue being much leſſened by that and other Practices, which he alſo thereby redreſſeth.

15. But to provide for the Pleaſure and Convenience of the Inhabitants, as well as their Profit, in the ſame Month wherein the City was Dedicated, he opened the Bath of Leucippus, adjoyning to the Cirque and the Palace, made long before by the Emperour Severus; a Great and moſt Magnificent Work. For the better ſerving of this Bath and other parts of the City with Water: the fourth day after the Dedication he publiſhed an Edict, for the cleanſing of the Aquæducts, which Burthen he impoſeth upon thoſe through whoſe Grounds they paſs; requiring that no Trees grow within fifteen Foot of them, leſt they ſhould Mine the Works; and for this in the way of Recompence he grants Immunity from extraordinary Burthens, confiſcating their Lands in caſe of Negligence. Having thus conſulted for the Profit and Pleaſure of his new Citizens, he could not be wanting in what tended to the Inſtruction and Ornament of their Minds; but for this Purpoſe, as alſo to fill the Place by a greater concurſe of People, he provided for the publick Profeſſion of Learning in the City. Three Years after the Dedication, by an Edict directed to the People, and bearing Date from Conſtantinople, he confirms all the Privileges granted by his Predeceſſors to Phyſicians and Profeſſours, and frees both them, their Wives, and Children, from all Employment and publick Service: ordaining that they neither be compelled to ſerve as Souldiers, nor to Quarter any whatſoever, or give Entertainment without their free Conſent; giving this for a Reaſon, that they may the better inſtruct many in the Liberal Studies, and their ſeveral Arts. In like manner did Julius Cæſar, that he might draw People to Rome, then much emptied, make all that profeſſed Phyſick, or the Liberal Arts, free of the City. So did Auguſtus, as Dion Caſſius witneſſeth, Grant Immunity from Employments to Phyſicians. But he that firſt provided for the Privilege and Immunity of Profeſſors, was Veſpaſian, the ſame who firſt allowed Salaries to ſuch as taught Rhetorick, out of the Publick Treaſury; which Grace of his was afterward Confirmed by Hadrian at the beginning of his Reign, as alſo by Antoninus Pius, Severus, and Antoninus, Philip, Diocleſian and Maximilian, all who were favourable to them, as were the Lawyers, who wrote much in their behalf. But all this hitherto done, extended only to their Perſons, not to their Patrimony, their Eſtates and Families, the Immunity of which was reſerved to Conſtantine, to be by him beſtowed.

Opens the Bath of Leucippus.

Encourages Phyſicians and Profeſſors.

Chron. Alexand.

Cod. Th. lib. 15. Tit. 2. & Cod. Juſtin. lib. 1. eodem. Tit.

Beneficia Divorum retrò Principum confirmantes, Medicos & Profeſſores literarum, Uxores etiam & Filios eorum ab omni functione, & ab omnibus muneribus publicis vacare præcipimus, nec ad militiam comprehendi, neque hoſpites recipere, nec ullo fungi munere, quo faciliùs Liberalibus ſtudiis & memoratis Artibus multos inſtituant. Cod. Theod. Lib. 13. Tit. 3. l. 3. ex qua Lege pars Legis 6. Cod. Juſtiniani. eodem Tit. deſumpta eſt. Vide Gothofred. in Leg.

16. For, before this Edict (the occaſion of our preſent Diſcourſe) he had Publiſhed two ſeveral Conſtitutions for the Encouragement of Phyſicians, Grammarians, and other Profeſſors of Learning, giving in the firſt, not only Immunity to their Perſons, but to their Eſtates, ſecuring them from violent Arreſts and Injuries, with a great Penalty to thoſe that ſhould moleſt them, whether Bond or Free. Their Salaries due from the Cities he commands to be paid, and as for ſuch Offices as were counted Dignities, he permits them either to accept or refuſe them, as they ſhould ſee occaſion; however diſcharging them from common Offices and ordinary Services; becauſe their Attendance upon their Patients and Scholars might require their whole time, he would not have them forced from their Employments: and yet leſt it ſhould be imagined in the leaſt, that they were barred from Honours, or Honourable Offices, it's left free for them to take or leave them, as they find convenient. Therefore they might be, if they pleaſed, in the Cities where they lived Duumviri, Defenſores, Gymnaſiarchæ, Ædiles, Prieſts, Flamines and Legati, which were both Perſonal Employments and Honours; and if they pleaſed they might refuſe them, as Phavorinus did that of Prieſt, under Adrian, appealing to the Laws made in his behalf as a Philoſopher. By his ſecond Conſtitution he diſcharges the Archiatri & Ex Archiatris, or the Phyſicians of the Court and of the City, of all Duties and Employments belonging to ſuch Ranks and Orders as they might chance to be of; or the payment of Gold or Silver, or the furniſhing of Horſes; and extends the Privilege unto their Sons. “ All thoſe Immunities and Privileges he “ Confirms by this Edict made in favour of his new City, adding two more con- “ cerning the Militia, and Quartering of Souldiers. And now after four or five years, by reaſon of theſe Encouragements, ſo great Confluence was made to Conſtantinople, that there was want both of Architects for Building Houſes and Churches, and of Proviſions; ſo that the Founder was obliged by new Laws in both reſpects to provide for the Multitude. He directs an Edict to Felix, the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, wherein after Signification, that there was need of very many

Lex. 1. hujus Tituli.

L. 2. hujus Tituli.

Takes care for Architects.

Architectis quamplurimis opus eſt, ſed quia non ſunt, Sublimitas tua in Provinciis Africanis, &c. Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 4. l. 1. Abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſt. velut κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν ἀναγκαῖα obſervante Gothofr. quem Conſule.

ny Architects, he orders him to draw thoſe in his Provinces of Africk to undertake that Study, who were about eighteen years of Age, and had ſome taſte of the Liberal Arts; for the Encouragement of whom, he grants Immunity from ordinary Burthens and Employments, both to them and their Parents, and affirms, he had appointed competent Salaries to ſuch as ſhould inſtruct them.

And increaſes the Privileges of the Navicularii.

L.6. de Navicularis Cod. Th. Lib. 13. Tit. 5. *abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſtin. Lib.*7. eod. Tit. Pro Commoditate urbis quam æterno nomine jubente Deo donavimus, hæc urbis Privilegia credidimus deferenda, &c.

17. One great Advantage this City received by its Situation; that as by Land it ſtood very well for Proviſions, ſo by Sea might be imported whatever the World could afford, both for Pleaſure and Convenience. Now all things of this Nature being conveyed by the Navicularii, who (as we ſaid) were a Corporation: By one Edict he redreſſed ſuch Diſorders among them as were obſerved to hinder the vigorous Proſecution of their Work, the greateſt Burthen often lying upon thoſe who were the leaſt able to bear it, and others avoiding their Proportions, how equal ſoever. This was publiſhed at Carthage on the ſeventh of September; and at the beginning of December following, we find another Conſtitution directed to the Navicularii of the Eaſt, wherein he tells them, "That for the Commodity of this City, to which by God's Command he had given an Everlaſting Name, he thought fit to beſtow upon them the following Privileges: As that all Navicularii ſhould be free from Civil Burthens, Offices and Services: That they ſhould not be bound to undertake any Honourable Employment in Cities to their Detriment, nor be Compelled to be Tutors or Guardians. That they ſhould not be bound by the Laws Julia and Papia, which allowed to Huſbands and Wives but ten parts in certain Caſes, though left them by the Teſtaments of their Wives or Huſbands; ſo that they might leave their whole Eſtates to one another, as they deſired; nor by the Reſcript of the Prince himſelf, be forced to appear before any extraordinary Judge; but in Conteſts about Inheritances, or any other Civil Matter be convened in that Court, in the Juriſdiction of which they then abode. That as the Cuſtom was to the Fleet of Alexandria, four Quarts in a hundred ſhould be allowed them toward the repairing the loſs or waſte which muſt neceſſarily be made in the Tranſportation of Corn: and that for every thouſand Meaſures, they ſhould receive for Freight one Solidus; that ſo by theſe Immunities and Rewards, being encouraged, and ſcarcely being at any Expence themſelves, they might lawfully go about their buſineſs. By this Conſtitution he eſtabliſhed a new Body or Society of Navicularii, for the Benefit and Advantage of Conſtantinople, in the Eaſt; and gives them as great Privileges, nay in ſome reſpects greater than what belonged to thoſe of Africk and Alexandria, who being formerly allotted to the Service of Rome only, now were ſo divided by him, that (regularly) the Fleet of Africk was left to its former Service; but that of Alexandria appointed to the Supply of Conſtantinople. But thus much concerning the Building and Peopling of this City from moſt Authentick Writings, not to mention other idle Reports: and we ſhall diſmiſs the Hiſtory of its Founding with this little Account further; that Valens a great Aſtronomer of that Time, caſting as it were its Nativity, upon Conſideration of the Scheme, gave out, that its Empire would continue ſix hundred ninety ſix years. Had he ſaid one thouſand one hundred twenty two, ſome obſerve he had gueſſed nearer to Truth. And yet though its preſent Condition as to Religion may ſeem to have aboliſhed the Foundation and Name (it being at firſt Deſigned and Dedicated in a manner to Chriſtianity) yet having ſet up upon a new, though Apoſtate Account, it ſeems yet after two hundred and twenty more very vigorous, and ſo vivacious, that whoever (of what Religion or Nation ſoever) ſhall be Lord of thoſe European and Aſian Provinces, it promiſes to it ſelf, from its Situation, a Fortune little Inferiour to what formerly it did, and at preſent doth enjoy. So that howſoever Valens Calculated, it was Founded under a wonderful Lucky Planet.

Valens his Prognoſtication of the Duration of Conſtantinople.

Cedrenus Zonaras in Conſtantinop.

Conſtantine Publiſheth an Edict concerning Judicature.

ut L. 2. Cod. Juſt. ubi in rem actio. L. 3. finium regendorum. l. unde Litigioſis l. l. 16. 17. de appellationibus. Et l. 1. de his qui per metum Judicis. Et vide Gothofred. in l. l. Hieron. in Chronic. Conſularia Daciana.

18. Conſtantine after the Founding of his new City, either out of Fondneſs to it (as Parents are wont to be indulgent to their Young and Tender Off-ſprings) or to encourage and further the Buildings by his Preſence, was much there, as appears by the Dates of his Edicts, and now, as habituated to be kind to all his Subjects, from the frequent Acts of Indulgence to his new Citizens, in the year following, in the Dedication he publiſheth a large Edict to all the Provincials through the Eaſt, bearing Date from this City, concerning the Order and Inviolability of Judicature, againſt the Corruption of Judges and Inferiour Officers, and the Knavery of Private Perſons in Poſſeſſion; of which there are ſix parts at leaſt, as now they are divided in our Law-Books. For theſe two or three years he had been diſintangled from Wars, and ſo more at leiſure to proſecute his other Deſigns; but now the next that follows, we find him Engaged by the Sarmatians, in War with Conſtantine his Son over-throws the Sarmatæ.

His Edicts in reference to that War.

A. D. 332.

Pacatiano & Hilariano Coſs.

Lex 4. de ſponſalibus Cod. Th. lib. 3. Tit. 5. & Cod. Juſtin. eod. Tit. ſed mirè interpolata.

Sulp. Severus. in vita Martin. C. 1.

Inde Murci dicti ſunt jocula-riter.

De filiis Militarium Apparitorum & Veteranorum. Cod. Theod. lib. 6. tit. 22. & 12. Cod. Juſtin. tit. 48.

Anonymus apud Sirmondum nunc editus à Valeſio, unà cum Ammiano Marcellino.

the Goths, which was managed by Conſtantine Cæſar his Son, who obtained a Victory over them in the Territories of the Sarmatæ, on the twentieth of April in the Conſulſhip of Pacatianus and Hilarianus A. D. cccxxxii. Though the Son had the Honour to have the name of General, and the Repute of a Conquerour; yet we find that the Father was not far off: for by the Date of another Edict this Month, it appears he was at Martianopolis, a City of Myſia in the Confines of the Goths and Sarmatians. And whether he had reſpect therein to this Expedition, in that Edict he gives Encouragement to Souldiers. For whereas Formerly a Woman that was Contracted, was not compelled by the Laws to ſtay any time for the Man, but might again refuſe him, though preſent, much leſs bound to expect one that was abſent and at a diſtance: "By that new Law he excepts a Soldier, though a Volunteer in the Service, his abſence being for the publick Concernments, and Ordaines, that a Woman Contracted to ſuch an one ſhall ſtay two years for him; condemning him to an Iſland that ſhould contract or marry her to another within that time; but in Caſe he returned not within two years, which time was thought ſufficient for one Expedition, ſhe might freely Marry to any other. That this Law had reſpect to this Expedition againſt the Goths by way of Encouragement, we may be induced to believe from another, which this ſame Month of April he made in way of Puniſhment and Compulſion for the ſame Service. The Veterani or old Souldiers had ſo great Privileges by the Laws, that it was thought but reaſonable, that when there hapned any urgent occaſions, their Sons ſhould be compelled to ſerve in the Armies; but many of them were ſo backward, eſpecially in Italy (where ſince the time that Auguſtus began to ſpare the Italians, they had applyed themſelves much to Huſbandry, and been averſe to War) that to make themſelves uncapable, they would cut off their Thumbs, and Parents were wont to make their Children unfit to bear Arms. Conſtantine had formerly, when he had War with the Sarmatæ, Publiſhed ſeveral Edicts for reſtraining of this Humour, and forcing them into the Field; and having the ſame occaſion, he now commands "That ſuch of them as entred at ſixteen years of Age, and are not fit for Military Service, be condemned to Offices and Services in the Towns and Cities, thereby cutting off the Privileges, which elſe they enjoyed." And ſucceeding Princes puniſhed them with greater Severity, as we ſhall ſee in due time and place. But as for this War, it was finiſhed with that Succeſs by Conſtantine the Son, that about one hundred thouſand of the Goths periſhed by Hunger and Cold, beſides thoſe that fell by the Sword, and they were conſtrained to give up Hoſtages, amongſt whom the Son of Ararich their King.

Sarmatæ beaten out by their Slaves.

received into the Empire.

Conſtantine his Law concerning Teſtaments of Souldiers.

Hieron. in Chronico.

*Author vitæ Conſt. lib.*4.*c.*6.

Anonymus Sirmondi.

A. D. 334.

L. 2. de Advocat. Fiſci dat. Singinduno.

l. 3. de fide teſtium dat. Naiſſo Cod. Theod.

L. 15. Cod. Juſtin. lib. 6. tit. 21. qui Teſtamenta facere poſſint, &c.

19. Thus were the Sarmatæ delivered from the Inroads and Oppreſſion of the Goths, but within two years were more roughly handled by their own Servants called Limigantes (and afterwards Arcaragentes) by whom they were beaten out of their own Countrey. They have been forced to Arm them againſt the Goths, and theſe Slaves thereby coming to know their ſtrength, would not own any more Subjection, but turned their Arms againſt thoſe for the defence of whom they had taken them up; who thus outed of their Dwelling, betook themſelves to the Emperor, and by his order were beſtowed through Thrace, Scythia, Macedonia and Italy, to the number of three hundred thouſand of both Sexes, all Ages and Conditions; but ſuch as were fit for Service, he took into his Armies. By the Subſcriptions of the Edicts of the year, wherein Optatus and Paulinus were Conſuls, it appears that he was in Myſia and Dacia in the Months of July and Auguſt, probably to take order in this Affair. One bears Date of the ſeventh of July, and on the thirteenth of Auguſt following we find another Famous Law Dated from Nicomedia, concerning the Teſtaments of Souldiers in Expedition, or in preſent Service, by which they are diſcharged from the Obligation of ſuch Solemnities as the Law makes neceſſary in the Wills of other Perſons; and theirs made good, if but written on the Scabberd of their Swords or their Targets with their Blood, or with their Swords in the Duſt ſuch time as they died in Battle. now this bearing Date on the Ides or thirteenth of Auguſt: The next that follows, is that made at Naiſus in Dacia, and bears Date but eighteen days after; ſo that Conſtantine muſt have poſted up and down in the ſpace of two Months and leſs from Singindunum in Myſia, back to Nicomedia, and from Nicomedia to the Borders of Naiſſus; which is agreeable enough to his Practice, and to the pains he took, but the time was ſo ſhort, that with our learned Lawyer, we may be content to caſt back this Edict concerning the Teſtaments of Souldiers, nine years, to the year ccxxv, and acknowledge it here to have been miſplaced.

Sect. I.

A. D. 335.

20. By the Edicts of the following year, it appears, that for ſome time he reſided in Myſia, but was paſſing to and fro, and for the moſt part was at Conſtantinople; and now being arrived at the thirtieth of his Reign, here he Celebrated it with great Magnificence. About this time (ſome ſay this very year, though others place it two years backward) he conferred the Dignity of Cæſar upon Conſtans, his third Son, and (as Zoſimus writes, Dalmatius the Son of his Brother Dalmatius, had the ſame Title, together with Conſtantine his Brother, and Annibalianus, being in ſome ſort alſo made Partakers of that Imperial Dignity, adorned with Purple, and other Robes ſet off with Gold, and ſtyled Nobiliſſimi, becauſe they were of his Kindred. The thirtieth of his Reign being over, the Author of his Life farther tells us, that having long before Married his Eldeſt Son, he procured a Wife for Conſtantius his Second, and ſolemnized the Marriage with all Splendor imaginable, feaſting the Men and Women apart by themſelves, and in honour hereof, beſtowing Gifts upon all Nations and Cities. Much about the ſame time Ambaſſadours came to him out of India, bringing Preſents of great Value, and greater Rarity; not only Gemmes, but certain Animals, unknown before to the Weſtern parts of the World: and he adds that this they did to ſignify, that his Empire and Dominion extended as far as the utmoſt Shore of the Ocean; and obſerves, that as at his firſt Promotion, the Britans in the moſt Weſtern Parts of the World, firſt ſubmitted to him; ſo now at the laſt the Indians in the moſt Eaſtern acknowledged his Sovereign Authority. Having receiv'd this Acknowledgment, he divided his Empire amongſt his three Sons, aſſigning to Conſtantine, his Eldeſt, the Grand-father's ſhare, the Eaſt to Conſtantius, and that Part lying betwixt them unto Conſtans; but above all things deſirous that they might be fitted for Government, he appointed them Tutors and Inſtructors, the beſt that could be had, to teach them the Arts of Peace and War, the Liberal Sciences, and eſpecially to ground them well in their Religion. Thus the Author of his Life in his Panegyrical way, who muſt not be underſtood as if Conſtantine reſigned the Empire to his Sons and put off his Cloathes before he went to bed; but about this time, when he promoted his youngeſt Son and Kindred, we find that the Empire was Govern'd in this manner: Conſtantine, the Eldeſt Commanded in Gall, and ſome Weſtern Provinces; Conſtantius, when a Boy (as Julian teſtifies) had had the Name of Commander in Gall, but now Govern'd Aſrick and Illyricum, and Italy was ruled by Conſtans. Dalmatius was appointed to defend thoſe Parts that bordered upon the Goths, and, as ſome ſay, Meſopotamia; and Annibalianus had Charge of Cappadocia and Armenia the leſs.

He makes Conſtans, his Son, Cæſar.

L. 21. decurionibus dat. Vineinacio pr. Non. Aug. & l. 4. Cod. Juſtin. de Offic. Rector. Provinc. dat Nicopoli. 1 Kal. Novembr.

Vita Conſtantini li. 4. & 49, 50. &c.

His Felicities.

Orat. 1.

Chron. Alexand.

Anonym. Syrmondi, Vide Chron. L.L.

21. This Diviſion as we ſaid, was not made by Conſtantine in order to the deveſting himſelf of his Sovereignty; but to the better Government of the Empire, and the Breeding of his Sons; yet this ſeemed a Preparatory or Ominous to what within little more than a year enſued. He was now above ſixty Years old, a great Age for Princes as uſually it happens. All this while he had continued in perfect Health and Vigour, ſo as to endure Exerciſe, Riding and Travel. His Underſtanding he had perfect, ſo as ſtill he would compoſe Prayers and Orations, Converſe and Diſcourſe with his Friends, and aſſiſt with much Dexterity at the Framing of his Laws and Edicts, both relating to matters Civil and Military. Not long before his Death, he made a Funeral Oration in the Place where he was wont to ſpeak, and therein diſcourſed of the Immortality of the Soul, of the Rewards in the future Life, which attend thoſe that live well here, and the Puniſhments appointed for wicked Perſons. By this and other Courſes he took, he endeavoured to prepare himſelf for another World, and make his Paſſage into it more eaſie and quiet: but his Meditations were interrupted by News from the Eaſt, where the Perſians made Diſturbance; which when he received, intending (as he ſaid) to make this his laſt Victory, he rais'd an Army with all Expedition: of this the Enemy having Notice, and fearing to be engaged in a War with him, ſent their Ambaſſadors, who upon their humble deſire of his Friendſhip, and Promiſe to give Satisfaction required, obtained Peace. Conſtantine, about this time, entring into another Journey; for now he began to be diſtempered, which when he found, and that his Diſeaſe increaſed, he made uſe of the warm Baths of the City, and afterward went to Helenopolis (a City built by him in Memory of his Mother) to perform his Devotions in the Martyrs Church. Hence he remov'd to Nicomedia, and there in the Suburbs thereof call'd Achyrona, having received Baptiſm, departed this Life on the two and twentieth Day of May, being Whit-ſunday, as ſome affirm, in the ſixty ſecond Year of his Age, and the thirty ſecond of his Reign, (though others write ſomewhat variouſly, as to the punctual time) the firſt year of the two hundred ſeventy ninth Olympiad, the thouſand and ninetieth year of Rome, A. D. CCCXXXVII. T. Fabius, Titianus, Maximinus and Felicianus being Conſuls, ſome reported that he was poyſon'd by his Brothers and Nephew; but he that firſt reported it deſerves no Credit, and they that received it from him were too remote from the time of his Death, to gain any better Reputation as to this matter. None of the Antients, be they Chriſtians or Heathens, making mention of any ſuch thing. But of the latter ſort, what Practices ſoever were made againſt his Body) ſome are conceiv'd to have offered great Violence to his Memory; which Wound, moſt of the former ſort endeavour to bind up and heal, yet ſome gladly would keep it open, and make it bleed afreſh, and that out of kindneſs to the other Party, however they veil themſelves under the Chriſtian Name. Here, for very weighty reaſons, it highly concerns us, the Reader, and the Truth to interpoſe, but with a cautious and wary hand: if Incurable, ſuch we ſhall confeſs and leave it; but if it may be healed up, though not without ſome Cicatrice or Fear remaining, no good-natured Men will blame us for endeavouring to cauſe others to think and ſpeak well of the Dead.

Author Vitæ Conſtantini, lib. 4. c. c. 53, 55, 56. &c.

He dies.

Titiano & Feliciano Coss. Philoſtorgius. Recentiores, ut Zonaras & Cedrenus. c Non Socrates, Theodoretus, Sozomenus, &c, non Victor Eutropius, Zoſimus.

And, in order to an indifferent Procedure, we ſhall (without mincing the matter) produce thoſe Characters which are given him by Writers that are eſteemed to have born him no good Will, and which indeed ſpeak the worſt of him: nay, we ſhall take it for granted, that ſuch Chriſtians as ſpeak largely in his Commendation, ſpeak out of Affection; and not producing their Denial againſt the Affirmation of the other (though there be as much Reaſon to believe Affection, as Malice and Hatred) Condemn him in all things his Adverſaries alledge, without all benefit of Compurgators, except Reaſon and unqueſtionable Records, ſuch as cannot be judged partial, do acquit him.

His Character by Eutropius.

First then Eutropius, a Writer of the Pagan Perſwaſion, lays this to his Charge, "That by Proſperity being ſomething altered from his goodneſs of Diſpoſition, he firſt began to perſecute his own Relations; as his Siſters Son, an excellent Young Man, of great hope, his Wife and very many of his Friends: for this Character he gives him, that at firſt he was a man to be compared with the beſt; and toward his latter end with the Indifferent or Middle ſort of Princes. Innumerable Excellencies, he ſaith, both of Body and Mind were eminent in him. He was moſt deſirous of Military Glory, Fortunate in War, yet ſo as his Fortune did not exceed his Induſtry; for after the Civil Broils, he ſeveral times Defeated the Goths, and at length granted them Peace, and gave the Barbarous Nations occaſion to have a deep Senſe and Memory of his Grace and Clemency. He was given to Civil Arts and Liberal Studies, was an Affector of Juſtice, and the love of his People, which he altogether endeavoured to procure by Liberality and Courteſie. As toward ſome of his Friends he was uncertain, yet extraordinarily kind, whom to enrich ſtill and advance, he would omit no occaſion. Many Laws he made, ſome Good and Equitable, more Superfluous, and ſome ſevere. And firſt of all others, adventured to advance a City of his own Name to that height, as to make it æmulous to Rome it ſelf. Going about to make War upon the Perſians, who now haraſſed Meſopotamia, in the one and thirtieth year of his Reign, and the ſixty ſixth of his Age, he died in the publick Suburbe at Nicomedia. His Death was foretold by a Blazing Star of an unuſual Bigneſs, which the Greeks call a Comet, and he deſerved to be reckon'd amongſt the Divi. So much Eutropius, as near as we can Tranſlate him, who lived when the Latin Tongue was much altered.

Verum inſolentia rerum ſecundarum aliquantulum Conſtantinum ex illa favorabili animi docilitate mutavit. Innumeræ in eo animi corporiſque virtutes claruerunt.

Civilibus Artibus & Liberalibus Studiis deditus, affectator Juſtitiæ & Amoris, quem omnino ſibi & Liberalitate & docilitate quæſivit.

By Victor.

23. The next we ſhall produce, is Aurelius Victor, one as little addicted to him, as the former. He having given us an account of his War and Dealing with Licinius, adds, "That having by admirable ſucceſs obtained the Monarchy of the Roman Empire; at the ſuggeſtion of his Wife Fauſta, as was thought, he cauſed his Son Criſpus to be put to death: afterward he procured his ſaid Wife to be ſtifled in a Bath; being reproved by Helena his Mother, which took moſt heavily the death of her Grand-ſon. Then for his Character, he tells us, that he was greedy of Praiſe or Fame above Imagination, and yet he ſaith, he was wont to call Trajan Herba parietaria, for having his name upon ſo many Walls in Rome. He built a Bridge over the Danube: his Royal Apparell he adorned with Gems, and always wore a Diadem; yet was he moſt profitable to the State in ſeveral reſpects: By moſt ſevere Laws, he repreſſed Calumnies; He cheriſhed Good Arts, and eſpecially the Studies of Learning; He himſelf was given to read, to write, to meditate; was wont to give Audience to Ambaſſadors, and hear the Complaints of the Provinces. Having made Cæſars his own Sons, together with Delmatius his Brothers Sons, having lived ſixty and three years, and thereof Reigned half Fuit verò ultrà quam æſtimari poteſt laudis avidus. Hic Trajanum Herbam Parietariam ob titulos multos ædibus inſcriptos appellare ſolitus erat. Commodiſſimus tamen rebus multis fuit.

Sect. 1.

A. D. 337.

(ſo as thirteen by himſelf) He died of Sickneſs. A Giber rather than fair-ſpoken; “ whereupon by a common Proverb he was ſaid for ten years to have been a moſt excellent Prince, for the twelve following a Robber, and for the ten laſt a Pupil, or Child by reaſon of his Immoderate Expenſes. His body was buried in Byzantium, call'd Conſtantinople. Theſe two give ſome Blows to the Memory of Conſtantine, and upon account of their Religion cannot but be eſteemed Adverſaries to him, and of the other Party; but theſe are but Velites, their ſlight Weapons, weak or blunt; or if they wound they ſeem to carry a Balſom along with them, for they Praiſe more than Diſpraiſe him; but he that follows lays on Stroaks indeed, and that with invenomed Steel. His Pen makes him ſo black and ugly, that ſcarcely any of thoſe fair Lines can appear, which they both diſcern and own in him. And by what hath been already ſaid, the Reader may eaſily gueſs, that it is Zoſimus, ſome part of whoſe Accuſation we have had already occaſion to mention; and now ſhall be faithful in producing what remains.

Irriſor potiùs quàm blandus; unde Proverbio vulgari Thracata decem annis præſtantiſſimus, duodecim ſequentibus Latro, decem noviſſimis Pupillus ob Profuſiones immodicas nominatus.

24. Scarely is there any thing he ever did, or ſaid, but this Writer if he can, makes an ill Conſtruction of it. Having firſt raiſed what Prejudice he may concerning his Birth; his Endeavours after Preferment he aſcribes to the heat of his Ambition. In the Quarrel betwixt him and Licinius, he will have him the Aggreſſor, as being accuſtomed to break his Word; yet all this while he makes him to have conceal'd the Naughtineſs of his Diſpoſition. But Licinius being removed out of the Way, and all the Power being left in his own hands, he tells you he no longer diſſembled, but acted according to his Luſt and Pleaſure. Then he gives us the Narration of the Death of Criſpus, and how he began his Impiety at his own Houſe; his changing his Religion thereupon, and his founding of his new City, upon the Quarrel betwixt him and his Subjects of Rome. After this he tells us how he was beaten by the Scythians, and giving up himſelf to a voluptuous Life, ordain'd the Allowance of Corn to the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople, and profuſely ſpent the publick Revenue in uſeleſs Structures. But theſe are more general, and ſpeak him a Bad Man: now follows more particularly what declares him a Fool, an ill Stateſman, and a Tyrant altogether. He alſo (ſaith he) made a diſturbance in the Offices of “ Magiſtracy formerly Inſtituted. For whereas there were before two Præfecti “ Prætorio, who ordinarily executed that Charge; not only thoſe that ſerved in the “ Court were under their Command; but alſo ſuch Souldiers as kept the City, and “ all they that lay upon the Borders, the Præfectus Prætorio, who was Eſteemed “ the Second after the Emperour himſelf in Dignity, had the Charge of Proviſions “ for the Army, and Power to puniſh ſuch as offended againſt the Diſcipline there- “ of: but Conſtantine altering ſuch things as had been well ſettled, divided this one “ Magiſtrate into four; for to the one of them he aſſigned all Ægypt with Pentapolis “ in Libya; the Eaſt as far as Meſopotamia, beſides Cilicia, Cappadocia, Armenia, “ and all the Maritime Tract from Pamphilia as far as Trapezond, and the Caſtles Si- “ tuate upon Phaſis; and moreover Thrace and Myſia (bounded by the Borders of “ Aſemus, Rhodope and Topecus) beſides Cyprus and the Iſlands Cyclades, Lemnos, Imbrus “ and Samothracia excepted. To the ſecond he Aſſigned Macedonia, Theſſaly, “ Crete, Greece, with the adjacent Iſlands Epirus, Illyrium, the Dacians, Triballi “ and Pannonians, as far as Valeria, with the upper Myſia. To the third all Italy “ and Sicily, with the adjacent Iſlands; as alſo Sardinia, Corſica and Africk from the “ Syrtes, as far as Cyrene. And to the fourth the Celtæ or Galls beyond the Alpes, “ with Spain and the Britiſh Iſland.

By Zoſimus.

Κωνσταντῖνος δὲ τὰ καλῶς καθεστῶτα κινῶν.

25. By this means having thus divided their Office, by other ways, he alſo “ ſtudiouſly endeavour'd to deſtroy their Power; for whereas in all places, not “ only Centurions and Tribunes, but alſo thoſe they called Duces, who ſerved in “ the place of Generals, had Command of Souldiers; he by inſtituting Magiſtri Militum, “ whereof one commanded the Horſe, and the other the Foot, with Power “ to order and puniſh them, much more infringed the Power of the Præfecti Prætorio. “ That this, both in time of Peace and War did endamage the State, he aſſures us “ he will make appear: For the Præfecti Prætorio in all Countries collecting the “ publick Revenue by their Officers, and paying the Souldiers had all Military men “ at their Devotion, who conſidered it was they, that both paid them their Wages, “ and had Power to puniſh them, if there was occaſion. But now there being “ one that pay's them, and another that puniſhes them, they do what they liſt, “ although one might alſo alleage, that the greateſt part of their Proviſions are devoured “ by the Captain and his Officers. Conſtantine did another thing, which “ made free Paſſage for the Barbarous Nations into the Roman Provinces: for all “ the Borders of the Empire being by the good Forecaſt of Diocleſian fortified with “ Garri- “

Gariſons and Caſtles, and therein the Militia lying, the Barbarians were thereby barred of all Acceſs. This Security Conſtantine aboliſhed by removing the greateſt part of the Souldiers from the Borders, and placing them in Towns where there was no need of them; whereby he deprived them of their Defence, which were lyable to the Inroads of the Barbarians, and plagued thoſe Places with Souldiers, which were in Repoſe; and by this means many of them were utterly depopulated, beſides the enervating of the Souldiers by the Pleaſures of the Theatre, and other voluptuous Courſes; and to ſpeak ſimply, he laid the Foundation of thoſe Miſchiefs, which to this time have followed. Then after an Account given of the greatneſs of Conſtantinople, he ſubjoyns, that all this being done he ceaſed not to burthen the publick Revenue with Penſions, which were not aſſigned according to Reaſon, but to perſons unworthy and unſerviceable. To ſuch as paid Tribute he was burthenſom; but enriched ſuch as were utterly uſeleſs: for, Profuſeneſs he eſteemed Munificence. He laid a Tax of Gold and Silver upon all that exerciſed any Trade in all Countries, even the very meaneſt, ſo that Strumpets were not excuſed from it. Hence came it to paſs, that upon the Approach of every fourth year, when this was to be paid, there was nothing but weeping and Lamentation throughout the City; and when it came, great were the Tortures which thoſe Miſerable Creatures endured on their Bodies, the Purſes of whom could not reach to the Impoſition; ſo that Mothers ſold their Children, and Fathers Proſtituted their Daughters to make up the Payment of this Tax, which they called Chryſargyrum. He deviſed alſo another Courſe to Torment thoſe that had conſiderable Eſtates; for ſuch he would call to the Dignity of the Prætorſhip, and under pretence of this Honour, make them pay a great ſum of Mony. So that when the Officers came to ſee this executed in the Cities, all would run away into Forreign parts, as unwilling to purchaſe Honour at ſo dear Rates. All the Eſtates of thoſe of greateſt Quality he kept Recorded, and Impoſed a Tribute upon them, called Follis; by which Impoſitions he exhauſted the Cities; and the payment of them being exacted long after his death, very many of them were rendred Deſolate without Inhabitants. That Conſtantine having all theſe ways endamaged the Common-wealth, at length died of Sickneſs. And time it was.

26. Now, for Juſtice her ſake, let us Pauſe a little; and to Conſider of theſe grand Accuſations, it will be convenient to Reflect upon the Condition and Qualifications of Accuſers or Witneſſes, and their Teſtimonies, ſo as to diſcover their Knowledge and Faithfulneſs, without which their Witneſſings ſignifie nothing, but rather make for the Party accuſed. There are ſome Witneſſes then that are called Certain, and others Uncertain. The certain Witneſs is he that was preſent, or ſaw the thing done; the uncertain, is he that only had it upon Hearſay; and as to this matter Plautus ſays well, that one of the former is worth ten of the latter ſort. There are alſo indifferent Witneſſes, and Witneſſes Partial; either upon the account of Favour, or Enmity, or Malice. Partiality requires Abatement on both ſides; but as all Laws have ever been more favourable to Charity than the contrary Extream, the Enemy-Witneſs is in equal diſeſteem with him that ſpeaks for Gain, that's bribed to give a Teſtimony, is rejected as well as he; and for this Reaſon it is, that we know accuſed Perſons to have the Privilege, in our own Country, to except againſt a conſiderable number of Perſons of thoſe that are Judges of Fact, and in the Power of whom it is, to accept or reject the Teſtimonies of ſuch as ſhall but witneſs againſt them. We further know it to be the Duty of a Witneſs, and conſtantly given him in Charge, to ſpeak the Whole Truth, as well as nothing but the Truth; eſpecially it's behoveful, when the Reputation and Fame of a Perſon is call'd in Queſtion. As the Commendation of a Friend, or the Accuſation of an Enemy is not to be regarded much; ſo if they ſpeak quite contrary, they are of Weight and Moment; of all others, that being the faireſt Teſtimonial, which a known or profeſſed Enemy makes. In the next place, if two Adverſaries joyn in the Commendation; a third, who alone gives an ill Character of the ſame Perſon, muſt needs be eſteemed partial, and if he make him Guilty of what they acquit him, he is in no caſe to be credited as to the reſt; nay this would hold (it being a matter of dubious, and therefore of Charitable Conſtruction) though there were but one that teſtified contrary to the other. In concluſion, a Witneſs that is convicted of Forgery or Contumely, is infamous, and barred of all Credit: for Witneſſes, not Witneſſings, are to be believed.

An Anſwer to Zoſimus his Calumnies.

Teſtis Certus, Incertus. vide Calvini Lexicon.

Pluris eſt Teſtis oculatus unus, quàm auriti decem.

Teſtis idoneus Pater Filio, aut Filius Patri non eſt. L. 9. ff. de Teſtibus lib. 22. Tit. 5. & vide l. 3. Cod. Tit.

Pulchrum eſt Teſtimonium quod ab Hoſtibus petitur.

Jure dubio benigniorem Interpretationem ſequi, non minus Juſtum eſt quam tutum. l. 192. ff. de Regulis Juris.

Hadrianus Junio Rufino Proconſuli Macedoniæ reſcripſit, Teſtibus ſe, non Teſtimoniis crediturum l. 3. ff. de Teſtibus, & vide L. 3. Cod. Tit. Vide Calvini Lexicon in V. Teſtis.

27. Now all theſe Rules, if to Witneſſes in private Cauſes and Accuſations, much more are Applicable to Hiſtorians; for Hiſtory is by Cicero termed, the Witneſs neſs of Times; ſo that if an Hiſtorian fail, either in Knowledge, or Veracity; the injury he does extends to Poſterity: not like that done by a private to a private Perſon in a Court of Juſtice, in which uſually the preſent Age (nay ſeldom that) is only concern'd, and dyes with the Party injured; whereas the wound given by an Hiſtory bleeds ſtill, as long as Hiſtory and Time will laſt. In other falſe Teſtimonies a few perſons are prejudiced, in this all future Ages abuſed. Now then, to deal impartially, of theſe three Writers laſt mentioned, the two former can only pretend to the Repute of Certain Witneſſes, or to what bears ſome Proportion to this Qualification. Eutropius ſerved under Julian in his Expedition againſt the Perſians, and ſo might be an Eye-Witneſs of many of the Acts and Performances of Conſtantine; could not but know, both what he practiſed, and what the general Senſe and Opinion was concerning him; how much beloved, or hated: for what he was commended, and for what condemned, and writing at the time when all this was freſh in every mans Memory, could not for Shame contradict the Senſe of the Age; eſpecially all Fear being paſt, the Family of Conſtantine having already fail'd, and another poſſeſſed of the Imperial Power. Victor, though not altogether ſo ancient as he, might alſo live in the time of Conſtantine; but as for Zoſimus, who was in Employment as Comes and Advocate of the Treaſury under Theodoſius Junior, he could not reach his Days, who died about or nigh an hundred years before he could write his Hiſtory; and therefore he might be a Teſtis auritus, but not Oculatus, an Ear-Witneſs, but not an Eye-Witneſs; except at the ſecond hand, as he might ſee what they had written of him, and take it upon Truſt from them. As for the ſecond thing, they were all Pagans, and upon that account lye, at leaſt, under a Vehement Suſpition of Partiality: for of all Prejudices nothing like that of Religion: ill Livers indeed, or Atheiſtical Perſons, on all ſides, may be little concern'd what Opinion prevails; but thoſe that have a Senſe of things above them, and eſpecially, if Zealous, entertain no Concernment like to this. Above all, ſuch as conceive themſelves of the old Religion, and diſturbed by thoſe they account Innovators, vehemently reſent the alteration. Nothing in the World hath raiſed ſuch Paſſions, and conſequently procur'd ſuch Extravagance in Speaking, Writing, and Acting, as a Religious Zeal.

From the Conditions requiſite to a Time. Teſtimony.

Tantum Religio potuit ſuadere malorum.

28. For Eutropius and Victor there is not ſo much to be ſaid, but that Zoſimus was moſt Zealous for the old Ethnick Religion, is ſo evident, that none can deny it; not his friend Leunclauius, who owns his ſpleen againſt Conſtantine hereupon, and excuſes it, as againſt one, who, firſt of the Emperours, deſerted the Religion of their Anceſtors. This ſo overruled his hand, that he could put nothing but Gall into his Ink; whereas the Duty of an Hiſtorian in delivering the Character of a Perſon is, to ſpeak the whole Truth, as well as it is the Charge of every private Witneſs. The uſual fault indeed of thoſe who write the Lives of men, is agreeable to the common Practice of Painters, who generally make mens Pictures with better Lines and Colours, far more graceful, than they are themſelves; and you ſhall hear ſome ſay, it's no matter, though it be not ſo like, ſo it be good Work; as if that could be called Titius his Picture which reſembles Sempronius, and hath little, or nothing of the other's Face: but Zoſimus hath not offended on this hand, being afraid, that the Pourtraiture of Conſtantine ſhould be miſtaken for his Couſin Julian's, becauſe they were ſo near a Kin. We have heard and read for certain, that Religious Phancy hath been ſo powerful in ſome, as to clean the Feet of the moſt Eminent of their Adverſaries; and as to particular Perſons more lately abroad; ſo long ago in our own Country, to have affixed long Tailes to an whole Country, which ſome ſilly People of a neighbouring State, will ſcarcely believe, but are appropriate to the whole Nation; and thereupon, when they reproach us, uſually they call us Steorts or Tailes. Little better Conſtruction can be put upon Zoſimus his Deſign, or any mans elſe who writes nothing but ill, and that to all Exceſs, againſt a Perſon, who it cannot be denied but had very good Qualities, and did as great things to ſet him off with Luſtre. For whereas Leunclavius takes it for granted, from the Allegations of others, that he gives him Commendations, there is little or nothing of this to be found. If he can put an ill interpretation upon any thing, he puts it: but if ſometimes he relates ſome Actions, which Malice it ſelf cannot blemiſh, and which he is conſtrain'd to mention, no good uſe to his Advantage makes he of it; but leaves the thing it ſelf to ſpeak, or rather forces it not to ſpeak (which he cannot do) contrary to the very Nature and Drift of it. And this is all the Right he doth him, if ſometimes not to do Wrong be ſaid to do Right to any Perſon. How oft doth he Inſinuate concerning his breach of Faith, without any excuſable occaſion? And layes the War againſt Licinius upon him, without any any Reflections againſt his Enemy, whom others confeſs to have been as bad a Man as could be. Eutropius affirms innumerable Excellencies both of Body and Mind to have been Eminent in him. He meddles not with his Body, except implicitly, when he tells us, that he died of a Diſeaſe, and his Mind he repreſents far from being Sound, though it was in a ſound Body. So far Eutropius and Victor may ſeem to Countenance his Accuſation concerning Ambition, that they ſay he was covetous of Military Glory (a Conſtantinian Vice ſometimes incident to Generous Spirits) but Eutropius further writes, he was Fortunate in War, and yet ſo as his Fortune did not exceed his Induſtry, than which nothing can be ſaid more of a Souldier, of ſo Great a Conquerour. His Succeſs and Fortune was great, all muſt yield, that know what things he brought to paſs before he arriv'd at the Monarchy, If his Induſtry was as great, he muſt have been a moſt Aſſiduous, Vigilant, and Laborious Warriour.

Kent, becauſe of the Murder of Becket.

29. As an Effect both of his good Fortune and his Induſtry (which, it ſeems, quitted him not after he had Triumphed over all his Æmulators) Eutropius inſtanceth, that the Civil War being over, he ſeveral times defeated the Goths, and obtain'd a Reputation of Clemency among the Barbarous Nations. But Zoſimus quite contrary ſaith, he gave up himſelf to Idleneſs, would not Fight, was Beaten, and loſt the greateſt part of his Army. Eutropius acknowledges a Good Nature, Towardlineſs, or Inclination in him, though it was ſomething altered by Proſperity (as we often ſee in the Beſt of Men.) This Zoſimus, if you will have his Gloſs upon it, interprets a Natural Pravity or Malignity of Diſpoſition, which he formerly conceal'd, (but he forgets that he ſaid before, that he betray'd his Faithleſneſs or breach of Truſt, and Ambition) but when he arriv'd at the height of his Good Fortune, then Diſcovered it ; and Acted, not a little, or in ſome things according to his Will and Power, but (to Explain the Aliquantulum of Eutropius,) even in all things. Victor and Eutropius both witneſs of him, that he was himſelf addicted to, and Cheriſhed Learning and all Good Arts. Doth Zoſimus but hint any ſuch thing concerning him ? Victor further adds, that he was wont to Hear and Receive the Complaints of the Provinces, which Complaints, if you allow Zoſimus an Expoſitor, can be of nothing but the moſt Grievous and Inſupportable Burthens wherewith he haraſſed all his Subjects. So that when you read in Eutropius that he affected Juſtice, and the Love of his People, and altogether endeavoured to procure it by Liberality and Courteſie, peruſe but what Zoſimus writes of him, and you will find, this was but Drollery in Eutropius, as that alſo in Victor, when he ſaith, That he was moſt profitable to the Commonwealth in ſeveral reſpects, or elſe all is perverted, and falſe Printed ; and as before, for Favourable Docility, or Good Inclination, is to be read, Malignity of Nature ; ſo here inſtead of Juſtice, the moſt horrid Injuſtice in the World ; of Liberality, Rapacity ; for Courteſie, by way of Errata read Cruelty ; and for moſt Profitable, moſt Pernicious or Plaguy. And then take notice of a Grand Miſtake that the World hath hitherto lain under, as to Politicks, and that if any Prince will endeavour to purchaſe the Love of his Subjects, he muſt do it by Injuſtice, Rapacity, Cruelty, and being a Plague to his Country. So it muſt be, if you make theſe Writers accord ; and perhaps the particular Diſpoſition of the Age did marvellouſly hit the Malignity of Conſtantine's Nature : perhaps he found his Subjects of the humour of Spaniels, that the more he beat them, the more they lov'd him.

Favorabilis Docilitas.

Περιστάσης δὲ τῆς πάσης εἰς μόνον Κωνσταντῖνον ἀρχῆς, οὐκ ἔτι λοιπὸν τὴν κατὰ φύσιν ἐνοῦσαν αὐτῷ κακοήθειαν ἔκρυπτεν, ἀλλὰ ἐνεδίδου τῷ καθ᾽ ἐξουσίαν ἅπαντα πράττειν.

τούτοις ἅπασι τοῖς τρόποις ὁ Κωνσταντῖνος τῷ πολιτεύματι λυμηνάμενος ἐτελεύτησε νόσῳ.

The major and better number acquit Conſtantine of thoſe heavy Accuſations.

Calumniare fortiter ut aliquid hæreat.

30. To be ſerious, Reader, thou ſeeſt what Contradiction there is amongſt thoſe Accuſers of Conſtantine ; and how the major part, and that which had reaſon to know beſt, Diſchargeth him of that Load of Calumnies heaped upon him by one Single, but Bitter Adverſary, who ſeems to have had that Cunning, as to do it to ſome purpoſe, that ſomething might ſtick : For he knew, that Serious Conſiderers there are very few ; that the World is Governed by Prejudice and Opinion ; that there's more Affection than Reaſon in the Judgments of moſt ; ſo that the way is, by a great Exaggeration of Horrid Crimes, firſt to raiſe Paſſion and Indignation, and the Work is done. If Indifferency and Juſtice have any place with thee, thou can'ſt not but give credit to two rather than one, and to ſuſpect this one, as to all the reſt, who by a larger Teſtimony is already convinced of Falſhood in ſome particulars. But neither do we think he was free from Faults ; this would be to offend well nigh as much on the other hand ; and therefore from theſe general Reflexions, come to what is ſaid particularly againſt him ; weigh it without Partiality, and take in what Julian, his Succeſſor, in a jeering manner objected, as bitter againſt him as the reſt, upon the Account of Religion and other things. As for his putting his Son Criſpus and others to death, we have already ſaid, that if there was either a ſufficient Cauſe, or he was abuſed by his Wife, Cruelty for this cannot be laid to his charge; and we might inſtance in Kings, that have through Miſtake, and by Inſtigation of others, both long ago, and of late put to death their Sons, and yet have not incurred ſo grievous Cenſures of Cruelty and Unnaturalneſs. A Moral Man would think, that what Victor ſayes of his greedineſs of Praiſe or Fame, above imagination, ſeems ſomething inconſiſtent with what he ſubjoyns concerning Trajan. The Humour of that Prince was not unlike to that of our Church-wardens at preſent in our Pariſh-works. There could not any Publick Building be erected, but he muſt have his Name ſet upon it, which Vanity Conſtantine taxed, both by a Jeſt, and his own Practice. He called him Herba Parietaria, or Parſley, becauſe his Name grew, as it were, upon Walls; but as for himſelf, though he Erected ſo many ſumptuous Structures, (eſpecially Churches, & hinc illæ lachrymæ to our Zoſimus and others) yet it's obſerved, that ſeldome or never could his Name be found upon them: ſo that this Deſire of Praiſe muſt rather, as Eutropius explains it, be taken for Thirſt after Military Glory.

Philip of Macedon, his Son Demetrius; and Philip of Spain, his Son Charles.

31. His wearing of a Diadem, and Gems in his Cloaths can argue little more, than that he was of a Gay Humour, and lov'd to appear Neat and Splendid; which alſo he betrayed in his Diet and his manner of living, with which Julian ſo twits him. And yet as to his Diadem and Feaſting, there might be ſomewhat of a Religious Concernment: for probably he refuſed to wear the uſual Laurel about his Head, as ſuperſtitiouſly dedicated to Apollo; and his Feaſts were the many and great Entertainments he made for the Biſhops and other Chriſtians, eſpecially at the Feſtivals appointed by the Church. This ſo moved the Stomach of Julian, that in his Tale of the Cæſars, becauſe of his voluptuous Life, he feigns him to have choſen to live with the Goddeſs of Pleaſure, and by her to have been put in womens Clothes. You muſt know the man was wonderfully taken with the Conceit of womens Clothes, and therefore, as his Friend Zoſimus acquaints us, was wont to puniſh ſuch Souldiers as fled from their Colours, by habiting them therewith. Now think you, that judging it a fine Device ſo to diſgrace thoſe that forſook the Camp, he would not think fit alſo, in the ſame manner, to make ridiculous him that had forſaken the Gods, and deſerted the Pagan Religion? How could he poſſibly diſpenſe with ſo witty a Conceit? And he jeers him for being curious about his Hair; in revenge, as we may judge, for being himſelf derided by the Antiochians for affecting to wear a long Beard, and that (as his Friends confeſs) very ridiculouſly. However he might be pleaſed to be neat and ſplendid, that he was no effeminate Perſon, both the Teſtimonies lately produced, and the great things atchieved by him ſufficiently ſpeak: amongſt which, that is not the leaſt which Julian himſelf hints in his Tale, concerning his Recovery of a Country, which Trajan formerly had ſubdued. This was Dacia, which after Trajan had with vaſt Labour and many Battels laid to the Dominion of the Empire, it again ſhook off the Yoak, and being more troubleſome and harder to Manage than before, after ſo many Emperours, was again reduced to Obedience by Conſtantine.

In Cæſaribus

Mihi Delphica Lauro Cinge volens Melpomene comam. Horat. Carmin. lib. 3. od. ult. & Laurea donandus Apollinari. Carm. lib. 4. od. 2.

'Οψοποιοῦ καὶ κομμωτρίας βίον ἔχων.

32. But we come to thoſe Matters wherein he is ſaid more eſpecially to have done amiſs, as a Stateſman, and a Prince. Theſe are, changing the Politie of the State, drawing the Garriſons from the Borders, and the cruel Oppoſition of his People. Zoſimus charges him for having made four of two Præfecti Prætorio, and giving much of their Power to the new Officers call'd Magiſtri Militum. As to which we muſt take leave to conſider, whether it was He who firſt made the four Præfects, and then whether he did amiſs. Suppoſe he made them, and gave away their Power. Firſt then, upon Inquiry it appears, that he made them not; but found four, and ſo left them: for there being then a Tetrarchy in the Empire, each of the Emperours and Cæſars in their ſeveral Diſtricts had his Præfectus Prætorio, as Gothofred well obſerves, which at laſt (when he had ſubdued all his Adverſaries) coming under his Dominion, he let remain ſtill, as many as they were; but whenas their Power was too great (which by reaſon of the Obligations, or Puniſhments they might put upon Souldiers brought the Armies to be at their Devotion) or for other Reaſons reſpecting the Perſons who were now employ'd, whom he might not have cauſe to truſt with ſo great a Command, he inſtituted a new ſort of Officers call'd Magiſtri Militum, who ſhould Govern both Horſe and Foot, but the Nature and Reaſon of the Employments of theſe and others Officers will more appear ſhortly, when we come to deſcribe the whole Politie of the Empire. As little Truth is there in the other thing laid to his Charge; that he drew off the Souldiers from the Borders, and leaving them naked, thereby gave the Barbarians free Acceſs into the Roman Territories. The Empire had ſeveral Borders or Limits,

It anſwers to Particulars.

He made not four Præfecti Prætorio.

He drew not the Souldiers off from the Borders.

mits, which according to the ſeveral Exigencies of Times, it behooved Princes to look to: but in the time of Conſtantine, and long after, they were eſpecially concern'd to have a care of the Myſian and Scythian Limit, as it was called, which lay upon the River Danubius, through which many Incurſions were made of Sarmatians, Scythians, Goths, and other Barbarous Nations, which at length bore down all before them. Now all manner of ways, it is moſt evident, that Conſtantine laboured to ſtrengthen theſe Borders, and keep faſt ſhut theſe doors, through which, after his Death, Ruine and Deſtruction entred into the Provinces.

33. For firſt, it is univerſally granted, that theſe People he often defeated and conquer'd; and brought Dacia under the Yoak, which had not been reduced ſince the time of Trajan. Then again, from the Dates of his Laws it is evident, as we have hinted before, that he was, even to his laſt, perpetually travelling to and fro, and moving upon theſe Borders. Next to this, Victor the Hiſtorian, beſides others, atteſts, that he made a Bridge over Danubius; and for what end did he make it, but that his Army might have Egreſs and Regreſs, for repreſſing the Inſolencies of theſe Nations; like as Trajan had done before him? Further, beſides this Bridge, he built a Caſtle or Fort in the ſecond Mæſia upon Danubius over againſt Transmariſca, for ſecuring both the Banks of the River, and reſtraining the Incurſions of the Goths (as Procopius informs us) which had the Name of Daphne, and from him the Diſtinction of Conſtantiniana Daphne in ancient Coins. All theſe Courſes he took cannot but ſatisfy an indifferent Perſon what care he had of the Borders, and that he himſelf neglected not the Building of Caſtles and Forts, no more than Zoſimus his beloved Diocleſian, where there was occaſion. But to give the Reader further Diverſion in beholding the malicious Partiality of this Writer, it happens ſo well, that there is ſtill extant a Conſtitution of his (divided in the Code into two ſeveral Laws) whereof the one adjudges him to be burnt alive, that ſhould procure to the Barbarians Liberty of making Deprædations in the Roman Territories (by deſerting their Stations and neglecting their Watches) or divide the Booty ſo acquired with the Barbarians. The other forbids the Officers of the Armies to give leave to Souldiers to be abſent from their Caſtles, or Colours, or thoſe Places where they lay to watch the Motions of the Enemy. If any gave ſuch leave, and in the Souldiers abſence no Eruption of the Enemy hapned; the Officer was to be puniſhed with Deportation, and the loſs of his Eſtate. But if at the ſame time an Incurſion of the Barbarians fell out, he was to forfeit his Head. If this doth not ſhew how careful he was, that the Barbarians ſhould make no Incurſions, and in order to this, that the Souldiers ſhould not by any means quit their Stations and Watches upon the Borders, then is there nothing in this World which can afford Arguments to our Relief. But let us further take Notice of the occaſion of theſe Laws. The ſame year they were made we are told, that Conſtantine lying at Theſſalonica, the Goths broke through the Borders, that were then neglected; and waſted the parts of Thrace and Mæſia, whom he repreſſed, and forced " to beg Peace, and reſtore the Captives. This Licinius complain'd was againſt " the Agreement betwixt them two; that he ſhould be ſo buſie as to reſcue his Ter- " ritories, or the Borders which lay within his Government, from the Enemy; and thereupon Hatred ariſing betwixt them, a War at length enſued. Here we may ſee who it was that neglected the Borders, even he, whom, though Julian and other Pagans deſcribe as both odious to God and Men, yet deſerves no Cenſure at Zoſimus his hands. It was Licinius in whoſe Diſtrict theſe Borders lay, and who would neither look to them himſelf, nor ſuffer others to do it. On the contrary Conſtantine conceiv'd ſuch Indignation at theſe Irruptions, which brought ſo much Damage and Diſgrace to the Empire, that he could neither forbear by Arms to repreſs the Barbarians, nor by Laws inflicting no leſs than Death, to prevent their Incurſions for the time to come; and that by fixing the Souldier to his Station on the Borders. That he continued in this Mind and Practice to the laſt, his conſtant Journeys into theſe Parts, and other things here mentioned, declare. And now, Reader, paſs thy Cenſure where it's deſerv'd.

De Ædif. Juſtiniani, lib. 4. & Ammianus Macellinus l. 27. vide Valeſii annot. ad p. 340.

Cod. Theod. lib. 7. Tit. 1. de re Militari. Vide Gothofred in L.L.

Cod. Theod. Lib. 7. Tit. 12. de commeatu L. 1. & Cod. Juſtin. eod. Tit. L. 1.

Anonymus apud Sirmondum poſtea editus à Valeſio unà cum Ammiano.

34. But to come to thoſe Cruel Oppreſſions of his People. And firſt, to conſider of the Chryſargyrum, or Tax of Gold and Silver, what it was, and whether he firſt Impoſed it upon the Subjects, from Tradeſmen and Merchants to the moſt mean and vile of all others, even to Harlots; and that with ſuch Cruelty, as Mothers were forced to ſell their Children, and Fathers to proſtitute their Daughters. It's Notorious then, that Gold was Exacted from Merchants, and ſuch as Trafficked, long before the time of Conſtantine. Alexander Severus, amongſt other Infirmities, that he might draw Trade to Rome, remitted to them, both the Gold called Au-

He brought not up the Chryſargyrum.

Lampridius in Alexandro.

A. D 337.

rum Negotiatorium, and Coronarium, of which the firſt is the ſame whereon we now Inſiſt. This is affirmed by Lampridius, who lived in the dayes of Conſtantine, and dedicated to him the Life of that Emperour, ſo that he could not be the firſt that brought it up. But if we demand of Zoſimus, at what time of his Reign Conſtantine impoſed this Tax, he and Leunclavius his Apologizer, and ſuch like, will tell us that it was after the Founding of Conſtantinople, toward the end of his Reign, when they talk ſo much of his Prodigality. But if we view the Laws made by him, and conſider them well, we ſhall find in the middle of his Reign, ten years before the Building of that City, mention made of this very (a) Tax, as of a thing that had been in uſe of a long time; Money being then paid into the Publick Treaſury by Merchants. So faithful is Zoſimus, as to this Tax upon Merchants; and we ſhall find him full as worthy of Credit, as to that which concerneth Harlots. For amongſt all thoſe Extravagant Courſes Caligula took to maintain his moſt laviſh Expences, he raiſed a (a) Revenue both from Whores and Pandars, and that by a Law made for this purpoſe: and how ſcandalous ſoever, the Impoſition, it ſeems, continued to the time of Alexander Severus, who forbad the Money to be paid into the Treaſury, but aſſigned it to publick Works, as the Repairing the Theatre, the Cirque, the Amphitheatre, and the Ærarium. Therefore was neither the one ſort nor the other firſt Impoſed by Conſtantine, who, if he had any hand in contriving any thing of the former, made it to be Luſtralis Collatio, or to be paid in four years, whereas formerly it was annual, or paid at ſome other ſet and conſtant time. This new Courſe might be more profitable for the Prince, who ſhould receive a rounder ſum together; and more eaſie for the Subject, who would have the Uſe and Improvement of his Money, the four years. Here was no Injuſtice. If the Collectors made it more burthenſom, it was their Fault, not his Deſign.

Nor the Tax upon Harlots.

(a) L.L.2 & 3. Cod. Theod. de Veteranis, & vide Comment. Gothofred. in L. 1. de Luſtrali Collatione, eod. Cod. lib. 13. Tit. 1.

(b) Ex Gerulorum diurnis Quæſtibus pars octava, ex capturis Proſtitutarum quantum quæque uno Concubitu mereret; additumque ad caput Legis ut tenerentur Publico, & quæ Meretricium, & quæ Lenocinium feciſſent. Sueton. in Calig. c. 40.

35. The Impoſition upon Pandars was taken away afterward by Theodoſius the younger; and that upon Strumpets, by Anaſtaſius. Of all Authors that write about it, not one layes it upon Conſtantine, Zoſimus excepted. And though in the Code of Theodoſius ſo many Conſtitutions we find concerning the Luſtralis Collatio, or Gold and Silver impoſed upon Merchants, yet not one word concerning any laid upon this ſort of Women; therefore we may ſafely enough conclude, that Zoſimus belyes him in making him the Author, either of the one or the other ſort. If he continued, or by reaſon of his great need of Money, ſuffered this Chryſargyrum ſtill to be exacted, by Leunclavius his good Favour, he is not ſo much to be blamed, as if he firſt had impoſed it. But this Calumny is ſo groſs, that ſome Learned men would gladly ſeek for an Evaſion to acquit Zoſimus of ſo much Malice and Falſeneſs: inſtead of Wenches, it's thought Work-men ſhould be read, the word that ſignifies the one kind being eaſily miſtaken and falſe written for the other; ſuch were Porters, Smiths and others, at this time lyable to the Chryſargyrum, whom afterward Valentinian the elder diſcharged of the Burthen; or elſe the Hiſtorian, they think, was miſtaken, and took the Tabernarii Negotiatorii, who were obnoxious to this Payment, for the Tabernariæ Meretrices; according as the ſame Honeſt, good man, having heard or read that Conſtantine's Mother was a Tabernaria, very carefully and kindly wrote, that ſhe was an Harlot; ſuch Impartiality is there, and much more in our Zoſimus. But upon further Examination, we cannot but find the Conſequences of this terrible Oppreſſion juſt as true, as the thing it ſelf; viz. The Cries and Lamentations that were to be heard throughout every City; and when the fourth year came, the Stripes and Torments uſed towards the Bodies of thoſe miſerable People, who could not reach to the Payment of the Money; ſo that Mothers ſold their Children, and Fathers proſtituted their Daughters. If in Conſtantine's time any ſuch thing hapned at Conſtantinople, which was a City as well as the reſt, how could this cruel Exaction and Oppreſſion of poor People conſiſt with that great Care he took for them, even by Zoſimus his Confeſſion, that they ſhould not want Bread? would he feed them becauſe they were in want, with one hand, and beat them becauſe they were in want, with the other hand: Give them Bread to ſupply their Neceſſities, and put them to Torture, becauſe they were neceſſitous, and had neither Money to buy Bread nor pay him his Tax? He muſt have been a pretty humorous Prince at this rate, or Zoſimus pretty confident to dare thus to impoſe upon Poſterity, and think all Fools that ſhould come after him: for this Allowance of Bread was both given to the Old Rome, and the New; not to every City; his Revenue would not afford it. But though he could not ſupply all Poor with Bread, he took eſpecial Care, that neither Poor nor Rich ſhould be Impriſoned or Tortured for what was owing to the Treaſury, declaring, that a Priſon was for Malefactors, and ſuch as deſerv'd Puniſhment, not for them.

ἑταίρας pro ἑταίρους, i. e. Συνεργοὺς, Operarios.

L. 8. de Luſtrali Collatione. Cod. Th. Vide Gothofr. ubi ſupra.

He tortured not his Subjects.

Nemo Carcerem, Plumbatarumque verbera, aut Pondera, aliaque ab Inſolentia Judicum reperta ſupplicia, in Debitorum ſolutionibus, vel à perverſis, vel ab iratis Judicibus expaveſcat.

In

A. D. 337.

In caſe any abuſed this his Clemency, then indeed he ordains they be kept by a Guard in ſtrict Cuſtody; and if they perſevere in their Diſobedience, that then their Neighbours ſhall make diſtreſs; profeſſing it to be his Judgment, that this mild way is the beſt to procure the Payment of the publick Money. In general, by another Law he commands that all Exactions be made without Concuſſion or ſevere Diſturbance of the Debtors to the Publick, under great Penalties to be inflicted upon the Exactors.

Carcer Pœnalium, Carcer hominum Noxiorum eſt, &c. Cod. Th. Lib. 11. Tit. 7. de Exactionibus L. 3. & vide L. 2. de Cohortalibus Lib. 8. Tit. 4. L. 1. eod. Tit. 1. Lib. 11.

36. The poor then were not by any Contrivance of his, Beaten or Impriſoned, and much leſs were they forced to ſell their Children, or to proſtitute their Daughters. So far was he from forcing them to any ſuch thing, that whereas before, and in his time, in Italy and other places, it was too ordinary for Parents, when Poor and Neceſſitous, to Kill, Expoſe, Sell and Pawn their Children, by an Edict (which being written ſo as to remain moſt Durable, he commands to be made publick in all Cities of Italy) "for prevention (as he ſaith) of that Parricide; he orders Ablavius, the Vicar of the Præfectus Prætorio, to take care for the Maintenance of ſuch Children as ſhould be brought to him by Parents under that Qualification; and to the Expence aſſigns indifferently both his Publick Treaſury, and his own private Eſtate. Foraſmuch (ſo he notes) as the Education of Infancy can admit of no Delay. Taking notice afterward of the practice of Parents in Africk, who by reaſon of Want did ſell, and pawn their Children; by another Edict, directed to Menander, the Præfectus Prætorio, he commands, that ſuch as have no Eſtate, and hardly and difficultly maintain their Children, be relieved by the Treaſury, before they be driven to ſuch Neceſſity. To this end he impowers all Proconſuls, Præſidents & Rationales, throughout that Province, to give maintenance to all that were in ſuch Diſtreſs, and Proviſions out of the publick Granaries; concluding, that it was utterly contrary to his Inclinations or Manners to ſuffer any to periſh with Famine, or proceed to ſo horrid a Fact. The next thing Zoſimus mentions, amounts to this: that having in ſo great a Compaſs as the Roman Empire, many Perſons Richer and more able to bear Offices than others, who ordinarily were forced to undergo them; he conſtrained them to diſcharge theſe Offices; or elſe, where he perceived it might be ſpared, there he exacted Money, for defraying of the publick charge, as at this day the City of London is wont to do. And an horrid thing that is which follows, that he would have the greateſt Perſons, as well as thoſe of inferior Condition (for perhaps they were as able) to contribute toward the publick Expence. Beſides, he tells us, that he was ſo truly prudent, as a Prince, and ſo well skill'd in his Trade, as there were none of his greateſt Officers, but He underſtood their Eſtates; at leaſt all their Lands (ſuch might be known) he kept regiſtred in his Books; and upon them he laid a Tax called Follis, which was not oppreſſing, or difficult to be paid. For having largely courted Senators (upon whom this Tax chiefly lay) and by building Houſes for them, encouraged them to inhabit his new City: it's not to be imagined, that by any great Exactions he would deterr them from continuing and diſcharging their Truſt; which was with one hand to build, and with another to pull down; as in other Matters Zoſimus forceth him to Act. But if we conſider our Author well, he dares not ſay, that in Conſtantine's time any Miſchief ſucceeded upon this Impoſition; but that this continuing long after his Reign, the Riches of Cities were by Degrees exhauſted, and very many were left without Inhabitants. Now we have known a thing prudently inſtituted, which coming through ill hands hath been diverted from it's firſt and innocent Deſign.

Vide Lactantium divin. Juſt. l. 6. C. 20.

Æreis Tabulis aut Ceruſſatis aut linteis Mappis ſcripta per omnes Civitates Italiæ præponatur Lex, quæ Parentum manus à Parricidio arceat, votumque vertat in melius, officiumque tuum hæc Cura perſtringat &c. Cod. Th. lib. 1. Tit. 27. l. de Alimentis quæ inopes &c. L. 2. Cod. Tit. Provinciales victus atque Alimoniæ inopiâ Laborantes Liberos ſuos vendere, vel oppignorare Cognovimus. Quiſquis igitur &c.

Abhorret enim noſtris moribus ut quemquam fame confici, vel ad indignum facinus prorumpere concedamus.

Other Objections of Zoſimus frivolous.

ἐπιμεινάσης γὰρ καὶ μετὰ Κωνσταντῖνον τῆς ἐπαιρήσεως ἐπὶ χρόνον συχνὸν ἐξαντλουμένου κατὰ βραχὺ τοῦ πλούτου τῶν πόλεων, ἔρημοι τῶν οἰκούντων αἱ πλεῖσται γεγόνασι.

37. But whatever the thing in it's own Nature ſpeaks, Zoſimus his Deſign was to render Conſtantine odious; as we know it to be the Practice in all Reformations, of thoſe who are addicted to the old way, to render infamous ſuch as have been Inſtruments in the Alteration; and by a prejudice raiſed againſt the Perſons moſt ridiculouſly to inſinuate an ill Opinion of the Cauſe, or Thing it ſelf. Although the Reader may by what he has already ſeen and read, be ſufficiently ſatisfyed as to this matter, yet is there one Remarck ſtill remaining, which ſo much ſhews the humour of the Man, that it will be for the Reader's Diverſion to mention it. He tels us he often wondered how it came to paſs that the City of Byzantium, being grown to that extraordinary height, ſo that no other, either in reſpect of Felicity or Greatneſs could be compared to it, yet this ſhould by no Prophecy be foreknown to their Anceſtors. Meditating much about ſo weighty a Buſineſs (you muſt know) and turning over many Hiſtories and Collections of Oracles, after ſome time of Doubting, with much adoe he light upon a certain Oracle of Sibylla Erythræa, or Phaello of Epirus, which Woman poſſeſſed by a propheſying Spirit, was reported to have made ſome Predictions, on which Nicomedes relying, and interpreting them as favouring his Deſign, by the advice of Attalus, made War upon Pruſias, his Father. Now the main Drift of this Oracle is to declare, that a Wolf ſhould have Dominion, and Wolves ſhould inhabit the Parts of Bithynia, about ſuch time (or a little before) as thoſe that inhabited old Byzantium, ſhould enjoy Regal Power. You may eaſily gueſs whom he will have meant by the Wolf, viz. Conſtantine, and by the Wolves, his Succeſſors; and that becauſe of the grievous Burthens and Impoſitions laid upon thoſe Parts, ſo as though that Town, or the Helleſpont ſhould be happy in this reſpect, that it was raiſed to ſuch height of Dignity, yet that grievous Wolfe ſhould ſore affright it.* Now good Reader, conſider but what this Interpreter himſelf hath writ concerning Byzantium; and how it was affrighted or afflicted by Conſtantine, even ſo much, Poor City! that it was enlarged, called New Rome, adorned with Imperial Privileges, and it's Citizens munificently provided for. In Concluſion, if he would interpret it Aſtoniſhed, ſo it might well be at the Change of it's Fortune to ſo high a Decree for the better, that he himſelf was (as he confeſſes) ſeized with Admiration to behold it ſo advanced, that none could be compared to it, either in reſpect of it's Felicity, or Magnitude. It's a Queſtion whether the man's Wit or Integrity were greater. Other gueſſes, if it were worth the while, might be made at this obſcure Oracle (as they call it) and if, as ſome modern Authors do, we ſhould ſay, that the Turks and their Tyranny better have expreſſed the Senſe and Meaning of it, we ſhould ſeem to any Wiſe and indifferent man, to have as much Reaſon on our ſide: but let Zoſimus and his Oracle paſs together with ſuch Cenſure, as the Reader will find himſelf obliged to make, while we return to Conſtantine, and diſpatch what is at preſent further to be ſaid, in reference to this oppreſſing and haraſſing the People.

Τρισμάκαρ Ἑλλήσποντε θεόκτιτα τείχεα τ' ἀνδρῶν θείαισιν ἐφετμαῖς Ἧν Λυκὸς αἰνόλυκος πλήξει κρατερῆς ὑπ' ἀνάγκης.

38. Who ever conſiders the Laws he made, views the univerſal Tenour of them, their Occaſions and Drift with all Impartiality, muſt confeſs, that he was a great Reformer of Manners, took extraordinary Care for redreſſing Grievances, (though to his own Loſs and Abatement of his Revenue) and by all Opportunities provided for the Convenience, Eaſe and Emolument of his Subjects. Any Learned man in things of this Nature will ſay, that he almoſt made as great Alterations, to theſe Purpoſes, in the Laws (both as to the Jus Publicum & Privatum) as he did (a) in Religion it ſelf; and that Nazarius his Panegyrick cited by Learned Gothofred, is no Fable, although, as we formerly ſaid, we ſhall neither produce it, nor any Elogiums given him by Chriſtian Writers, to avoid the Exception that might be made upon the account of their Intereſt and Affection. It were too tedious a Work, and not proper for us here, to inſiſt upon that, which would deſerve a particular Treatiſe of it ſelf, and in ſome little meaſure by (b) others hath been performed; and beſides what we have already inſtanced, we muſt ſpeak largely of this Perſon upon another occaſion. If the Reader will but peruſe the firſt Conſtitutions of the ſeveral Titles of Theodoſius his Code; eſpecially with the Commentaries of the moſt Learned Gothofred, he will herein receive abundant Satisfaction. That the Law, which ſhould afford Relief, might not be burthenſome in the Practice of it; let him take Notice how ſeverely he puniſheth the (c) Avarice of Advocates. That his Subjects might not injure one another in Word, no more than Deed, what ſharp Laws he made againſt (d) Libels, for repairing the Credits of ſuch as were ſlandered in that way. How Innocent and Juſt his Mind in Reference to his (e) Revenue and private Men, appears by the Care he took for the Ability and Integrity of the Advocates of the Treaſury; and how he preferred the Cauſe of private Perſons before his own Gain in that particular; which, as he profeſſeth himſelf in one of his Edicts, ſo it is the Opinion of the beſt Lawyers, that many more of his Conſtitutions do evidently atteſt and Confirm it. How cautious he was, that the Poor and Innocent ſhould not be oppreſſed, nothing can be more evident, than that by one Edict he diſcharged the former Sort of the burthen of Taxes, and provides for the ſafety of the other by puniſhing Promoters and Informers with no leſs than Death. Farther how Conſtant. M. 22. Conſtitutiones hic occurrunt ordine, de Decurionibus, ex quibus apparet quis tum Curiarum Status fuerit, quo item, quantoque ſtudio Princeps hic, tum Curiarum tum Curialium. Seu Decurionum atque adeò ſingularum Rerump. ſeu Municipiarum utilitati conſultum voluit. Gothofr. ad L. 1. Lib. 12 Cod. Theod. Tit. 1. de Decurionibus.

(a) Nonæ Leges regendis moribus, & frangendis Vitiis conſtitutæ.

(b) Baldwinus de Leg. Conſt. de quo tamen ſic Gothofr. de Conſtitutionibus hujus Imperii loquens. quarum omnium Sententiam exhibere oportuit eos, qui Conſtantini M. Genium ex ejus potiſſimùm Conſtitutionibus efferre voluerunt; at non etiam unius tantùm aut alterius, quod Baldwinus fecit; cujus, ut ſemel dicam, Commentarii de Conſtantino M. σκιαγραφίαν potiùs juſti alicujus operis continent quàm ἀποτέλεσμα aliquod. (c) Tit de poſtulando. Cod. Th. lib. 2. Tit. 10. (d) Tit. de famoſis Libellis ejuſd. Cod. Lib. 9. Tit. 34. (c) Tit. de Advocato Fiſci Lib. 10. Tit. 15. Quod itaque arguit quis, quámque Innocens & Juſtus Conſtant. M. animus erga privatos fuerit, imò ex proximo L. apparebit quàm potior apud eum privatorum cauſa fuerit. Gothofred. in Leg. 1. Idem in Leg. 2. hujus Tit. ſic Primo loco occurrit optimi Principis dictum illud de Moribus ſuis, quod, Potior apud eum Privatorum Cauſa ſit, quàm Fiſci Tutela. Quod de ſe dictum aliæ complures Conſtant. M. Conſtitutiones conteſtantur, & confirmant. Tit. de Conſul. Lib. 13. Tit. 10. Tit. de Petitionibus L. 10. T. 10.

great a Lover of Juſtice and exact Cenſor of Manners he ſhewed himſelf in the point of Contracts in reference to Marriage, in the caſe of Liberty, Donations, and other things, Perſons who are truly Learned in the Laws, with Paſſion ſhew us. Theſe and many other things being by him introduced, as Preparatives and Concomitants to true Religion, we ſhall in that place more properly diſcover, and Treat of particularly. But by this it ſufficiently appears, that Eutropius did not miſtake him, when he wrote, that he was an Affector of Juſtice. As for what he ſays concerning his Laws, that many were Superfluous; we muſt conſider the Man's Religion, and then we ſhall not wonder that his many Laws reſpecting Reformation and Chriſtianity, are eſteem'd Superfluous by a Pagan, as his Pious Magnificence in Building of Churches, accounted Childiſh Profuſeneſs by ſuch; although he was too kind alſo to thoſe about him. A Great Man, and one as able to judge of things of this Nature, as any whatſoever, propounds to us the Excellent Goodneſs of his Laws, as that which beſt makes out to us his Life and Character; and although the Author of his Life (as all that Read it know) was a Panegyriſt, and gives him great Encomiums, yet in compariſon of what his Laws ſpeak of his Tenderneſs and Charity toward the Poor, he is bound to affirm him Jejune and Empty. From all laid together, both Affection and Malice being Silenced, he appears a Man of great Parts, and as great Performances; and deſerves, in reſpect of thoſe moſt Eminent Qualifications of his Reign, that Sirname, which Poſterity, and that early, thought fit to beſtow upon him. As all men have their Faults, his greateſt ſeems to have been a too ſplendid manner of Living, both as to his Attendance, Diet or Apparel; the thing his Bitter Enemy twits him with in his Tale of the Cæſars, who would not have omitted other Crimes to which the Age he liv'd in could have atteſted.

Ex hac verò Conſtantini M. in Pauperes Munificentia; atque adeo ex Conſtant. M. ſuper eo Legibus, apparet, quàm ſterilis præ iis Relatio ſit Authoris Vitæ Conſtantini. lib.4. c.28. Et certè non aliundè meliùs, certiùs, & Vitam & Characterem Conſtantini colligas, vel aliorum Imperatorum, quàm ex eorum Conſtitutionibus ſingulari ἐπιστάσει facio. Gothofred. ad L. 1. de Alimentis, ut ſuprá.

The Polity of the Empire in or about the time of Conſtantine.

39. But, though Zoſimus maliciouſly charges him for thus Innovating in the Government, and Introducing new Officers, which tended to the Ruin of the Empire, yet muſt it be ſaid, that in and about his time there was made a conſiderable Change in the Politie thereof. And now being arrived, at this Diſtance, from the Monarchy of Auguſtus, though the Sovereign Power was ſtill the ſame, we find a new Face of Subordinate Government, each Prince having Contributed to it, as either Convenience directed, or his own Will and Pleaſure inclined him. Therefore judge we it requiſite to the Nature of our preſent Deſign, to give the Reader a Proſpect of the whole Politie, ſuch as it was in or about this time of Conſtantine. For amongſt the manifold Advantages he reaps by the knowledge of Antient Times, that of the Nature of Governments, with the Power of Magiſtrates, is one of the greateſt; and without this, he will not be able to underſtand and make uſe of the following Hiſtory, with near ſo much Benefit and Improvement.

Sect. II.

An Appendix to the Hiſtory of Conſtantine, neceſſary for the underſtanding of the following Hiſtory, containing the Polity of the Empire, or the Form of Government, either introduced by him, or in force in and about his time.

The Emperour Head.

1. THE Head then of the State, or the Emperour, was ſuch at this time as we formerly deſcrib'd him, poſſeſſed of as great and abſolute Power over his Subjects as was conſiſtent with Liberty. For he had all the Authority which long before had been conferred upon Octavius Cæſar by the Lex Regia, and continued to Veſpaſian by renewing of that Law. In what manner ſoever he obtained the Sovereignty (for almoſt as long as Emperor and Empire continued, the Souldiers, when the fit was on them, would make the Choice) it was in his power to aſſociate one or more to him; and it began now to be a Cuſtom, for more ſecurity, to make Emperours before their death, whom they deſigned for their Succeſſors. Their Promotion was by Nomination or Declaration; and the Enſigns of their Dignity was Purple, and of later times a Diadem; which, after that Chriſtianity had well nigh obliterated Paganiſm, was ſolemnly ſet on their Heads, with Prayers, by the Patriarch or Biſhop, which Ceremony We call a Coronation. For though ſome former Emperors ſometimes put on a Diadem, yet before Diocleſian there was nothing ſingular as an Enſign of the Imperial Monarchy, but the Purple Robe onely; whereupon Purpuram ſumere ſignified as much as to take the Imperial Power, and Purpurâ indui, as much as to be made Emperor. But Diocleſian commanded himſelf to be adored, the Emperors before having onely been ſaluted as the Judges; and to his Cloaths and Shooes he added the Ornament of Gems. This being now the Cuſtom, it was more confirmed by Conſtantine, who out of Averſeneſs to the Laurel, as conſecrated to Apollo, whoſe Temples and Worſhip he deſtroyed, conſtantly wore the Fillet or Diadem ſet with Gold and Precious Stones, and ſometimes joyned with a Helm or Cap; which ſort was generally worn by his Succeſſors.

The Enſignes of his Majeſty.

Corona oſtentat Regem, non facit.

Eutropius de Diocleſiano, qui Imperio Romano primus Regiæ conſuetudinis formam magis, quàm Romanæ libertatis invenit; adorarique ſe juſſit, cùm ante eum cuncti ſalutarentur: ornamenta Gemmarum veſtibus, Calceamentisque indidit. Nam prius Imperii Inſigne in Chlamyde purpurea tantum erat; reliqua communia. Vide Seldenum noſtrum in Titles of Honour.

Cæſar, or Heir of the Empire.

2. The next in Degree and Dignity to the Emperour, was he who bore the Title of Cæſar, by which he was deſigned Heir to the Empire. Before this of Cæſar, that of Princeps Juventutis was uſed in this ſenſe, firſt given by Auguſtus to Caius and Lucius, his Grand-ſons; for by retaining Names which were uſed in times of popular Liberty, as Princeps taken from the Princeps Senatûs, and Imperator, which had been the Title of a General, he ſought to cover that ſtricter Government which he introduced. Till the time of Adrian, Princeps Juventutis continued to be the Title of the Heir Apparent; and Cæſar, together with Auguſtus, was uſed in the Style of the Emperours themſelves; and if ſometimes it be found given to, or aſſumed by the next Heirs or Sons, during the Lives of their Fathers, it was but as if whoever was a Son of him that was called Cæſar Auguſtus, ſhould have the Name of Cæſar, (not Title) to denote the Honour and Bloud received from ſuch a Father. But Adrian, adopting Ælius Verus, gave him the Title and Style of Cæſar, as ſingularly denoting him his Apparent Succeſſor: after which it ceaſed to be uſed as a Name of the Imperial Family and Bloud, and became Honourary in the Emperours, joyned with Auguſtus, and in their deſigned Succeſſors ſingle by it ſelf. The Cæſar was created ſometimes by the Emperours Verbal Deſignation, ſometimes by Letters Patents, or otherwiſe. The Enſign of their Dignity was a Purple Robe with Gold, to which a Coronet was after added, and then alſo put on by the Hands of the Patriarch in a ſolemn and religious manner. Sometimes one, ſometimes more were created, as it pleaſed the Emperours. Sometimes they had parts of the Empire aſſigned them to govern, and were often joyned in Reſcripts with the Emperours themſelves, as is to be ſeen in the Imperial Conſtitutions. Yet, though they were partners in the Government, were they Subjects, not equal in Dignity and Power, and might be degraded by the Sovereign Authority. They are frequently ſtyled in Coins and Laws Principes Juventutis, and more ordinarily Nobiliſſimi Cæſares. Yet was there another Rank or Dignity next to them in place, which had the Style and Title of Nobiliſſimus, and gave expectation of the Title of Cæſar, as Cæſar did of Auguſtus or Emperour.

The Enſign of his Dignity.

rour. The firſt we meet with that had this Honour were Conſtantius and Anaballianus, the Kinſmen of Conſtantine, who conferred it upon them, as lately was obſerv'd out of Zoſimus.

The Senate.

3. That which held the next place in the State was the Senate, not in reſpect of the particular men which conſtituted it, but of the whole Body. Its Authority continued (for the moſt part) ſuch as in the ſettlement of Auguſtus, but was ſometimes ſtreightned, and otherwhiles enlarged, (eſpecially by the Emperour Arcadius) as the humour of the Reigning Prince inclin'd, who being Abſolute, and having all the Authority both of Senate and People in his hands, their power was in effect but precarious. In an Interregnum indeed the Senate ſeemed again poſſeſſed of its ancient and paramount Privileges, and as the Supreme Power diſpoſed of the Empire; and ſuch perſons as had ill managed it, when the Sword was on its ſide, it would cenſure. Now at this time of which we write, it appears from the Laws (the beſt Teſtimony) that it was in great eſteem and reputation with the Emperours. In their Conſtitutions they ſtyle it, Ampliſſimus Senatus, Egregius Senatus, Florentiſſimus Cœtus, Venerandus Cœtus Senatûs, Concilium Ampliſſimorum Virorum, Nobilior Curia, Nobiliſſima Curia, Splendidiſſima Curia, Senatûs Orbis Inclytus, and the like; and the Senators themſelves they call Proceres, Ampliſſimi Viri, Clariſſimi, & Nobiles. In their Conſtitutions or Orations the Compellation is, Patres Conſcripti, & Veſtra Sanctitas. And though Nero formerly ſo much diſdained it, they reckoned themſelves of their number, and the Senate to be part of their own Body; though the Sovereign and Abſolute Authority reſided in the perſon of the Prince, and he by virtue thereof might do matters without it; yet it made for the Dignity and Grandeur of the Roman Empire, that he ſhould have ſo great and ample a Council to aſſiſt him, eſpecially at the Reception and Audience of Ambaſſadors and Strangers. Arcadius was ſo indulgent to it, that under him the Senate of Conſtantinople exerciſed the ſame power as in the Commonwealth, declared publick Enemies, denounced War, and the like; but this was extraordinary, and fully in the Prince's power: otherwiſe he ſent his Conſtitutions often to them, which were abſolutely concluſive, and as it were to be regiſtred in their Court. In other matters the Senate ſuggeſted, decreed, and framed an Order or Senatuſconſultum, but the Emperour by his ſanction confirmed what was done. At this time we find by the Laws, that the Nomination of Prætors was in the power of the Senate. It regulated the payments made by its own Members, and the expences of Games, yet ſo, as what it reſolved was referred to the Prince, who confirmed it. Sometimes alſo the Emperours would allow it to purge it ſelf, and make choice of ſuch as were worthy to be its Members; yet ſo, as the Names of thoſe they made choice of were by the Præfect of the City to be brought to the Prince, and receive his Approbation. Moreover, Profeſſors were choſen by the Senate, and when any Gift or Preſent was to be made to the Emperour by it, it was by Intervention of its own Decree. Its Officers who managed the buſineſs handled in it, were thoſe called Cenſuales (from the Cenſus or Tax they managed alſo) except in caſe of Citations, which belonged to the other Officer called Princeps Officii. But here it will not be amiſs to mention what Capitolinus writes in the Life of Gordian, That it was the Cuſtom, if the Commonwealth was in ſuch danger, as conſtrained the Fathers to take ſuch Counſels as were not fit to be divulged, then a ſecret Senatuſconſultum was made; at the making and entering whereof, neither Scribes, publick Slaves, nor the Cenſuales, were ſuffered to be preſent, but the Senators themſelves diſcharged all their Employments.

Its Dignity.

Vide Paratit. Tit. 2. lib. 6. Cod. Theod. de Senatoribus, & de Glebali, vel Follium, ſeptemve Solidorum Conlatione, & de Auro oblatitio.

Power.

Vid. Tit. Cod. Theod. de Prætoribus L. L. 8, 9, 10, 12. &c.

Its Officers.

Several ſorts of Senators.

4. Of Senators, ſome by reaſon of the greatneſs of their Birth were fitted for the Employment; others merited it by having paſſed through the ſeveral Offices of the Palace and State; others were preferred by the Favour of the Prince. Some Senators were naked, neither of the rank of Illuſtres, Spectabiles, nor Clariſſimi, not furniſhed with any privileges of Dignity. Some lived at Rome or Conſtantinople, and others in the Countrey. The Præfectus Urbi was their Head, and by him alone could they ordinarily be judged in Civil Cauſes; from whom in ſome caſes they might appeal, in others not. The Uſe of publick Horſes and Waggons was allowed Them, which privileges were denied to moſt others. In Cauſes Criminal the Judge or Governour of the Province where a Senator lived, might take cognizance of the matter, yet not proceed to Sentence, but certifie the Prince, the Præfectus Urbi or the Præfectus Prætorio. The Præfect of the City in the Suburbian Provinces, in this caſe was to take to his aſſiſtance five Senators, not at his diſcretion, but choſen by lot. Senators were privileged from ſeveral payments, to which others were obnoxious, as from that called Aurum Coronarium, from Quartering of Souldiers, and paying Toll in ſeveral caſes. They were not to be rigorouſly examined, nor

Their Privileges.

Their Burthens.

put to Torture, but in caſe of Treaſon and the greater ſort of Crimes: but ſeveral Duties they paid, and were obnoxious to divers Burthens, except diſcharged by ſpecial Privilege, ſo as they were forbidden to make any long Travel without Licence and Approbation, leſt the Revenue thence ariſing ſhould be diminiſhed: and ſo great was the Expence this way, that ſome got leave to reſign the Dignity, although not in the days of Conſtantine, who made it his buſineſs to encourage ſuch as he brought to Conſtantinople. (a) Among thoſe payments was the Follis lately mentioned, called alſo Glebalis Collatio, and by many other Names. This was a Burthen of the Eſtate or Soil, not the Perſon; and therefore all their Lands and Eſtates were regiſtred in the Senate. All ſuch as received profit out of their Lands paid it, but very few being exempt, not the Emperours Houſe it ſelf, becauſe he alſo went for a Senator, except he thought fit to renounce the Dignity. But ſuch as had no Lands were not ſubject to it; they onely paid two Folles, or an inconſiderable ſumme: for of the Coin called Follis there were ſeveral ſorts. Some alſo were exempt from this payment, as alſo from another lying upon the poorer ſort, of ſeven Solidi. Beſides theſe there was a fourth kind in Gold paid by Senators, called Aurum Oblatitium; yet to this they were not conſtrained; but it was freely given to the Emperour upon ſome notable occaſion; as after his Victory and Overthrow of ſome Tyrant, in way of an Acknowledgment. And from this was different another ſort of Preſent they made, which is called Oblatio Votorum. But the three former ſorts of payments, viz. the Glebalis Collatio, the two Folles, and the ſeven Solidi, remained till the time of Juſtinian, and then by him were quite aboliſhed; ſo that the Laws concerning them, or the ſecond Title of the ſixth Book of Theodoſius his Code, is omitted in that of Juſtinian.

The Conſiſtory.

The Members of it.

5. This was the great Council of the Emperour, who beſides it had his (b) Conſiſtory, or Privy Council, as we may term it, wherein were handled and determined all State-Affairs, and ſuch private matters as by way of Petition or otherwiſe came before the Prince. The Members of it were of great Rank and Employments, Illuſtrious perſons, who had the privilege of ſpeaking and debating before the Emperour; ſuch as were the Præfecti Prætorio, the Quæſtors, the Magiſter Officiorum, the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, and Comes Rei Privatæ, properly called Comites Conſiſtorii, or Conſiſtoriani. There were others which had the Name alſo of Comites Conſiſtoriani, but in an inferiour Rank, who were not ſtyled Illuſtres, but Spectabiles; and were not admitted to ſpeak and debate in Conſiſtory, but onely (c) permitted to be preſent at Debates, and hear the Emperour's Determination. Theſe were alſo of the firſt Rank of Comites, or Comites Primi Ordinis, but here of the ſecond ſort of Dignity. For to make our way to what we muſt ſhortly ſpeak of the ſeveral ſorts of the publick Miniſters and Officers, the Reader muſt know, that under the Roman Princes are to be obſerv'd five ſeveral Degrees or Ranks of Dignities, viz. Illuſtris, Spectabilis, Clariſſimus, Perfectiſſimus, and Egregius; theſe were not in uſe during the Republick, but were afterwards introduced for diſtinction of perſons, which is ever greater under Monarchy than in a Commonwealth. The firſt ſaid to have been in Uſe, was that of (d) Clariſſimus, given to Senators in the time of Tiberius; though from Tacitus it appears that ſome of the Roman Knights or Equites had the diſtinction of Illuſtres or Inluſtres, much about the ſame time or in the days of Auguſtus. At firſt Clariſſimus ſeems to have been more Honourable; but now about the Reign of Conſtantine, when they were made more diſtinct Attributes of Dignities, Illuſtris became ſuperior, as is evident from the Laws. And ſuch was the fortune of Clariſſimus, that not onely Illuſtris gave it the go-by, but afterward Spectabilis juſtled in betwixt them. Illuſtris at length became the Attribute of eleven ſeveral ſorts of perſons: The firſt were the Patricii, the higheſt Rank in the Affection of the Prince, next the Nobiliſſimi, and inſtituted (e) by Conſtantine the Great; I ſay, in the Affection of the Prince, to whom they were accounted as Fathers, but not as to the Dignity of State, for ſo they were inferiour to the Conſuls, being rather to be eſteemed a Rank or Order, than a Dignity; and having no Juriſdiction, being no Magiſtrates, were ever Subjects; whereas the Emperours themſelves diſdained not to bear the Office of Conſul. The Rank of Patricii was joyned with ſeveral of the Dignities, and when ſo found, gave the perſon precedence above all others, except the Conſul, the ancient and moſt ſublime Miniſter in the State.

The ſeveral Degrees of Perſons in the Empire.

Patricii, who.

6. To defer a little the enumeration of the reſt that had the Style of Illuſtres, as of the other Degrees of Dignities, till we come to deſcribe the Nature of their particular Offices and Employments, and firſt ſpeak of the more general Ranks and Qualifications. The Author of the (f) Life of Conſtantine tells us, that to prefer the more perſons, he invented new Honours. There were three Ranks of Comites; which whe-

Three Ranks of Comites.

(a) Vide Paratitlon ubi ſuprà. & Juretum in Miſcellaneis, ad Symmachi Lib. 4. Epiſt. 62.

(b) Conſiſtorium Suidâ θεῖον συνέδριον. Forſan ab hoc differebat Auditorium, in quo Cauſas privatas tantùm tractari conſueviſſe exiſtimat Gutherius Lib. de Offic. Domûs Auguſtæ 1. c. 17. At vide omninò Gothofr. in L. 5. de Fide Teſtium &c. Cod. Theod. Lib. 11. Tit. 39. & quod Conſiliarii Principis dicti fuerunt Monitores, vide Juretum in Miſcellaneis ad Symmachi Epiſt. 7. Lib. 4.

(c) De eorum Privilegiis vide Gothofredum ad L. un. qui Conductores. Cod. Th. lib. 10. Tit. 5.

(d) Pancirolus in Notitiam Imperii C. 2. De Centenarii Dignitate Perfectiſſimatu, inferiori, Egregiatu verò ſuperiori, ſi qua talis fuerit. Vide Comment. Jacobi Gothofredi in L. 7. de Agentibus in Rebus. Cod. Th. Lib. 6. Tit. 27.

(e) Zoſimus. De iſta Controverſia, utrùm Patricius an Conſul præceſſerit, Vide Jacob. Gothofred. in Tit. 6. Lib. 6. Cod. Theod.

(f) Lib. 4. C. 1.

whether firſt inſtituted by him, or not, began about his time to be remarkable. The Emperours at the beginning of the Monarchy had ſuch about them as they called their Comites, or Companions; as alſo Amici, or Friends; as had of old the Eaſtern Kings, from whom ſome think this Cuſtom transferred. For King David had his Friend or Companion, Daniel was the Companion of the Babylonian King, and honoured above all his Friends; and in the Kingdom of Syria, Ptolomy, Nicanor and Gorgias were the Kings Friends. At firſt Comes and Amicus, Companion and Friend, were in effect the ſame; and according to their Intereſt and Endearment with the Prince, they were diſtinguiſhed into ſeveral Ranks; as there is no man but hath thoſe Friends that are more intimate with him than others are. Afterward they became diſtinct, (though Friends ſtill were often called Companions, and Companions Friends) the Amici or Friends being taken for the Intimates or Privadoes of the Prince, his Favourites and inward Boſom-friends, who knew his heart; as Epheſtion was the friend of Alexander. The Comites were the Companions and Aſſiſtants in his Expeditions and Labours, as was Parmenio to the King; and in all Encampings had the next place to his Pavilion. Both of theſe ſorts were admitted to his Conſultations, and afterwards known by the joynt and common name of Conſiſtorians. Of both before the time of Conſtantine there is frequent mention. The Emperours Attendance and his Council was called Comitatus; and in ſome years the name of Comes grew ſo common, that it was in a manner given to all Officers and Magiſtrates that gave attendance at the ſaid Sacred or Privy Council, and thence afterward extended to all that were Overſeers in any matters of State. So that Suidas defineth Comes to be the Ruler of the people, as Cujacius obſerves, whoſe Opinion alſo it is, that before the time of Conſtantine the Great, it did not ſignifie any Title of Honour or Dignity; but he, when he had altered many things in the Empire, and endeavoured to oblige many perſons, erected the Comes into a Dignity, and made the threefold diſtinction, or three Ranks of Comites lately mentioned. He grounds his Opinion upon the relation of the Author of Conſtantines Life, who having ſaid, that no man was denied that asked any thing of that Prince, nor any mans Expectation fruſtrated that expected any thing of him (for ſome he enriched with Money, others with Lands, many he dignified with the Senatorian, many with Conſular Honour, and many he preferred to be Duces:) adds, Some were made Comites of the firſt Rank, ſome of the ſecond, and others of the third.

Selden, Titles of Honour. Part 2. Ch. 1.

Maccab. Ch. 3. 38. &c.

Vide Suetonium in vitâ Tiberii C. 46. & Lampridium in vitâ Alexand. Severi al I. un. de Comitibus. Cod. Juſtin. Lib. 12. Tit. 11.

Whether firſt introduced by Conſtantine.

Lib. 4 C. 2.

Κομίτων δὲ οἱ μὲν πρώτȣ τάγματος ἠξιȣ̃ντο, οἱ δὲ δευτέρȣ, οἱ δὲ τρίτȣ.

7. Moſt Learned Men follow Cujacius herein, but ſome there are who will not have theſe words interpreted, as if he (Conſtantine) had then begun the diviſion by diſtinguiſhing his Comites into theſe Ranks; urging that theſe words no more enforce this Concluſion, than thoſe that go before do infer that he inſtituted the Dignity of Senators, Conſuls, and Duces. But that which follows ſeems ſufficiently to confirm Cujacius his Interpretation: For that Writer further tells us, that Numbers by this means obtained to be Clariſſimi, and other Honours: for, that he might confer Honours upon many, he invented various Dignities. They cannot inſtance in any Author wherein certain mention is made of this Dignity, before Conſtantines time. As for what a very Learned man of our own cites of St. George, being called a Comes by Dignity out of the Rituals of the Greek Church; as alſo of one Patricius a Comes, out of the Life of St. Actemon in that Church. The ſame exception lies againſt theſe Greek Rituals and Lives, that he himſelf brings and preſſes againſt Zonaras, and other Greek Hiſtorians in other caſes, viz. That living in later times, they wrote in the Phraſe and Language of their own Ages, and uſed Terms of more modern times to expreſs things ancient, which they conceived like to thoſe with which they themſelves were acquainted. That before Conſtantines time theſe three Ranks or Degrees came to be ſettled and diſtinct, it's no way probable: for he (as the Author of his Life writes) invented ſeveral ways to dignifie thoſe that were of different Merits. Although there are ſaid to be but three Ranks of theſe Comites or Counts; yet this is to be obſerved, that the ſame Rank according to the Qualitie of the Office to which it was applied, had different Degrees. Of the firſt Rank were the Comites Conſiſtoriani, but not they onely, for Inſcriptions are found Comes Ordinis primi, and Comes Ordinis primi intra Conſiſtorium, given at once to the ſame perſon, as Titles received at ſeveral times. The grand Officers of the Empire were alſo of this firſt Rank, as the Magiſtri Sacrarum Largitionum, Equitum, Domeſticorum, to whom thereupon the Titles of Selden ubi ſuprá.

Διασημοτάτων δὲ ὡσαύτως κ̀ ἑτέρων πλείστων ἄλλων ἀξιωμάτων μύριοι ἄλλοι μετεῖχον, εἰς γὰρ τὸ πλείονας τιμᾶν διαφόρȣς ἐπενόει βασιλεὺς ἀξίας.

As, whether by Cæſar was meant the Heir Apparent before Adrian his Adopting of Ælius Verus.

Several ſorts of the firſt Rank.

Vide Seldenum ubi ſuprá. Gothofred. ad Cod. Th. Lib. 6. Tit. 13. Gutherium de officio Domus Aug. Lib. 1. C. 17. Tres fuerunt ſpecies Comitum primi ordinis. Prima, quæ una cum Adminiſtratione competebat, ipſique Dignitati tempore Adminiſtrationis competebat. Secunda, quæ vacantibus conferebatur pro præmio: i. e. poſtquam Adminiſtratione vel Officio, aut Profeſſione quis functus fuiſſet. Tertia, quæ ab otioſis & inertibus Pretio, vel Gratiâ impetrabatur. Vide Gothofr. in Cod. Th. Lib. 6. Tit. 18.

Magiſtri & Comites were promiſcuouſly given; theſe ſame being alſo ſtyled Comites Sacrarum Largitionum, Equitum & Domeſticorum. Of this firſt Rank was alſo the Emperour's Chief Phyſician, known by the Title of Comes Archiatrorum, and ſo were alſo ſometimes thoſe that were under him: ſo that being a Comes of the firſt Rank, did not equal one in Place and Degree, with all others of that Rank; for of them ſome were Illuſtres, ſome Spectabiles, and others Lower, according to the Dignity in which their Offices placed them. Of the ſecond Rank of Comites were ſome Governours of Provinces, and ſuch as had the Government of Cities only, and with the former are thoſe ſometimes the ſame, who are ſtyled Duces; which Name being firſt taken from Employment, and not ſo Titular as this, we ſhall more properly ſpeak to anon. As for the loweſt or third Rank, it took in all the reſt that bore the Title of Comites; which, as ſome have obſerv'd out of Suidas, was of ſo large extent, that any Governour was ſignified by it; as alſo they take Notice that it is interpreted in Heſychius. This was the moſt comprehenſive and uſual Title, and the loweſt Rank, as trite and thridbare, as ours of Eſquire, or the Sieur amongſt the French. Theſe general Dignities and Styles premiſed, as was neceſſary (which will be more evident and cleared from the Confuſion in which moſt Authors involve them, by that which follows) we come from the ſhadows to the Subſtance, to the Deſcription of the ſeveral Offices of Magiſtracy, and Military Employments which, with what went before, compoſed the whole frame of Government.

Κόμης interpretatur Ἄρχων.

The Conſul.

8. Here we muſt begin with the Conſuls, that Ancient Officer, and, as we ſaid, the moſt ſublime Miniſter of the State; the greateſt Dignity ſtill at this time, next the Nobiliſſimus. And what we have formerly obſerv'd concerning Conſuls ordinary and extraordinary, Suffecti, or Honorary, muſt be remembred here. And that whereas formerly the Office of Conſuls was Annual, Julius Cæſar made ſeveral in one year, for three, two, or one Moneth; which gave occaſion to that Diſtinction. The ſame Diſtinction continued after Conſtantine his Days, as is evident by a Law of his Son Conſtantius, wherein mention is made of ordinary Conſuls, beſides ſeveral other Conſtitutions. By the Code of Theodoſius it appears, it was Annual at this time, though not that it was ſo made again by Conſtantine, as Lipſius hath written. All the ancient Honours were ſtill allowed it. It's termed no leſs than Divinum Præmium by the Emperour, and by Writers ordinarily Faſtigium, and He Potiſſimus Magiſter. When Conſuls were created, their Names were ſtill publiſhed abroad by Meſſengers ſent on purpoſe throughout the Provinces. From their Names the Characteriſtical Note of Years was taken, as formerly; and with them the Edicts and Conſtitutions of Princes were ſubſcrib'd, ſo that without them, by a Law of Conſtantine, they are declared null and of none Authority. When their Names were read, the Readers, at the mentioning of them, ſhewed Reverence. To them it was lawful to give the Sportula Aurea, and the Diptycha made of Ivory, by a Law of Theodoſius the Firſt, and to none other. The Sportula was a Preſent wont to be made by ſuch as entred into Magiſtracy, to their Friends, which might be in Silver to others, but to none but the ordinary Conſuls in Gold. And Diptychs were Tables to write in, conſiſting of two Leaves, in which being of Ivory, as appears from Claudian, the Names of Conſuls were wont to be written and ſent abroad; ſo that only to them it was lawful to make a Preſent of that Matter; Diptychs of other Materials it being permitted to give to any. They wore ſtill the Trabea, or Robe woven with Gold and Purple. And as for their Place and Precedence, Gratian by a (a) Law declares, that the other higheſt Dignities give Place to them in the Senate, whatever Matter be handled therein: ſo as the Conſul ſhould ſit in the firſt Place, and firſt give his Vote; although the Præfect of the City, he who was the chief and the Head of the Senate were preſent, who preceded, and Voted before all beſides him, and at length by a Novel of Juſtinian, had Place given him before Conſuls and Patricians. That the Conſul preceded the Patrician is evident from Caſſiodorus, beſides the Law now mention'd, who in his Forms of Charters placeth that of the Patrician next after that of the Conſul. And in his Patent or Charter it is told the Patrician, that he (b) precedes the Prefects, and all other dignified Perſons, giving only Place to that Luſtre, which the Prince himſelf ſometimes aſſumes, which was no other than the Conſulſhip. This ſeems to be contradicted by a (c) Law of the Emperour Zeno, wherein it is ſaid, that the Honour of the Patriciate is placed before all others; and order is taken that none be Preferred to it, but ſuch as have before paſſed through the Dignities and Offices of Conſul, Præfectus Prætorio, Præfectſhip of the City, Magiſter Militum, or Magiſter Officiorum. But this doth not Evince, that in the Dignity of the Common-wealth it preceded the Conſulſhip, but only in the private Affection of the Prince, to whom &c.

His great Dignity.

Part 1. B. 2.

De Prætoribus &c. Cod. Th. Lib. 6. Tit. 4. L. 12. ita ut adſint decem è Procerum numero, qui ordinarii Conſules fuerint. De Magiſtratibus Populi Romani c. 9.

Vide Paratitlon Tit. 6. Lib. 6. Cod. Th. & LL. ibi notatas.

de Conſtit. Principum. L. 1.

L. 1. de Expenſis Ludorum. Cod. Th. L. 15. Tit. 9.

(a) Cod. Th. l. 6. Tit. 6. l. 1. Diverſa Culmina Dignitatum Conſulatui cedere evidenti auctoritate decernimus &c.

(b) Præfectorios & aliarum Dignitatum viros præcedit, uni tantum cedens fulgori, quem interdum etiam à nobis conſtat aſſumi. Caſſiodor. variarum lib. 6. C. 2.

(c) Neminem ad ſublimem Patriciatûs Honorem (qui cæteris omnibus anteponitur) aſcendere liceat, niſi priùs, aut conſulatûs Honore potiatur, aut Præfecturâ Prætorio &c. Cod. Juſtin. lib. 12. Tit. 3. L. 3. de Conſulibus &c.

whom they that were Patricii being ſo intimate, as to have the Reputation of his Parents, he would have none obtain this Honour, but ſuch as had paſſed through the higheſt Employments; For the contrary, beſides other Teſtimonies, is moſt evident from Caſſiodorus, who was contemporary with Zeno himſelf.

Ex Libanio Sidonio Apollinari, quæ vide apud Gothofred. ubi ſuprà.

His Place merely Titular.

The Honorary Conſul.

9. Thus great was the Conſulſhip; but after all, it's Greatneſs conſiſted in Noiſe, in Name, in Place and Cloaths, ſo that in Caſſiodorus his Formula it may very well be termed Fulgor; it's Luſtre lay more in the Feet than the Hands or Head, for which Members there was very little occaſion: The great and weighty Burthen ſuſtained by the Conſul's vaſt Shoulders was the Gown and coloured Robe he wore; little Employment for his Eyes, but to behold with Contentment the twelve Lictors going before him, and bearing the Faſces and Axes very gracefully; eſpecially ſince of late Laurel was added to them, which commonly was uſed only in Triumphs: For his Hands, but to carry Majeſtically the Ivory Rod: For his Head, but to conſider how beſt to fill and become his Curule Chair, and to have his Robes and Ornaments ſit well upon him. The Emperours ſince the Monarchy, by aſſuming, both his Power and that of all other Magiſtrates in a manner, had permitted him to take his Eaſe. Inſtead of Commanding Armies, and having the great Management of Affairs, both at home, and in the Provinces, how do we find him now ſpending his time? Even at home in his own Houſe, entertaining himſelf and his Friends, except he would pleaſe to go in State and ſhew himſelf in the Senate-Houſe. Only you might ſee him buſied a little (eſpecially at his firſt Promotion) in (a) Manumiſſions, or ſetting Slaves at Liberty, a Privilege ſtill indulged him, and that as it were his Solemnity and peculiar Employment: perhaps in exhibiting the publick Games and Spectacula; and then as a Reward of his (b) Merits, it was lawful to preſent him, and him alone with Gold; and Reaſon too, conſidering that he found the Horſes in the Curule Races. Very little more do we find the Conſuls did at this time, ſcarcely ſo much as to ſit as Judges, and decide Cauſes, aſſign Tutors, or to let out the Cuſtomes and publick Revenues; which though they might do under (c) former Emperours, yet we ſhall now find in other hands. And whereas formerly they preſided and regulated the Proceedings in the Senate, now that Work ſeems to be diſcharged by the Præfect of the City, who was at this time the Præſul, or Head of that Body. Though conſidering what manner of man formerly the Conſul was, and as his Vicegerent, out of good Manners he might give him Place. In Concluſion: however for the Ceremony and Pageantry of the Empire, the Conſul was ſtill preſerv'd in Being, yet by Degrees he dwindled to nothing, and about Juſtinian's time ceaſed to be; ſo little Notice was taken of him in the Reign of Theodoſius the Younger, that when the Notitia, or Survey of all the Dignities, as well Civil as Military was compoſed, he was not ſo much as mentioned therein; having nothing of Buſineſs or Employment worth the mentioning. As for the Honorary Conſul; he was alſo in Being in the time of Zeno, as appears from the (d) Law of that Prince, but now mentioned; and was bound for his Honour to give an hundred Pounds of Gold toward the Repairing of the Aquæduct of the City, as the Annual, or ordinary Conſul, by the next preceding Law of Valentinian was bound to do, inſtead of the Largeſſes they formerly (to no purpoſe) gave to the People. Amongſt the Tomes of Caſſiodorus there is extant a Charter beſides that of a Conſul, for creating a Conſularis, whoſe Office is not termed Conſulatus, but Conſularitas. This Lipſius concludes to have ſucceeded in the room of the Suffectus or extraordinary, introduced by Julius Cæſar, and muſt have been merely Titular, or Honorary: but enough of the Conſul little more than a Name; now we come to both Name and Thing.

Pinge vaſtos humeros vario colore Palmatæ, validam manum, victoriali ſcipione nobilitatam, Lares proprios etiam Calceis Aureis egredere. Sellam Curulem pro ſua magnitudine multis gradibus eniſus aſcende, ut in otio ſubjectus merearis, quod nos per maximos Labores aſſumimus Imperantes. Rem victoriarum agitis, qui bella neſcitis; nos juvante Deo Regimus, nos Conſulimus, & veſtrûm nomen annum deſignat.

The Præfectus Pretorio.

His Original.

10. The chief Magiſtrate and Miniſter of the State, and which had the firſt Place amongſt the Illuſtres (next to the Patrician, who was no Magiſtrate as ſuch) was the Præfectus Pretorio. He took his firſt Denomination from the Prætors: for all Magiſtrates (as we have already (e) ſhewn) eſpecially Military, were called Prætores; and the General's Tent, or Pavilion, Prætorium; as alſo the Guard that watch'd before it, Prætoria Cohors; and the Admiral's Ship Prætoria Navis; hence he that had the Charge of the Prætorium, or lodging of the Prince, and commanding the Prætorian Bands that guarded it, was named Præfectus Prætorio. The Prætorian Souldiers had firſt their Pay augmented by Scipio Africanus, who gave them half as much more as others receiv'd; but Auguſtus by virtue of a Senatusconſultum, ordered them double Pay, and five hundred Drachms after they had ſerved ſixteen Years. Their number was ten thouſand, divided into ten Companies or Cohorts, under ſo many Tribunes. They were Men of more than ordinary Stature, and diſtinguiſhed by better Arms and Habit from the ordinary Souldiers. Theſe were after-

---

(a) L. 13 de infirm. his quæ ſub Tyrannis. Hæc Conſulatûs ſolennitas dicitur. Officium celebrabant cum id celebrabatur.

(b) Li. 2. de ſpectaculis. Cod. Theod. Lib. 15. Tit 5.

(c) Spartianus in Antonino. Ovid. 4. de Ponto.

(d) Quoniam verò Glorioſiſſimæ huic urbi, quæ caput Orbis Terrarum eſt, omnifariàm credimus conſulendum. Univerſos qui poſthac Honorarii Conſulatûs Inſignibus principali Munificentiâ decorantur 100 Libras Auri ad reficiendum Aquæductum Publicum miniſtrare cenſemus, ad ſimilitudinem eorum, qui per Annale tempus Conſularium Editione Munerum gloriantur.

(e) Part. 1. Lib. 2. C. 4. Paragr. 40.

afterward ſucceeded by three thouſand and five hundred of the moſt choiſe Armenians, divided into nine Scholes (as they termed them) or Parties. Over them the Præfectus Prætorio had abſolute Command, and by his Advice the Prince managed all his Matters: for he was that to him which to Romulus was the Tribunus Celerum, the Legatus, to the Conſul; the Quæſtor, to the Prætor; and the Magiſter Equitum to the Dictator. They obtained by degrees ſuch Authority, that not only had they the Adminiſtration of Arms and War, but receiv'd Appeals, and handled all Affairs of the Empire.

11. Auguſtus being Author of this Magiſtracy created firſt one, and afterward two Præfecti Prætorio, according to Mecænas his Model; that if need were the one might withſtand the Traiterous Deſigns and Attempts of the other; and they were to be of Equeſtrian Rank; but Tiberius gave the whole Command to Sejanus, who perſwaded him to unite the Prætorian Souldiers, formerly quartered up and down the City, in one Camp; that they might be weaned from the Luxury of the Place, be readier upon all Occaſions, and by their Union in one Body ſtrike the greater Awe into the People. Hereby this Office, moderate before, received great Advantage. In the Camp the Præfects, at firſt, handled no Cauſes; but only took Care of what concern'd War; for Auguſtus committed Appeals in Law-Suits of Citizens, to the Prætor of the City, and of ſuch as lived in the Provinces, to Perſons of Conſular Dignity; of which Rank he ſet one over the Affairs of each Province. Nero ordered Appeals to be made from Judges to the Senate. Adrian was wont, when he took Cogniſance of any Proceſs, to call to him both Senators and Equites; and according to the Reſult of their Debate, gave Sentence, no mention being made of the Præfects. Marcus Antoninus was the firſt that uſed their Advice and Authority in Law-Matters. Commodus then, that he might more freely follow his Pleaſures, committed the Care and Management of all to Perennius, his Præfect; and ſo by Degrees Judgments and Appeals were tranſlated to them. Some Princes, following the Example of Auguſtus, made two Præfecti Prætorio. (a) Commodus had as many after the Death of Perennius, and ſometimes three, finding it neceſſary to leſſen ſo great a Power by putting it into more hands. When the Barbarians made ſo frequent Incurſions, ſucceeding Princes aſſigned Præfects to certain Regions. For under Decius, Vectius Aquilius was Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt; under Valerian, 2, Vicarius and Ragonius Clarus, of Illyricum and Gall; but theſe were not certain, nor perpetual, but according to the Neceſſity of the Times, and the State of War, receiv'd and exerciſed their Power. And the Power of the ordinary Præfects (the common number whereof towards Conſtantine's time was two, as it ſeems from Zoſimus) was exceeding great; even ſo great that (b) (as one well obſerves) through the Negligence of ſome Princes, they made, and might be made Emperours, as they pleaſed. For having Authority, both over Military men, and in all things Civil, they obliged and conſequently, had all ſorts of Perſons at their Devotion; the Præfect was eſteemed a ſort of Prince, without Purple; in this Reſpect only to differ from the Emperour himſelf.

Conſtantine abridged their Power;

12. Conſtantine therefore had reaſon to be jealous of their extravagant Power, and to correct ſo great an Error in Politie, as the former Princes had committed. This he did by taking away their Authority in Military Matters, which he tranſferred upon his Magiſtri Militum, and by continuing the number of four, as he found them under the four Princes that preceded him, whereof each (as he ſaid) had his Præfect. Notwithſtanding this, they ever retained great Authority. They publiſhed their Edicts, which were perpetually to be obſerv'd, except the Prince repealed them. They commanded the Governours and Judges of ſuch Provinces as were under their Care; puniſhed them, if faulty; removed them, if unfit; paid them their Salaries due out of the publick Treaſury, and received Appeals made from them; but from the Præfects lay no Appeal. Some things the Judges of the Provinces could not do without their Order, and (c) Caſſiodorus (who in his Formulæ deſcribes their Office) hints ſomething, as if afterward they received Authority over Souldiers alſo in part, and had Power of fining, as far as the Sum of fifty Pounds of Gold. They had the Charge of the Annona, or Proviſions for the Army; took Care of the Ways, and of the Tents. The chief Management of the Revenue was in them; and in the collecting and exacting thereof, this Courſe was afterward obſerved, which is preſcribed by (d) Juſtinian. The Prince having conſulted and ſignified how much Money, or what Supply he ſhould want for the follow-ich howe- was very at.

he manner heir raiſing oney.

Tacit. Annal. 4.

(a) Ὁ δὲ Κόμμοδος δύο τοὺς ἐπάρχους καταστήσας ἀσφαλέστερον ᾠήθη μὴ ἑνὶ πιστεύειν τοσαύτην ἐξουσίαν, μερισθεῖσαν δὲ αὐτὴν ἀσθενεστέραν ἔσεσθαι ἤλπισε πρὸς τὴν βασίλειον ἐπιθυμίαν. Herodianus. Lib. 1.

(b) Atque eo progreſſus, ut Negligentiâ & Adulatione Principum, Principes fecerit, atque ita Militares animos devinxerit, ut ſibi aſſereret Imperium, nam Præfectos Prætorio omnes ſuſpiciebant, cum Caſtrenſem omnem & Civilem, Poteſtatem exercerent. Gutherius De Offic. Dom. Aug. lib. 2. C. 1.

(c) Præfectura Prætoriana quidam Principatus quondam Imperii erat, attamen ſine Purpurâ; & in eo diſcrimen Principis & Præfecti ſtatuebatur, quod ſacram Purpuram & Imperatorias Infulas non geſtaret. Braſſeus in Caſſiodori variarum L. 6. C. 3. quod P.P. Edicta fecerint vide L. 31. de Naviculariis, Cod. Th. Lib. 13. Tit. 5.

(d) Nullus ei Miles de fori ſui Authoritate præſcribit, excepto officiali Magiſtri Militum. Credo & vel illis aliquid Antiquitus cederet, qui videbantur pro Republ. bella tractare. (e) Novel. 128; quam Conſule omninò de modo Collationis.

ing year, the Præfecti Prætorio made the Diſtribution thereof in the Month of July, or Auguſt, according to the Value and Wealth of the ſeveral Provinces, and in their ſeveral Offices or Courſes it was Regiſtred, what Proportion each Country or City ſhould pay, either in Specie, or in Gold; and of this how much was to be brought into the Treaſury, and how much expended in the Province. An equal Ceſs being thus made, Copies were ſent from the Offices of the Præfects to the Governours of the Provinces, at the beginning of every Indiction, and by them publiſhed in the Cities under their Authority, within the Months of September and October, in which the Indictions or Impoſitions of Taxes ordinarily began. In caſe they obſerved not the Rule præſcrib'd, they made good to the publick ſo much as it was thereby endamaged. Now the Burthens of the Subject, or Provincials were, either ordinary, or extraordinary: and uſually they upon whom the former ſort lay any thing heavy, were excuſed from the latter: uſually, I ſay, but not always; when by Reaſon of a great War, or for other Reaſons the Emperours were at exceeding great Expence, as is evident from the Laws.

Tribute, what properly.

13. One conſtant Charge conſiſted in Tribute, properly ſo called; another in payment of Cloths, or Gold and Silver. By Tribute the Laws mean the ſeveral ſorts of the Annona, as Corn, Wine, Oyle, Fodder, and the like, ſuch as we may term Eſculenta and Poculenta, which are alſo called Fiſcale Debitum, and ſometimes might be redeem'd by Money. This being an Annual payment, the Præfects had the Charge thereof, and took Care, that the ſeveral things ſhould be diſpoſed in their peculiar Storehouſes, to be reſerv'd for the Maintenance of the Army, or other Uſes. For it's eaſie to obſerve in ſeveral Ages and Countries, that Tributes and Rents were formerly wont to be paid in kind; and here in England, amongſt the reſt, even for a conſiderable time after the Norman Conqueſt. Therefore as ſome Princes have heaped up great Treaſures of Coin, ſo others vaſt Quantities of Proviſions. (a) Meſitheus the Præfectus Prætorio, and Father in Law of the Emperour Gordian, was ſo induſtrious for his Maſter this way, that in the greater Cities upon the Borders, he cauſed to be laid up ſo much Wheat, Vinegar, Barley, Lard, and Straw, as would maintain the Army an whole year; and in the leſſer, Proviſion of this kind for forty, thirty, and at leaſt fifteen days, but in ſome of them for two Months. (b) Severus when he died, left ſuch a ſtock of Corn, that for ſeven years together, every day ſeventy five thouſand Modii might be ſpent, and ſo much Oyl as was ſufficient for the ſpace of five Years, both to ſerve the City, and all Italy, Trajan alſo took Care, that there ſhould always be a Stock of Corn at Rome to ſerve, if need were, for eight years. Now for this ſupply ſeveral Provinces of Courſe contribute ſeveral Things. The Leptitani in Mauritania furniſhed Oyl, the Galls Horſes, and the Spaniards alſo, eſpecially they of Bœtica, of which in thoſe times they had an excellent Breed, beſides Cloths, Oyl, Fat and Lard. In Italy the Lucani found Hogs, and the Brutii Oxen; the Sicilians, as Pancirolus obſerves, paid the tenth part of their Wheat, which amounted yearly to eight hundred thouſand Modii, and if need was, were bound to add another tenth, for which they receiv'd Satisfaction out of the Treaſury; as alſo a fourth, if Neceſſity urged; for Sicily of old was eſteemed the Granary of Rome, till ſuch time as Ægypt was ſubdued, which in after times paid the fifth part of their Fruits, for which Conſtantinople receiv'd eight Millions of Medimni of Wheat yearly: but yet what here is ſaid concerning ſuch Nations and People their furniſhing ſuch and ſuch particular things, hath rather Relation to the beginning of the Empire; for as appears by Theodoſius his Code, the Princes that ſucceeded Conſtantine much regulated and altered theſe Payments, whereof ſome were ordinary, and ſome extraordinary, as the Occaſions and Wants of the State were urgent.

What ſeveral Countries furniſhed.

Vide L. 2. Cod. Theod. de diſtrabend. pignoribus, lib. 11. tit. 9. & L. ult. C. Juſtin. lib. 4. T. 46.

(a) Cujus viri tanta in Repub. diſpoſitio fuit, ut nulla eſſet unqnam Civitas limitanea potior, quæ non poſſet Exercitum Pop. Rom. ac Principem ferre; quæ totius Anni in Aceto, Frumento & Larido atque Hordeo & Paleis condita non haberet: majores verò urbes, aliæ 30 dieram, aliæ 40, nonnullæ 2 menſium, quæ minimum 15 Dierum. Capitolinus in Gordiano tertio.

Sportianus in Severo Rei frumentariæ quam minimam repererat; ita conſuluit, ut excedens ipſe vitâ 7 annorum Canonem P. R. relinqueret.

In Notitiam Imperii Orientalis, cap. 5.

De hac re, vide illius Cod. lib. 11. tit. 9. L. 1. & Tit. 17, 18.

14. However, they were all under the Care and Management of the Præfects, who alſo had the Charge of receiving Clothes for Souldiers; the manner of furniſhing which, was various in the ſeveral Countries; but generally one was Exacted for every twenty or thirty Acres, or ſometimes according to the Poll; or elſe Gold in the room of it. Beſides theſe, they not only look'd to the Collection of the Extraordinary Impoſitions (as we ſaid) as alſo of Tolls, Impoſts, and other things too tedious here to relate, but could Impoſe Extraordinary Charges and Services in ſome Caſes; and the Navicularii, or thoſe who Tranſported the Proviſions, were by them Governed. They granted leave to make uſe of the Curſus Publicus, which none of the Greater Officers, except the Magiſtri Officiorum, could do. At their Creation, the Prince of old Girded them with a Sword, as the Enſign of their Office. At their firſt Inſtitution they could not be Senators, being only of the Equeſtrian Rank, leſt they ſhould grow too Great. Alexander, the Emperour, firſt firſt added that Dignity, leſt Senators ſhould be judged by thoſe that were below their Order; and ſo they came to be ſtyled Clariſſimi, and afterwards Illuſtres. They rode in Gilded Chariots, drawn by four Horſes, accompanied with the ſhouts of the Publick Cryers, and Lucky Acclamations of the People, who ſtyled them Fathers of the Empire, and Exhorted them to demonſtrate themſelves really ſuch.

L. L. 7, 8. de extraordin. & Ammian. Lib. 17.

Titles given to the Præfects.

The Princes honoured them alſo with the Title of Fathers, as with thoſe of Magnitudo, Culmen, Amplitudo, Præcelſa Magnificentia, Celſitudo, Excellentia, Sublimitas, and the like, beginning their Letters, Fave Hypate Chariſſime nobis, and concluding, Divinitas te ſervet permultos annos Incolumem, Parens Chariſſime. Anſwerably, their Seat was called Sublimiſſima and Excelſa. Their Privileges were great, and their Stipends large; for Juſtinian allowed the Præfect of Africk an hundred pounds of Gold yearly, which ſome compute to have been about nine thouſand Sterling. Theſe things abundantly are Evident from the various Conſtitutions of Princes. And thus much in general of their Præfecti Prætorio.

He of the Eaſt was moſt Eminent.

15. In particular, He of the Eaſt was moſt Eminent, both for number of Provinces, and Authority. Now we muſt know, that the Diſtrict of every Præfectus Prætorio ordinarily included ſeveral Diœceſes, and each Diœceſe ſeveral Provinces. We ſay, Ordinarily; for ſeveral (a) Examples Convince us, that ſometimes a Præfect had but one Diœceſe, which was no other than an (b) Union or Collection of ſeveral Provinces under one Adminiſtration, or Government.

His five Diœceſes.

But the Præfect of the Eaſt had under him (c) five Diœceſes, viz. that of the Eaſt, ſtrictly ſo called, Ægypt, Aſia, Pontus, and Thrace. Over which, as his Deputies, were ſet ſo many of the Greater Provincial Officers. Of theſe, the Comes of the Eaſt Commanded fifteen Provinces; the Præfect of Ægypt ſix, the Vicar of Aſia ſeven, the Proconſul of Aſia other three, the Vicar of Pontica eleven, and of Thracia ſix; all which made up eight and forty Provinces, as in the Notitia of the Empire is expreſſed.

The Fleets under his Command.

Under his (d) Command were the ſeveral Fleets of the Eaſt, which (as in the other Parts of the Empire) ſerved for conveying Proviſions for Defence of the Borders, and clearing of the Seas and greater Rivers of Pirates, and by ſome are reckoned eleven in number. Amongſt theſe were Eminent that called Claſſis Seleuca, Inſtituted (as ſome think) by Conſtantius, after he had fixed his Seat at Antioch, and with great Charge had made an Haven on the Shore of the Syrian Sea, called Portus Seleucenus; though others think it the ſame with that of Seleucia, in the River Orontes. There was one alſo in the Euxine Sea, conſiſting of forty Veſſels: a Third was ordained by Trajan in the Red Sea: a Fourth belonged to Alexandria: a Fifth Cruiſed on the Carpathian Sea. The Notitia reckons up ſix more in Danubius, beſides one belonging to thoſe that ſerved in the Treaſury, or the Theſaurenſes. This Præfect was Reſident at Court in the time of Juſtinian; the Imperial Seat, or Conſtantinople being within his Diſtrict. Of his Arms, or the Enſigns of his Authority, the Notitia makes not mention; but doubtleſs they were near the ſame with thoſe belonging to the Præfect of Illyrium, viz. a Book of Mandates erected on a Table covered with a Carpet, betwixt four burning Wax-lights; on one ſide the Images of the Princes (which they as well as other Civil Magiſtrates of Provinces, but not Military, had born before them) and on the other ſide, of five Women holding Veſſels full of Gold, and repreſenting his five Diœceſes.

He of Illyricum.

16. The ſecond Præfectus Prætorio mentioned in the Notitia, was he of Illyricum, placed by Conſtantine in the Northern Parts.

What meant by that Name.

In Ancient Times, all the Tract reaching from Danubius to Italy, and now called Sclavonia, was taken for Illyricum. (g) Zonaras writes, that the name of Illyricum being formerly given to various Places, became afterwards peculiar to the upper Continent above Macedonia and Thrace, between Hæmus and Rhodope, and after paſſing theſe Bounds, was extended beyond thoſe Mountains, as far as the Euxine Sea. In the time of Claudius the Second, it contained the Thracians, Myſians, Dalmatians, Pannonians, and Dacians. What Countries Conſtantine, after the new Diviſion laid to it, we have already ſeen out of Zoſimus. Jornandes divideth it into eighteen Provinces; Sextus Rufus into Seventeen; but the Empire coming to be divided amongſt ſucceeding Princes, Illyricum Eaſtern and Weſtern.

Illyricum alſo became twofold, viz. (h) Eaſtern, which contained two Diœceſes, Macedonia and Dacia, whereof the former conſiſted of ſix, and the latter of five Provinces; and Weſtern, which being under the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy included Dalmatia, the two Pannonia's, Noricum Ripenſe, and Savia. Illyricum divided in the middle by the Mountain Adruis, as Italy, by the Apennine, amongſt other things, paid Wine and Horſes for the Uſe of the Army, having of the latter an excellent Breed, and for every thirty Acres the Value of a Solidus toward the cloathing of the Souldiers.

17. Each

(a) Vide L. 4. Cod. Th. lib. 6. Tit. 4. & quæ ibi notantur à Gothofredo, & L. 11. ejuſd. Cod. lib. 13. Tit. 3.

(b) Διοίκησις ἐςὶν ἡ πολλὰς ἐπαρχιὰς ἔχουσα ἐν ἑαυτῇ.

(c) Vide Notitiam Imperii. L. 3. de Militari Veſt. Cod. Th. & L. ult. de fide Cathol.

(d) Lege ſcil. lata à Valente, quæ extat Cod. Th. de Claſſicis lib. 10. tit. 23. & Cod. Juſtini L. un. eod. Tit.

(e) Gothofred. in d. l.

(f) Pancirolus in Notit. orient. C. 7. quem vide de his Claſſibus.

(g) De Illyrico multa Appianus Capitolinus, Spartianus, Pollio, Vopiſcus Sext. Rufus, Zoſimus. Apud hos memorantur Præfectus, Dux, Curator Illyrici, Munimenta, Exercitus Illyrici; ſeparaturque à Rhætia, Thracia, Dalmatia nonnunquam; ſic Pancirol. ſed vide Hiſtoriam hanc infrà.

(h) Notitia Imperii orientalis.

The Diœceſes and Provinces of the Eaſtern.

17. Each of the Diœceſes under the Præfectus Prætorio was Governed by it's Vicar. He of Macedonia Ruled theſe ſix Provinces, Achaia, Macedonia, Crete, Theſſaly, old Epirus, new Epirus, with part of Macedonia Salutaris. Under the Vicar of Dacia were, Dacia Mediterranea and Dacia Ripenſis, Mœſia Prima, Dardania Prævallitana, and part of Macedonia Salutaris, divided betwixt him and his Brother Vicar. Theſe two halves put together, make up twelve Provinces, which being added to the Provinces of the Eaſt, fill up the number of ſixty Provinces of the Eaſtern Empire. The Seat of this Præfect was firſt at Sirmium; but when Attila, the Goth had miſerably waſted Illyricum, Pennius, or rather Ærius the Præfect, removed to Theſſalonica, a City of Mygdonia (which was part of Macedonia, betwixt the Rivers Ethedon and Dhabrius, not far from the Sea, formerly called Halis, and built ſay ſome by Caſſander, ſay others by Philip of Macedon. Upon this account many Privileges were conferred on the Church of Theſſalonica. Afterward Juſtinian having overcome the Sclavi, and recovered both the Dacia's and Pannonia; made the Town where he himſelf was born Metropolis, enlarging and adorning it with Walls, Buildings and great Immunities. Some ſay this was Sclavonia, a City of Dalmatia, near to Dacia and the ſecond Pannonia: ſome will have it Bederina, others Acrido, and ſome none of them all; but of this Matter we ſhall diſcourſe in another Place: but he called it Juſtiniana Prima, having founded another City, not far from it, which he alſo called by his own Name. The Chief Enſign of this Præfect was an Iron-Chariot guilded, drawn by four Horſes. To this were added the Images of the Princes, and one Table covered with a white Cloth, with golden Fringe, betwixt four Lights, the Emperours Picture upon a Book of Mandates; wherein were ſuppoſed to be contain'd the Duty and Office of the Præfect, and wont to be preſented to them by the Emperour. And laſtly, are to be ſeen two Women repreſenting the two Diœceſes, Macedonia and Dacia, having their Heads crown'd, and Baskets in their Hands full of Gold. Theſe Enſigns are mentioned, or ſtamped in the Notitia, as peculiar to the Præfects, not but that they uſed alſo ſuch as belonged of old to the Roman chiefeſt Magiſtrates: for they had the Faſces with gilt Axes carried before them, as had alſo the Prætors; the Trabea, or Robe enbroydered with Gold and Purple, the Ivory Rod; they had a golden Collar about their Necks, and were girt with a Purple Girdle.

The Enſignes of this Præfect.

He of Italy.

18. The third Præfectus Prætorio was he of Italy, who (as Zoſimus writes) had under his Juriſdiction, both that Country, and Africk, together with the Iſlands of Sicily, Sardinia and Corſica. But we find, that in the Reign of Julian, Mamertinus was Præfect of Italy, Africk, and alſo Illyricum; therefore ſome contend, that the laſt in thoſe times had not conſtantly it's Præfect, but the Empire being divided after Valentinian, and Valens, the Præfect of Italy had only of Illyricum the Weſtern part. This Præfect, as he of the Eaſt at Conſtantinople, lived at Court, and therefore both theſe were termed Præfecti Prætorio Comitatus. In the Code of Juſtinian no mention is made of him, nor of the Præfect of Gall; but only of him of the Eaſt, and of Eaſtern Illyricum, becauſe then the Empire had failed in the Weſt. Africk being recovered from the Vandals by his Arms, he made a Præfect of his new Conqueſts, and to it joyn'd Sardinia. But though he alſo recovered Italy, yet it doth not appear, that he reſtored it's Præfect alſo, it being Governed by Narſes, the Eunuch, of whoſe Magiſtracy no Title appears in our Law-Books; and for ſuch Governours as ſucceeded him in ſuch parts of Italy, as continued under the Empire in following times, they had the Title of Exarchs of Ravenna, whereas that of Eparch was proper for the Præfect; but to return to the times whereof we write, and the Age wherein the Notitia of the Empire was compoſed. The Præfectus Prætorio of Italy had in his Diſtrict three Diœceſes, Italy it ſelf, Illyricum (the Weſtern) and Africk. That of Italy contained ſeventeen Provinces, that of Illyricum Six, and that of Africk Seven, as in the Notitia they are expreſſed, which we do not here ſet down, leſt we perplex the Reader's Memory with too many Names.

Ἔπαρχοι dicuntur.

His three Diœceſes.

The Præfect of Gall.

19. To the fourth Præfectus Prætorio was, as Zoſimus informs us, committed the Celtæ, or Galls beyond the Alpes, together with Spain, and the Britiſh Iſlands. Though he governed ſeveral Countries, yet becauſe Gall was Richer, and nearer to Italy he took his Denomination from it, and was called Præfectus Prætorio Galliarum, in the plural Number. He had three Diœceſes in theſe Countries now mentioned; Gall, Spain and Britain, which under ſo many Vicars contained twenty nine Provinces, viz. Spain ſeven, Gall ſeventeen, and Britain five, whereof the Names were Maxima Cæſarienſis, Valentia, Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Cæſarienſis; of which hereafter. But long it was not e're all theſe three Diœceſes were overrun and poſſeſſed by Barbarians, and the Præfect failed. Therefore in the Notitia he hath no Enſigns mentioned, only his Diœceſes and Provinces; and his Officers, the ſame with thoſe of the Præfect of Italy: and probable it is, that Mutatis Mutandis, his Enſigns were the ſame; ſo that it might ſeem ſuperfluous to mention them. As for Juſtinian, he neither mentions any Officers of thoſe Provinces, becauſe in his time they owned not the Roman Empire. And thus much of the Præfects themſelves. Something muſt be added of their Officers, that this Polity, not obſerved hitherto by many Hiſtorians, may more fully appear.

The Officers belonging to the Præfecti Prætorio.

Vide Pancirol. de Aſſeſſoribus ad Notitiam Orient. Imp. l. 8. & Gutherium ubi ſuprà, Tit. 2. C. 4.

20. Firſt then it muſt be known, that all Magiſtrates of Provinces, and eſpecially the Præfects, had one or more Lawyers to aſſiſt them, whom they termed Aſſeſſores, and Conſiliarii. By their Council and Advice they Decided Cauſes; it being the part of the Aſſeſſor to Inform himſelf fully of the Matter in Controverſie, hear Advocates Plead, read Petitions, and Anſwer them; as alſo, to take care of ſuch Edicts as were to be framed, or of Letters to be written, and to Interpret Decrees according to Law. They heard Criminal Cauſes, but left Judgment or Sentence to be paſſed by the Præfects, to whom they gave Directions therein: and what could not be by the Præfects, otherwiſe employ'd, was Diſpatched by them. Of other Officers, which attended the Præfects, no certain number can be Aſſigned. Juſtinian ordained, that the Retinue of the Præfect of Africk ſhould conſiſt of three hundred ninety and eight Perſons; but thoſe of other Places were doubtleſs more Numerous; whenas the Comes of the Eaſt had belonging to him, as ſuch, ſix hundred Men.

Their general Names,

The Body of their Officers is in the Laws termed Officium and Apparitio, the Officers themſelves Officiales, Apparitores, Cohortales, becauſe they had the Form, and Privileges of a Cohort: (and Pancirolus thinks, that that Cohort or Band, which by the Evangeliſts is ſaid to have been gathered together at our Saviour's Paſſion, was of this nature) Beneficiarii, becauſe promoted by the Beneficium, or kindneſs of the Tribune, to ſome Office or Employment; and Scriniarii, becauſe they kept the Papers which concern'd themſelves, in Desks or Coffers. Theſe Officers, both of the Præfects, and other Illuſtrious Magiſtrates, as alſo thoſe that had the Title of Spectabiles, were made ſuch by the Prince his Codicils, or Letters. Every Chriſtmas day there was a Promotion of them to be Cornicularii, or Commentarienſes, as they had deſerved.

And Employment in general.

Their Work was to Execute the Commands of the Præfects, Introduce ſuch as had Suits, make Records, and read them; enter Judgments and Execute them, and do other things Requiſite, as in Courts of Judicature. They were ſent to Adminiſter Oaths to ſuch as were ſick, or Noble Perſons. They went before the Præfects, as Lictors before them and other Magiſtrates; took care of the publick Poſts; gathered Tributes; hunted out High-way-men, diſcovered to them by the Stationary Souldiers; who, by the Ordinance of Auguſtus, were appointed to lye in wait for Robbers. They had large Fees, beſides Proviſions allowed them out of the Provinces; and theſe lay about the Houſes of the Præfects. There were others that liv'd with them, and were call'd Domeſticks; whereof there were ſome that were call'd Chancellors; who wrote Letters from them (as from the Preſidents) to Private men; and ſo named, as appeareth from Caſſiodorus, becauſe they ſate within Cancelli, or Lattices, through which might be ſeen what they did.

In Particular, theſe were

21. But the Notitia reckons up in the Office of the Præfecti Prætorio, theſe by Name, viz. the Princeps, Cornicularius, Adjutor, Commentarienſis, Abactis, four Numerarii, Subadjuva, Curator Epiſtolarum, Regerendarius, Exceptores, Adjutores, & Singularii; whereof moſt are frequently mention'd in Law-books.

Princeps.

The Firſt was Principal of the Office, directing and commanding the reſt of the Officials, without whoſe Order nothing could be done; being herein like the Princeps, or Principal of the firſt Cohort. He had, beſides other Clerks in his own Office, a Domeſtick Chancellor, who wrote his moſt ſecret buſineſs; and, beſides other Honours, had the Title of Clariſſimus.

Cornicularius.

The next to him was the Cornicularius, whom Accurſius takes only for a ſimple Prætorian Apparitor; Alciat, for a Miniſter of the Principal; but Pancirolus, according to the Notitia and the Laws, for one of the Chief of the Office; and thinks him to have been the Writer and Publiſher of the Commands, Judgments, and Decrees of the Præfect, or the Preſident. Sometimes he is called Chancellor, but ordinarily Cornicularius, which Name is Antient, being given to the Scribe of the Tribuni Plebis of old, and ſeems taken from an Horn, which he might uſe as the Enſign of his Employment, or by it to command Silence in the Court. They were preſent, as appeareth from the Acts of Martyrs, at the Examination of Criminals, and took charge of ſuch as were Condemned. It's thought they Commanded the Præcones, or Publick Criers. They continued in their Office but one year, until Chriſtmas. They were Rewarded with the Dignity of Comes, and Immunity from Extraordinary Charges. They, as the other Apparitors of the Præfecti Prætorio, had their peculiar Scrinia, or Offices, wherein ſeveral Clerks wrote, and kept the Commands, Judgments, and Decrees of the Judges. In the Office of the Cornicularius belonging to the Præfectus Prætorio of Africk, wrote ten Clerks, to whom were allowed Proviſions from the Publick.

Adjutor.

22. The Adjutor ſupplied the Places of others, and Aſſiſted them, being by the Emperour Gratian termed the Adjutant of the Office, or Company. He was alſo called Optio, from the Optiones of the Legions, ſo Named from the Wiſhes of ſuch as being ſick and weak, unable to Diſcharge their Office, deſired their Help and Aſſiſtance: He moſt commonly Apprehended Delinquents, and Committed them to Priſon; Tortured them to make them Confeſs, and perhaps had charge of the Execution. It's thought the Speculator was under him, ſuch an one as Beheaded St. John Baptiſt, whom we Tranſlate an Executioner. He alſo had his particular Office, wherein, under the Præfect of Africk, ten men wrote the Names, Conditions, and Ends of Delinquents. But, to avoid Confuſion, we muſt take notice, that ſometimes by Adjutors are meant Miniſters of the Quæſtor, taken out of ſeveral Offices.

Commentarienſis.

Next to the Adjutor the Commentarienſis is mention'd in the Notitia, and had charge of Priſons. He allowed Priſoners, if poor, out of the publick Proviſions, two or three Libellæ a day, whereof one was the tenth part of a Denarius in Value. He took care that Men and Women were not put together; and every thirty dayes was to give an account of the number of Priſoners, their Crimes and Age to the Præfect, or Judge, that they might not be Ruined in Priſon. He had under him ſeveral Inferior Officers called Stratores. He entred the Caſes of Delinquents, and their Bail; and from Digeſting theſe things into Memorials or Commentaries had the Name; for a Commentary is a Book, wherein ſummarily Matters are Deſcribed, as by Heads. Sometimes they Tortured Criminals, themſelves, and took care of their Execution, bidding the Speculators Execute the Sentence of the Judges. The Commentarienſis had a peculiar Adjutant or Deputy, who in his Abſence ſupplied his Place. In his Office wrote twelve Clerks, allowed him at the Publick Charge.

Rectè Aſconius in Verr. 3. Notat hæc Nomina Princeps, Commentarienſis & Cornicularius de Legionaria Militia ſumpta eſſe. Vide de his Valeſii Annot. in Ammian. Marcellini Lib. 15. p. 67.

Abactis.

23. But the moſt Important Officer in the whole Office of the Præfectus Prætorio, or other Magiſtrates, was the Actuary, called Actuarius and Abactis. He Recorded Contracts, and other Matters before the Judge, Faith thereof being publickly made: ſo that without further Examination or Scrutiny, Credit was given to this Record; ſo, as at this day, to the Acts of Publick Notaries. In making their Acta or Records, this was the Form. It was neceſſary to write down the name of the Contractor, Witneſs, or the like: the Time, and the whole Contract of Buſineſs was to be Deſcrib'd in Order: All this was to be done, at leaſt read, before a Judge; at Conſtantinople, before the Maſter of the Cenſus; in the Provinces, before the Preſidents, or Municipal Magiſtrates: for the Præfecti Prætorio, the Preſidents and their Actuaries being not able to diſpatch all Buſineſſes, nor ſuch as were at a great diſtance to attend them; Power of making theſe Publick Acts was given to the Duumviri, and Governours of Cities. To enter them, or read them falſe, was a Crime, no leſs than High Treaſon, becauſe they were of ſuch Importance. By reaſon of multitude of Matters coming before them, they had Aſſiſtants. In their particular Offices they had ten men maintain'd at the Publick Charge. Now again, to avoid Confuſion, take notice, that ſometimes an Actuary (as in Suetonius and Seneca) ſignifies one that took and noted what was ſaid and Dictated in general; ſometimes one that wrote down the names of Souldiers, what Pay, and what Reward was due to them; but theſe belong not to our preſent Cogniſance.

Acta eorum aliquando Geſta, Publica Monumenta, Inſtrumenta forenſia Publica, Publica Teſtificatio, Publicæ Chartæ, & Tabulæ. Hinc Publicare dicuntur, Inſinuare & Intimare; ac ipſa Actio dicitur, Inſinuatio & Intimatio. Acta ipſa Græcis ὑπομνήματα, & Actuarius ὑπομνηματάριος.

Pan.irolus.

Four Numerarii.

24. Next in the Notitia follow the Numerarii, who were four in number, in the Præfects Office. In the Provinces there were two called Tabularii, whereof one took Account of Eſtates, Goods or Money, which by Forfeiture or Succeſſion fell to the Treaſury, or to the Cheſt of the Comes Rerum Privatarum; another of ſuch Tributes as belonged to the Largitiones, or publick Expenſes: for the Emperours had two Cheſts, or Receits, over which were ſet ſo many Comites Illuſtres, viz. the Comes Largitionum, and Comes Rerum Privatarum. To the Expenſe of the former were Aſſigned out of the Tributes and Cuſtomes a certain Quantity of Gold and Silver, with other things in ſpecie, contained in the Canones Largitionum. The Accounts hereof were eſpecially Managed by the Numerarii, living with the Preſidents in the Provinces; but the Numerarii of the Præfect of the Eaſt, Reviewed, and Examined them, being for that purpoſe tranſmitted to them. They took care that no-nothing ſhould be wanting of the due Sum of Money, and of that Gold which belonged to the Treaſures of the Provinces, and part they aſſigned to the Prætorian Cheſt, and the reſt to be tranſmitted to the Comes Largitionum: the other Comes was over the private Patrimony of the Prince, viz. his Lands and Houſes; and beſides this, gathered ſome few things; what herein belonged to him, ariſing out of Cauſes handled in the Treaſury, Confiſcated Goods, and ſome other wayes. Theſe Accounts were made up by the Numerarii in the Provinces, who entred the Kinds and Quantities of the ſaid Goods, and what Profits were made of the Prince his Lands. All which the Numerarii of the Præfect of the Eaſt diligently Reviewed and Collected. Iſidore will have the Numerarii ſo called, becauſe they brought the Publick Money into the Treaſury; but St. Auguſtine ſeems to derive their Name from Numbering or Accounting; and moſt probably they were much the ſame for Employment, as our Auditors. But theſe two belonging to the Præfect, (as the other alſo of the Provinces) were employed in Accounts and Writings. A third was called Numerarius Auri, who received the Gold levied out of the Provinces, and belonging to the Cheſt of Publick Iſſues; exchanged Silver for Gold, and managed the golden Mines. The fourth was Numerarius operum Publicorum, of publick Works, as the Palace, publick Houſes, Gates, Aquæducts, Walls and Baths. For the Præfectus Prætorio had the Charge of the Building or repairing of them, as this Officer kept the Accounts, as alſo he ſeems to have done of certain kinds of Mines. The Pains of the Numerarii being great, they were allowed Aſſiſtants, provided they choſe them out of the thirty Principals called Primores; who might not execute the Office of Aſſiſtants twice, without the Interval of two years, leſt their long Continuance ſhould miniſter Occaſion of Fraud. The Numerarii being diſcharged, were free from Perſonal Offices, and requited with the Dignity of Comites of the firſt Rank.

à Nummo.
à Numerando.

Subadjuva.

25. To the Numerarii is adjoyned the Subadjuva, who yet was not their Miniſter, but Adjutant to the Adjutants, and thence had his Name. In the Office of the Magiſtri Militum, he is by the Notitia called Primiſcrinius. He that belonged to the Præfectus Prætorio of Africk had ten Clerks writing in his under Office, maintained at the publick Charge. After the Subadjuva, or rather the Subadjuvæ (for there were ſeveral of them) he is reckoned that had the Care of Letters, or Epiſtles, which the Præfect had occaſion often to write, both to the Prince and others. Thoſe that were written in behalf of ſuch as had well diſcharged their Employments, were termed Epiſtolæ Teſtimoniales; thoſe that concerned the Canones or Rates of the Tributes, Canonicæ. They that wrote them were alſo called Epiſtolares, who moreover in Caſe of Appeals to the Præfect, took account of what had been done by the former Judge, and recorded the ſucceeding Proceſs. He that follows, viz. the Regerendarius was doubtleſs the Maſter of Requeſts to the Præfect; ſo called, becauſe he did Regerere, or Referre in Codicem, Book ſuch Petitions as he received: in the Eaſt he was termed Subſcribendarius, for that he ſubſcribed the Petitions; thence a Book into which things were tranſcribed was called Regiſtrum. Pancirolus thinks Regerendarius the ſame with Referendarius, who as Procopius writes, preſented Petitions to the Prince, and returned Anſwer from him. In the Office of the Magiſtri Militum of the Eaſt, he is called Scriniarius, and by Theodoſius, Libellenſis, as by others à Libellis. The Office of Petitions belonging to the Præfectus Prætorio of Africk, had ſix Writers in it, paid by the Publick. The Præfectus Auguſtalis, the Vicars, Correctores and Præſidents had none of theſe Officers, becauſe bound to ſubſcribe Petitions themſelves; yet the Conſulares of the Eaſt (though not thoſe of the Weſt) had ſuch under them, that they might preſerve ſome Shadow of the Conſular Dignity. In the Office of the Præfectus Prætorio were alſo the Exceptores, who in the Cauſes of Appeals, Recorded the Judgments given before him. They kept the Records called Memoria; though ſome think the Place where they were depoſited to have been ſo called. Moreover they were wont to draw the Edicts of Princes. They were governed by one Primicerius, who had Aſſiſtants, when Abſent, or otherwiſe employed. Of this ſort of Officers there were ſixty belonging to the Præfect of Africk; and what Wealth Sons, their Fathers yet living, got in the Employment, was accounted as much Caſtrenſe Peculium, as if they had ſerved in the firſt Legion: which Privilege Lawyers alſo have obſerv'd to have belonged to all Apparitors, or thoſe Officers of whom we have now Treated. But theſe were the Scriniarii, who dealt in Writing. There were other Officers and Attendants of the Præfects, not ſo conſiderable, which therefore we ſhall omit. And thus much of the Præfecti Prætorio, and their Office; and ſo much, becauſe the Cura Epiſtolarum.

Regerendarius.

Lib. 2. de Bello Perſico, de Theodoro ſcribens.

Exceptores.

Exceptores, ab Acta excipiendo.

Filiiſamilias quicquid acquirebant, Patribus ſuis acquirebant, excepto Peculio Caſtrenſi, & quaſi Caſtrenſi.

the Underſtanding of their Place and Employment in the State gives the greateſt Light to the Tome of that Government we endeavour to deſcribe, and to the Underſtanding of the Imperial Laws.

Beſides the Præfecti Prætorio, there was the Præfect of Rome.

His Power.

26. Beſides the Præfecti Prætorio, there were other Præfects and civil Magiſtrates, not Subject to them (nay two which in the two great Cities took place of them) of whom ſomething is to be ſaid, and then we come to the Magiſtrates of the Provinces; theſe were the Præfects of both Romes, and other Officers belonging to theſe Cities under their Command. Auguſtus, as we have elſewhere noted, ordained a Præfect of Rome, but he ſeems rather to have Reſtored the Office, than to have firſt inſtituted it: for the Kings in their Abſence left ſuch a Magiſtrate to govern the People. Romulius was ſo deputed by Romulus; Martius by Tullus Hoſtilius, and Sp. Lucretius by Tarquinius Superbus. Long after, Auguſtus being buſied by his Wars, ſet Mecænas over the City; a man of Equeſtrian Rank: then by Reaſon of the Multitude of People, and the ſlow Proceedings of Law, he took ſome of Conſular Dignity to reſtrain the Inſolence of Slaves, which was at that time very great. The firſt of theſe was Meſſala Corvinus, who continued in but a ſhort time, as not knowing how to govern; and ſome ſaid he laid down on his own accord within ſix days, proteſting it was an Arbitrary Office; to which Auguſtus had granted abſolute Power; not only within the City, but an hundred Miles round about. At firſt the Præfect received Appeals from all the Provinces, but afterward this was reſtrained to thoſe call'd Suburbane, or Suburbicarian, becauſe (if Pancirolus ſay right) they reached to the Suburbs of Rome. Alexander the Emperour leſſened his Power, joyning with him fourteen Perſons of Conſular Rank, termed Curators, as Lampridius writes. From the Prætors of Rome, which in the time of Conſtantine were two, he alſo receiv'd Appeals; and when the Vicar of Africk ceaſed, Valentinian ordered Appeals to be made to him out of thoſe Tranſmarine Provinces. Of a Senator's Life he was to Judge, aſſiſted with five Patrician Senator's choſen by Lot; whence this Proceſs was called Quinquevirale Judicium. But Appeal lay from him to the Prince, in which reſpect he was inferiour to the Præfectus Prætorio, from whom none lay, though in certain Caſes he was obliged to conſult the Emperour. Both of them might baniſh into Iſlands, and deprive Criminals of their Liberty. He had under his Command Souldiers diſpoſed into certain Stations in the City, to be ready for the ſuppreſſing of Tumults. Under his Care were the Spectacula, or publick Shows, the ſelling of Meat at Juſt Prices, and all Trades; for which were choſen inferiour Officers, at the Prince his Diſcretion. He had the overſight alſo of publick Buildings; and as the Præſul of Senators, præſided in the Senate.

De Præfecto urbis Romæ vide Leges varias allegatas à Gothofredo in Notitia Præfectorum urbis Romæ; & Pancirolum in Comment. ad Notitiam Imp. occident. cap. 4. Hiſtoriam hanc noſtram paſſim.

Majores Capitis Diminutiones, Deportatio, & in Servitutem Reductio.

Officers under him.

27. Under him were theſe ſeveral Officers in the City for diſpatching the Buſineſſes aboveſaid: The Præfectus Annonæ, to whom belonged the Care of Proviſions; Præfectus Vigilum, who governed the Watches appointed for Prevention of Fires and Robberies: The Comes Formarum, who looked to the repairing of Aquæducts, or Vaults call'd Formæ: The Comes Riparum alvei Tiberis, & Cloacarum, who had Charge of the River Tiber, and the common Sewers: The Comes Portûs, who governed the Port or Heaven of Hoſtia made by Claudius: The Magiſter Cenſûs, whoſe Charge it was to ſee that Taxes and Impoſitions were truly, and equally laid: The Rationalis Vinorum, who took account of the Wines imported, and of the Cuſtomes thence ariſing: The Tribunus Fori Suarii or Over-ſeer of the Hog-Market: The Conſularis Aquarum, who had the overſight of the nineteen, or as others ſay, twenty four Waters conveyed by Aquæducts into the City: The Curator Operum Maximorum, to whom was committed the Care of the great Cirque, the Walls, the Amphitheatrum Caſtrenſe, and other great Works: The Curator Operum Publicorum, who had Charge of the publick Houſes, and other Works. The Curator Statuarum, to whom was committed the Safe-guard of the Statues, whereof at Rome was a great number: The Curator Horreorum Galbanorum, or of the Publick Storehouſes: The Centenarius Portus, who ſaw that Strangers and Citizens quarrel'd not at the Haven, and provided for Apprehenſion of Thieves and Malefactors: And laſtly, the (a) Tribunus Rerum Nitentium; whoſe Buſineſs it was to ſee that the ſacred Houſes, Palaces, Courts, Baths, Cirques, Theatres, Amphitheatres, Highways, Libraries, Fields and other Publick Places were kept ſweet, Neat and Cleanly.

(a) Primò Centurio Rerum Nitentium dictus eſt, poſtea Tribunus, & tandem Comes huic Officio Præfectus. Vide Valeſium in Ammian. Marcel. lib. 16. p. 64.

28. Conſtantinople*, as we ſaid, being made another Seat of the Empire of Conſtantine, and named New Rome, with the Name received all the Privileges of the Old. Emulating therefore Rome in all things, it was alſo divided into fourteen Regions; had it's Capitol, and other publick Places and Ornaments; and alſo its

The Præfect of Conſtantinople.

(a) Præfect who Judged and Determined, as well Civil, as criminal Cauſes, and thoſe of Senators alſo within a certain Compaſs; and to him Appeals lay, as to the other out of the Provinces, from the Præſidents and Proconſuls. Conſtantine ordained no Præfect for its Government, but three Prætors; whereof the firſt he called Flavius, the ſecond Conſtantinianus, and the third Triumphalis, from the Victories he had obtained; all which he would have ſpend large Sums of Money upon the People in the Theatres. Theſe were to be of Senatorian Rank, and by ſuch to be choſen. Conſtantius, his Son, to theſe three added two Prætors more,but in the laſt year but one, of his Reign, made one ſingle Governour of the City, Honoratus by name, who had been Præfect of Gall, with the Title of Conſularis of Byzantium, as Pancirolus imagined, by a Miſtake of Byzantium, for Byzacium in Africk, as (b) Gothofred tells us in his Diſcourſe concerning this Subject. For this chief Officer had the very Title of Præfect, and this Title continued, as may be ſeen by the Imperial Conſtitutions. And now had he Power over the (c) Prætors of the City, the number of whom under Valentinian was leſſened to four, who entred their Office on the firſt of January. Gratian added other Four. At length Valentinian the Third, and Martian, commanded only three to be created out of the Senators dwelling at Conſtantinople, who had ſome Cogniſance of the Affairs of Children and Minors. The Notitia takes no Notice of them, as perhaps at that time laid aſide, or of ſmall Account. Their Office in thoſe Days was dwindled to little more, than to ſet forth Plays and publick Shows, wherein they were at great Charges. In the time of Juſtinian there ſeemeth one only to have been at Conſtantinople, called Prætor Plebis, whom he ſtyleth Magnificentiſſimus, who had an Apparitor.

(a) De Præfecto Conſtantin. vide eund. Pancirolum in Comment. ad Notit. Imp. Orient. C. 25. & Notitiam Præfectorum urbis Conſtant. Gothofred. in Notitia Dignitatum. Et Hiſtoriam hanc noſtram.

(b) Vide Comment. Gothofr. ad L. 16.

(c) de Præto*ribus & Quæſtoribus, Cod.* Th. lib. 6. Tit. 4.

From whence to him lay Appeals.

29. Conſtantius, that he might give greater Authority to the Governour of this City, Ordained, that from the two Governours of the Diœceſe of Pontica, viz. Bithynia and Paphlagonia; and ſo many of Aſiana, viz. Lydia and Phrygia Salutaris, and from the two Proconſuls of Aſia, the Helleſpont, and Iſlands, and from the three Proconſuls of the Diœceſe of Thrace, to him ſhould lye Appeals. This Præfect had Souldiers under him. He had Power over Tradeſmen, as had the other of Rome, and took care that the Liberal Sciences ſhould there be profeſſed; employing at Conſtantinople, as the other at Rome, three Rhetoricians, ten Grammarians of both Languages, five Sophiſts, one Philoſopher, and two Interpreters of the Laws. He overſaw the eleven hundred Shops given by Conſtantine and Anaſtaſius to the Great Church in Conſtantinople. He had the ſame Officers, as the other of Rome; only it doth not appear that he had a Vicar. Amongſt thoſe the Præfectus Annonæ took Care of the Palatine Bread, which we formerly mentioned to have been by Conſtantine's Bounty beſtowed upon the People, out of the Palace. As the Præfectus Vigilum at Rome commanded ſeven Cohorts or Companies for prevention of Fires; ſo this at Conſtantinople, five hundred and ſixty three Perſons choſen out of the Bodies of Artificers, and Diſpoſed as need required, through the fourteen Regions. But this Office being in proceſs of time beſtowed on mean Perſons, who inſtead of ſuppreſſing, conſpired with Thieves, by degrees it became of no Repute. wherefore Juſtinian in the Præfect's room Created the Prætor Plebis, to whom he gave Power of the Sword over ſuch as by Whoring, Stealing, or other ſuch Courſes, offended in the Night. The Præfect of Conſtantinople alſo nominated the Lecticarii, or Decanarii, a Company founded by Conſtantine, for Burying of the Dead, maintained by Rents he aſſigned them out of the Shops lately mentioned. They were called Lecticarii from the Beds or Bieres; and Decanarii, it's probable, becauſe divided into Companies conſiſting of ten apiece. And, as at Rome, it's not to be doubted but here alſo were Curatores Operum; for here were alſo ſeveral Great and Conſiderable Works, which requir'd the Overſight of ſome careful Perſons. Here were four Forum's, two Theatres, one Cirque, eight Baths, two Palaces, five Store-houſes, two Houſes for Playes or Shows, four Ciſterns, four Stews or Bains, fifty two Porticus's, twenty publick Priſons, like Bridewell, an hundred and ſeventy Degrees or Stairs whereon the Poor received the Bread given by Princes, one Porphyry Column, two others Hollow, one Coloſs, beſides ſeveral other things of Curioſity. Both Præfects had the Offices of Princeps, Cornicularius, Adjutor, Commentarienſis, and the reſt. Both were Equal in Dignity, and Illuſtrious. Both had the ſame Enſigns of Authority common to them and the Præfecti Prætorio, or with very little difference. In a gilt Chariot drawn by four Horſes, they rode through the City, with the ſame Acclamations of Criers and People. Alexander the Emperour calleth the Præfect of the City, Urbis Amicum. Other Princes in their Conſtitutions give them the Titles of Tua Sublimitas, Magnitudo, Sinceritas, Illuſtris Auctoritas, and others given to the Officers under his Command.

Præfecti Prætorio. He was ſtyled alſo Glorioſiſſimus, and his Seat Ampliſſima. In his Court he had Eighty Advocates, whereof fifteen were Eminent, and called Primates. The firſt was made Advocate of the Treaſury, with a publick Salary; and all the reſt had the ſame Privileges with other Advocates, and the Title of Clariſſimus.

Provincial Magiſtrates.

During the Republick.

In the time of Auguſtus.

Conſule Strabonis Geographiam ad finem lib. ſcil. 17. & ult.

30. The ſeveral Offices of the Præfects being Diſpatched, who were the Higheſt ſort of Magiſtrates; True Method brings us to the Provincial Officers under their Command; which courſe is fitteſt for underſtanding the Government, rather than to ſpeak to all, as they were Ranked by their Dignities. Theſe Provincial Officers, at this time, were ſuch as under the Præfects Governed the ſeveral Diœceſes, or ſuch as Ruled the ſeveral Provinces under them; the firſt Riſe and Original of whom to Diſcover, it will be worth our while to fetch things higher. Know then, that the Romans, when they had Conquered Sicily, Sardinia, and Corſica firſt, and afterward Spain, and Gallia Narbonenſis, appointed to each Province a Prætor, as we have in our firſt Tome already ſhewed; for that both Spains being ſubdued in the Dxx year of the City, four Prætors were ſent abroad. Afterward, Africk having receiv'd the Yoke, and the Power of the People of Rome being further ſpread, (whereas Prætors had only hitherto governed Provinces) it pleaſed the Fathers, that ſuch as had been Conſuls the foregoing years, ſhould, their time being out, ſtill have the Command, as Pro-Conſuls for the years following. Provincial Officers therefore were only Prætors, Proconſuls and Quæſtors, till the Change and new Model made by Auguſtus; who dividing the Provinces betwixt himſelf and the People, aſſigned to them the peaceable and ſetled, and reteined the unſetled and unquiet, that lay upon the Borders, in his own Hands, under pretence of eaſing them of ſo great a Burthen; but indeed thereby to have the Armies at his own Command, and prevent their turning the force of the Empire againſt himſelf. The Magiſtrates now of Provinces belonging to the People, he called Proconſuls; being choſen by Lot out of the Senators, though they were not of Conſular Dignity. They held their Office only a year, and once out of the Pomærium had ſome Faſces, or Conſular Enſignes born before them, till their return; but had no Authority over Souldiers, neither wore the Sword, nor Chlamys, or Souldiers Habit. But thoſe he ſent into his own Provinces ordinarily he called Legati; though perſons of Conſular Dignity and Proprætores; but theſe were afterwards called Præſides, and all, Legati; or Lieutenants of Cæſar. They had five Faſces, or Bundles of Rods carried before them; had one Aſſeſſor to aſſiſt them; commanded the Soldiers; wore Swords, and the Habit; and continued in their Office as long as it pleaſed the Emperour. To the Præſidents of Italy that commanded Souldiers, he gave the Name of Prætors, becauſe the ancient Commanders of Armies were ſo called. Theſe were afterwards ſtyled Conſulares; therefore the Name of Prætor and Conſul, ſaith Dio, remained only in Italy; the Governours of which were ſtyled Prætors and Conſulares.

What a Province was.

What is a City.

31. To ſuch as had been Conſuls, he only Aſſigned two Provinces, viz. Aſia and Africk, with three Aſſeſſors, and thoſe alſo of Conſular Dignity. Into the Inferiour Provinces were alſo ſent Quæſtors, who afterwards got the Name of Cæſar's Procurators; ſuch was Pontius Pilate in Judæa; but Strabo writes, (which it ſeems was afterward) that Auguſtus appointed Ten Prætorian Provinces to the Ordering of the Senate, into which Prætors were ſent, and two Conſular, which were Governed by Proconſuls. He being dead, Tiberius would not permit the Magiſtrates, that were to be ſent into the Provinces, to be choſen by the People, but by the Senate; and ſo all things, by degrees were transferred into the Power of the Prince. Now a Province was that Country, or Region of the Roman Empire, which was not Governed by Kings, but Magiſtrates. For Strabo tells us, (a) That of all that Ground which was under the Obedience of the Romans, Part was held by Kings, (as Tributaries and Vaſſals) and Part they held themſelves by the Name of a Province, and thither ſent Governours and Quæſtors, or ſuch as were Employed in Levying their Tributes. The Provinces (as we ſaid) were divided betwixt Cæſar and the People; but ſuch Regions as (b) Tributary Kings and Reguli held, were accounted to belong to Cæſar's ſhare. Provinces moſt commonly were bounded by Seas, Rivers, or Mountains; but in Deſcribing a Province Conceits are various. Some will have that a Province, which contained Ten or Eleven Cities; and more Queſtion there is what thing it was which Conſtituted a City, or could give that Title to a Town. Some take a City (Vrbs) of old to be meant by a place which had Courts of Juſtice Adminiſtred by the Duumviri; others require a Prætorium, a Gymnaſium, a Theatre, a Forum, a Bath and Porticus, which indeed Lawyers ge-generally eſteem as Enſigns and Marks of Cities. The Prætorium was the place where the Preſident or Chief Governour Adminiſtred Juſtice. The Gymnaſium or Palæſtra, was a Four-ſquare, encompaſſed with a Periſtyllium, or four Galleries (as the Exchange in London, or Cloiſters in Monaſteries) whereof that toward the South was double, having an Exedra, or place with Seats, like to a Chapter-Houſe in Monaſteries, where Philoſophers ſate and Diſputed. On the Theatre were Plays and Shows preſented. In the Forum the Duumviri, or Defenſores Civitatum, Magiſtrates of the Cities, Adminiſtred Juſtice in leſſer Matters. The Porticus, or Baſilicæ were Arched Buildings, ſupported by Pillars, where Buſineſſes were Tranſacted, as the Exchange, having about them Shops, whereof mention is often made in Law-books. The Chriſtian Churches reſembling theſe, were alſo termed Baſilicæ. Afterwards, Biſhops being ſet over the more Eminent Towns, ſuch are not eſteemed Cities as are not Epiſcopal Seats, eſpecially in Italy; yet is not this univerſally obſerv'd, and Lawyers confeſs it to be no neceſſary Mark.

(a) Ταύτης δὲ τῆς συμπάσης χώρας τῆς ὑπὸ Ρωμαίοις ἡ μὲν βασιλεύεται, ἣν δὲ ἔχουσιν αὐτοὶ καλέσαντες ἐπαρχίαν, καὶ πέμπουσιν ἡγεμόνας, καὶ φορολόγους quò ſuprà.

(b) Καὶ βασιλεῖς δὲ, καὶ δεκαρχίαι, καὶ δυνάσται τῆς ἐκείνου μερίδος, καὶ εἰσὶ, καὶ ὑπῆρξαν ἀεί. His verbis Strabo Geographiam ſuam claudit.

What Governours of Provinces in the time of Conſtantine.

32. But before the time of Conſtantine, whereas Provinces were of various ſorts; as firſt, Prætorian, then Conſular, and Proconſular; ſometimes Proprætorian, and ſometimes Quæſtorian, (as Cyprus, to which were ſent Quæſtors, who Raiſed Money, and Adminiſtred Juſtice without Military Power.) About this time this Cuſtom was changed by the Inſtitution of the four Præfecti Prætorio, their Diœceſes and Provinces. Over their Diœceſes certain Officers and the Vicars had Command, and under them, over the ſeveral Provinces into which the Diœceſes were ſubdivided, other Governours called Proconſuls, Conſulares, Correctores, and Preſidents. The Diœceſe of the Eaſt was committed to a Comes, and that of Ægypt to one that bore the Title of Præfectus Auguſtalis, and under them the Vicars; as there were three ſeveral ſorts of Magiſtrates, ſo of Provinces, ſome were of the greater, ſome of the middle, and ſome of the leſſer ſort. The firſt were Governed by Proconſuls, the ſecond by Conſulares or Correctores, and the third by Preſidents; for the Præſides were the lower ſort of Governours, although ſometimes all Provincial Magiſtrates (by reaſon of the Latitude of the words) go under that Name or Appellation; and no more kinds of Provincial Magiſtrates are found in the Notitia. Further, it muſt be known, that theſe Provinces were often made greater or leſſer, viz. Proconſulares, Conſulares, or Præſidial, according to the Exigency of Affairs, or the Pleaſure of Princes; as alſo their Limits altered and changed for the ſame Reaſons. The Comes of the Eaſt (who ſometimes goes under the Name of Præfect of the Eaſt, ſometimes of Vicar, and otherwhiles of Preſident, in the general ſenſe now mentioned) had great Authority, receiving Appeals from all the Inferiour Magiſtrates of his fifteen Provinces. He had Power to Fine as far as ſix Ounces of Gold, whereas that of other Magiſtrates, that were only Spectabiles, extended but to three. To his Court belonged forty Advocates, who had ſtudied the Law at leaſt five years. In his Office he had ſix hundred Apparitors; and reſided at Antioch, the Metropolis of Syria; yet from him there lay Appeals to the Præfectus Prætorio, and the Quæſtor of the Palace; and his vaſt Juriſdiction over fifteen Provinces, was at length cut ſhort by Juſtinian, who confined it to Syria Prima, and Cyrrheſtia adjoyning to it.

The Comes of the Eaſt.

The Præfectus Auguſtalis of Ægypt.

33. The Præfectus Auguſtalis was inſtituted by Auguſtus, by him appointed to the Government of Ægypt, and thence had his Name. He was no Senator, nor ſo much as Conſularis till the time of Severus, but only of Equeſtrian Rank. His great Charge was to ſee conveyed away for Conſtantinople the Felix Embola, or the conſtant annual quantity of Corn. For in the days of Auguſtus, Ægypt ſupplied Rome with two Millions of Modii of Wheat; and indeed for four Months of the year alone furniſhed that City. The Imperial Seat being Tranſlated to Conſtantinople, Corn was alſo from Ægypt tranſported thither, and thither only, after that the Weſt was overrun by the Barbarous Nations; and hence came all that Grain, which Conſtantine turned into Bread, and cauſed to be Diſtributed to the Inhabitants of his new City; which Allowance, though diminiſhed to one half by his Son Conſtantius, yet afterward was made up and increaſed by his Succeſſors. In Juſtinian's time eight Millions of Medimni yearly were ſent to Conſtantinople, bought with ſix hundred and eleven pounds of Gold, given by the Liberality of the Senate, or others, into the hands of the Præfect of the City, or the Præfectus Annonæ. Neither is it any wonder, that Ægypt ſhould afford ſo much Corn, conſidering it's vaſt Fruitfulneſs and Riches; for it yielded to Auletes a Revenue of twelve thouſand and five hundred Talents, and as much more to Auguſtus. Nay, ſome affirm, that Ptolomy Philadelphus raiſed out of it three Millions and five hundred thouſand

Of our Money, 2343750 l. as Mr. Brierwood reckons.

Modii of Corn, and fourteen thouſand eight hundred Talents. And yet the Inhabitants in Nero's time, beſides the Alexandrians, were ſeven Millions and fifty thouſand Perſons: but, for the Power of the Præfect, he inquired into the Miſdemeanours of the Preſidents Subject to his Juriſdiction (for only Præſidents they were, no Proconſuls, or Conſulares, becauſe he himſelf was ſometimes but of Equeſtrian Degree) and, their Crimes firſt made known to the Prince, puniſhed or removed them. His Reſidence was at Alexandria, the great Emporium, not only of the Roman Empire, but of all the Eaſt. For hither Merchandiſe from India was convey'd. Juſtinian reduced his Power alſo into narrow Bounds, confining it to Alexandria, and the two Provinces called both the Ægypts, or all Delta; Mareotis, and the City of Menelaus excepted, which he laid to Libyæ. The Præſidents of theſe two Provinces alone he ſubjected to his Command; allowing him an Office of ſix hundred men, and a Revenue proportionable to ſo ſtraitned a Power. He was bound yearly to exhibit the Courſes of thirty ſix Horſes before the People, and was at further Expenſes in Publick Baths, and other things. The Comes of the Eaſt, and he had the ſame Enſigns of their Authority; viz. the Faces of the Princes on the top of a Gilded Pillar; on a Table covered with a white Carpet, a Book overlaid with Silver: below, the Pictures of the ſix Provinces ſubject to him, holding in their hands Veſſels full of Gold, in token of Tribute; having about their Necks Golden Chains, on their Heads Crowns; and ſome of them appear, as having caſt off their Mantles from about their Shoulders. The Comes of the Eaſt, this Præfect, and the Vicars, were of the Rank of Spectabilis, and ſo was the Proconſul.

The Enſigns of their Authority.

The Proconſul.

34. The Proconſul of Aſia had under him three Provinces, and being Governour of a kind of Diœceſe, was of the ſame Rank and Power with the Comes, Præfect and Vicars. Any other Proconſuls that were but Governours of ſingle Provinces, yet had greater Privileges than other Provincial Officers, as the Proconſul of Achaia, to whom the Notitia gives alſo the Title of Spectabilis, with his Officers, as the Princeps, Cornicularius, Commentarienſis, Quæſtor, Adjutor, and the reſt, whom we find belonging to the Governours of Diœceſes. There were many other particulars wherein the Proconſul Excelled the Ordinary Magiſtrates of Provinces; this Reſpect being continued to him by Poſterity, out of acknowledgment of that great Dignity and Power whereof he was poſſeſſed. He had ſix Bundles of Rods and Axes carried before him, whereas a Preſident had but five. It's probable indeed, that the Conſularis had the ſame Ornaments with him, but not the Correctores, nor Preſidents. From his firſt Departure out of the City he uſed theſe Ornaments, till his Return; and exerciſed in the way voluntary Juriſdiction (as we call it) viz. of Manumiſſion and Adoption, which things were not permitted to other Magiſtrates. He could fine in ſix Ounces of Gold, as could the Comes of the Eaſt, and the Præfectus Auguſtalis; Preſidents, but in two. He had his Legatus or Lieutenant to whom he could delegate his Juriſdiction, whereas the Preſident contented with one Aſſeſſor, delegated Cauſes to inferior Judges. A Proconſul, though he continued in his Office but a year, yet ſtill adminiſtred Juſtice till the Arrival of his Succeſſour; a Preſident, only ſo long as pleaſed the Prince. Some think that to him alone was proper the Power of Deportation, not to the Preſident. He had the ſame Privilege of old, as the Prætor at Rome, of publiſhing Edicts to moderate the Law, which were termed thence Jus Provinciale, a Power never granted to Preſidents, nor other Magiſtrates, ſtyled Clariſſimi, till the Reign of Probus. Preſidents were under Command of the Comes of the Eaſt, or of Vicars. The Proconſul was Subject to the Orders of the Præfectus Prætorio alone. From the Preſident though Delegated by the Prince, Appeal lay to the next Proconſul in Matters not exceeding ten pounds of Gold; but from the Proconſul, to the P. P. or the Quæſtor of the Palace. The Proconſul had his Libellenſes, not the reſt. He rode in a Silver'd Chariot drawn by four Horſes. He had for Enſigns of his Authority the Picture of his Provinces, or Province, together with the Images of the Princes on a Pillar, and a Book of Mandates ſtanding on a Table covered with a white Carpet, with a golden Fringe. Neither he, nor any other Magiſtrate could ſtir out of his Province, nor make War without the Authority of the Senate, or the Prince: Neither could any of them in his Province build a Ship; leſt by a Liberty, and Study of Gain, they ſhould be diverted from the publick Buſineſs, or intercept the Profits and Encouragements of Merchants.

How much more Honourable than other Ordinary Magiſtrates.

F. de Jure Fiſci l. 4. §. 2. Joh. Loccenius de Jure Maritimo, lib. I. C. 2. ſ. 1.

Other Provincial Magiſtrates of the Degree of Clariſſimi.

35. Now after theſe, who bore the Title of Spectabilis, a little of the other Provincial Magiſtrates ſtyled Clariſſimi; ſuch were Conſulares, Correctores, and Preſidents, to whom, under the Vicars, the Provinces ordinarily were divided. Here as, Conſulares.

the Conſulares are not to be underſtood, as ſuch who had born the Office of Conſul, but as were Dignified with Conſular Ornaments only, being firſt Inſtituted by Auguſtus, and ſet over the Provinces of Italy, whence they paſſed into other Countries. Sometimes Commanders of Armies have been called Conſulares; either by Reaſon of the ſame Ornaments, or becauſe they were created out of this ſort of Magiſtrates, and there was a Conſularis of Waters under the Præfect of Rome. Their Enſigns of Authority were ſix Faſces and Axes, a Curule-Chair, and the Faces of the Princes, with the Image of a Woman repreſenting the Province; whereas Correctores and Preſidents had that of a Town, and a Book of Mandates, not marked, as was that of theirs. Their Office or Attendance was Conſtituted, as that of Preſidents and other Clariſſimi. They had of old two Numerarii, but afterward were allowed but one apiece. There were in the Eaſt fifteen Conſulares, and ſometimes in the Weſt two and twenty; and the Name and Employment continued till the times of Juſtinian, who mentions the Conſularian Provinces.

Correctores.

36. Correctores held the middle Place betwixt Conſulares and Preſidents. This ſort of Officer is found in the Reigns of Severus and Caracalla, and afterward was created a Corrector of all Italy, who continued long in uſe, till Conſtantine's time, and then this Emperour ordained two for that Country. At length they got into other Provinces, as Auguſtanica and Paphlagonia in the Eaſt, and in the Weſt, Savia. They had ſome Command over Souldiers, whom they puniſhed with the Knowledge of the Magiſtri Militum. They wore the Chlamys, and had as Enſignes of their Authority the Faces of the Princes, with Books of Mandates, and the Image of a Town, and the ſame Office, or Apparitors, as the Conſulares and Preſidents. To add ſomething, though not much, to what we have already frequently hinted concerning the Præſes or Preſident: Of thoſe Prætorian Provinces made by Auguſtus, Alexander the Emperour made many Præſidial: and afterwards Prætors being taken away, all the reſt became ſuch, till the Reign of Juſtinian, who reſtored the Office and Authority of Prætors. The Preſidents, as others of the Clariſſimi were termed Ordinarii, their Provinces Ordinariæ, and alſo their Seats; generally they had the Style of Clariſſimi, but not all: for the Præſes Arabiæ under the Comes of the Eaſt, and he of Iſauria were but of the Degree of Perfectiſſimus. The Prince honoured them, as the Correctores, with the Titles of Brothers, of Juſtiſſimi, Vigilantiſſimi, Optimi and Præſtantiſſimi; as Claudius Lyſias ſaluted Felix, and St. Paul worded it to Feſtus. They continued in Power but a year, except the Prince thought fit to continue them longer. Their Office and Attendance was very little different from thoſe of the Conſulares and Correctores: and the Enſigns of ſuch of them who were but Perfectiſſimi, were well nigh the ſame with thoſe of the other.

The Præſes, or Preſident.

Military Officers.

37. We have Diſpatched the Civil Magiſtrates of the Provinces, and now come to the Military, being of as great Concernment, ſuch as were placed on the Limits of the Empire. Auguſtus (as we ſaid) retaining thoſe Provinces that were Troubleſom, and furniſhed with Souldiers, in his own hands; appointed nine Regions, or Limits, on the Borders to be kept by the Legions. One in Spain, with three Legions; one in the Lower Germany upon the Rhine, with four; another in the upper Germany, upon the Danubius, with other four; a fourth in Dalmatia, with two; a fifth in Pannonia with three; a ſixth Limit in Syria, with four Legions; a ſeventh in Ægypt, with two; an eighth in Africk, with one; and a ninth in Mœſia, upon Danubius, with two. All which make up twenty five Legions. But to theſe Claudius added a tenth Limit in Britain, with three Legions; Veſpaſian an eleventh in Cappadocia, with two; Trajan a twelfth in Dacia, with two; a thirteenth in Armenia and Meſopotamia, upon the River Tigris, with other two; and a fourteenth in Arabia, with one. All which make up the number of thirty five Legions. Afterwards, new Enemies continually falling upon the Roman Empire, ſometimes new Limits were added to the old, and otherwhiles their Number was leſſened, as the ſtate of Affairs required. Dio mentions thirteen in Alexander's time, and the Notitia fifteen in the Eaſt alone. Afterward, when the Empire of the Weſt was over-run, the Emperour Leo, for the better Defence of the Eaſt, added three Limits, with ſo many Comites, and one Dux of the Weſtern Pannonia. And whereas Paleſtine and Meſopotamia had formerly had each its Dux, this Charge of thoſe Countries was given to a ſingle Perſon; there being now five Comites that Commanded in the Eaſt. For the better underſtanding of theſe Limits, or Prætexturæ, as they were alſo called, Theodoſius (a) tells us in his Novels, that whatſoever belonged to the Roman Empire, was in old time fenced with a Vallum Limitis, a Wall or Rampier of a Limit, from the Incurſions of Barbarians.

Nine Limits appointed by Auguſtus.

How many afterward.

Vide Pancirolum in Notitiam Imp. Orient. C. 139.

38. Yet

(a) Majorum diſpoſitione vallo Limitis ab Incurſione Barbarica defenſatur, quicquid intra Romani nominis concluditur poteſtatem.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 337.

38. Yet is not this old time to be extended beyond that of the Emperour Adrian, before whoſe Reign, the Romans in their Limits made uſe of Camps and Stations, rather than Walls: but Adrian found it more convenient to raiſe Walls in ſuch Places (a) as were not by Rivers ſeparated and fenced from Barbarians; of which that is moſt celebrated, which he here in Britain cauſed to be drawn betwixt the mouths of the Rivers Tine and Esk, though the Materials were no better than Turf. Afterwards were added for the further ſecurity of the Limits, Towns, Gariſons, Caſtles and Forts, ſuch as (b) Zoſimus writes Diocleſian to have raiſed out of his great fore-ſight, for the ſafety of the Empire. Theſe Towns are called Towns of View or Diſcovery, by Ariſtides (c) the Orator; for upon the Borders were of old appointed Select Companies of Spies, or Scouts, call'd Speculatores, or Exploratores, whoſe Duty it was, as (d) Ammianus deſcribes it, to go far and near to Diſcover the Motions of the Neighbouring Nations to the Duces, or Captains. But it was grown a great piece of Policy with the Romans, and that we can eaſily believe, before the time of Diocleſian, for hindrance of the Irruptions of Barbarous Nations, to build Towns upon the Borders; not only where there was no Natural Fence by Mountains or Waters, but upon Rivers alſo, as hath often been obſerv'd. For inſtance, Strasburg, Spire, Mentz, Confluentz, and others upon the Rhine, to reſtrain the Incurſions of the Germans into Gall; and it was alſo practiſed by them here in Britain; where Bravonium, or Brannonium was built upon the Eaſtern Bank of the Severn, the better to curb the Tranſabrine Natives, beſides Deva (now Cheſter) and other Cities upon the River Dee. As for the other ſorts of Works, the greater Munitions were called Caſtra, from the Camps of the Souldiers, and theſe, not ſeldom, grew into great Towns or Cities throughout Europe; which we find evident here in Britain, where almoſt all our great Cities and Towns had their beginning from the Roman Caſtra, (whether on the Borders or elſewhere) though not alwayes planted in the very ſame ſite, yet at no great diſtance. And eſpecially this obſervation holds in thoſe, the Names of which were in the Saxon times faſhion'd ſo as to end in Cheſter. For which reaſon alſo it is, that the Ancient Stations about the Picts Wall, the Carkaſſes of many whereof do at this day appear, are ſtill called Cheſters by the Country People. The leſſer ſort of Munitions were not termed Caſtra, but diminutively Caſtella, and Burgi; which Name, as Vegetius writes, was under the later Emperours given to ſmall Caſtles, or Forts convenient for War, and well ſtored with Corn; and the Burgundians from living in ſuch, received theirs; to which Oroſius alſo witneſſeth. Procopius writes, as if theſe ſmall Forts were firſt built upon Danubius, being not ſtrong in themſelves, but in the Souldiers who lodged in them. That Attila eaſily Demoliſhed them in his Paſſage, and that Juſtinian re-edified them; not ſuch as they had been formerly, but very ſtrong, and able to endure a Siege. But of all theſe Towns, Camps, or Caſtles, there were in the Eaſt alone above three hundred Gariſons, and ſcarcely any Province but had fifteen, or thereabouts.

Fenced by Adrian firſt with Walls; and afterwards with Cities, Towns and Caſtles.

as here in Britain.

39. Now, to come cloſer to our buſineſs; every one of theſe Towns had its Governour, or Præpoſitus, and the ſeveral Limits or Frontiers had their ſeveral Duces Limitanei. Here we muſt take notice, that the Commanders of Armies were Anciently called Duces, though moſt commonly Imperatores. Afterward the Sovereign Power being transferr'd from the People to the Prince, and the Title of Imperator being aſſumed by him as Peculiar; Generals were only called Duces. At length the Name was in an eminent way conferred on ſuch as Commanded the Souldiers lying upon the Frontiers, which being ordinarily Infeſted by the Barbarians, ſtood in need of perpetual Guards. And of theſe Euſebius, or the Author of Conſtantine's Life, is to be underſtood, where he writes, that that Emperour made many Duces; although the Duces of the Borders were much Ancienter than in his time. Our Learned Cambden will have thoſe that Govern'd the Limits firſt ſtyled Duces, about the time of Ælius Verus; but Pancirolus more Antiently than this; no later than the firſt Emperours. Their Name and Office was older, but their great Encouragement, and the ſupport of their Employment they received from Alexander Severus, the Emperour, who, as Lampridius tells us, gave ſuch Grounds and Territories, as were gained from the Enemy upon the Borders, to thoſe Duces Limitanei, and ſuch Souldiers as ſerved under them; to paſs from them to their Heirs, on condition that they continued in Service, and never to come into private hands. He concluded, that they would hereby be provoked more induſtriouſly to mind their Buſineſs, while they fought for the Defence of their own Poſſeſſions: and for their further Encouragement, he beſtowed upon them Cattel and Slaves, that they might Till their Lands, and thereby, the forſaking of theſe Territories ſo near the Enemy, through

Duces Limitanei

Had the Lands upon the Borders aſſigned to them.

(a) Vide Spartianum in vitâ Adriani.

(b) Πόλεσι καὶ φρερίοις, καὶ πύργοις, Opidis & Caſtellis, atque Burgis Interprete Leunclavio.

(c) Πόλεις ἐφορεία.

(d) Id illis erat Officium, ut ultrà, citráque perlonga ſpatia diſcurrentes, vicinarum Gentium ſtrepitus noſtris Ducibus intimarent.

Hinc apud Antonini Itinerarium Caſtra Exploratorum in Britannia noſtra; item Præfectus Numeri Exploratorum Lavatre juxta murum, & Præpoſitus Numeri Expl. Portu Adurni, apud Notitiam.

(e) De his Limitibus, Oppidis, Caſtris & Caſtellis vide Burtoni Noſtratis Comment. in Antonini Itinerarium.

(f) Ceſtria de Caſtris nomen quaſi Caſtria ſumpſit.

(g) Lib. 4. c. 10.

(h) Lib. 7. c. 22.

(i) De Ædificiis Juſtiniani L. 4.

through the Poverty or Age of the Poſſeſſors, might be prevented. In like manner did Probus give much Land in Iſauria to his old Souldiers, on theſe terms, that their Sons being eighteen years old, ſhould be ſent to the Wars. Of this kind, as one obſerves, were the Agri Militibus aſſignati mentioned by Ulpian; and hence, as well as for other Privileges enjoy'd by the Veterani, an Account is given us, that ſo ſevere Laws were juſtly made by ſeveral Emperours in after times, to compell the Sons of theſe old Souldiers to undertake that Service, from which the Fathers were excuſed.

And by Conſtantine were made Comites of the firſt Rank.

40. But thus we ſee the Duces of the Limits holding Places both of very great Honour and Profit. Several of them were by Conſtantine advanced to be Comites of the firſt Rank, and were by him ſtyled Comites per Provincias: and thoſe of this Degree ſeem rather Superiour to others that enjoyed but the Title of Spectabiles, though Inferiour to Illuſtrious Perſons, and therefore ſuch as had arrived at this Quality of Comites, were in place above other Duces, although afterwards, when theſe Titles came to the Feudal, (as we ſhall ſee hereafter) the Duke became more Honourable than the Count. At what time the Notitia of the Empire was Compoſed, there were only two of theſe Comitates Rei Militaris in the Eaſt; viz. of Ægypt and Iſauria; the reſt were called Duces, and were thirteen in number. In the times a little before the Notitia, here ſeems to have been in this Iſland but one, who Executed the Offices of both, with the Title of Dux Britanniarum, beſides one ſtyled Comes Tractûs Maritimi; the ſame with him who afterwards was called Comes Littoris Saxonici. But in the Notitia are expreſſed beſides this Comes Littoris Saxonici, (who was Admiral at that time, and ordained againſt the Maritime Incurſions of the Saxons) both a Comes and a Dux of Britain. From the Enſigns of the Dux his Authority (Images and Names of Towns ſituate toward the North) it appears, that his Juriſdiction lay toward the Inner parts of the Iſland, and upon the Northern Frontiers of the Roman pale; and conſequently the Government of the Comes Britanniarum was chiefly in the Southern Parts: I ſay Chiefly, for that indeed it appears from his Enſigns (which was the whole Iſland, and a Building repreſenting the Capital City) and the placing of the whole Province in the Notitia under his Diſpoſition; That all that part of Britain which the Romans held, was generally under his Care; and the Government of the Dux was rather added for Aſſiſtance to him. As for the Forces here maintain'd by the Romans under theſe Officers, the Comes Britanniarum had under his Command MMM Foot, and DC Horſe: The Comes Littoris Saxonici MMCC Foot, and CC Horſe, and the Dux XIVM Foot and DCCCC Horſe, which reckoned with thoſe of the two Comites, make up XIXMCC Foot, and MDCC Horſe. This in particular of our own Iſland. As for the other Provinces of the Weſt, we muſt adde, that there were four other Military Comites, and X Duces, appointed for Defence of their Frontiers. The Comites were of Italy, Africk, Tingitana, and Tractus Argentoratenſis, or the Parts about Straſburg. The Duces were of Mauritania Cæſarienſis, the Tripolitani, Pannonia Secunda, Valeria Ripenſis, Pannonia Prima, Noricum Ripenſe, Rœtia Prima & Secunda (the form of whoſe Commiſſion Caſſiodorus hath Exemplified amongſt his Formulæ) Sequanicum Armoricanum, Belgica Secunda, Germania Prima, and of the Parts about Mentz.

In ſo many Provinces, viz. Libya, Thebais, Phœnicia, Euphratenſis, Palæſtina, Oſrhoena, Meſopotamia, Arabia, Armenia, Mœſia ſecunda, Scythia, Dacia Ripenſis, and Mœſia Prima.

Dux Britanniarum in this Iſland.

Comes Britanniarum.

See Selden Titles of Honour, Part 2. Ch. 1.

Other Comites and Duces of the Weſt.

Their Power.

41. The Powers Exerciſed by Comes and Dux were of the ſame nature; though, as it ſeems from what we have lately hinted concerning Britain, with ſome Subordination. Both of them had Cognizance of the Matters of Souldiers, having the ſame Command throughout their Diſtricts, as the Tribunes of Legions were wont to have over Military Men: and if Comites, they animadverted upon them in the room of the Magiſtri Militum. In the time of the Notitia they had the liberty of Liſting their own Souldiers; but Zeno the Emperour afterward would have this Privilege nulled, and the Admiſſion of their Souldiers belong to the Prince alone, and perhaps with very good reaſon. Theſe Duces were not made for a time, as other Officers and Magiſtrates, their Offices being in perpetuum. They wore red or purple Coats, were Girt with the Military Girdle, and they alone had Armed Men ſtanding at their backs, when at Meals. For their Expenſe they had large Allowance. The Prince, when he wrote to them, uſed theſe Expreſſions: Experientia tua, Laudabilitas, or Gravitas veſtra. Though the Comites, as we ſaid, were higher in place, yet both were of the Degree of Spectabilis. Their Enſigns and Officers were almoſt in every thing proportionably alike. The Officers of both (as the Princeps, Commentarienſis, Cornicularius, Regerendarius, and the reſt formerly mentioned, as belonging to other Powers) had Vide Pancirolum in Not. Imp. orient. C. 139.

By whom Judged.

had their Places beſtowed on them by the Prince, taking their Patents out of the Office called Scrinium Libellorum. At firſt there lay Appeals from theſe Duces and Comites to the Præfecti Prætorio, and the Quæſtor of the Palace; but Juſtinian, by a Conſtitution, Ordain'd, that thenceforth it ſhould be to the Magiſter Officiorum, and the ſaid Quæſtor. And by the Magiſter Officiorum they themſelves were Judged, except where Cuſtom otherwiſe prevail'd; as in the Limits of the Eaſt, Illyricum, and the Thraces, where they were Convented before the Magiſter Militum; as alſo in the Weſt, where the Duces and Comites Limitanei were ſubject to the Magiſtri Militum Præſentales, concerning whom, and other Magiſtri, it's neceſſary that we now ſpeak.

Magiſtri Militum.

42. Auguſtus, as we formerly related, wrote a Breviary of the Empire with his own hand; in the firſt part whereof he deſcribed the Militia; as what Forces were on Foot, and what Fleets were to be found in every place. Theſe Matters being Recorded in certain Tables called Latercula, were afterward Tranſcrib'd into the Notitia of the Empire; as by theſe Tables appear'd, at firſt were ſent to the Government of the Souldiers certain Lieutenants of the Prince, called Conſulares, either from Conſular Ornaments, or becauſe they were Choſen from amongſt ſuch as had born that Office and Dignity. To theſe Lieutenants Succeeded others by the Names of Magiſtri Militum, though uncertain by whoſe Ordination, but ſuch were called Magiſtri, as to whom the Care of ſome Buſineſs of Conſequence was eſpecially committed, and their Authority was termed Magiſteria Poteſtas. But whereas the Præfecti Prætorio had this included in their Extravagant Power, to Order, Cenſure, and Puniſh Souldiers and their Officers; Conſtantine taking away moſt of their Command, Ordained two Magiſtri Militum, the one of Horſe and the other of Foot, to have full Authority over Military Men, as Zoſimus writes; which in the Weſt was conſtantly obſerv'd. Indeed in the Eaſt, for the more vigorous Reſiſtance of the Inroads of the Barbarous Nations, Theodoſius the Elder Created more of theſe Officers, who were preſently reduced to the number of five; but in the Weſt two ſtill remained, the one of Horſe, the other of Foot; who living in the Court, or Preſence of the Prince, were called Magiſtri Militum in Præſenti, or Præſentales. Theſe Magiſtri had well nigh the ſame Power over Souldiers, as the Præfecti Prætorio over the Provincials. They Heard and Determined both their Civil and Criminal Matters. Such as Commanded Arms in their ſtead could only Sentence Common Souldiers, not Tribunes nor Centurions. The Emperours in their Letters uſually ſaluted them with Inſignis Autoritas tua, or Præclara, or Illuſtris Magnificentia tua, or Magnitudo, Gloria tua, or the like. The Enſigns of a Magiſter Militum Præſentalis in the Eaſt, were, a Book of Mandates ſet on a Table covered with a white Carpet (ſeveral Copies have different colours of Book and Carpet) and on a Golden Plate the Faces of the Princes; underneath the Arms and Names of ſeveral Regiments Commanded by him. The five Magiſtri Militum in the Eaſt mentioned by the Notitia, Commanded both Horſe and Foot, though it was otherwiſe in the Weſt. Of them, two were in Præſenti, or Reſided at Court; another in the Eaſt, ſtrictly ſo called; a fourth in Thrace, and a fifth in Illyricum; all who Commanded LXX Legions XLI Companies (Vexillationes) of Horſe, XLI Auxiliary Bands (Auxilia) and XII Fleets. How many of each ſeverally, the Reader, if he pleaſes, may ſee in the Notitia: for to make particular Enumerations would be too tedious.

Præſentales.

Sic Magiſtratus qui ſunt in urbe, Arcadius Jureconſultus in præſenti eſſe dixit, & præſentes eos vocant Arcadius & Honorius. Hinc Prætorium in quo hi Magiſtri Militum Controverſias, aut Delicta cognoſcebant, Præſentum Juſtinianus vocat; denique Domeſtici, qui ſemper Principem comitabantur quandoque Præſentales nominabantur. Vide Pancirolum in Comment. in Not. utramque C. 31.

Legions, what.

43. But to the Militia it ſelf it's very convenient that we ſay ſomething: and firſt of a Legion, which had the greateſt both Name and Number of all thoſe ſeveral Bands or Parties of which it conſiſted. A Legion was ſo called, as Varro and Nonnius tell us, à legendo Milites, from gathering up the Souldiers Man by Man, as they were Liſted; and contained ſix thouſand Foot, and DCCXXXVI Horſe, as Vegetius obſerves, though indeed we may find ſometimes a greater, and ſometimes a leſſer number. It was divided into ten Cohorts, of which the firſt was called Milliaria, excelling the reſt in Riches, Birth, Skill and Valour, and was accompanied by the Eagle (the Standard of the Romans) and the Faces of the Princes. Of Footmen it contained MCV, beſides CXXXVI Horſemen Arm'd, the reſt had each CLV Foot, and LXVI Horſe, arm'd with Corſlets in the ſame manner. Hereupon they were all called Quingenariæ Cohortes; except the Fourth and Seventh which contained DC Foot: but the Legions thus framed were ſo ordered by Marius; whereas before his time, they conſiſted of MMMM apiece, and thence were Termed Quadratæ. The Conſuls of old were wont with two Legions to wage War, and with ſuch Auxiliaries as were found requiſite to be added to them. He that gave both ſuch Names and Number to the Legions as ſtuck by them, was Julius Cæſar, who with ten Legions in nine years ſubdued Gall, and according to the Order and Time of their raiſing, named them Firſt, Second, Third, &c. which cuſtom continued; but his beſt beloved was the Decimana, or Tenth, which had ſhewn moſt Affection to him. To other Legions Names were added upon Occaſion; as, that which with the Fourth revolted from Pompey to Cæſar was by him called Martia, for the Reputation it had of Courage. To another he gave the Name of (a) Alauda, becauſe the Souldiers thereof wore Helmets creſted, like the head of a Lark, or from the Auſpicium of that Bird, as Cicero will have it. Auguſtus having obtained the Monarchy, kept in Pay twenty three Legions, or as ſome ſay twenty five, as (b) Dion Caſſius tells us; adding withal, that in his time but nineteen remained; the Names of which he ſets down, and obſerves, that the reſt were either diſbanded, or by Auguſtus himſelf or other ſucceeding Emperours mixed with other Legions; whence the name of Gemellæ, given to ſome of them was thought to proceed. If the Reader pleaſe to know the Names of all the reſt, which by other Emperours were raiſed till the time of Dio; he may further have a view of them in that Hiſtorian: but the Number of the Legions, as the Names, were changed according to the Pleaſure of Princes, or Exigency of Affairs.

Legio, quòd leguntur Milites in delectu. Varro de Ling. Lat. lib. 4.

Dio. lib. 38. P. 90. Ἐξαίρετον δὲ δὴ τὸ δέκατον στράτευμα ἐποιήσατο, ὅτι εὔνοιαν πῶς ἀεὶ αὐτοῦ εἶχεν. οὕτω δὲ δὴ τὰ πολιτικὰ στρατόπεδα πρὸς τὴν τῶν καταλόγων τάξιν ὠνομάζετο, &c.

(a) Alauda Gallicè a Lark.

(b) Lib. 55. P. 564. Edit. Hannoviæ, MDCVI.

44. Some of the Legionary Souldiers were ancient men, and bare heavy Armour, as of old the Macedonians, viz. round Targets, and Sariſſæ, or long Lances. Others were young Men called Velites, who neither uſing Breaſt-plates, nor Bows, nor Targets, caſt Miſſile Weapons afar off, or Stones, either with their Hands, or Slings, in Legions called Pilani, and out of Legions, Auxilia; being then procur'd by the Romans from their Friends and neighbouring Nations; and leaſt reckoning being made of them, they were moſt expoſed to Danger, and placed in the Front. There were a third ſort amongſt the Legionary Souldiers, they called Peltati, of greater Age than the Velites, and ſo called from a light and ſmall Shield, which they uſed in Fight, together with a ſhorter ſort of Lance, from which the Romans more Ancient named them Haſtati, and thoſe ſtill more modern Lancearii. Laſtly, there were others, which being moſt remarkable both for Age, Strength, and Experience, had the Honour to be call'd Principes; of which the firſt was called Primus Princeps, the next Secundus Princeps, Tertius, Quartus, &c. accordingly, as there were Primus, Secundus, and Tertius Haſtatus, and Centurio Primipili, and Centurio Primi Haſtati; and amongſt the Triarii, Primipilus, Secundus, Tertius: and from thoſe who were termed Principes, were the Heads, or Chief of the Officials, or Officers belonging to the Preſidents, and other Magiſtrates, which we have already mentioned, ſtyled alſo Principes, for that there was amongſt the ſaid Officers or Attendants, a ſhew or likeneſs of the Militia. In general, it is to be noted that Anciently none could be admitted a Souldier, that was not of the ſtature of five Foot and ſeven Inches, which Valentinian in a Conſtitution (which ſhall be mentioned in its place) affirms to have been the Cuſtom obſerv'd from the Founding of the City. And therefore, when Lampridius writes, that Alexander the Emperour was of the Military ſize, he is to be underſtood according to this Meaſure. For what more might be ſaid of the Legions, as to their Number or Names, the Reader may conſult Pancirolus, who has Exhibited them as he found them Engraven in an old Marble Stone at Rome; to which Catalogue he hath added another Table, whence it appears, both at what time, and by whom each of them was raiſed.

Velites.

Auxilia.

Peltati.

Principes.

Numero DC, Triarii dicti, quia in ultimæ acie & tertio ordine locati.

Numero MC.

45. From them we ſhall paſs to their Officers; and firſt take notice, that of old he that had the Command of a Legion was called a Tribune, and the Principal Officers of the Wings of Horſe, a Præfect. To which Places Auguſtus preferr'd young Senators. But in the time of the Notitia, and afterwards, we ordinarily meet with Præfects of Legions and Fleets, and Tribunes of Cohorts; yet ſo as that Name of Tribune did ſtill alſo continue in the former ſenſe, and by Præfects of Legions are principally to be underſtood the Greater ſort of Tribunes, ſo named to Diſtinguiſh them from ſuch as Commanded but a Cohort of the Legion, or D Foot, and by degrees were Promoted. Theſe Greater Officers heard and determined the civil Controverſies of their Souldiers, and did lightly alſo puniſh them, ſo far as to Beating, (as one of them commanded St. Paul to be uſed) but could not paſs any Capital Sentence, except in the abſence of the Magiſter Militum, or other Superiour Officer, whoſe Vicars they were called for this reaſon, and might Puniſh as well as they, if they were Comites of the firſt Rank. The Care of Arms and Cloaths for the Souldiers, as well as Diſcipline, belonged unto them. Other Tribunes, which Tribune.

Præfect.

Tribunus dictus à Tribu, inquit Vegetius, tribuendoque Jure; præeſt enim Militibus quos ex Tribu primus Romulus legit.

which had not arrived at that Honour, might Determine the Matters of their Men, and Puniſh them moderately; but their Authority extended not to Life. The Tribunes could give leave to their Souldiers to be abſent, but not in time of Expedition or Service, upon Pain of Death. The Higher Sort received their Commiſſions from the Prince. The Inferiour ſort of Tribunes, being Ten in number, becauſe ſo many Cohorts in a Legion, were promoted by Succeſſion, as others died, or were removed to Higher Places. After their Example, the Ten Notaries, who, under the Primicerius, handled the Matters of the greater Laterculum, were called Tribunes; for they had under them Inferiour Clerks or Scrinarii, as theſe Tribunes other Inferiour Officers: whereupon this was termed the Literata Militia, becauſe it imitated the Armata.

Vexillatio.

What Images the Romans uſed in their Standard or Colours.

46. Next after a Legion follows that, which, in thoſe dayes they called Vexillatio, and it received its name from the Banner or Vexillum, the Diminutive of Velum, a ſquare Banner-Roll, uſed by Emperours and other Generals. Theſe Vexilla belonged both to Horſe and Foot, being uſed by the Romans as well as the Enſigns, or Signa: But to fetch theſe things higher, Romulus for his Enſign or Colour, uſed only Bundles of Hay tied to the tops of Spears; ſo humble in all reſpects were the Beginnings of the Roman Greatneſs. Afterward they had the Eagle, Wolf, Minotaur, and Boar, which were borne before, and in the Army, till ſuch time as Marius in his ſecond Conſulſhip appointed the Eagle for the whole Legion, and then the Images of other Creatures became the Signa of Cohorts, to which were added a Dragon, and an Hand, and at length a Ball or Globe, by Auguſtus, to ſignifie that the World was ſubject to the Roman Empire. The Eagle at firſt was of Silver, and being ſet in a kind of Box or Caſe, was fixed to a long Spear or Pole, but afterward, when Rome had got the Wealth, as well as the Sovereignty of the World, it turned to Gold, and, as the Armour-bearer of Jupiter, held a Thunder-bolt in it's Feet; ſo that it may ſeem ſomething Strange, that the Romans appointing this Bird to ſo maſculine an Employment, ſhould in their Language ſubject both Sexes of it to the Fœminine Gender. But to our Buſineſs, Vexillatio is here taken for a Troop, Turma, or Cuneus of Horſe-men fighting under one Vexillum, whereon was expreſſed what Troop it was, of what Cohort or Century, together with the Prince his Name, and probably his Image: but Conſtantine cauſed therein to be inſerted a Repreſentation of the Croſs, which at the time of his Converſion, he ſaw in the Air, and now came up the word Labarum. A Vexillatio in a Legion contained thirty two Horſe, commanded by a Decurio, out of a Legion, ſometimes three hundred, leſs or more. An Ala of Horſe contained alſo about three hundred men, and ſeems divided into thoſe Parties called Turmæ, as Vexillatio into the other they named Cunei. Now of Horſe-men ſome were Cataphracti, who being armed themſelves throughout, uſed alſo armed Horſes; others were of light Armour, as Haſtati or Contati, who fought Cominus, with Pikes, or Lances; and ſuch as beſides Launces made uſe of Targets, and were called Scutati; and others went under the Name of Ferentarii, who fought Eminus; and theſe were, either the Scythæ or Sagittarii, who fought with Bows and Arrows, as our Archers or Tarentini, that uſed Darts. And ſuch of them as having diſcharged all their Miſſilia, came afterwards to Hand-ſtroakes, were called Jaculatores. The whole Ala was commanded by a Tribune, who as appears from Capitolinus, had ſometime alſo the Name of Sevir; and ſo much of the Vexillatio.

Vide Panciro*lum in Notit. utramque* C. 32. & Jacobi Gothofredi Com. in L. 22. de Erogatione Militaris Annonæ. Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 4.

De Labaro Vide Comm. Gothofredi in L. un. de Præpo*ſiti s Laborum. Cod. Th. lib.* 6. Tit. 25.

In M. Antonino.

Ala of Horſe.

Cataphracti.

Haſtati.

Ferentarii.

Jaculatores.

Auxilia.

47. To add a little concerning the Auxilia; there was this difference betwixt them and the Legions at firſt, that Legions conſiſted of Roman Citizens only, Auxilia of Friends or Allies, and were joyned as leves Armaturæ to the Legions. But after that the Sovereign Power was transferred upon the Prince, Legions were alſo raiſed out of Allies and Confederates. A Legion had its ſeveral Officers, Superior and Subordinate, together with its ſeveral Companies and Enſigns. An Auxilium was Commanded by one Tribune, or Phylarcha, alone; and conſiſted of M, or more, ordinary Gregarious Souldiers, and was (as it ſeemeth) from his Conſtitutions by Juſtinian called Optio, though Optiones were alſo particular Perſons. But thus much of theſe ſeveral ſorts of Souldiers; of whom the Reader muſt farther obſerve, that at what time Conſtantine Conſtituted three Ranks of Comites, there were alſo Ordained three Orders or Ranks of Souldiers, with new Names or Titles. For all ſtanding Companies, as well of Horſe as Foot, were diſtinguiſhed into Palatini, Comitatenſes, and Pſeudo-Comitatenſes. The Palatini were ſuch as had obtained the Honour to be of the Guard to the Prince his Palace, and in this reſpect were in greater Eſteem than the reſt. The Comitatenſes were ſo named from the Comitatus, or Company of the Prince, and having ſucceeded the Prætorians, were

After the time of Conſtantine, all were diſtinguiſhed into Palatini, Comitatenſes, and Pſeudo-Comitatenſes.

De his vide Panc*irolum in Notitiam utramque Imp. ſed præcipuè* Pa*ratit. Tit. de re Militari, Gothofredi Cod. Theod.*

were in his Court, and waited on him whitherſoever he went. The Pſeudo-Comitatenſes were the reſt, imitating them, as it were, in their Officers, Companies and Symbols, but not graced with the ſame Privileges and Immunities: for both their Allowance was leſs, and in Caſe a Comitatenſis died inteſtate, and without any apparent Heir, his Company, or Troop was Heir at Law, but the Prince or Treaſury ſucceeded to the Pſeudo-Comitatenſis. To prevent Fraud herein, none could paſs from one Order to another without the Prince his ſpecial Warrant. In the Notitia are reckoned up under the Magiſtri Militum Præſentales, only Palatina Auxilia, Vexillations of Horſe, both Palatine and Comitatenſes; but Legions, both Palatine, Comitatenſes and Pſeudo-Comitatenſes. And thus much concerning the Office and Commands of the Magiſtri Militum, who were by Dignity Illuſtres, as reckoned amongſt thoſe of Higheſt Rank, and eſteemed equal with the Præfecti Prætorio, and the Præfects of both Cities.

Vide omninò Comment. Jacobi Gothofredi in L. ult de re Militari.

Officers that ſerved the Emperour in his Court.

48. And ſo we have diſpatched what the Deſign of this preſent Work requires, concerning ſuch Officers as conſtituted the Polity, and carried on the Government abroad, and in the Provinces. We muſt of neceſſity ſee who they were further, that ſerved the Prince at home, or in his own Court. Of theſe ſome took Care of the Buſineſs, ſome of the Perſon, and the Bed-Chamber of the Præfectus and Primicerius Sacri Cubiculi; under whom waited the Comes Sacræ Veſtis, and ſeveral inferiour Officers and Attendants, who had the Name of Decani. Some ſerved him at Table, and attended on him in the Palace of Courſe; as the Comes Caſtrenſis, under whoſe Inſpection waited the Primicerius Menſarum, the Primicerius Cellariorum, the Primicerius Pædagogiorum, and the Primicerius Lampadiorum of the firſt, ſecond and third Rank. Some wrote the Secrets of the Prince, viz. three Perſons called Cartularii Cubiculi, and by ſome the Palace was kept and attended, viz. three Decuriones Silentiariorum, and the Comes Domorum per Cappadociam. Of all thoſe the Præpoſitus Sacri Cubiculi was the higheſt in Place and Degree, for his great Charge of the Emperour's Perſon, and his Nearneſs to him, which Relation rais'd him to the higheſt Dignity of Illuſtris. This he enjoyed before the time of Theodoſius the younger; yet ſo as to take place after the P. P. the Præfects of the Cities, the Magiſtri Militum, and the Comites Conſiſtoriani, or the Comes Sacrorum Largitionum, Comes rei Privatæ, the Quæſtor and Magiſter Officiorum, of whom hereafter. But by a Conſtitution of that Prince, he was made equal in Degree with the Præfects of both ſorts, and the Magiſtri Militum; ſo as he and they ſhould take Place according to the time and order of their Promotion. And here it will not be amiſs to hint to the Reader, that from the Laws are to be obſerved three Degrees of Illuſtrious Perſons; the firſt was of the Conſuls and Patricians, who took not their Place according to their Promotion, but preceded others, however of the Degree of Illuſtris before them. The ſecond was of ſuch, as amongſt whom the time, and order of Promotion was obſerv'd, and they took place accordingly, being otherwiſe equal, and theſe were the (a) Præfects of both ſorts; the Magiſtri Militum, and the Præpoſitus Sacri Cubiculi now under Conſideration. The third Rank comprized the Quæſtor, Magiſter Officiorum, the Comes S. Largitionum, and Comes Rerum Privatarum, which four, though they were of the Degree of Illuſtris as well as the reſt, yet held, as it were an inferiour Rank by themſelves; ſo as by the time of Promotion they were not privileged to take place of the other, but had only Precedence amongſt themſelves; of whom we ſhall write after we have added ſomething concerning the Attendance of the Prince his Bed-Chamber, leaving the reſt of the Court to be ſpoken of according to their Dignity.

Notitia Imperii.

Præpoſitus Sacri Cubiculi.

Three Degrees of Illuſtrious Perſons.

Cod. Th. lib. 6 Tit. 8. de Præpoſitis ſacri Cubiculi & Cod. Juſtin. lib. 12. Tit. 5. Hiſtoria hæc noſtra.

(a) Vide Comment. Gothofredi in D. L. 6.

The Cubicularii.

Decani.

49. Thoſe that there waited were called Cubicularii and Miniſteriani from their Services, and this was the general Name; but amongſt them ſome were known by that of (b) Decani, perhaps becauſe they were ten in number, as Pancirolus gueſſeth, or elſe they had under them that number of inferiour Waiters, for the word Decanus we know ſignifies one who preſides, or commands ten Perſons, and thence hath been transferred in a more general Signification, to ſuch as precede other Clerks in Churches, and at this day ſignifies a Preſident, as in the Faculty of Medicine at Paris, where the Preſident of the College they call Decanus (in French le Doyen,) and they have an Officer, who looks to the Phyſick Schools, the Senior Batchellor of Phyſick, whom they term Archidiaconus (or Achidiacre;) ſuch Correſpondence in Names, as well as other things, hath there been betwixt the Militia Armata, Palatina, and Togata. But theſe Decani dreſſed the Emperour, made his Bed, kept the Doors, and did other Services there, as Pancirolus gueſſeth; or rather were a ſort of Serjeants at Arms, the chief of them, and who commanded next the Præpoſitus, poſitus. Being him they called Primicerius. The next in order to him was the Secundocerius, then the Tertiocerius and Quartocerius: as to which Terms Suidas writes, that Primicerius is the firſt of an Order or Rank, and that the Addition of Cerius is only a lengthening of the word, and further ſignifies nothing. The Primicerius Sacri Cubiculi, was by his place of the Dignity of Spectabilis, which very Title the Notitia gives him. Of the Comes Caſtrenſis, and other Officers out of the Chamber, we ſhall ſpeak anon. Thoſe of the Chamber enjoyed many Priviledges. They were exempted from finding Men and Horſes for War, and from Quartering Souldiers. They were convented, upon occaſion before the Magiſter Officiorum (the Supreme Judge of all Courtiers) and needed not put in Bail or give Security, but were committed to the Primicerius, who was charged with them, and had reaſon to be good in his Office, for it laſted but two years, at the end whereof, he was ſucceeded by the Secundocerius, or him that was next to him. From all ſordid Services they were free, and from Contributions to the Repairing of Bridges, High-wayes, or the like. As all thoſe Officers belonging to the Bed-Chamber enjoyed theſe Priviledges, ſo much more the Præpoſitus Sacri Cubiculi, who, beſides his Command over theſe and other Perſons, had the overſight of many Houſes and Lands in Capadocia, (where a great part of the Prince his Patrimony lay) and ſent his Officers called Canonicarii to collect the Rents, which being brought to Court were expended in the Maintenance of the Houſhold.

(b) Decanos vocant, eo quòd ſint Denis præpoſiti. Aug. Decani ſunt qui 10 Viris præſunt. Vegetius. At verò Gothofred. δεκανᾶσθαι pro δεξιοῦσθαι excipere, apprehendere derivat. Homin. enim munus peculiare fuiſſe vult quod in Rep. fuit Lictorum; ſed de his vide L. un. de Decanis Cod. Th. lib. 6. Tit. 33 & Gothofr. in L. qui quatuor genera Decanorum memorat;

Their Priviledges.

Inde Tamiaca Prædia dicta, ſed vide infra hujus. Cap. §. 4. Par. 51.

The Magiſter Officiorum.

50. He that held the next place in Court after the Præpoſitus Sacri Cubiculi, was the Magiſter Officiorum. Under Conſtantine the Great he was both called Tribunus and Magiſter Officiorum; ſometimes in the Laws Comes Officiorum; for he was in Comitatu Principis, and ſtood by him in the Conſiſtory with other Perſons of the Greateſt Quality. He had his Name from his Command over the Officers or Servants of the Prince; for Officia here is to be taken for the ſame as Miniſteria. Zoſimus and Procopius call him the Captain or Governour of the Palatine Ranks or Orders. And he had not only Authority over the Courtiers and Attendants of the Prince, and ſuch Companies about the Palace as were in Arms, but had the overſight alſo of Fabricks or Forges, and power over the Limitaneous Duces and Comites, from whom appeal lay to the Quæſtor and Him. His Duty it was to preſent fit Senators to the Prince in the Provinces (as appears from Caſſiodorus, who in the Forme of his Patent ſets forth the Nature of his Employment) none could be made Judges without his Approbation; and in the City he had an hand in the making of ſuch Officers as took care of Proviſions. By his means Audience was procured from the Emperor, both to his own Subjects and Strangers, whom it was his duty to entertain. He alſo had the Power of the Curſus Publicus or Poſtage, which was permitted to no Subjects, but the Præfectus Prætorio, and himſelf. They could grant in the Prince his Name, Liberty of this Curſus to others; and if any offended in this kind, it was incumbent upon him to preſent their names to the Prince. But to come more Particularly to Perſons, or things over which this Magiſter had Power or Juriſdiction: He of the Eaſt overſaw Eight Colleges, Bodies, or Companies of Armed Men about the Court, which in thoſe days they termed Scholæ. Of theſe, Two were called Scutarii; the Third Gentiles Seniores; the Fourth Scrutarii Sagittarii; the Fifth Scutarii Clibanarii; the Sixth Armatura Juniorum; the Seventh Gentiles Juniores; and the Eighth Agentes in Rebus, and the Deputies of this Schole. Beſides theſe, were under his Command the Menſores and Lampadii; Four Scrinia or Offices, viz. Memoriæ, Epiſtolarum, Libellorum & Diſpoſitionum; the Office of Admiſſions; Fifteen Fabricks or Forges; whereof of the Eaſt five, Pontica three, Aſia one, Thrace two, and Illyricum four; And laſtly, two Comites of the Limits, and thirteen Duces. The Command of him of the Weſt (when the Empire came to be divided, was, if the State thereof admitted it, the ſame; though as to Numbers it might differ: For here were Nineteen Fabricks, whereas in the Eaſt were but Fifteen.

Nomen officia etſi multa ſignificat hic pro miniſterio accipitur, ut apud Martianum, vide Pancirolum in Not. Orient. C. 63.

His Employment.

Variarum. Lib. 6. C. 6.

Perſons under his Juriſdiction, as ſeveral Scholes.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 337.

Scholæ what.

51. Of the Scholæ or Companies about the Court, it's requiſite we ſay ſomething; for a diſtinct Knowledge of thoſe ſeveral ſorts which bore Arms under the Emperor. This word Schola (more frequently it's Scholæ in the Plural Number, as Feſtus only hath it) was much uſed in thoſe Times to ſignifie a Body, Company or Society. And Gregory of Tours, the Biſhop and Hiſtorian, by it ſignifies an whole Houſhold; but here it is taken for a whole Rank, Order or Company of the Emperor's Guards, who (moſt of them) bore Arms for his Defence: but were neither Legions, Cohorts, Vexillations, nor Auxilia. There were of theſe Scholares, ſometimes divided into nine Scholes, about MMMD Choiſe Men, Armenians at firſt, to which afterward MM more were added by Juſtinian, and called Supernumeraries, who (beſides the Agentes in Rebus here reckoned, who were not Fighting Men, no more than another Company called Silentiarii) were for Protection of the Prince his Perſon. Great Care was had, who were admitted into theſe Scholes, till Zeno the Emperor firſt broke the Cuſtom, by giving way to Idle and Effeminate Perſons. Afterward Juſtinian (if we give credit to that ſecret Hiſtory, which goes under the name of Procopius) ſold theſe Places, and having filled up the number, added the two thouſand Supernumeraries, to whom he gave no Pay. To be ſure none could be admitted without the Emperor's Approbation; and therefore their Names were Inrolled in the Offices belonging to the Greater Laterculum; and the Liſt called over, and renewed every four Months, at what time ſuch as came in, received their Patents from thoſe Notaries, written by them, and ſubſcribed by the Prince. They were not permitted to hire any Grounds, leſt they ſhould be diverted from their Attendance. Each Schola had its Comes for its Chiefeſt Officer, of the Dignity of Spectabilis, and under him others Inferior, as the Primicerius, who had alſo the Title of a Tribune, and was Spectabilis too; The Secundocerius and other Nine, who ſucceeded by times, and with him were of the Degree of Clariſſimi. As for the Names of the Eight particular Scholes, the Scutarii ſeem ſo named from their Targets, which they eſpecially uſed in Defence of the Emperor's Perſon; and to have been firſt Raiſed by Conſtantine, who aſſigned Bread, both to them and the Clibanarii. The Gentiles were raiſed out of Barbarous Nations, not yet converted to Chriſtianity. The Scutarii Sagittarii were Armed Cap à pie, and uſed Bows and Arrows. The Scutarii Clibanarii were Cataphracti, both they and their Horſes being Armed, and ſeem alſo firſt Inſtituted by Conſtantine. The Armaturæ were ſuch as uſed ſolid Armour. For Ælian diſtinguiſheth Footmen into the three ſeveral ſorts of Armaturæ, Velites and Peltati. Here is well added Juniorum; for the Armatura Seniorum ſerved in the Weſt, in the Notitia whereof only ſix Scholæ are mentioned.

Itaque accepto Epiſcopatu omnem Scholam Deceſſoris ſui abjiciens, Syros de genere ſuo Eccleſiaſticæ Domui Miniſtros ſtatuit. Hiſt. Lib. 10. C. 26.

Eight ſeveral Scholæ.

Scutarii, Equites. Scutati Pedites.

That of the Agentes in Rebus.

Their Name and Duty.

But the Eighth and laſt Schola, was that of the Agentes in Rebus, of which more is to be ſaid, as of that which is more remarkable, and of a different Nature from the reſt. Theſe Agentes were, till the time of Conſtantine called Frumentarii, and were the Meſſengers of the Prince ſent, as occaſion ſerved, upon ſeveral Errands into the Provinces. Probable it is, that they took their former Name from the Reſemblance that their Employment bore to that of the Frumentarii of the Legions: for as they went up and down to gather Corn or Forage for the Army; ſo they beſtirred themſelves thoughout the Provinces, to give an account to the Emperor how matters ſtood therein, and to ſignifie his Pleaſure and Commmands to ſuch, as to whom they were directed. Afterwards from Executing the Prince his Orders they got that of Agentes in Rebus: For upon many Errands were they ſent: as to haſten the Payment of the Publick Revenue, to cauſe Armies to March, to fetch any Publick Records, to carry Letters from the Emperor to the Magiſtrates, and Anſwers from the Magiſtrates to him. So great were their Labours and Watches in this, and other kinds, that they alone ſeemed to undergo the Toil of the Publick Service; and as ſuch, and ſo neceſſary and ſerviceable they are owned in ſeveral Laws. Amongſt them there were five Degrees; the Scope and Reward whereof was, that of thoſe they called Principes or Primates of the Officers of the Præfecti Prætorio, of the Governour of a Province, or the Greater ſort of Magiſtrates; to which they arrived, as the reward of their Labours, after great Fatigue and Trouble, and often not without great peril of their Lives: But having obtained this Honour, their Dignity and Privileges were great and many. For they were Senators, and having formerly had precedence allow'd them before Rationales, and with Conſulares; they were joyned with Vicars, and at length made equal to Proconſuls. Yet, being reckoned amongſt Senators, they were free from the Duties of ſuch, as the Glebalis Functio, and at their Promotion might put their Sons or Brothers into their places of Agentes. The firſt Degree, and from which they aroſe, was that of the Ducenarii; the ſecond were the Centenarii; the third the Biarchæ; the fourth the Circitores; and the fifth the Equites, which was the firſt ſtep to preferment; all the ordinary ſort being known by the general term of Tyrones; as the other diſtinctions were taken from the ſeveral diſtinct Titles and Offices of the Milliaria, or firſt Cohort of a Legion. They all enjoyed various Privileges. As it was a part of their care to ſee that none made uſe of the Curſus Publicus without leave obtained; ſo becauſe of their continual Travel, the convenience thereof was allowed them, by the Prince or Magiſter Officiorum: They were free from Burthens and Employments in Cities, if they had ſerved a certain number of years. They were not forced to be Navicularii, except their Birth compelled them, or that they had Lands that were burthened with that ſervice. And the Privileges of Souldiers they alſo enjoyed, as they uſed the Military Habit; if found Criminal, they were judged according to their deſert, by the Magiſter Officiorum.

De Agentibus in Rebus Vide Tit. 27, & 28. Lib. 6. Cod. Th. & Tit. 20, & 21. Lib. 12. Cod. Juſtin. & omnino Paratit. Gothofredi d. Tit. 27. Cod. Th. De his etiam ſextus Aurelius Victor in Diocleſiano, & Ammianus paſſim; ſed Hiſtoria hæc noſtra plenè. In Rebus, id eſt, in negotiis Publicis exequendis.

Their Privileges.

The Schole of the Silentiarii.

53. There was beſides theſe another Schole, which though ſet by the Notitia under the Direction of the Præpoſitus Cubiculi; yet was alſo judged by this Magiſter; and therefore having purpoſely omitted it, we ſhall here take notice of it with ſome remarques. And this is that of the Silentiarii. They were ſo called, not becauſe they were Secretaries to the Prince, as ſome imagined, but from Silence, which it was their Task to procure in the Court: and for this end they waited before the Emperor's Chamber, when he was in Conſiſtory, or ſate in Council; and that before the ſecond Velum, or Hanging. for there were two of theſe Hangings or Curtains, at the firſt whereof Petitioners, or ſuch as had any Buſineſs at the Conſiſtory, gave their Attendance; and the ſecond was before the Prince his Chamber, and near the Conſiſtory which from this Silence got to be called Silentium, or Silentiarium, and not only it, but the Debate it ſelf which therein was held. Watching before the Emperor's Chamber, it's ſuppoſed, they bore Arms, and ſo were a ſort of the Armed Palatine Militia; in which reſpect they enjoyed the Priviledge of the Caſtrenſe Peculium; and being ſo near to his Perſon, they were by him ſent and Employed upon ſundry Affairs. Particularly its found, that when Perſons of Note, upon Notable occaſions have been ſent for up to Court, they were the Meſſengers: though ſometimes it might exceed, yet the ſet and appointed Number of them was Thirty, which being divided into three Parties, each of theſe Parties had its Decurio or Officer; who as he preſided over them, ſo it was his Charge to look to the Marſhalling of the Train of the Emperor or Empreſs, when they went abroad. Theſe Decuriones had Great Privileges conferred on them by ſeveral Princes. By Theodoſius the Elder they had place given them with Exduces, becauſe indeed they were a kind of ſuch, and reckoned among the Senatores Adlecti, or ſuch as had the Honour and Dignity of Senators, but were free from the Burthens and Impoſitions laid upon that Order; which Privilege Theodoſius his Grandſon afterward extended to the Silentiarii, after they had ſerved diligently their full time, or thirteen years. Theſe Burthens were the Glebalis Collatio formerly ſpoken to, and that of the Prætorſhip; and beſides, they were alſo excuſed from the Metatus, as it was called, or Quartering of Souldiers, or others upon publick Employment, though Illuſtrious Perſons, who in this reſpect had more indulged to them, than was permitted to their Inferiours. But the Emperor appropriates theſe Privileges to the Thirty Silentiarii, and their three Decuriones, denying them to Supernumeraries, in caſe there ſhould be any. Long after Juſtinian (or rather Tribonian) increaſed the Dignity of the Decuriones, when their Term was expired, by conferring on them the Dignity of a Magiſter Officiorum, or Comes Domeſticorum, ſo that whereas formerly they were of the Degree of Clariſſimi, and then Spectabiles, by this means they became Illuſtres.

De Silentiariis vide Tit. 23. Lib. 6. Cod. Theodoſ. de Decurionibus & Silentiariis, & quæ notantur ad varias LL. & Pancirolum in Notit. orient. cap. 61. Eorum multi ſcriptores paſſim meminere, inter quos Pro*copius. Agathias* τῆς ἀμφὶ τὸν βασιλέα σιγῆς ἐπιϛάται.

Their Privileges.

Adlecti ſunt immunes, & παραλλήλως ponuntur Adlecti & immunes ut ex LL. edocet Gothofri*dus.*

54. Now to come to ſuch other Officers as were more directly under the Command of the Magiſter Officiorum, & leave the reſt to their more proper places. The Notitia preſents us vvith the Menſores and Lampadarii; the Menſores, often alſo called Metatores, were ſuch as provided Quarters or Lodging for the Emperor, or his Army upon any Journey or Expedition, in Towns or Cities; and in the Field choſe out and prepared the Ground for incamping. As to quartering or lodging in Towns, it was the manner of theſe Menſores, as of Harbingers at this day, to fix upon the Doors the names of ſuch perſons as were there to be received. The Landlords or Owners of the Houſes were obliged only to afford them the third part of their Lodgings, except the perſons entertain'd were Illuſtrious, and then they were to allow them one half. And if it hapned that ſuch as were to find Quarter were of the Dignity of Illuſtrious, and had ſeveral Houſes, they were allowed to keep their own dwelling Houſes to themſelves, but leave the other to be diſpoſed of for Quarters. Neither were any excuſed, except ſome few privileged perſons, from this Duty, but as well the private Houſes and Grounds of ordinary men in the Country, as the Lodgings of Citizens were obnoxious to it. Now when the Emperour was to travel, his Geſts were publiſhed two Months before, and therein every days Journey appointed and limitted, with the hour of his ſetting forth, the Manſions where he would bait or lie, and where the Proviſions of the Army were to be received; theſe were the Menſores of moſt account in Law-Books. Others there are mentioned under this Name, who ſerved at Court, and are thought to have provided Dyet for the Courtiers, and, as Aveners, Hay and Provender for their Horſes. Theſe alſo were to be approved of by the Prince in the Scrinium Libellorum; and their Primicerius, or Chief of them, after two years ſervice, was permitted to enter himſelf as a Tyro, or the loweſt of all in the Schole of the Agentes in Rebus. And beſides theſe the Magiſtri Militum had their own Menſores or Quarter-Maſters, who provided Quarters for the Souldiers under their Command; but they are not of this ſort under preſent conſideration.

Menſores their work.

De modo Metatorum, Vide Paratitlon, Tit. 1. Lib. 7. Cod. Th. & L. L. ibi citatas.

Hiſtoriam hanc noſtram.

Vide Pancirolum ad Notit. Imp. Orient. c. 65.

Lampadarii.

55. The Lampadarii, mentioned in the Notitia with the Menſores, were thoſe that took care of providing Lamps or Lights, not only for the Court or Palace, but for the ſeveral Offices hereafter to be ſpoken of: the Clerks of which often ſitting up very late, had occaſion to uſe many of them. The Principal, or Primicerius of them held his place three years, and then others ſucceeded him in order. Beſides theſe Officers under the inſpection of the Magiſter Officiorum, and the four Scrinia (of which it's more proper to ſpeak hereafter, becauſe, though they were under his inſpection, yet they had Maſters alſo of their own, of three of whom the Notitia treats, amongſt thoſe of the Palace, that were of the degree of Spectabilis) the Office of Admiſſions was, as appears both from the Notitia and Caſſiodorus, under his Command. Thoſe that belonged to this Office were called Admiſſionales, and had alſo a Maſter of their own by the name of Admiſſionum Magiſter; becauſe it was their duty to admit and introduce ſuch as came before the Emperour, and thoſe that had the Honour to do their obeiſance, ſalute, or as the Latine word is, Adore him. But this Adoration was little more than what we uſe to our Princes at this day, viz. a kneeling to them, and bowing the Head; which being in uſe with the Subjects of Perſia, and others, at length was required by the Roman Emperours. But long it was e're it became ſolemn and conſtant at Rome: for though Caligula, Domitian, and Heliogabalus would be ſo worſhipped, yet other Princes either neglected it, or forbade it (as Alexander Severus, who would have no ſuch Honour paid to him) till Diocleſian, who admitted it again, and thenceforth it became a conſtant Ceremony, and was received by the Chriſtian Emperors; whereas his Predeceſſors, as Ammianus tells us, were wont to be ſaluted no otherwiſe than the Judges. But as modern Princes (more condeſcending) are wont to give their Hands, the border of the Emperors Robe or Purple was uſually held and offered (in Procopius his time by two perſons) up to be touched and kiſſed, whence theſe manners of Speech often occur in the Books of Law, and others; not only Adorare Imperium, Adorare Principem, and the like; but Adorare Purpuram, Purpuram attingere, and Muricem adorare. Of this Ceremony, as is evident from the Notitia and the Code of Theodoſius, there were ſeveral Methods, according to the Quality of the perſons that were received and introduced by theſe Admiſſionales, who, as we ſaid, were under the Juriſdiction of the Magiſter Officiorum, together vvith another ſort called Invitatores, vvhoſe Duty it vvas to invite ſuch as ſhould eat vvith the Emperour, or fetch others to him upon other occaſions. Of theſe the Notitia maketh no mention; but being joyned together vvith the Admiſſionales in a Conſtitution of the Emperour Leo, vve think it (vvith Pancirolus) convenient enough here to ſay, that there vvere ſuch men.

Admiſſionales.

How the Emperour was ſaluted.

Lib. 15.

Lib. 6. Tit. 8. L. unic. de Præpoſitis ſacri Cubiculi: ubi vide quæ Gothofredus Comment.

56. But the next and eſpecial charge of the Magiſter Officium vvere the ſeveral Forges, or places for making of Armour.

Fabricæ in quibus Arma fabricabantur.

De his Conſule Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 22. de Fabricenſibus. Novellam Theod. 43. de Bonis Fabricenſium, & Cod. Iuſtin. l. 11. tit. 10. Adde Comment. Gothofr. in L.L. item Paratitlon Cod. Theod. l. 7. tit. 1. & Pancirolum in Not. Imp. orient. C.C. 66, 67, &c.

(a) Clibanaria voce Perſicâ dicta.

Fabricæ, or Forges, and of theſe the Notitia makes ample mention, reckoning up thoſe that belonged to the ſeveral Countries. Theſe Fabricæ were places wherein Arms were made and provided for the Army, uſually in the Provinces not far diſtant from the Borders; for there was of them the greateſt need. In every of them all ſorts of Arms or Weapons were not made, or that but rarely; but each Fabrick was appropriate to ſome particular kind, as that called Scutaria, to the making of Armour for Defence and Protection of the Body, as Targets, Back and Breaſt, Helmets, and the like; and (a) Clibanaria to thoſe that were proper to the Cataphracti, of whom we lately ſpake. When the Arms were perfected, they were then remitted to the publick Magazine, and there reſerved for uſe, it being unlawful for any to buy or ſell them, or make any elſewhere: ſuch as wrought them had the name of Fabricenſes, being men choſen out of ſuch as were not obnoxious to any Duties, or Employments in Corporations, which being made out before the Preſident of the Province, or the Magiſtrate of the Town, they were admitted into the Company, and to publick Salary; For each Fabrick had its Company or Body apart, wherein, after the manner of the Offices at Court, there were four or five more Eminent, who received greater Wages than the reſt; and of theſe the firſt had the Title of Primicerius; who at the end of two years was diſcharged of his Office (the next ſucceeding him) and the Employment alſo; and was admitted amongſt thoſe they called Protectores, to ſalute or adore the Emperour after the manner we e're while deſcribed; but all of them were ſubject to a Tribune; he who preſided over every Forge, being called by this Name, as appears from Ammianus Marcellinus. The Materials for making theſe Arms the Provincials brought in, both the Ore of Iron and Braſs, and alſo Coals; and in ſome parts of the Eaſt, Money, inſtead of the Materials themſelves, till notice was taken by Theodoſius the Great, and how by this means there was much abuſe committed (the Workmen receiving the money, and for their own gain, buying what was cheapeſt) he commanded expreſly, that the payment of theſe Materials ſhould thenceforth ever be made in Kind. And as hereby he obviated the covetous practices of theſe Fabricenſes, Arcadius his Son by another Law prevented their Idleneſs, and deſerting the Publick Works; commanding that they ſhould have Stigmata, or marks ſet upon their Arms, as Tyrones, or new Souldiers were wont to have, that thereby, if they concealed themſelves, they might be diſcovered: for the Employment they could not leave, till ſuch time as they had paſſed through all Degrees, and had diſcharged the Office of Primicerius, neither could their Children be excuſed from it. If any of them fled or made away what he had, the reſt of the Body were anſwerable for him: and upon this account, if any of them died without Heirs, his Eſtate fell to the Company. To encourage them, beſides the Honour they obtained after their diſcharge, they enjoyed other Privileges, being free from the burthen of Quarter, lately mentioned, and having the Magiſter Officiorum alone for their Judge. We ſhall add further concerning theſe Fabricenſes, that amongſt them there were a ſort of men called Barbaricarii, the buſineſs of whom it was to cover or adorn Helmets, their Beavers or Creſts with Braſs, Gold or Silver, reſembling men, and various ſorts of other Animals, after the faſhion of Barbarians. Theſe, in reſpect of the Weapons they dealt with, are ſometimes by the Notitia, and the Laws, placed under the Juriſdiction of the Magiſter Officiorum, and by reaſon of the Metals with which they covered or adorned them, under that of the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum. And beſides in every Forge there was another kind of perſons, whom they called Deputati, thought to be Slaves condemned to Drudgery, or hired Servants, who brought in Wood and Coales, if they were not the Clerks of the Works rather, as ſome of the Emperours ſeem to make them.

De Stigmatis Pœnæ hic non eſt locus, ſed de Stigmatis Notæ, ſeu Notitiæ. Vide infra Hiſtoriam hanc noſtram.

The Privileges of thoſe that ſerved in them

Barbaricarii dicti ſunt ex Barbarico opere, & ornamento. Vide de his l. 1. D. Tit. de Fabricenſibus, cum Comment.

De Deputatis Conſule Pancirolum uti ſupra. C. 70.

The Office of the Magiſter Officiorum furniſhed out of the Agentes in Rebus.

Adjutor.

Notitia Imp. Vide Leges citatas in Notit. Dignitatum Cod. Theod. ad hujus Magiſtri officium ſpectant. Pancirolum in Notitiam Imp. orient. C. 71.

57. Such being the Employment of the Magiſter Officiorum, ſo various, and at ſuch a diſtance thoſe Things and Perſons that were under his charge, it was neceſſary he ſhould be furniſhed with plenty of Under-Officers, Meſſengers eſpecially; and for this cauſe it was fit, that the Agentes in Rebus ſhould be under his Command, and out of their Company it was, that his Office was furniſhed. The firſt of theſe was he that gave both the Name and Office of Adjutor; for his Adjutant he was, or rather his Deputy in diſpatching all his buſineſs. This perſon was preſented by the Magiſter to the Prince, and by word of his mouth received Authority to act. Such Pleas or Trials as were to be held before the Magiſter he managed, as the Recorder now before the Mayor of a Corporation, and was of that Eſteem as to have the Title given him of Clariſſimus, and ſometimes of Spectabilis; and having diſcharged his Office was of equal Dignity with ſuch as had been Subadjuvæ.

Curioſus.

Vicars, or the Principes of the Agentes in Rebus. The Adjutor alſo, for his Aſſiſtance in ſo weighty an employment, had two Subadjuvæ. Beſides, from amongſt the ſaid Agentes in Rebus, this Magiſter of the Eaſt had three Auditors, who received the Accounts of the Fabricks, as many, who received them of the Barbaricarii lately mentioned; and five others, who looked to the Works in the ſo many Provinces within his Juriſdiction of the Eaſt, Aſia, Pontus, Thrace and Illyricum, and took exact notice of, and recorded what number of Arms, and of what ſort were every day made; how many removed to the Magazine; of the Wages due to Workmen, and other Expences. In the time when the Notitia was written there were ſo many; but the Emperour Leo much encreaſed the Number of the Subadjuvæ for the Fabricks. But further, for Intelligence, and Communication betwixt him and thoſe in the Provinces, and that the Curſus Publicus, or Poſtage might not be abuſed, out of the ſame Company one attended him by the Name of Curioſus, who making his abode at Conſtantinople, and being ever in waiting, was called Præſentalis; and beſides him in each Province was one of theſe Curioſi, under the care and over-ſight of the Magiſtri Officiorum, both in Eaſt and Weſt, when the Empire came to be divided. Their employment much reſembled that of the Agentes in Rebus, from the Schola, or Company of whom, by a Law of Conſtantine's, they might only be created. They gave Intelligence of whatſoever was done in the Provinces, and from their Care hereof, and of the Curſus, were alſo termed Curagendarii, and by ſome the Eyes of the Prince, but put no man to Death, nor carried any to Priſon, nor collected any Tributes, as the Frumentarii or Agentes ſeem to have done. Their principal care was of the Curſus Publicus, or Poſtage, which they managed ſo, as they were to ſuffer none, without leave, to uſe it. Concerning them there is an whole Title in the Code of Theodoſius, out of which more hereafter upon occaſion.

Lib.6.Tit.29.

Interpretes diverſarum Gentium.

The Curſus Publicus under the Magiſter Officiorum.

By whom firſt inſtituted.

58. The laſt Officers or Attendants of the Magiſter Officiorum mentioned by the Notitia are the Interpreters of divers Nations, by which the Emperour and he converſed with Strangers, heard the Propoſals of Ambaſſadours, and returned them Anſwers. And at laſt it concludes what's to be ſaid of him at preſent (for ſeveral other inferiour Court-Officers, and under his Juriſdiction, come after, which it medles not with till it hath diſpatched the Greater or Illuſtrious) with telling us, that he grants out Licenſes for the publick Curſus, or Carriage, which as we have ſeveral times hinted, no Subject but the Præfectus Prætorio and himſelf could do; none of the Judges, not the Præfecti of the Cities, not the Magiſtri Militum, Duces or Vicars, as Gratian the Emperour expreſſeth it. Of this Curſus Publicus therefore, having not done it under the Præfecti Prætorio, here it's convenient that we ſay ſomething. The uſe of the Curſus amongſt the Perſians is very evident; and if credit may be given to Herodotus, firſt by them invented. Xenophon particularly aſcribes it unto Cyrus; who, as he ſaith, conſidering how far an Horſe could run in one day, took order for the building of Inns and Stables at ſuch a diſtance; and in them placed ſuch Horſes of Courſe, and men to manage them, taking care that there ſhould be a ſufficient number to receive Letters, to deliver them to the next Poſt, and entertaining ſuch Horſes and Riders as were wearied and ſpent, ſend freſh Horſes on the ſame errand. This (a) Courſe being uſed both night and day, ſeemed to exceed the ſwiftneſs of Cranes, at leaſt was of all Journeys the moſt ſpeedy. (b) Herodotus ſaith the ſame thing, and deſcribes it in the ſame manner; adds that the Perſians called it Angareion; others call theſe ſwift Meſſengers of theirs Angari, who in the ſame Language were alſo known by the name of Aſtandæ, and held no ignoble or mean place in the Commonwealth; as is concluded (c) by ſome from the practice of Darius the laſt King, who as Plutarch reports more than once, executed this Office (poſſibly of Overſeer, or Manager of it) in the Reigns of his Predeceſſors Ochus and Arſes. Thus much concerning the Perſians is evident, but when, and by whom this practiſe was entertained by the Romans, is not ſo clear. The Writers of the Imperial Hiſtory herein not well agreeing amongſt themſelves. For Suetonius attributes the Curſus, both by men and carriages to Auguſtus. Sextus Aurelius Victor makes Trajan Author of the Curſus. Spartianus writes, that Trajan inſtituted the Curſus Fiſcalis, or that belonging to the Treaſury, and how Severus altered that by Carriages from the hands of private men into the Exchequer. But thus this difference may ſeem to be reconciled: Auguſtus ordained the Curſus by Vehicula or Carriages; ſo as when ſuch came on a ſudden, as had Licenſe to make uſe of them, the Municipal Magiſtrates furniſhed them at the charge of the Country. This was found ſuch a burthen, that Nerva, when he came to the Government remitted it to Italy, as appears by his Coins; and either Trajan or Adrian, not

(a) Τούτων δὲ οὕτω γιγνομένων φασὶ τινὲς θᾶσσον τῶν γεράνων ταύτην τὴν πορείαν ἀνύτειν· εἰ δὲ τοῦτο ψεύδονται ἀλλ' ὅτι γε τῶν ἀνθρωπίνων πεζῇ πορειῶν ταχίστη, τοῦτο εὔδηλον. Cyropæd. l. 8. c. 43.

(b) τοῦτο τὸ δράμημα τῶν ἵππων καλέουσι Πέρσαι ἀγγαρήϊον. *Lib.*8.c. 98.

(c) Vide Briſſonii de Regno Perſarum, l. 1. Vide Comment. Jacobi Gothofred. in l. 1. tit. 5. *Lib.*8. Cod. Theodoſii & in l. 5. *lib.*6.tit. 29. de Curioſis.

not long after made this Curſus ſetled, Conſtant, and Publick or Fiſcal, viz. at the Publick Disburſement; ſo as upon any ſudden occaſion publick Carriages and Cattel were at hand, and the Magiſtrates were no more put to that charge and trouble. Now was the Curſus become ſetled and conſtant; yet ſtill did the Country by a Tax maintain the charge thereof; which burthen was ſo heavy, that Antoninus Pius, out of his commiſeration, gave eaſe herein to the oppreſſed; and at laſt Severus, that he might make himſelf acceptable to his Subjects, removed it from private hands to the Treaſury, or remitted the Tax laid upon the people, & transferred the charge from the private to the publick Purſe. But much more hereafter concerning the Curſus Publicus.

Poſthæc cùm ſe vellet commendare hominibus, vehicularium munus à Privatis ad Fiſcum traduxit.

The Quæſtor Palatii.

59. The next Officer was the Quæſtor of the Palace. The ancient Queſtors, being by Auguſtus truſted with the Decrees of the Senate, afterwards had the Office of reciting the Prince his Letters, and what was tranſacted in the Senate: and under the later Emperours their power ſtill encreaſed; for they adminiſtred Juſtice in their ſtead; To them and the Præfectus Prætorio, ſometimes to them alone, ſuch Cauſes being committed. In ſhort, executing all things in a manner under their Name, they became Illuſtrious in Title, and under the Reign of Conſtantine received that of Quæſtores Palatii, being little inferiour to the Præfecti Prætorio: For they compoſed Laws and Edicts that were to be publiſhed, and Mandates that iſſued out to the Preſidents, with the Reſcripts of the Emperours, which were not held valid, except They ſubſcribed them. Now Laws and Edicts thus confirmed were ſent to the Comes Diſpoſitionum to be tranſcribed and kept in his Office, and then were by an Edict of the Præfectus Prætorio expoſed to view in ſome Forum or publick Place; otherwiſe no man was bound to the obſervance of them. They were laid alſo to be publiſhed when they were read in the Senate by the Primicerius of the Notaries, or the Proconſul. At Conſtantinople they were uſually read in the Suburb Septimus, called alſo Secundianus, for which Pancirolus obſerves, that Septies recitata by a miſtake is often read in Law-Books, and accordingly to be amended. At Rome they were publiſhed in the Pantheon, in the Forum of Trajan, that of Apronianus, or the Atrium of Minerva. For their longer duration they were written in Braſs, or in Tables of Ceruſs called Tabulæ Ceruſſatæ, or in Linnen Cloth called Linteæ Mappæ, or by Encauſtum or burning of Letters; which four ſorts were in Uſe in the time of Conſtantine, who alſo, as Gothofred obſerves, makes mention of Marble-Tables in Uſe in the ſame Age. Yet were not Edicts written in Braſs, but ſome of the other ways recorded, according to the Cuſtom of the Prætors. They were ſent into all Cities, and expoſed there to be read, for 30 days, as Pancirolus obſerves particularly, that Joſephus takes notice in the Edict of Claudius.

De hoc officio & omnibus aliis conſule Pancirolum & Gothofredum.

His Employment.

The manner of framing Edicts.

Quàm variis locis Romæ conſtitutiones Principum recitatæ fuerint, vel lectæ, vel propoſitæ; Vide omnino Gothofredum in l. 3. de bonis vacantibus. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 8.

Vide Comment. ejuſdem Gothofred. in l. 1. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 27. Panſirolus.

60. At the framing of them the Emperours were wont to conſult with Lawyers, ſometimes thirty, ſometimes more; but the Quæſtor's duty was to adviſe them, both in matters of Law and other things, ſo that if there were any over-ſight committed, the fault was laid on him. He overſaw the Leſſer Laterculum, wherein were Regiſtred Tribuneſhips, the Commands of Caſtles and the Borders, and, together with the Præfectus Prætorio in Comitatu, received Appeals made from the Judges, called Spectabiles, to the Prince. Caſſiodorus (to whom Gothofred refers us for the deſcription of this Office) hath a Formula of the Quæſtorſhip, which ſeems to us to excell all ſuch of his others, as we have read, in Elegancy. Herein eſpecially are required knowledge of the Laws, and Eloquence; but the main buſineſs is to expreſs well the meaning or intention of the Prince; to be his Mouth to the People, or, as it wordeth it, the Voice of his Tongue, which yet to be, it eſteems a piece of great difficulty. If the Prince was in doubt of any matter, it was expected the Quæſtor ſhould reſolve it; he being the Treaſury of the publick Fame, the Magazine of Laws, and prepared for any ſudden occaſion. Nothing being more excellent, as Tully, the Maſter of Eloquence ſaid, than to be able by Language to lay hold of the minds of men, to allure their Wills, and to move and draw them whither and whence one pleaſeth. The Quæſtorſhip is termed by this Patent, the Glory of Learning, the Temple of Civility, the Mother of all Dignities, the Habitation of Continency, and the ſeat of all Vertues. To him that exerciſed the place, the Provinces ſent up their Requeſts, the Senate ſought for Reſolution in Law-Matters, and ſuch as were themſelves Learned, expected to find what they knew before. To come towards a period of what concerns the Quæſtor. From the beginning, and under Valentinian the Elder, his place was before Proconſuls, yet was not then of the Dignity of Illuſtris, though afterward he obtained this Honour. Suitably he was in Acclamations as the P. Pr. ſtyled Father of the Empire, Magnificus and Glorioſiſſimus, and from Princes received that of Sublimitas tua, and others wont to be given to Illuſtrious Perſons. His Arms were on a Table covered with a Carpet down to the ground, a Book with a Golden Cover, whereon, in a Square, was ſeen the Picture of the Prince, and toward the left hand a Roll of How Caſſiodorus deſcribes the Office of the Quæſtor.

*Variar. l.*6.*c.*5.

Quæſturam toto corde recipimus, quam noſtræ linguæ vocem eſſe Cenſemus. O quàm arduum eſt ſubjectum verba dominantis aſſumere, loqui poſſe quod noſtrum credatur!

Claudianus Poeta de Mallio Theodoro qui hoc officio functus eſt.

——Terris
Edicta daturus, Supplicibus reſponſa venis. Oracula Regis Eloquio crevere tuo, nec digniùs unquàm Majeſtas meminit ſeſe Romanâ locutam.

His Place.

His Enſigns.

of Papers ſuppoſed to contain the Edicts of Laws publiſhed by him in the Emperours name. And this, as the Great Seal or Purſe with our Chancellors or Keepers ſtood by him when he ſate in Court, and, perhaps, was borne before him, as Pancirolus gueſſeth: and now it was, that the Acclamations was made of his being the Father of his Country as was uſual to the P. Prætorio. The Notitia ſaith expreſly, that he had no Officium, but Aſſiſtants out of the Scrinia, or Offices, as he pleaſed; which Pancirolus interprets to have been Twelve Notaries out of the Scrinium Memoriæ; Seven out of the Scrinium Epiſtolarum, and as many out of the Scrinium Libellorum; which being Twenty ſix in number, he uſed in the writing of Reſcripts, his Proceedings and Laws; and they had the Title of Viri Devoti. Laſtly, it's obſervable, that Juſtinian inſtituted another ſort of Quæſtors, to inquire into the Cauſe of the coming of Countrymen into the City to decide their Matters, and ſend them home in the twelfth year of his Reign. But indeed, he rather reſtored than firſt introduced theſe Officers, who alſo took care, that Sollicitors of Law-Suits received not immoderate Fees; and for that purpoſe had their Apparitors and Aſſeſſors.

Idem obſervat. Gothofred. ex l.17.de Proximis.

Another ſort of Quæſtors.

The Comes Sacrarum Largitionum.

61. But to the moſt ancient Quæſtors ſucceeded, in time, the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum. Auguſtus in room of them ſent certain Procurators choſen out of the Libertini, or Equites into the Provinces; who, gathering the publick Revenue, received a Salary from him, and were ſtyled Procuratores Auguſtales. They decided Cauſes belonging to the Revenue, and ſometimes governed Provinces, if not very large; and of this ſort was Pontius Pilate in Judæa, where a Procurator was in the room of a Preſident. But for management of the publick Treaſury at Rome, from the time of Auguſtus, down to Conſtantine, there were ſometimes Quæſtors, moſt commonly others, who had the Name of Præfecti Ærarii; Conſtantine, when he came to the Government, changed the management of the Treaſury, by introducing two new ſorts of Magiſtrates, who ſhould order the whole income; whereof the one was called Comes Largitionum, and the other Comes Rerum Privatarum. This Pancirolus aſcribes to Conſtantine, although by gueſs, as we may judge; for the moſt Learned Gothofred affirms, that by all the Laws he cannot find any of theſe Officers under that Emperor. However, probable enough it is, that he brought them up: for by the Judiculus which Gothofred gives us of the Comites Largitionum mentioned in the Code of Theodoſius, there is one who executed this Office in the time of his Son Conſtans, and another during the Reign of Julian; as about the ſame time, others, who bore the place of Comes Rerum Privatarum. The Comes Largitionum had firſt his name à Largitionibus, from the free gifts of the Prince; and held it, when his work was quite altered, as much from what it was then, as the Chief Treaſurer of a Nation differs from an Almoner. Though indeed the Gifts of the Roman Emperours were ſo great and frequent, that the management of them may ſeem far to ſurpaſs the care and trouble of the Revenue of any Nation now in being, which formerly was but a Member of that Empire. And ſo neceſſary they were, that Auguſtus in his Rationarium of the Empire, or Book which he compoſed with his own Hand, together with the publick Treaſure and other things, wherein the ſtrength of the State conſiſted; the Fleets, Kingdoms, Provinces, Tributes and Tolls; therein made mention of the Neceſſitates and Largitiones; by the former meaning his neceſſary, by the later his free and voluntary Expenſes.

When inſtituted.

Whence ſo called.

Vide Pancirolum in Not. Imp. orient. c. 73.

62. At firſt the Emperours made uſe of a Candidate of the Queſtorſhip, or ſome other Courtier, who paid ſuch Aſſignments of Bounty, as they made out of their Privie Purſe, till Alexander Severus brought in thoſe they called Ærarii. Theſe Acts of Bounty were chiefly upon occaſion of ſome publick Rejoycing, and were called Congiaria; probably from the carrying of the Money in Congiis (that ſort of Veſſels) into the Forum. This courſe to pleaſe the People, was much practiſed by Auguſtus, and after by his Succeſſors imitated, till Conſtantine, as was ſaid, for the diſtribution of his Bounty, brought in this Officer, who from the Largitiones or Gifts, had his name. Before his time the Congiaria and Feaſtings were the uſual ways, whereby the Princes carreſſed the people. In and after his time, they uſed ſeveral other Courſes. Pancirolus takes notice, that a pound of Gold was wont to be given to the Alitarcha, that he might not cut down the Cypreſs Trees, as he was wont, in the Grove of Daphne. Ten pounds of Gold were given by Juſtinian out of the Revenue of Phœnicia to the Primicerius Notariorum: but a ſet and ſolemn ſort of Bounty they uſed on New-years-Day, on which it was the Cuſtom for them to give New-years-Gifts to the Comites of the Conſiſtory, and others; as with the late Emperours, to preſent the Senate and Officers of the Army on Eaſter-Day. Beſides theſe, this Comes paid Souldiers and others their Wages; and thence had the Name, not only of Largitionum, but Remunerationum Comes. To theſe were added Comes Sacri Ærarii, Theſaurorum Curator, or Præfectus Imperialium Pecuniarum, Quæſtor, and the like; for to him was alſo committed the care of collecting and keeping the Publick Revenue ariſing by tributes and cuſtoms.

His work.

63. The Revenue by Cuſtoms was either greater, or leſſer, according to the Covetouſneſs, Occaſions, or Humours of the Princes. In the Reign of Heliogabalus, the tenth part of the value of Wares was exacted, which Alexander reduced to the thirtieth, or little more than three in a hundred; and this gave Occaſion to the ſtamping of half Aurei, and the third part of an Aureus; all Payments of this Nature being in thoſe days made in Gold. But ſucceeding Princes would have the eighth part of the Value, or little more than twelve in the hundred. And for Tribute the Subject paid what the Emperour, or Præfectus Prætorio demanded, or as the cuſtom of the Countreys was,(as was formerly ſaid) which being in kind was laid up in the publick Store-houſes, for the Maintenance of the Armies, and relief of the Poor: but the Money ariſing from the Cuſtoms and Tributes was the charge of the Comes Largitionum. The Jews paid a Didrachm for every Head, which being impoſed in the room of that, which was wont to be paid to the Temple, Theodoſius commanded to be alſo received by him, as that Impoſt called Capitatio upon Country-men, was wont to be. Now that this Comes might the better diſcharge ſo vaſt an Office, for procurement of the Payment of the Revenue, he ſent ſome of thoſe Officers, or Notaries that attended him, called Imitendarii, into all the Provinces, to conſtrain the Præſidents, or Governours to gather, and pay the Money; who for this purpoſe named one, or two of their own Office, as Procurators to attend. Beſides there were others called Tractatores, who as Auditors took their Accounts, and every four Months ſent them up with the Money to the Comes.

Officers under him.

Other inferiour Comites Largitionum.

Comites Commerciorum.

Stationarii.

Præfecti Theſaurorum.

Suſceptor.

Tabularius.

64. But there were many Officers in the Provinces, which the Notitia placeth under his Diſpoſition, or Command. As firſt, in the five Diœceſes of the Eaſt, ſo many; who were alſo ſtyled Comites Largitionum, though but of the third Degree or Rank of Comites; for they were but Perfectiſſimi. The Diœceſes are in the Notitia ſet down in general, without any Enumeration, or certain Number; but Pancirolus will have them ſix, viz. the known ones; the Eaſt ſtrictly ſo called, Ægypt, Aſiana, Pontica, Thracia, and Macedonia. Beſides theſe the Notitia mentions others called Comites Commerciorum, through the Eaſt and Ægypt, through Mœſia, Scythia, Pontus and Illyricum. being four in Number, as he computes. Theſe were tradeſmen, or Overſeers of ſuch, who bought up Materials for the Emperour's or Empreſs her wearing, as Silk, Wool, Flax, Purple, Skins, or other Materials, and provided Jewels and Pearl, Ointments and Silver. It was their Work alſo to ſee, that all Duties were paid by Merchants, for which purpoſe they had Officers under them, called Stationarii, in Places of Traffick: for out of the Cuſtoms it was, that Gift-Money and Wages were paid. Moreover, they look'd that no forbidden Commodities, as Gold, Iron, Grinding Stones, Armes, Salt, Corne, Wine, Oyl, or other things were carried out of the Empire to Barbarians; whom they neither permitted to traffick in the Empire, nor the Emperour's Subjects in their Territories. Next after theſe Comites, the Notitia mentions the Præfecti Theſaurorum under Command of the Comes Largitionum. Theſe were the Treaſurers of every Province, who kept the Money of each Diſtrict, and ſeparate from the reſt, till it was ſent up to him, having received it from the Decuriones; for in each City this was the Courſe of raiſing Money impoſed by way of Tax: There was one Decurio, or Alderman choſen out to be Receiver, and accordingly had the name of Suſceptor, who received what was required by way of Tax of every one after it was gathered, and paid in to him by the Ducenarii and Sexegenarii Apparitors, to whom the Tabularius, or Clerk ſo called, gave out the Rolls. The Suſceptor gave an Apocha, or Acquittance to him that paid him, wherein was expreſſed the name of the Payer, the ſum, the Cauſe of the Payment, the Day, Moneth and Conſul; as in like manner did the Stationarii, to thoſe of whom they received the Cuſtom, and then ſent away the Money to the Præſident, by whom it was conveyed to the Theſaurenſes. Theſe Præfects being in Places of ſo great Truſt, were not admitted, no more than the other Theſaurenſes, but in the Scrinium Epiſtolarum, by Commiſſion ſigned with the Prince his own Hand; nor without having firſt given ſufficient Caution for their honeſt Deportment.

Comes Metallorum per Illyricum.

Vide Goth. in L. L. 3. 4. de Metallis & Metallariis Cod. Th. lib. 10. Tit. 19.

65. Next after theſe Præfecti Theſaurorum, is reckoned the Comes Metallorum through Illyricum, who exacted the Portion of Gold due to the Emperour, from ſuch as gathered it, either in Rivers, or Mines, according to the Cuſtoms of Places; eight or ſeven Scruples, or Caracts by the year, not in melted Gold, but in the Oar. He is named of Illyricum, becauſe there, as in Macedonia and the neighbouring Countries, was great plenty of Metals, and there the Emperout had alſo Mines of his own; the Overſeers of which were choſen out of the Curiales, or beſt Comes & Rationalis Summarum.

men of the Cities under Command of this Comes. After him follows one termed the Comes, or Rationalis Summarum of Ægypt. He was ſent into that Country to inquire after thoſe they called Bona caduca, Eſcheats or Goods which any other way fell to the Exchequer, having at firſt no Juriſdiction; but afterwards, there being found Reaſon to employ him in buſineſs of very great Moment, his Dignity increaſed ſo, that he obtained the Title of Comes, and of Rationalis Summarum. For in thoſe days, and long after, till the finding out of the way into the Eaſt-Indies by Sea, there being a vaſt Trade driven in Ægypt out of India and Arabia, for Silks, Pretious Stones, Pearl and Spices, and thereupon vaſt Cuſtoms ariſing; it was thought fit to employ ſuch an Officer, and to gain him Reſpect by ſuch a Title and Character of Comes, Rationalis, and Procurator. It was the Cuſtom for a Rationalis to go very well habited, as appears by a Story out of Ammianus; how a Barber being ſent for, to cut the Hair of Julian the Emperour, one came to him ſo ſpruce and fine, that he was amazed, and ſaid, I did not ſend for a Rationalis, but for a Barber. In the Weſt there were eleven Rationales made in ſeveral Provinces; but in the Eaſt this of Ægypt is only mentioned, ſo that Pancirolus concludes, that either ſomething is wanting in the Notitia, or elſe the under-Comites Largitionum in the other Provinces ſupplied their Places.

Magiſtri Linteæ Veſtis.

Their Employment.

Magiſtri privatæ Veſtis.

Procuratores Gynæciorum.

Procuratores Baphiorum.

Procuratores Monetarum.

Præpoſitus etiam Monetæ, & Magiſtratus Æris.

66. Next follow in the Catalogue of Officers Subject to the Command of the Comes, they who went under the Name of Magiſtri Lineæ (or Linteæ) Veſtis; theſe were the Overſeers of ſuch as wrought in Linnen, for the furniſhing of the Court with Neceſſaries made of that Stuff, which Workmen were of the Quality of thoſe they called Conditionales; that is, they and their Children were perpetually obnoxious to this Work and Service. Theſe Magiſtri, both took Care for preparing the ſeveral ſorts of Linnen, and when made kept a Wardrobe of them, of which the Inventory was preſerved in the Scrinium Sacri Veſtiarii, written by the Primicerius of that Office. In the Weſt, inſtead of theſe Magiſtri Lineæ Veſtis, there was one that bore the Title of Comes Veſtiarii, who provided and kept the Linnen as the other did; and by ſome is reckoned amongſt the Cubicularii, or thoſe of the Bed-Chamber. After theſe Magiſtri come the Magiſtri Privatæ Veſtis, or Maſters of the Privy Robes, who had the charge of providing thoſe that were made of other things than Linnen, as of Silk and Woollen, for the Prince his uſe. They are alſo by Conſtantine termed Procuratores; and by Reaſon of the great things in their Charge, were to give Caution before their Admittance. Next follow the Procuratores Gynæciorum, ſo called from the Gynæcia, or inward Rooms, where Women as well as others wove Hangings, and other things of Silk, or Gold and Silk together; of which Works theſe Procuratores had the Charge, and gave Caution alſo at their firſt Admittance. Thoſe that ſewed under them being ſometimes Slaves, but however otherwiſe free Perſons, yet condemned (both they and their Poſterity,) to this Service. The Procuratores Baphiorum, or of thoſe Work-houſes where Wool or Silk was died, follow next. The Work-houſes were many throughout the Empire; but thoſe of moſt eſteem were in Phœnicia, for the dying of Purple, the Sale of which was forbidden, it being unlawful for any but the Prince to buy it; and thoſe Dyers were of the ſort of Conditionales alſo, being condemned with their Poſterity to this Drudgery. Then doth the Notitia mention the Procuratores Monetarum, or thoſe who under our Comes Largitionum took Care of the Mints, or coining of Money. In the Weſt, as we formerly ſaid, it reckons up ſix Places that had publick Mints, of which each had it's Procurator; but how many were in the Eaſt it doth not expreſs; though we have formerly taken notice of ſome Cities, that had this Privilege.

The Roman Money.

Brerewood de antiquis Romanorum Nummis.

The Stamp of the Braſs.

When Silver came in uſe.

67. Here it will not be inconvenient to ſay ſomething of the value of the Roman Coin: And firſt of the loweſt ſort, or that of Braſs. Their Æs therefore, or moſt Antient Money, was firſt ſtamped by Servius Tullius, whereas formerly it was diſtinguiſhed only by Weight, and not by any Image. And firſt the Image was that of Cattle or Pecus, whence it was called Pecunia. Afterward, it had on one ſide the Beak of a Ship, on the other a Janus, or double Body, and ſuch were the ſtamps of the As: for as for the Triens, Quadrans, and Sextans, they had the Impreſſion of a Boat upon them. A long time did the Romans uſe this kind, and no other Money, till after the War with Pyrrhus, in the CCCCLXXXIIII year of the City, and five before the firſt Punick War, Silver began to be Coined. The Stamps upon the Silver Denarii, or Pennies, are, for the moſt part Waggons, with two or four Cattle in them, on the one ſide, and on the other the Head of Rome, with an Helmet. The Victoriati have the Image of Victory ſitting: the Seſtertii uſually Caſtor and Pollux on the one ſide, and both ſorts, on the other part, the Image of the City; ſo the Cuſtom continued during the Commonwealth. Auguſtus cauſed Capricorn to be ſet upon his Coin; and the Succeeding Emperours ordinarily their own Images. Laſt of all came up Coin of Gold, which was firſt ſtamped ſixty two years after that of Silver, in the Conſulſhip of Claudius Nero, and M. Livius Salinator, with the ſame Stamp and Images; which to our Learned Countryman Brerewood ſeems to have been the Reaſon, why Golden Coines are alſo ſometimes termed Denarii by the Romans. So much for the Original of the ſeveral ſorts of Coins; now, more particularly, of the ſeveral kinds. Firſt, of the Braſs, from this named Author, to whoſe Diſcourſe nothing is now to be added, except it be this; that the Romans had a greater ſort of Money mix'd of Braſs and Silver, called Majorina, as is obſervable out of the Code of Theodoſius.

When Gold.

Several ſorts of Braſs-Coin.

68. The As was ſo named, quaſi Æs, or Braſs, being of that Metal, and at firſt conſiſted of a Pound-weight, till in the firſt Punick War, the People being ſorely oppreſſed by Debt, cauſed of one, ſix to be made, and yet to be of the ſame value. In the ſecond Punick War, Annibal ſorely preſſing upon them, in the Dictatorſhip of Fabius Maximus, they were reduced to one half, or to conſiſt of an ounce apiece; and in concluſion, by the Law of Papyrius, brought down to half an Ounce, and ſo continued. Now the As contained the tenth part of the Denarius; and was in value of our Money ob. q^{a}. The Semiſſis, or Semiæs, half as much. The Triens was the third part of the As, and the Quadrans the fourth, by ſome called Triuncis and Teruntius, becauſe it contained three ounces before the value was diminiſhed. The Sextans, or ſixth part was that which every Head contributed to the Funeral of Menenius Agrippa, but theſe were not thought ſufficient for uſe, and therefore there were other Pieces made, as the Uncia, or twelfth part of the Pound, the Semuncia, of the weight of four Drachms, and the Sextula, or ſixth part of an ounce. Theſe were the Coins leſſer than the As, anciently uſed by the Romans in their Traffick; but there are greater than the As mentioned, (he tells us) by Varro, as the Decuſſis, which was of the value of Ten, or of a Denarius; the Viceſſis, of two Denarii; the Treceſſis, of three; and they aroſe as high as Centuſſis, than which there was no word that contained more of Braſs Money. This contained an hundred Aſſes, was worth ten Silver Denarii, and of our Money 6 s. 3 d.

Of Silver.

The old Denarius.

The new.

Bigatus & Quadrigatus.

Seſtertius.

Nummus.

Obolus.

Libella.

Sembella.

Teruntius.

69. For the Silver Money, the old Denarius was ſo named, becauſe it contained denos æris or aſſes, viz. ten Aſſes, though its Weight and value was not at all times alike. For the old Roman Denarius, during the Commonwealth, weighed the ſeventh part of an ounce; and was in value of our Money 8 d. ob. c. with $\frac{3}{7}$ c; but the new Denarius, which came up in the time of Claudius, or a little before, weighed exactly an Attick Drachm; ſo that the Greek Writers, when they ſpeak of it, for every Denarius mention a Drachm; which of our Money was of the Value of 7 d. ob. Now, with reference to this new ſort of Denarius, are computations made generally; and if reſpect be had to the Ancienter Times, when the old, and true one was in uſe, then are all Reckonings to be increaſed one ſeventh part; for, ſo much did the Old exceed the New. Now know, that when you meet with Bigatus and Quadrigatus, they are the ſame with a Denarius, ſo called, becauſe it had the Bigæ and Quadrigæ ſtamped upon it. There was another Coin called Victoriatus, from the Image of Victory ſeen upon it, firſt ſtamped at Rome, by a Law of Clodius, which was in value half a Denarius; and therefore it was alſo called Quinarius, as containing the value of five Aſſes, and was worth 3 d. ob. q. The next that follows, and which makes moſt Noiſe in Books is, the Seſtertius, ſo called quaſi Seſquitertius, becauſe it contained two Aſſes and an half, being the half of a Victoriatus, and the fourth of a Denarius. In Writers it's often called abſolutely by the name of Nummus, becauſe it was in moſt frequent uſe, as alſo Seſtertius Nummus, being worth of our preſent Money but 1 d. ob. q^{a}. q. The Obolus was the ſixth part of a Denarius (equal to the Attick Obolus) and therefore by Celſus is called Sextans, as Brerewood quotes him, being as much as 1 d. q^{a}. The Libella was the tenth part of Denarius, and equal in value to the As, ſo called as a little Pound, becauſe ſuppoſed to equal a pound of Braſs. It was but of our Money worth ob. q^{a}. The Sembella, as if written Semilibella, was half this. And laſtly, the Teruntius was the fortieth part of a Denarius; ſo named, becauſe it was worth three ounces of Braſs. It was the leaſt Silver-Coin in uſe with the Romans, at leaſt, that is met with in Books, being as inconſiderable in value, as next to nothing.

Golden Coins.

70. To come at laſt to the Golden Coins; thoſe moſt Remarkable were the Aurei Denarii; ſo ſtyled, becauſe either the ſame Images were ſtamped upon them as upon the Denarii, or becauſe in bulk they do much reſemble them. From ſuch of them as Time hath not Conſumed, it appears, that the old Aureus, ſtamped during the Commonwealth, weighed two Silver Denarii; ſo as forty two were made of one Pound of Gold. It weighed two Drachms with $\frac{2}{7}$ and was worth of our Money 17 s. 1 d. ob. qa. The Newer Aureus, ſtamped about the beginning of the Emperours, was lighter than the former, one ſeventh part, weighing two Drachms, ſo as forty eight were made of one Pound of Gold; ſo that in Weight they equalled one of our Roſe-Nobles, being worth about as much, or 15 s of our preſent Money. Thus they continued Didrachmi for the time of the five firſt Cæſars, till Nero's Reign, and then by the Fraud and Avarice of Princes were made lighter, at firſt, in Nero's time, but two or three Granes; then under Galba they wanted a little more; and thoſe of Nerva, Trajan and Adrian want no fewer than eight. But the Aurei that Veſpaſian ſtamped, want ten Granes in Weight; as alſo thoſe of Antoninus Pius, M. Aurelius, Severus, and others. And for Domitian it may be ſaid, that he reſtored to theſe Aurei in his time the full Weight of two Drachms. But ſo the Roman Aurei continued, either Didrachmi or thereabouts, till the Reign of Alexander Severus; and he cauſed to be Coined the Semiſſis, or Half-Aureus, conſiſting of one Drachm, as alſo the Tremiſſis, or Triens, or Third Part; the one being worth 7 s. 6 d. and the other 5 s. of our Money: and ſo the Mint went till Aurelian Reigned; who again returned to the Aureus two Drachms; and ſo this Coin continued as long as Rome continued to be the Seat of the Empire.

The New Aureus.

How it varied under ſeveral Emperours.

71. Conſtantine the Great brought the Weight of the Aureus down in his Mints from two Drachms to one, and a ſeventh part; ſo that it weighed exactly the weight of the old Silver Roman Denarius; for he cauſed ſeven to be made of one Ounce, or Eighty four of a Pound; yet Ordering each to conſiſt of four Scruples, as he ſaith in his Edict, by a new way of Reckoning twenty Granes and a half to a Scruple. This new Aureus was after his time, by Greek Writers, called Nomiſma, (as Solidus by the Romans, being of our Money in value 8 s. 6 d. ob. qa. & $\frac{6}{7}$ q.) Such Aurei continued in uſe till the Reign of Valentinian, who cauſed others to be ſtamped, that were ſomething more heavy; for he Ordered that Six ſhould be made of one Ounce of Gold, whereupon by the Greeks it was called Hexagion, and by others Sextula. Theſe contained four Scruples, or one Drachm and $\frac{1}{3}$ apiece; ſo as ſeventy two were made of an Ounce of Gold. And ſuch were the Aurei Solidi in the time of Juſtinian; and ſo they ſeem to have continued till the laſt; except, when by the Avarice of Princes they have been made lighter, as Brierwood upon Trial found in the Coins of ſeveral Emperours; but the juſt Weight was four Scruples, and ſo they were of the value of our 10 s. There being alſo ſtamped by Valentinian the Semiſſis, or half of the Aureus, the Triens, or Third part, and the Scrupulum, or fourth part of this Aureus Solidus, which abated proportionably in value.

Nomiſma. Aureus Solidus.

Sed Conſule quæ ſcripſit Jacobus Gothofredus in L. un. de Oblatione. Votorum Cod. Th. l. 7. tit. 24. Hic aliter Valentiniani Factum interpretatur, adeò ut, non Aureorum pondus imminutum ſit, verum numerus tantùm Solidorum imminutus in Libram, & ſic Libra ipſa imminuta. Vide Hiſt. hunc noſtram infrà.

72. To make this Matter compleat, we muſt add what Silver and Braſs-Coins were in uſe at Conſtantinople, after the Tranſlation of the Empire thither. There was that they called Miliariſium, which weighed two Drachms, being worth the eighth part of an Aureus Solidus, and of our preſent Money 1 s. 3 d. The greater Siliqua, or Cerates, contained half of the value of this, or 7 d. ob. The Siliqua, or Ceratium Simplex, being the twenty fourth part in value of the Solidus Aureus, was worth of our preſent Coin 5 d. Theſe were Silver. Then was there of Braſs or Iron-Coin, the Follis, ſo called, becauſe it was beaten out like a Leaf. It was worth the twelfth part of a Siliqua. Such were the Roman Coins, the Names of which our Brierwood could diſcover in Antiquity. It remains, that ſomething be ſaid of the Marks of certain Coins, by which they may be known in Antient Writers, and the Sums by which they uſually reckoned. Becauſe the As was at firſt (as hath been ſaid) of a Pound weight, it is thus expreſſed Ł, and the Seſtertius, becauſe it contained in value two pounds of Braſs and a half, thus ŁŁS, or ĦS. The mark of the Quinarius, or Victoriatus was Λ, and of the Denarius X or ✱.

Silver and Braſs-Coins at Conſtantinople.

73. Now for the Sums, there were three in uſe amongſt the Romans. Firſt, Seſtertium, in the Neuter Gender, according to the Vulgar Opinion, which contained a thouſand Seſtertii; ſo much as in the time of Auguſtus it was lawful to ſpend at a Wedding-Feaſt. The next was the Libra, or Pound, which contained of Silver twelve Ounces, or ninety ſix Drachms, or later Denarii, and was worth of our Money 3 l. The third was the Talent, which contained twenty four Seſtertia, and ſix thouſand later Denarii, being the ſame with the Attique Talent. For, the Names of Sums of Money.

Λίτρα Οὔγγία.

of Talent, Mina, and Drachm, the Romans took from the Greeks, as thoſe from them the other of Libra and Uncia. This was worth of our preſent Money 187 l. 10 s. There often occurs alſo the mention of Sportula, which was of the value of ten Seſterces, and 1 s. 6 *d. ob. q*ª. Theſe were the Sums by which they reckoned. But, as for the Seſtertium in the Neuter Gender, Mr. Brierwood obſerves, that it's not to be found in any Antient Author in the Singular Number, as now it is uſed. And the reaſon brought why it ſhould be termed Seſtertium, becauſe it contained two Pounds of Silver and a half, is not good: for a thouſand Seſterces make up 7 l. 16 s. 3 d. whereas the two Pounds and a half amount but to 7 l. 10 s. But the Plural Number Seſtertia is often met with, and in this ſenſe, as containing a thouſand Seſtertii. However, in reckoning by Seſterces, the Romans had an Art, which may be known by theſe three Rules. The firſt is, that if a Numeral Noun agree in Caſe, Number and Gender with Seſtertius, then it denotes preciſely ſo many Seſtertii, as Decem Seſtertii, juſt ſo many. The ſecond is this; If a Numeral Noun of another Caſe be joyned with the Genitive Plural of Seſtertius, as Seſtertiûm, it denotes ſo many thouſand; as for Example, Decem Seſtertiûm ſignifies ten thouſand Seſtertii. Laſtly, If the Adverb Numeral be joyned, it denotes ſo many hundred thouſand, as Decies Seſtertiûm ſignifies ten hundred thouſand Seſterces; or if the Adverb Numeral be put by it ſelf, it is of the ſame ſignification, as Decies, or Vigeſies, ſo many hundred thouſand Seſtertii, or, as they ſay, an hundred Seſtertia. It's eaſie to ſee here in Reading Authors very Learned Men have been miſtaken, for want either of Knowing or Obſerving theſe Rules. But thus much of the Roman Coins, from the Learned Brierwood, to which, upon occaſion ſomething may be added. Now to return.

Three Rules about Seſterces.

74. Next to the Procuratores Monetarum (under whom ſuch as wrought were alſo, with their Wives and Children obnoxious ever to that Service.) The Notitia mentions the Præpoſiti Baſtagarum, as alſo obedient to the Comes Largitionum. By Baſtaga, or Baſtagma is meant a Duty of Conveyance, or carriage of things belonging to the Publick, or to the Prince. Of ſuch as were obnoxious to this Service, ſome Diſcharged it by Water, as the Navicularii, of whom heretofore; and ſome by Land, by Mules or Horſes. The Tertiocerius of the Office of this Magiſter, gave order for the Baſtagæ, of which each had its Præpoſitus, or Overſeer. The laſt ſort of Officers under Command of the Comes Largitionum, mentioned by the Notitia, are the Procuratores Linificiorum, whoſe Duty it was to procure Flax for the Service of the Prince and Court, as it was the Task of the Magiſtri Lineæ Veſtis, to get it Cleanſed, Wrought, and made up into ſuch Cloths or other things as uſe required. All thoſe Officers were obedient to the Command of the Comes, but had diſtinct Charges of their own, not being his Attendants, or his Servants. But he had an Officium, or number of Attendants, being Secretaries or Clerks, who took the Accounts of thoſe forementioned Perſons. Thoſe wrote in ten ſeveral Scrinia or Offices, and were termed the Militia Literata, and Palatini, becauſe they lived in the Prince his Palace, being Excuſed from Sordid Employments, and the finding of Souldiers. The which Officium, or Attendance had its Primicerius; there were alſo the Secundocerius, Tertiocerius, and Quartocerius; and each Scrinium, or particular Chamber, had its Primicerius alſo. The Primicerius of the whole Attendance, and the three next under him, enjoyed the Dignity of the Prætorian Tribunes, being permitted to Salute the Prince, and adore the Purple, as they phraſed it; nay the Primicerii afterwards had the Honour of Enconſulares.

A Βαστάζω, Porto.

Præpoſiti Baſtagarum.

75. To omit the Deſcription of the Nature of theſe ſeveral Scrinia, as alſo the Arms of this Comes, as too tedious, which the Reader, if he pleaſe, may find in Pancirolus. The next Great Officer, and of the Dignity of Illuſtris, was the Comes Rerum Privatarum. The Emperours, very anciently, had ſuch as took care of their Private Eſtates, or Patrimonies, eſpecially the Rationalis of Alexandria; but Severus, after the Overthrow of Albinus, Confiſcating the Eſtates of an infinite number of Perſons that had taken his part, gave original to this Officer, ſetling one more certain; who in Books goes under many Names and Titles: as Cæſaris Procurator, or Curator; Rationalis, Procurator Privatæ Rationis, Magiſter Rei Privatæ, Rationalis Summæ Rei, Domûs Procurator, Comes Rei Dominicæ, Imperatoris Domûs Præfectus, Comes Rerum Privatarum, Imperialium Theſaurorum Curator, Imperialium Pecuniarum Privatarum Quæſtor, Comes Illuſtris Ærarii Privati, and others. He of the Eaſt had the Charge and Government of all the Prince his Patrimony, or Demeſne, eſpecially his Lands in Aſia, Pontica, Cappadocia, Meſopotamia, Oſrhoena and other

The Comes Rerum Privatarum.

(a) Vide etiàm Notitiam Dignitatum Codicis Theodoſiani.

(b) Comitiva Privatarum, ſicut Nominis ipſius ſentitur Vocabulum; per Rationalium Curam quondàm Principûm privatam fertur Gubernaſſe ſubſtantiam.

(c) Caſſiodorus var. lib. 6. c. 8. Vide Pancirolum in Not. & Notit. Cod. Theodoſiani in hoc Comite.

His Employment before he came to be Comes.

Afterward.

Vide de hac re luculentam formulam Caſſiodori.

Primùm tibi contra nefarias Libidines, & Humani generis improbos Appetitus, quaſi Parenti Publico decreta Cuſtodia eſt &c. Vide quæ tibi Commiſſa ſunt. Caſtitas Viventium & ſecuritas Mortuorum.

other Regions; together with the Parks, thoſe Lands called Emphyteutica Prædia, the Huſbandmen, the Flocks, Herds, and other things. For the better Diſcharge whereof, he had Command over the Preſidents of the Provinces, and ordered all the private Accounts. Moſt anciently he that diſcharged this Employment was but of Equeſtrian Dignity; ſometimes but a Libertus. Before they arrived at the Dignity of Comites, they judged only Slaves, Vilains, and ſuch as belonged to the Lands of the Emperour, with his Bona Emphyteutica, or ſuch things as were brought to the Treaſury, and had Power over their own Train or Attendants. But after theſe Procurators came to be Comites, they had Cogniſance of Inceſt; and took Care, that Sepulchres were not violated, as Caſſiodorus in the Formula of this Office gives us to underſtand. In this Commiſſion the King further tells this Comes, that it is his part to direct the Canonicarii, or ſuch as gathered the Canones, or Payments due from Lands, to call upon the Tenants, and take Cogniſance of thoſe Goods, or Eſtates called Bona Caduca. Moreover, that it was his part to recover to the Treaſury ſuch Money as was caſually found, and owned no private Maſter. Though the Laws, as Broſſeus obſerves, gave ſuch Treaſure to the Finder.

Officers under him.

76. Farther, from Corrupted Judges he recovered the Triple value in Pecuniary Matters, in Capitals their whole Eſtates. From the Cohortales, or Officers of Courts, four-fold the Sum they had Exacted of ſuch as went to Law. Publick and Navigable Rivers alſo ſeem to have been under his Inſpection, becauſe ſaid to be in the Patrimony of the Prince. He paid Artificers their Wages, and for the Family of the Emperour and Empreſs, he found Proviſions; without his knowledge nothing belonging to the Private Eſtate of the Prince could be Alienated, not ſo much as by the Præfect of the City. Before him were Tryed ſuch Gifts, as were ſaid to be given by the Prince out of Publick Debts, and without him nothing could by Petition be obtain'd. He had under him Rationales or Procuratores, for gathering of Moneys, from whom there lay Appeal to him: and if the Buſineſs was not worth ſo great a Journey, he might Delegate the Governour of the Province to Hear and Determine the Matter. The Treaſury which belonged to the Comes Largitionum was properly called Ærarium; and that wherein this Comes Rerum Privatarum kept his Money, was termed his Arca or Coffer, and alſo Fiſcus: although the Terms of Ærarium and Fiſcus be often Confounded, and one taken for the other: Neither doth Fiſcus ſignifie all Private Matters belonging to the Prince, not extending to his Lands, but relating to forfeited Eſtates, or ſuch as fell for want of Heirs, and certain Tolls or Cuſtoms. This Comes had in his Court a certain number of Advocates, who obtain'd from the Emperour Anaſtaſius the Privilege when they left Pleading, to be ſtyled Clariſſimi, and to be eſteemed Comites of the firſt Rank.

Paſſim Hiſtoriâ hæc noſtrâ.

77. He alſo, as we hinted, like as the Comes Largitionum, had his Rationales or Procuratores in all Provinces, to receive all the Eſtates Confiſcate, or any other way appertaining to his Office. In order hereunto, this Courſe was obſerv'd: Firſt, He in whoſe hands ſuch Goods or Eſtates at preſent were, was Cited to Appear, which if he did within thirty dayes, he was heard; paying to the Primicerius of the Office, and to the Advocates, four Solidi. In caſe no man appear'd, the Goods were ſeized, yet the Intereſt of the Poſſeſſor ſtill ſaved; ſo as if he yet came he might ſtill be heard. The Comes firſt declaring, that he challenged the Eſtate. Then did the Rationales Inventory the Goods, and ſeized on them in the Emperour's behalf, which Action they termed Incorporatio: and laſtly, fixed Bills or Titles on his Lands, which ſhould give notice of the ſame. To theſe Rationales alſo belonged the Care of the Emperour's Houſes, the Lands Patrimonial and Emphyteutical, the Recovery of Treaſure found; and if any one ſued for any thing belonging to the Prince before any Judge, it ought not to be without the Knowledge and Preſence of a Rationalis. Next to the Rationalis, the Notitia placeth the Baſtagæ Privatæ under the Diſpoſition of this Comes: for he commanded thoſe Carriages which conveyed the Private or Patrimonial Matters of the Prince; over which, Pancirolus thinks, that as in the Weſt, ſo in the Eaſt there were two Overſeers. There were alſo under him Overſeers of Stables, or places where Cattel were kept; of Flocks and Herds preſerved for Breed: as to which Pancirolus takes notice, how Arcadius the Emperour celebrates two of Mares; the one ſort called Hermogeniæ, and the other Palmatiæ, of which in our following Hiſtory. There were alſo the Procuratores Saltuum, or of Parks or Paſtures, into which theſe Cattel were ſent to feed; theſe are the Officers mentioned by the Notitia, as under the Command of the Comes, to which Pancirolus and Gothofred add others out of the Laws: as the Comes Sacri Patrimonii, ſaid by the Greeks to have been firſt

Sect. 2.

A. D. 337.

firſt brought up by Anaſtaſius, who had a peculiar Charge of the Lands of the Prince, and medled with nothing elſe.

De Comite Stabuli, vel Sacri Stabuli, Vide etiam Notitiam. Dignitatum Cod. Theod. ubi etiam de Gradu ejus agitur.

His Officers.

Vide L. ult. de Palatinis &c. Cod. Th. lib. 6. Tit. 30.

78. There was alſo a Comes Stabuli, who had the Charge of the Emperour's Horſes, and of conveying Horſes out of Africk, and the other Provinces for the Service of the Army; which Cuſtom was at length left off; and Money being more wanting, began, in lieu of Horſes to be exacted of thoſe Africans at firſt three and twenty Aurei; afterwards twenty only, and after that eighteen, and then fifteen for every Horſe; other two Aurei were paid to the Comes Stabuli, as his Fee, which Cuſtom was abrogated by a Law. There was alſo under Command of this Comes Rei Privatæ, the Comes Domorum per Cappadociam, or the Comes that had the Charge of the Emperour's Houſes in Cappadocia; and beſides the Rationales, others called Magiſtri Rei Privatæ, and the Præpoſiti Gynæcio. Beſides theſe Officers ſubordinate and commanded by him, he had, as other great Magiſtrates, an Officium, or Attendance of his own Servants, and more directly under him, who had the various Names of Apparitores and Palatini, becauſe they wrote in the Palace, beſides of Cæſariani, Privatiani or Privati, and Catholiciani, to whoſe Miniſtry or Under-Service the Demeſne or Patrimony of the Prince, and Eſtates falling to the Fiſcus did belong. For of the Revenues that aroſe from his Lands, and the Charges upon them, and the Sales made of them they took an Account, as alſo of forfeited Eſtates, and other Matters relating the ſame way. Therefore in Caſe any Cloths, Gold, Silver or Slaves belonged to the Emperour after this manner, theſe Palatini could not buy them, nor chaffer among themſelves, leſt by the Familiarity ſuppoſed to be amongſt them, and the Friendſhip thereby contracted, any Partiality might ariſe, and by that, Detriment to the Prince. And this Officium had its Primicerius and its Secundocerius, who had the Charge of the Writings and Accounts. The whole Officium was divided into four ſeveral Scrinia; each of which had its Primiſcrinius or Primicerius, to whom Theodoſius the Younger, gave the ſame Privileges, as thoſe belonging to the Comes Largitionum enjoy'd; that they ſhould have the Dignity and Honour of Exconſulares. Concerning them, as alſo the Enſigns of the Office of this Comes, which, as of the other Comes Largitionum, were, beſides the Faces of Princes, Baskets of Coin, and other things ſuitable to his Office; the Reader may conſult, if he pleaſe Pancirolus, and from Gothofred may have an account of ſuch Perſons, as from the Laws of Theodoſius his Code, appear to have executed this Place, as other Catalogues of the great Officers of the Empire.

Domeſtick Protectors, and their Comites.

Domeſtici Protectores Domeſtici dicti fuerunt; attamen Domeſtici à nudis Protecto*ribus diſtincti: nam Domeſtici digniori loco habiti, & Protectoribus præpoſiti; familiariùs enim Principi Militabant. vide Comm. Gothofredi in* L. uni de Præpoſitis Laborum, Cod. Th. Lib. 6. Tit. 25. Sed ſufficit. cum Com. l. 9. de Domeſticis & Protectoribus lib. 6. Tit. 24. Vide Auctor. Vitæ Conſtantini lib. 2. C. 8. Hi forſan dicti Præpoſiti Laborum pro Præpoſiti Labororum.

79. We have at length done with the Illuſtrious Officers of the Court, as well as the Country; if we but diſpatch two remaining, which were, the Comes Domeſticorum Equitum, and Comes Domeſticorum Peditum. Beſides the Vexillations of Horſe, the Legions and Auxilia of Palatine Foot, anciently called Prætorian, there were yet alſo certain Horſe and Foot which had as well as they, the Style and Title of Prætorian; but more properly and peculiarly were called Domeſtick Protectors, firſt brought up by Gordian the Younger, and by the later Greek Emperours called Spatarii. They received more pay than others, but never went to the Wars, the Deſign of them being only to protect the Prince his Perſon, and be near about him. They were elected out of the ſeven Scholæ of the Armenians; one of this Number was Ammianus Marcellinus, the Hiſtorian, being Protector to the Emperour Conſtantius; and ſome write, that Diocleſian was Comes Domeſticorum, at the time of his Election. Amongſt theſe Domeſticks, the firſt ten, after the Primicerius, were more eminent in Dignity, and received greater Pay than the reſt, being of the Title of Clariſſimi. After the Comes, the next was called Tribunus, and was of the Degree of Spectabilis, whom followed the Primicerius, and then the Secundocerius; who dying within the year, his Heirs, not only received the Profits of that year, but alſo, if before his Death he had ſucceeded as Primicerius of that year, they were permitted alſo to receive that Revenue. Moreover, ſuch as dyed of theſe Protectors, were ſucceeded by their Sons; who, though not of Age to bear Arms, were admitted to the Pay of four ordinary men. Thoſe fifty that moſt deſerved for their Strength and Piety, next the ten, carried the Labarum, or Banner of our Saviour, each in his Turn, and in the Title or Dignity of Clariſſimus were equal to them, being alſo ſtyled Præpoſiti Laborum. They were daily in waiting, and every day permitted to ſalute the Emperour, or as the Phraſe was, to Adore the Purple; which being their conſtant Practice, to Adore the Purple came to ſignify as much as to be admitted into their Number; and beſides, they were allowed to kiſs the Cheek of the Vicars of the Præfecti Prætorio, which to all was not indulged. The Advocates of the Fiſcus might every year preſent two to ſucceed ſuch of theſe Domeſtick Horſe, or Footmen as died, on certain Conditions: for this Comes had Fees from them in larger meaſure, and from others that were admitted into theſe Places. Theſe Comites Domeſticorum ſometimes ſupplied the places of the Magiſtri Militum, and were ſent againſt the Barbarians. We had almoſt ſet them at the Degree of Spectabilis, becauſe in the Notitia of the Dignities of the Code of Theodoſius, they are ſo placed: but in the Notitia of the Empire they have the Title of Illuſtris; and that of the Code, though at firſt it expreſſeth that this Comes is ſtyled Clariſſimus, yet adds, that in other Laws he is joyned with Illuſtrious perſons, as the Præfects and Magiſtri Militum, and is ſet before the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, the Magiſter Officiorum, the Quæſtor, Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, and Rei Privatæ. But in the Notitia of the Empire, he is placed after all theſe; although, as the other tells us, he was with them privileged from finding Souldiers to the Wars. And ſo now we have done (to be ſure) with the Illuſtrious Perſons, of which Pancirolus gives you this Catalogue, as to the Eaſtern Empire, viz. three Præfects, two Prætorio, and one of the City; ſix Magiſtri, viz. five Magiſtri Militum, and one Magiſter Officiorum; four Comites; viz. Largitionum, Rei Privatæ, Domeſticorum Equitum, & Peditum; one Præpoſitus Cubiculi, and one Quæſtor; in all fifteen Perſons.

Fifteen Illuſtrious Perſons in the Eaſt.

Perſons of the Rank of Spectabilis; as,

The Caſtrenſis.

Caſtrenſiani.

Pædagogia.

80. Of thoſe of the Rank of Spectabilis, which follows that of Illuſtris, the Primicerius Sacri Cubiculi is firſt named in the Notitia of the Empire; concerning whom, and the Decani under him, who Dreſſed the Emperour, and ſerved much in the ſame manner as our preſent Grooms of the Bed-Chamber, we have already ſpoken. The next in order to him was the Caſtrenſis, as the ſaid Notitia calls him, or the Comes & Caſtrenſis, or Comes & Caſtrenſis Sacri Palatii, as the Notitia in the Code finds him Cited in the Laws. This Perſon had the overſight of ſuch as Waited on the Prince out of his Chamber in the Palace; ſuch as belonged to his Pantry, Cellar, or his Table. In the dayes of Alexander Severus the Emperour, and before, one of the Liberti had the Management of the Prince his Table, by the Name and Title of Tricliniarcha, to whom at length ſucceeded this Comes Caſtrenſis. Such as under him belonged to the Table, were called Menſores, Menſæ Miniſtri, Miniſteriani, and, as he, Caſtrenſiani; either becauſe they were wont to live in the Camp with the Emperour, or, as the Souldiers had a ſort of Service in the Camp, ſo thoſe a kind of Attendance, like to that of Camp, in the Court; for thoſe that Attended in the Palace were alſo termed a Militia; and more Perſons were ſaid Militare, than thoſe that ſerved in the Camp; the word being in a ſenſe transferred both to Palatine and Religious Services. At firſt, they had Diet and other Neceſſaries found them, but this at length was turn'd into Money. The Pædagogia, or Pages, Boyes who wore Purple Caligæ, or Hoſen, the Notitia ſets under the Command of this Comes. It was his Duty alſo to look to the Buildings, Statues, and Ornaments about the Court; and by his Direction Walls of Cities were Repair'd, Caſtles built, as alſo Places for Adminiſtration of Juſtice: Bearing in his hand a Golden Rod, as the Badge of his Office. He, as Chief Gentleman-Uſher, walked before the Emperour. He might be preſent at Meals, and had the privilege to Adore the Purple. This is the Office, whom the Authors of the Byzantine Story commonly call Curopalata; and thoſe of later, or the laſt dayes of the Empire, Overſeer of the Table; who uſed the ſame Cap and Veſtments with the Logotheta Generalis, the Succeſſor of the Comes Largitionum. He had a ſmall Officium, or Attendance for keeping Accounts of Diet, and of the Utenſils and Plate belonging to the Tables. Concerning which, ſee Pancirolus, as alſo his Conjectures concerning the Enſigns of his Office; which yet are not called Inſignia in the Notitia of the Empire, (as he obſerves) having not this Word ſet above them, as neither above thoſe of Spectabilis, nor Clariſſimi, who follow (as the other of the Illuſtrious Perſons have) although their Arms be alſo placed in the Book. The Reaſon (as he thinks) might be this, that when they went abroad, they had them not borne before them, as the Illuſtrious had, but only drawn in their Commiſſions, or painted in their Court, to put them in mind of their Duty; as the Book of Mandates (or Inſtructions) which was alwayes near the Bench.

The Primicerius Notariorum.

The greater Laterculum, of which he had the Overſight.

81. After him, now next in the Notitia, follows he who had the Charge of Regiſtring all the Dignities and Offices in the Book, and this was the Primicerius Notariorum. Formerly a Catalogue of all Magiſtrates, Souldiers and Governours was written and kept by one of the Emperour's Free'd men, call'd Procurator ab Ephemeride, & à Mandatis, who moreover gave out Orders to them. Afterwards this Employment was given to Notaries, dignifyed with the Title of Tribunes, who regiſtred all that were prefer'd by the Prince to Dignities, in the greater Laterculum, which was a Volume that contained the Names of all that enjoyed any civil, or Military Dignity. The Arms of their Offices, and their Salaries; with the Commiſſions granted to Magiſtrates, and the Mandates, or Inſtructions of the Prince, as alſo the ſeveral Scholes, and ſuch as ſerved in the Numeri; with their Symbols. It had it's Name from the reſemblance which in Shape and Figure it bore to a Brick, and indeed, together with the leſſer Laterculum, comprehended well nigh all the Dignities mentioned in the Notitia; thoſe of the Largitiones & Rei Privatæ excepted; and certain Places of Magiſtracy regiſtred in the ſeveral Offices of Memoriæ, Epiſtolarum & Libellorum. This Book was managed by the Primicerius Notariorum, and his Scribes, or Clerks called Tribuni Notarii; becauſe they equal'd Tribunes in Dignity, and from the Notes they uſed in their Writings. Some write they were firſt inſtituted by Gordian the Younger. The Fees they receiv'd from Officers for their Commiſſions were very conſiderable, forty or fifty Aurei, accordding to the Rank and Quality of the Place.

Under him Tribune-Notaries.

Their Employment.

82. For they made out Commiſſions to the Magiſtrates of Provinces, and the Cities, and regiſtred their Names, with their Stipends and Allowances; of the Magiſtri Militum, together with the Legions, Cohorts, Auxilia and Vexillationes; as alſo their Commanders and Pay; thoſe of the Caſtra and the Souldiers of the Limits excepted, who belonged to the leſſer Laterculum, and the Scrinium Memoriæ. And beſides theſe, they kept the Names of ſuch as ſerv'd in the ten Scholæ, of whom many continually going in and out, they were bound, every four Months, to make new Liſts, or Maſter-Rolls; yet the eleventh, or that of the Agentes in Rebus was Regiſtred by thoſe of the Scrinium Memoriæ. The Primicerius, who by ſome is ſtyled Protonotarius, continued two years in his Office, and was then ſucceeded by his Aſſiſtant, or the Secundocerius, as this by the Tertiocerius, and the Tertiocerius by him they called Quartocerius. The Primocerius read, as did the Proconſul in the Senate, ſuch Edicts as the Emperours had made, which by a Law of Theodoſius appears; and being out of his Office, was graced with the Senatorian Dignity, and the Honorary one of Magiſter Officiorum, being equal in Place to a Proconſul, if he never roſe to the Honorary one of Magiſter. Of the Notaries under him there were three Ranks: ſome being called Tribunes and Notaries; others Domeſticks, being Secretaries to the Emperour, whoſe Secrets they wrote; and below theſe was an inferiour ſort, though called Tribune-Notaries; yet it ſeems not equal to the other, who had the ſame Place and Reſpect, as Palatine-Tribunes. The firſt ten, after the Primicerius, were privileged from Quarter at Conſtantinople, and enjoyed the Dignity of Vicars, and the Domeſticks, or Secretaries were the Fellows of Conſulares. Laſtly, it appears that none were received among the Tribune-Notaries, but ſuch as had before received the Title of Egregius, and that they were made of the Primiſcriniarii. They went girt with a Girdle, as Souldiers were wont to do.

L.33.de Petitionibus, & Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 10.

Three Ranks of them.

The three Magiſtri of ſo many Scrinia.

83. Now, at length follow the Maſters of the three Scrinia, or Offices, for by Scrinia are meant Offices, Cabinets, or Rooms, wherein ſhort Records, Edicts, Letters, Papers, and other Matters relating to Records were kept. Theſe in particular were, the Scrinium Memoriæ, Epiſtolarum, & Libellorum: the chief Officers whereof were, in Contradiſtinction to him of the Laterculum, ſtyled Magiſtri, not Primicerii; as thoſe that were next them, at this time, were termed Proximi, and not Secundocerius, nor Tertiocerius. To theſe Offices Auguſtus gave Original, who by the Advice of Mecænas, out of the Rank or Dignity of Equites, by Reaſon of Multiplicity of Buſineſs, choſe certain Perſons to take Records of ſuch Judgments as paſſed, ſuch Letters as were written, and other Matters. Afterwards ſucceeded others by the Title of Magiſtri Scriniorum, in Dignity of the Rank of Spectabilis; and in place equal to Vicars: as to their Immunities, freed from all Burthens, both Civil and Perſonal, together with their Proximi, and as to Profeſſions, ordinarily Lawyers. At firſt they continued three years, then two, afterward but one, in their Office; and quitting them were made Comites of the Conſiſtory. For in all Employments it was a Rule, to ſuffer none to continue long in place; both that Room might be made for other deſerving Perſons; and ſuch as were employ'd might not by long Continuance in any Office, be more inſtructed, and tempted to do amiſs. Next to them were the Melloproximi, or Futuroproximi, who ſucceeded the Proximi, and were of the Style and Dignity of Clariſſimi, with all the reſt that followed, as far as the Exceptores. They ſupplied the Place of the Proximus, and were in the Room of the Tertiocerius; of whom he that next followed bore the Name of Adjutant. The Number of theſe Scriniarii was ſetled, and Conſtant: for in the Scrinium Memoriæ were ſixty odd Perſons, and in the reſt thirty four a piece. Of theſe ſome were Exceptores, ſo called from taking Notes, and recording ſuch things Scrinia diximus vocari Pluteos, vel Annaria, in quibus Commentarii breves, Edicta, Epiſtolæ, Libelli, aliave literaria monumenta claudebantur. Panſirolus.

Sed de his Scriniis & Scriniariis, item Proximis, vide plura in Paratit. lib. 6. Cod. Theod. Tit. 26. de Proximis, Comitibus, &c.

as paſſed before the Prince, the Præfecti Prætorio, or Quæſtor. Under theſe was another ſort, which wrote, and were Candidates for the next Place in Ordinary which fell, into which when they came, they paid two hundred and fifty Solidi for their Admiſſion, to the Proximus, and twenty, or fifteen more to the Melloproximus; which afterward by a Conſtitution of Anaſtaſius was transferred upon their Heirs, for this is obſerved concerning all the Palatine Militia, or thoſe that ſerved in the Court, that generally ſuch as came in, at their Entrance paid certain Fees to the Seniors, or Principal of the Office. The firſt fifteen, in eſteem greater than the reſt, received alſo great Allowance from the Emperour; and at firſt in Kind, but it was afterward turned into Money. The Scriniarii, if in the Provinces, were exempted from the Burthen of Quartering, and as a Mark of their Employment, they wore a Girdle. For the Caſſock and Girdle at firſt ſeem to have been taken from the Souldier, and ſo to have paſſed into uſe, both with Civil Officers, and Eccleſiaſtical Perſons; as in other Countries, though not in England, the Cuſtom is ſtill obſerved, both by Lawyers, and others. Pancirolus obſerves, that St. Ambroſe calls theſe Scriniarii, Officia Palatina. In Civil and Criminal Matters they were judged, as all their Relations, by the Magiſter Officiorum, and paid leſſer Fees than others. Although they of the Scrinium Memoriæ be properly called Memoriales, yet ſometimes the reſt alſo go under that Name. The places of the Principal in thoſe Offices were ſo good, that Procopius writes them to have been better than an hundred Centenaries of Gold yearly.

The Scrinium Memoriæ.

84. But that we may touch a little upon the Particular Offices; and firſt, as they lye in the Notitia, upon the Scrinium Memoriæ. Princes of old, were wont to have ſuch about them, as took Notice of thoſe, who in War did gallantly demean themſelves. Theſe writing down their Names, and putting the Prince in mind of them, to Reward their good Service, had from the Effect of their Office, the Name of Memoriales. But theſe by Degrees grew out of Requeſt, and others came in their Rooms, whoſe ſpecial Charge it was to look to the leſſer Laterculum, wherein were Recorded the ſeveral Præfectſhips, Tribuneſhips, and Command of the Forts lying upon the Borders. We ſay, it was their ſpecial and principal Care; for beſides the leſſer Laterculum, there were other Records alſo kept in this Office, wherein the Memory of many other Matters was preſerved. Thoſe that dealt in the Laterculum, under the Inſpection of the Quæſtor of the Palace, are called Laterculenſes; the reſt Memoriales. The Notitia tells us, that the Magiſter Memoriæ (beſides the Charge of the Laterculum) did dictate Annotations, grant Commiſſions for Poſtage, and anſwer Petitions. Theſe Annotations were, as Pancirolus interprets the Word, ſhort Notes of ſuch things as were ordered or confirmed in the Prince his Name; who when he anſwered any thing by word of Mouth, the Magiſter dictated the Subſtance of what he ſaid, to the Proximus, who took ſhort Notes of it; or elſe the Memoriales, who from this taking or receiving had the Name of Exceptores, being in Quality ſomething above the reſt. In this Scrinium or Office were alſo kept thoſe Writings which the Prince ſubſcribed, for Approbation and Admittance of the Agentes in Rebus, and Palatine Officers under Command of the Comites Largitionum, and Rerum Privatarum; and probable it is, that by thoſe Memoriales were Recorded and kept the Names of the Places, Towns, or Stages of the Poſtage, or Curſus Publicus. That Catalogue, which goes under the Name of Antonine his Itinerary, wherein are reckoned up the Manſions, Towns, or Villages in which the Horſes were kept, being of this Nature, and probably kept in this Office; out of which the Licenſes to uſe it Iſſued. And as likely it is, that the Roll and Deſcription of the Engines of War, and the Pinaces and Veſſels, which ſerv'd on the ſeveral Limits was here alſo preſerv'd to perpetual Memory: upon which Accounts the Officers were not unfitly termed Memoriales. Of the ſixty four Perſons, which ſerved in this Office, twelve were Aſſiſtants of the Quæſtor of the Palace, and ſeven were called Antiquaries; four Greek, and three Latin; who looked to the Records, and copied out fair ſuch as Age had begun to deface. The reſt were Exceptores, or more ordinary Clerks.

Annotationis omnes dictat.

The Scrinium Epiſtolarum.

85. The Second Scrinium or Office, was that of the Magiſter Epiſtolarum. In the time of Auguſtus there ſeems to have been no ſuch Officer; for he wrote or dictated his own Letters, which afterward he left to Agrippa, and Mecænas, to be mended, or altered, as they ſhould find expedient. But not long after was brought up this ſort of Secretary, called Magiſter Epiſtolarum, who receiving from the Prince his Mouth the Subſtance of what was to be written, dictated the Letters unto Clerks. For Nero had this ſort of Office; and Suetonius, who wrote the Lives of the Cæſars, was Magiſter Epiſtolarum to the Emperour Adrian. The Notitia tells us, that this Magiſter dealt in the Embaſſies of Cities, Conſultations, and Petitions. At the Audience and Conference with Ambaſſadours of Kings or Cities he was preſent, that he might fit the Anſwers he wrote according to the occaſion. But theſe Meſſages were firſt Debated in the Auditory of the Præfectus Prætorio, without any Determination; and being Reported by thoſe of this Office in the Conſiſtory, they then wrote Anſwers according to the Emperour's Reſolution. To ſuch Preſidents, or Governours of Provinces alſo, as Conſulted the Prince concerning any doubtful Matter of Fact, they wrote Anſwers as he directed. In Appeals from Illuſtrious Perſons, or Spectabiles, they wrote the Acta, or what paſſed; as alſo in Appeals made from Duces; and from the Records they wrote, got the Name of Practicarii. This Magiſter alſo Anſwered to the Petitions of Cities, as the Magiſter Libellorum to thoſe of Private Perſons. The Tribuneſhips of Legions, which were Diſpatched by way of Epiſtle, went through his hands: The Commiſſions of Perſons Illuſtrious, and of the Dignity of Spectabilis alſo. In concluſion, all Letters of the Prince written of courſe (as for Secret Matters, it might be otherwiſe) he Diſpatched, and thence he and the Under-Officers reaped no ſmall Gain and Advantage. After him, next in order were the Proximus, and the Melloproximus, as in the Scrinium Memoriæ was obſerv'd. Thirty four ſerved in the Office, of whom Seven waited on the Quæſtor, with the Title of Aſſiſtants; and thence paſſing to the Places of Laterculenſes in the Scrinium Memoriæ, had liberty to ſell their former of Aſſiſtants. Beſides this Magiſter, the Notitia mentions another of Greek Epiſtles, whoſe Work it was to Dictate ſuch in Greek as in that Language were to be ſent abroad, or being written in Latine, to Tranſlate them into that Tongue.

Legationes Civitatum, Conſultationes, & Preces tractat.

The Scrinium Libellorum.

86. Next follows the Magiſter Libellorum, or Maſter of Requeſts; for Libellus here ſignifies a Petition. Auguſtus himſelf Diſpatched and Signed Petitions; but his Succeſſors, to eaſe themſelves of the burthen, brought up this Officer; yet ſo, as that a long time they ſubſcribed them themſelves; till growing weary of it, this their Secretary had ſeveral Scriniarii, or Clerks, who took from the Prince his Mouth (or from the Magiſter) and wrote his Anſwers. But the Notitia tells us, this Magiſter Cognitiones & Preces tractat. Cognitio ſignifies the Debating and Examining of the Cauſe when Councel was heard. For when an Appeal lay to the Prince, from one he had Delegated to Hear a Cauſe; the Præfectus Prætorio in Comitatu (he in Waiting) or the Quæſtor of the Palace heard the Matter, which was managed by this Magiſter, and his Libellenſes, or thoſe of the Office, which in the time of the Notitia were Thirty four in Number, who took the Proceſs in Writing, as the Epiſtolares did, when Appeals came from Judges of the Degree of Spectabilis. They alſo were Regiſters of the Court, at the Tryal of any Illuſtrious Perſon before the Emperour: as alſo, when any Matter in the City was referred by him unto Delegates. Whereupon Juſtinian (as Pancirolus obſerves) calls this Magiſter by the Title of Magiſter Cognitionum, and Antigrapharius, (the ſame with Referendarius in the Notitia) and this Office Scrinium Libellorum & Cognitionum. Beſides this, they of this Office gave out the Approbatory Letters or Commiſſions, by which (being ſubſcribed by the Magiſter) the Prince Approved of the Magiſtri Militum, the Comites and Duces of the Limits, and ſeveral of the Palatine, or Court-Officers; ſo that their Places muſt needs have been very Profitable. Of the Thirty four, Seven alſo Attended as Aſſiſtants upon the Quæſtor, of his own Choice; and afterward came to be Proximi, and Melloproximi. The Maſter was moſt commonly a Lawyer, and often roſe to the Dignity of Præfectus Prætorio. Such were Papinian, Aurelius, Arcadius, Chariſius, Paulus, Ulpian; and in Juſtinian's time, Conſtantine the Compiler of the Pandects, who had been Advocate in the Præfect's Court, who alſo Exerciſed the Office of Magiſter Largitionum. Theſe Libellenſes were girt with a Girdle, as the Badge of their Office, and were judged as the other Scriniarii, by the Magiſter Officiorum. As for the Magiſter, neither he, nor either of the other two preceding Maſters, had an Officium of their own, or Attendants allowed them; but, out of the Office it ſelf, took ſuch Aſſiſtants as they pleaſed.

The Scrinium of the Comes Diſpoſitionum.

87. Now, laſt of all, beſides theſe three of the Maſters, there was a fourth Scrinium, or Office under a Comes Diſpoſitionum, as he is called; of which, though the Notitia makes no mention, yet Pancirolus thinks fit to add it, as being (he tells us) frequently mention'd in other Books, though at the time when the Notitia was written, the Magiſter Epiſtolarum might do the Work; and from the Prince his Diſpoſing many things by him, might be called Magiſter Diſpoſitionum. But this Scrinium, at other times, had neither a Magiſter, nor Proximi, but inſtead of them, a Comes; and ſuch as Managed it under him were termed Referendarii, as Pancirolus thought. They repreſented the Deſires of Suppliants, and Conſultations of Judges (as he believed) to the Emperour, which Repreſentation was called Relatio, and returned Anſwers to the Conſultors, which were termed Mandata, as well as Reſponſa, and alſo Diſpoſitiones. Being few at the firſt, their number increaſed to Eighteen, by permiſſion of Juſtinian, who yet reduced them at length to Eight. Their Comes had his Aſſiſtants, and they were all obliged, as all other Scriniarii, to ſerve twenty years, and at the end of their Service, they were Adorned with the Honour of a Conſularis; and the Comes himſelf Preferred to be one of the Prince his Conſiſtory, or Council. This is the Sum of what Pancirolus hath written concerning the Scrinium Diſpoſitionum, and thoſe that Served in it, whom yet Gothofred accuſeth of Errour herein, that he Confounds them with the Referendarii. And he Affirms, that by Diſpoſitiones here are not meant Conſtitutions, Sanctions, Pragmaticks, Edicts, though theſe elſewhere come under the general Name of Diſpoſitions, but other Acts of the Prince reſpecting the Commonwealth, beſides the Sanctions of Laws, Adnotations, Anſwers to Meſſages, Embaſſies, Conſultations, Petitions, or Cognitions, all which were Diſpatched by the other three Scrinia, or Offices, viz. Memoriæ, Epiſtolarum, & Libellorum. What then? Why in theſe Diſpoſitions were moſt commonly the Proviſions of the Annona, Diſpoſitions of the Emperours Journeys and Expeditions, concerning the Creation of Magiſtrates and Publick Officers, and Matters which the Prince had propoſed to himſelf to be done. That Diſpoſitions are taken in this ſenſe, he proves out of Lampridius, Capitolinus and others.

Pancirolus his Opinion.

Rejected by Gothofred.

Ad L. 1. *lib.*6. *Cod.Th. Tit.*26. de Proximis,Comitibus,Diſpoſ. &c.

88. He concludes, that (as a Law expreſly ſpeaks) in this Scrinium was kept the Norma and Series of the Emperour's Diſpoſitions; or what was Diſpoſed in the State by him, according to the Emergency of Affairs; ſo as what in a manner he daily Acted, Deſigned and Diſpoſed, were therein contained, their number ariſing to ſo great a multitude, that it was requiſite there ſhould be a peculiar Office for them; as alſo a peculiar Comes or Magiſter. But he proves that the Scriniarii of this Office or Scrinium, were of a lower Degree than thoſe of the other three; becauſe in the other, Learning was required to Form the Conſtitutions, Anſwers and Letters of the Prince; but in theſe, only Integrity and Induſtry; and therefore, as it is evident by a Law of Gratian, that the Chief Officers of this Scrinium were alſo called Magiſtri, which ſome have denied; ſo as plain is that which he obſerves from the ſame Law, and others, that theſe Comites, or Magiſtri Diſpoſitionum, though in Name they might agree with the Maſters of the other Scrinia, yet in Degree were inferiour to them, being joyned, not with Them, but their Proximi, with whom they received, when they went out of their Offices, the Honorary Dignity of Vicars. And thus we have run through the ſeveral Offices of the State, and thereby done ſo ſerviceable a part to the Reader, as to give him a Proſpect of the Polity of the Empire; by which means he may better underſtand not only the Government, but the Hiſtories, Laws and Cuſtoms of theſe Ages. But he muſt know, that what has been ſaid of theſe ſeveral Magiſtrates, hath relation chiefly to the Eaſtern Empire, which in the time of the Notitia, and eſpecially afterward, was moſt conſiderable; That of the Weſt ſhortly after failing, which was a good reaſon why Pancirolus chiefly inſiſted upon that of the Eaſt. I muſt confeſs, ſome may judge this too tedious a courſe we take; but yet, methinks, there is more ſtill to be added; one Subject yet remaining, without which, neither this Deſign, nor the Reader's knowledge of theſe Matters, can ſeem to look toward Perfection. And that is, a ſhort Account of the Municipal Magiſtrates, or the Government of the Cities and Towns Corporate; which we ſhall alſo Diſpatch with what Brevity and Clearneſs we can.

Clariſſimos viros, Proximos Scriniorum & Magiſtros Diſpoſitionum, Vicariorum Ordini copulamus, &c.

Pancirolus in Epiſt. Dedicatoria.

Municipal Magiſtrates.

89. The Roman Prince his Task and Employment being to look to the Government of the Provinces, by placing therein ſuch Magiſtrates as he thought convenient, and to take care of the ſtate thereof, left the Matters of the particular Cities to the Management of their own Officers; contenting himſelf with the Juriſdiction and Empire over the People, and the Tributes he received from them. Therefore had each Corporation a Court, or Senate of its own for their Government, and Proviſion of all Neceſſary Things; Creation of Magiſtrates, due Management of Publick Lands or Moneys, looking to their Publick Houſes, ſes, Baths, and Forums; Repairing of Ways, equal payment of Tribute, and other Matters relating to the Common good. All Cities within the Roman Pale had their peculiar Senates, the two Capital Cities Rome and Conſtantinople excepted, which the Preſence of the Prince eaſed of that Trouble, they having Præfects (as we have ſeen) of their own, who Diſcharged the Offices of other Inferiour Magiſtrates, or Curators; and the great Senates of the Empire there ſitting, there was no need of the other leſſer and lower Courts. Theſe two were therefore Paramount, and of condition ſurpaſſing the nature of theſe Inferiour Corporations. All other Cities looked upon themſelves as Graced and Privileged by having theſe Courts and Governments; and ſome there were, which, for their Revolting to Annibal, after his coming into Italy, were deprived of them, and Diſfranchized, as Capua, Puteoli, Attala, Fundi, Formiæ and others, which thereupon ceaſed to have their Municipal Officers, but received Governours from the People of Rome, or the Prætor, for many Ages; till by the Emperour they were Reſtored to their Courts, Judges, and Magiſtrates. But not only Cities (Civitates & Urbes) had their Senates, or Courts, but alſo Towns (Oppida) Free Burroughs, (Municipia) nay Villages (Vici) certain Manſions (Manſiones) and Forts or Caſtles (Caſtella) have had theirs too.

All Cities had their Senates.

Quemadmodum urbs Roma ſuos habuit Tribunos Plebis, ſuos Regionum Curatores, ſuos Conſules, ſuum Senatum, ità quoque & Municipia pro Tribunis Plebis habuere Defenſores, habuere & ſuos Curatores: Item pro Conſulibus Magiſtratus, id eſt Duumviros, pro Senatu Ordines, ſive Curias. Vide Gothofred. in L. 5. de Exhibend. & tranſmittend. reis. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 2. Paratitlon Tit. 1. Lib. 12. Cod. Theod. de Decurionibus.

90. The Senators of theſe Courts are ſometimes called Curiales, Municipes, and otherwiſe, but eſpecially Decuriones; in reſpect of their Care of the Publick, they were termed Fathers, the Nerves and Strength of the Cities, ſtyled Eminent, and joyned in Degree and Repute with the Honorati; the other Inhabitants being, in Diſtinction from them called Plebeians. For they in many things reſembled the Roman Senate, by the Example of which, the Sons of theſe Decuriones follow'd the Condition of their Fathers, and their Names were written in the Table called Album, as thoſe of the Senators were. Firſt were written thoſe that Excelled in Dignity, and then others, according to their Seniority in the Place; and ſuch as had Sons were preferred before ſuch as wanted. Further, as at Rome he was made Prince, or Chief of the Senate, who was more Eminent than the reſt, in reſpect of his more Honourable Atchievements; ſo was he that had paſſed through all Offices in the City, made Chief of the Court. And as at Rome once there were two Orders or Diſtinctions of Senators, viz. of Illuſtrious Perſons, and thoſe ſtyled Clariſſimi; ſo amongſt theſe Decuriones, ſuch as had paſſed through all Employments, were of a Principal Rank, and were termed Principales. They were more or fewer according to the Quantity of the Place they Inhabited; ſometimes Seven, Ten, or Twenty, and called Icoſoproti in Greek, as the Honour it ſelf Icoſoprotia. At Alexandria indeed there were but five Summates, and ſcarcely fewer any where elſe. Every one of them, according to his Place, was firſt asked his Opinion, as was obſerved in the Roman Senate.

which in many things reſembled that of Rome.

How the Decuriones came to be ſuch.

91. But for a more diſtinct Knowledge, how they came to the Dignity of Decuriones, we muſt know, that they were either ſuch from their Fathers, or Promoted. The Sons of ſuch Perſons, as we ſaid, followed the Condition of their Fathers, whether Adopted, or born of Lawful Matrimony; for as for the Spurious Brood, it neither enjoyed any ſuch Privilege in this, nor any other Matters. And only by the Father's ſide had they a Title to this Degree, not by the Mother's, except in the Court of Antioch; in which City this Right, by the Indulgence of Princes, was allowed to ſuch as were born of a Daughter of a Decurio, though their own Fathers never aroſe ſo high. Here Pancirolus tells us from Ulpian, that they could not come to any Government till the five and twentieth year of their Age; which, though but begun, was to be taken and eſteemed Compleat; though as to other Offices, the twenty fifth ought to be fully ended; according to which opinion of Ulpian, Michael Hoſpitalius, Chancellor of France, in the Year MDLXIII at Roüen, proved Charles the Ninth, the French King, at the entrance of his Fourteenth Year, to be of Age or Puberty. But it appears from a Law cited by Gothofred, that the Sons of theſe Decuriones, though but of Eighteen years of Age, and as yet not Emancipated or Looſed from the Paternal Power, were obliged to undergo the Offices or Employments of the Cities: and ſuch as were thus born, as Pancirolus himſelf Notes, were, though under pretence of Religion they had choſen the Monaſtical Life, drawn back again, and forced to Publick Service. So much for them whoſe Deſcent caſt both this Honour and Burthen upon them. Others were, upon Vacancy of Places, choſen by the Court; and the Plebeians or Citizens were, though unwilling, compell'd to Accept of the Charge, if they had not a reaſonable Ex-

None ſuffred to quit.

Few excepted.

Vide Paratitlon.

Excuſe, as old Souldiers, and ſome others; and if they were not yet arrived at eighteen years, if they were in Orders; but Jews were not excepted; provided they bore not any Office belonging to their Synagogues. And if once in this Relation, by the Laws they were ſeverely prohibited to deſert their Station, which many, tired out with the Trouble they met with, were wont to do, or by Employments inconſiſtent with their City-Duties to divert themſelves from the. By Degrees, they were to run through all the Offices of the Court, and not till then arrive at any Service, or Dignity, which if they undertook, they were to be forced back again. Yet, if they had taken Orders, the Conſtitutions, as the Affections and Inclinations of Princes were various, in that Particular. Generally they obliged them, either to return back, or find Subſtitutes, or leave their Patrimonies to the Courts. Several Exceptions there were in Favour of ſome, eſpecially ſuch as ſerved in the Palace. Alſo they could not be excuſed though by Connivance of the Court it ſelf, neither by the Favour of the Prince, but for a certain time, nor by the Sentence of a Judge, neither by a Subſtitute (except Clerks promoted to Dignity) without they had paſſed all the Offices, or could be excuſed for their Age.

When and how elected.

Their Employment.

To Phyſitians and Profeſſors they paid Salaries.

92. On the firſt of March the Promotion of theſe Senators or Curiales was wont to be made. The Court being ſummon'd by the Duumviri, by a publick Meſſenger, according to the Cuſtom of the City. Two Parts of the Court, at leaſt, were to be preſent, and the Preſident of the Province at all Elections. The Duumviri, or Cenſors named whom they thought fit, and thereupon the Suffrages being gathered, the Election was perfected by the Voices of the Major part, and the Approbation of the Preſident, who ſignified it to the Perſon by a Publick Meſſenger. If he pretended an Excuſe, he appealed to the Preſident, and if upon Tryal his Excuſe was found good, he that nominated him was condemned as to Coſts. To this grinning Honour ſuch were prefer'd, as had moſt Voices, or were Fathers of more Children, and for a Concluſion their Names were entred into the Album, or Liſt of the Court. From one newly admitted, certain Gifts, or Fees were due to the old Curiales, and divided amongſt them, which they called Sportulæ. Now having entred upon their Offices, their uſual Tasks, and Employments were, both various and troubleſome, which often provoked them (as we ſaid) by ſeveral Courſes to evade them. To them in general the whole Care of the Publick was committed. They were employed in Proſecutions. They managed the Revenue of the place, of which the third part was laid out for repairing the Walls, and publick Baths, the reſt for maintaining of Profeſſors, and other publick Uſes. For they alſo maintained Phyſitians to take Care of their Sick, with a certain Salary. Neither did the Preſident of the Province herein meddle; but the Curiales themſelves made choice of ſuch, to whom for their Honeſty and Skill, they thought fit to commit themſelves and their Relations. And theſe are termed Archiatri, or principal Phyſitians. Grammarians alſo, Rhetoricians and Sophiſts, or Philoſophers they had under Pay for inſtructing of their Youth. The leſſer ſort of Towns had uſually but five Phyſitians, and three Profeſſors. The middle ſort ſeven of the firſt, and four only of the latter ſort; but the greateſt ten Phyſitians, and five Grammarians, or Rhetoricians. Except to ſuch as theſe, no Salary could be allowed by the Publick; and in Caſe any ſuch were decreed, the Decree, as partial was accounted Null and Void. As for Profeſſors of Law, no ſuch were permitted to teach, except at Rome in the Capitol, at Conſtantinople, or Berytus. But to ſpeak further to the Duties of the Decuriones. Sometimes they had the Care of the publick Poſtage, or Curſus Publicus, and ſeveral other Services from the State were impoſed on them. For Example, they were made Suſceptores in other Provinces, Procurators of Mines and other Charges, and in the Corporation exerciſed that Power we lately mentioned, the whole Intereſt thereof being their Concern. The ten Principal of them gathered the Tributes, and if any was wanting, made it up themſelves. In Reſpect to which Duties they were not permitted to live in the Country. Though they managed the publick Revenue, and by Curators let out the Lands; yet without a Decree they could not alienate them, nor ſend a Meſſage to the Prince without Conſent of the Preſident. In caſe any of them died without Iſſue, he was bound to leave the fourth part of his Eſtate to the Court; which Cuſtom made moſt of them ſo deſperate as to be Spend-thrifts, and chuſe rather to waſte their Eſtates, than ſo to leave them: and ſome abſtained from Marriage, that they might not leave their Sons obnoxious to the Court, or Body; very few concerning themſelves for it more than Neceſſity conſtrained. It was fit therefore, they ſhould have many Privileges, to invite them to undertake ſo troubleſome a Task.

Their Privileges.

93. The chief of all their Privileges was this, that neither they, nor their Sons by the Governours of the Provinces could be put to the Rack, or have any ſuch Extremity uſed to them as was wont to be inflicted on ordinary Perſons ſuſpected; except they were found to have defrauded the Corporation of it's Money, or Revenue; in which caſe they might be beaten on the Back with leaden Bullets. They were alſo lyable to a ſevere Examination in the Caſe of Counterfeiting Writings. But further, if they fell into Poverty, they were to be maintain'd by the Publick, eſpecially if that had hapned to them by their Liberality to the Corporation. If any one entred into any Office of Magiſtracy, took the Toga Virilis, or married, it was the Cuſtom, that they ſhould be invited by them, and receive one, or two Denarii of the Party. Some of them, that had paſſed through all Offices, and arrived at the higheſt Place of the Court, were honoured with the Dignity of Comites of the firſt Rank. A Baſtard-Son by his Father offered to the Court, became Legitimate, and a Baſtard-Woman, if married to a Decurio. As Senators at Rome by the Laticlavium, ſo little doubt it is, but they by a peculiar Habit (though not known what it was) as well as by other Enſigns of Magiſtracy were diſtinguiſhed from the inferiour Sort. On Feſtival days, as upon News of ſome Victory, or the Prince his Birth-day, they wore Garlands. Without the ſpecial Command of the Emperour, they could neither be ſummoned upon any Law-matter to Rome, nor Conſtantinople, nor into any other Province. In ſome Countreys it was alſo the Cuſtom to have certain Courts, or Colleges, which they termed Synedria, out of which Cauſes could not be determined.

The Manner of their Proceeding in Buſineſs was after that of the Senate at Rome.

94. Now the manner of their Proceedings in Buſineſs, much reſembled that of the Roman Senate. As the Senate was called together at Rome by order of the Conſuls, or Prætor; ſo theirs by that of their Duumviri: That was ſummoned by a Præco, or publick Cryer, and ſo was theirs. In both they took Place according to their Quality. Two parts of three it was neceſſary ſhould be preſent at the Court, and if any Matter of Difficulty occurred, one of the Duumviri, who propounded the Buſineſs, asked the Opinions of the Curiales, Man by Man, beginning with him that was of beſt Quality. Precedence was uſually given to him that had moſt Children, except at Syracuſe, where no man was asked by Name, but, as now in our Parliament, ſpake of his own Accord; though it was the Cuſtom there alſo for thoſe that in Age or otherwiſe excelled, to begin: but if all held their Peace, by Lot they were compelled to deliver their Opinions. Of old the Decuriones gave their Suffrages by word of Mouth, or written on ſmall pieces of wood, as at Rome the Senators, and the Summates only ſpake; as in the City the Illuſtrious Senators; the reſt ſhewed their Opinions by Diſceſſion, each going over to that Party he approv'd; and what pleaſed the Major part was received, and called Decretum Ordinis, or the Decree of the Order, or Body. This Courſe was obſerved, till by the Tabellarian Law this Diſceſſion was forbidden, and Votes ordered to be paſſed ſilently by Writing, of which Pliny (as Pancirolus obſerves) doth complain. As the Reſolves of the Senate of Rome were wont to be Noted by thoſe Letters, S. C. ſo the Decrees of the Decuriones by D. D. Such was the Work, Honour and Employment of the Decuriones, while they continued in that Place or Relation; and Difficultly, if they would, could they leave it. Indeed by Deportation or Relegation, as a Puniſhment, they were Degraded. On the other ſide, ſcarcely could they get off except they had paſſed through all the Offices. Sometimes yet they were Excuſed by certain Privileges, as of Merit, Age, Number of Children, Service at Court, and in the Camp, publick Adminiſtration or Dignity; if by Merit, not Favour they had obtained it; alſo by being publick Meſſengers or Ambaſſadors, and having ſerved as an Official the ſpace of five and twenty years. If they aroſe to the Sublime Honours of Patrician, or ordinary Conſul, but not Honorary, or only by Patent of that Dignity. Moreover, the Præfecti Prætorio, Magiſtri Militum, the Advocates of the Fiſcus, the Principes of the Agentes in Rebus, and the Proximi of the Scrinia were diſcharged of the Trouble.

Who might be diſcharged of the Trouble.

Magiſtrates in Cities, as, Duumviri.

95. We have mentioned the paſſing of the Decuriones through ſeveral Offices; now what theſe were we muſt alſo tell the Reader. The higheſt Place of Magiſtracy was that of the Duumviri, or Duumviratus, ſo called, becauſe exerciſed by two Perſons, as the Conſulſhip was at Rome; though ſometimes, according to the Cuſtoms of the Cities, or Towns, there might be four, or five, who held the chief Magiſtracy, and be called alſo by other Names; as Ædilis, Prætor, and Dictator. The (a) Duumviri could only be made of the Decuriones, and the chiefeſt of them: and conſequently, the City of Alexandria, being wont to be Subject to Kings, as it

Magiſtratus pro Duumviro ſumitur in toto Tit. Cod. Th. de Decurionibus; & alibi.

it had no Decuriones, ſo none of the other ſort, but from Cæſar received a Judge, who was called the Juridicus of Alexandria, and exerciſed all the Powers belonging to the Duumviri, with whom he is often compared; to him, and alſo to them Power of aſſigning Tutors being granted: but herein his Authority exceeded theirs, that he had Cogniſance of the greateſt civil Cauſes, whereas the leſſer ſort were only triable before them. This ſeems to have been a Reaſon, becauſe He was created by the Emperour, and they only by the Corporation; but Severus put an end to this Difference, by introducing Decuriones alſo into this City. The Duumviri, by way of Eminency, are in the Laws termed Magiſtratus Municipales, and ſimply Magiſtratus. The ſame Form was obſerved in creating them, as in chuſing the Decuriones, only they were nominated two or three Months before they entred their Office; that in caſe they had juſt Cauſes to excuſe themſelves, others might be choſen in convenient time. If no fit Excuſe could be alleaged, though unwilling, they were compelled to undertake the Charge, and to give Caution for their juſt Adminiſtration. In old time they had Lictors, or Beadles, that went before them, but bore no Faſces, but only a Rod or Staff, as Virgers now. But this Cuſtom was afterwards changed, and at length every where the Faſces came to be uſed. They wore alſo the Prætexta, or Robe with a Purple Border.

Their Authority.

96. But now in Reference to their Power; they might be Judges in Cauſes to a certain Sum; but could not exerciſe thoſe Authorities, which belonged more to Merum Imperium, than Juriſdiction; as to reſtore one in Integrum, and other Matters: but they might take Caution of the Parties to traverſe greater Matters before other Magiſtrates. They had Power alſo of making Records, or Acta, by which are meant the Entries of ſuch things as were made before a Judge, either in pleading, or Matter of Proof, wont to be made in the Preſence of three Curiales; but this Juſtinian would not have inſerted into his Code; and they might cauſe Diſtreſs to be made for Payment of Coſts: they could chaſtize Slaves, and ſend away Fugitives to be puniſhed by the Governour of the Province. Some ſay they had no Authority to convict free Perſons; but others alleage the Caſe of St. Paul and Silas to the contrary, who by the Magiſtrates of the Philippians were, both impriſoned, and beaten, and diſmiſſed the Day following; as in the Acts of the Martyrs, many Chriſtians are ſaid to have been caſt into Bonds by the Municipal Magiſtrates. They might aſſign Tutors, provided the Eſtate of the Pupil did not exceed five hundred Solidi; the Richer being reſerved to the Juriſdiction of the Governours of Provinces. They took Caution for Pupils alſo at their own Peril; for if the Sureties failed, They were to make it good. In ſome Cities they Manumitted, ſo as to make the Parties Roman Citizens; whereas others were but Liberti, or free'd men of Latium, or Latines. They contracted for, and in the Name of the Corporation, and recovered Moneys left to it, at their own Peril. Theſe Troubles might well excuſe them from being Tutors, or Curators to Perſons under Age; and while they were Magiſtrates, they could neither ſue, nor be ſued. In ſome Cities, as is alleaged, they might hold for five years together; but generally, as of other Officers, their Employment was but annual.

Pancirolus de Magiſtrat. Municipal. C. 8.

Defenſor Civitatis.

97. Next after the Duumviri was the Defenſor Civitatis, or Defender of the City, by the Greeks called Syndick; which was a ſingle Employment reſembling much the Office of the old Roman Tribunes, as that of the Duumviri did the other of Conſuls. For of the Duumviri none could be made a Defenſor, but he was created of ſome fitting and able Man amongſt the other Citizens, being ſometimes alſo ſtyled Defenſor Plebis. For his Work was, as his Title imported, to defend the common ſort, and ſo alſo the whole Corporation from Injuries and Oppreſſions. In his Election the Biſhop, Clerks and Curiales of the Place were concern'd; upon whom, by a Conſtitution of Theodoſius it was incumbent, to make choice of the Perſon, who was afterward to be confirmed by the Præfectus Prætorio; having taken his Oath to Act in all things, according to Law: and the City for his Commiſſion, if he was of the better ſort, paid four, if of the inferiour, three Solidi; for he himſelf was at no Expence, receiving no Reward, or Salary, except ſuch was the particular Cuſtom. His great Work was, to decide pecuniary Cauſes amongſt his Countrymen, and to be Judge of the ordinary ſort in their Suits and Quarrels; though in old time his Authority in ſuch Caſes reached, as high as fifty Aurei, wherein the Parties were bound to come before him, and not before the Preſident of the Province, except by way of Appeal. Lighter criminal Cauſes he might hear, but his Animadverſion upon the greateſt Offender could only extend to Impriſonment, and then ſending him, in the Name of the Accuſer, to the Preſident, to be puniſhed. Teſtaments, Inſtruments of Contracts and Donations were regiſtred with him; and the Nonnullis Agoræi, apud Aſianos.

How Elected.

His Work.

the Acts of ſuch Proceſſes, as were under his Cogniſance, being taken by an Exceptor, that was ſent from amongſt the Officium or Attendants of the Preſident, and afterwards tranſmitted to a publick Office called Archivum, of which there was a Præfect, or Overſeer, to take Care they were not ſpoiled by Duſt, or any other way obliterated. To this Defenſor the Care of keeping the Multitude in order was committed, as alſo of protecting it, and the Price of vendible things. He aſſiſted ſuch as collected Tributes, againſt thoſe who neglected to pay them, and executed, as it were, the Place of the Preſident of the Province in the Town. It was his Task to purſue and find out fugitive Slaves, belonging either to the Publick, or to private Perſons. At firſt theſe Defenſores continued in their Places for five years, but afterward the Term was limited to two, which expir'd, other Citizens ſucceeded for the ſame time.

98. One of the moſt incumbent and Preſſing Duties upon the Decuriones was, to ſee the Tributes duely collected; for which Purpoſe they made Choice of ſome one Citizen to collect or receive them, who thence had the Name of Suſceptor. He was choſen in the Court, much what after the ſame manner as the Decuriones themſelves. One, or more named him at their Peril (for they were reſponſible for him in Caſe he failed) and the Record thereof being taken by the Clerk of the Court; he certified therein, both the Name of the Receiver, and Undertaker for him to the Preſident of the Province. The Suſceptor of the Corporation (for there were, as we have formerly touched, other Suſceptores of the publick Revenue in the Countreys) might be choſen, either out of the Body of the Decuriones, or from amongſt the Plebeians, (ſo they were termed) or inferiour ſort; but the Office was not reckoned amongſt thoſe they accounted Sordid. His main Work was, in the Preſence of the Defenſor Civitatis, to take an Account of every Mans Land, and what was owing, and then to demand and receive from every one the fiftieth part of Wheat, the fortieth of Barley, and the twentieth of Wine and Lard, which was ſent to the publick Storehouſes, and there kept by the Præpoſiti, or Overſeers of them. He alſo gathered what Poll-money was due, or Money uſually rais'd otherwiſe from Lands, and ſuch yearly Sums as were impoſed by the Prince after this manner. The Town-Clerk gave in an Account from his Office, what was due from each Perſon; and ſuch as were behind, or negligent to pay, the Apparitors of the Court were ſent to take it, and then they brought it to the Suſceptor, who gave a Note to him that paid it, wherein the Sum, the Cauſe of Payment, the name of the Party, the Conſul, Month and Day were expreſſed. This was termed Securitas, and Apocha, as the Payment of Tribute it ſelf Collatio, which though variouſly made, according to the ſeveral Nature and Cuſtoms of the ſeveral Provinces; yet all agreed in three certain Portions enjoyn'd by the Prince, at the firſt of January, firſt of May, and about the beginning of September; at which time the Indictions began. The Grounds of ſuch as deferred Payment were forfeited to the Emperour, and ſold. The Money gathered was committed to the Arcarius, or Under-Treaſurer, (ſuch Pancirolus thinks to have been Eraſtus, whom St. Paul mentioneth from Corinth, though Lawyers tranſlate him Adminiſtrator, or Curator) who was choſen after the ſame manner as the Suſceptor. He kept it not long in his hands, but ſpeedily tranſmitted it to the Præfectus Theſaurorum, or Treaſurer of the Province, who ſent it up to Court with all convenient Expedition. Such was the Employment of the Suſceptor, or Receiver, who only medled with ſuch things as we have named, or Money (not with Cloaths) paid by the Provincials for every twenty, or thirty Acres of Land; for theſe were received by others. He held his Office for a year, except the Cuſtom of the Place, or the Scarcity of men prolonged his Term unto two; neither could he undertake it again, till he had given Account of his former Adminiſtration. Every Suſceptor was bound to gather up, not only what was due within his own Year, but all Arrears; till at length, Anaſtaſius eaſed the Decuriones of this Trouble, by ordaining in every City other Collectors of Tributes, called Vindices, who continued in Being till the Reign of Juſtinian.

The Suſceptor.

Quòd Debita Publica ſuſciperet.

Vide Gothofred. Comm. in L. 54. lib. 12. Cod. Th. Tit. 1. de Decurionibus.

His Office.

The Arcarius or under-Treaſurer.

Ad Rom. ult.

Ἔραστος ὁ οἰκονόμος τῆς πόλεως.

Vindices.

99. As the Prince had theſe his Officers in the Cities or Places corporate, for Collection of his Revenue; ſo the Corporations alſo, having Lands uſually, Money, or Houſes of their own belonging to their Body, had a peculiar Officer called Curator, or Procurator, Logiſta, and Actor Publicus, who took the Charge of them, and let them out, as was thought convenient; the uſual Term not exceeding five Years. Such Money or Goods as lay in private Hands, he recovered, and procur'd the publick Buildings to be repair'd, being obliged to make good, out of his own Eſtate, whatever Detriment the Corporation receiv'd. He ſet a Price of Vi-

The Procurator.

of Victuals; ſaw that the Army had Proviſions, and Compelled ſuch as ſuffered their Houſes to Decay, and to be an .Eye-ſore to the City, to Repair them. That Publick Places were not poſſeſſed by Private Perſons, he took care; and in ſuch Caſes ſo Repreſented the whole Corporation, that if any went about to Build there, and he gave warning to him, it was the ſame as if he had done it to the whole Body; for what, in ſuch Matters, was forbidden him, was forbidden to the City it ſelf; but in moſt places a peculiar Officer was choſen for this Affair, whom Papinian calls Ædilis. The Curator paid alſo the Publick Debts, and Let out the Publick Money, but not to Intereſt, which was the Task of the Præfect of the Calendar. He, and other Curators were obliged every year to clear the Accounts. Sometimes there were more than one of them. Alexander the Emperour, made at Rome (as Lampridius writes) fourteen Curators of the City, to Hear and Determine Matters with the Præfect.

The Curator Annonæ.

100. But nothing being of greater Concernment in all Places, than that Proviſions, or Victuals ſhould not be wanting; in Old time an Officer was Created by the Decuriones, for the conſtant Supply thereof, by the Name of Curator Annonæ. He bought up, at the beſt hand, Corn, when need required, to be Diſtributed amongſt the Poor at a Moderate Rate, by Ædiles, choſen by the Duumviri for this purpoſe. Theſe Curators had an Officium, or Company of Officers and Serjeants Commanded by a Centurion, who had the charge of Conveying and Laying up Corn; and if Sacks were wanting, might take them from any of the Inhabitants, and uſe them for the preſent time. Of this nature was the Office of the Præfectus Annonæ at Rome; who, though at firſt he was no Magiſtrate, yet afterwards had Juriſdiction given him over ſuch as Traded in Wheat, Barley, and the like; which Authority is preſumed alſo to have been Exerciſed by theſe Curators of other Places. It was a Perſonal Employment, wherein they were not bound to be at any Expence themſelves, but only their Perſonal Labour was requir'd. The Corn was not to be ſold dearer nor cheaper than the Time requir'd; and if any City was in Want, the Emperour uſually compelled other Places to ſupply it at a Reaſonable Price. One, under twenty five years, was not to be compelled to this Office, except the Cuſtom and Orders of the Places were otherwiſe. It's uſually in Books, after the Greeks, called Sitonia; for which, for a long time, the Decuriones being wont to chuſe this Curator, afterwards one of the Officers or Apparitors of the Preſident, with the Conſent of the Biſhop and the Primates of the City, was appointed to Diſcharge it.

Epiſcopus, or Inſpector.

Curator Calendarii.

101. That there might be a ſufficient proviſion of Corn, the Curator was to take care; but this was not enough; the People or Inhabitants being wont not to buy it unbaked, but in Bread; and therefore that Bread and other ſorts of Victuals might not be Adulterated, but ſold in due Weight and Meaſure, yet a more Peculiar Officer than the Curator was wont to be choſen, whom they called Epiſcopus, or Inſpector, being taken out from the Body of the Decuriones. He had his Name from his Overſight or Inſpection, which cauſed the Athenians to give the ſame to an Officer of theirs, whom they ſent to obſerve the Actions of ſuch Cities and Places as were under their Command. At Rome this Task was Incumbent vpon the Ædiles, who had the Care not only of Vendible things, but of other Matters. But to come to the other Officers. As it often hapned, that Cities or Places Corporate had Money to ſpare, beſides ſuch as was laid out on Neceſſary Expences, there was another Choſen by the Prætor, for putting out to Intereſt ſuch, as elſe would lye idle, who bore the Title of Curator Calendarii, for a Book of Debts or Accounts of that nature was called Calendarium, becauſe in thoſe Times Intereſt was uſually paid on the Calends, or firſt dayes of every Month, their Bonds being uſually payable in one Month. Beſides theſe already mentioned, Corporations were wont to Create other Curators upon occaſion: as if any Debtor's Eſtate, by Decree of the Prætor was ſeized on, a Curator was appointed for the Management of it by the Duumviri. If any Publick Building was to be made, or Repaired, ſome were alſo wont to be Named by the Prætor, called Curatores Operum. Others were Aſſigned for looking to the Baths, and Walls of Towns, to the Repairing of which, the third part of the Revenue was wont to be appointed. Others to Publick Bake-houſes. Some to proſecute Debtors to the Publick, and others to make or Repair High-wayes, Aquæducts, or Publick Works, which the Ædiles, or Curators of the Place had not leiſure to Attend. And in ſome places a peculiar Treaſurer for keeping Publick Money was Ordain'd, whom, after the Example of the Romans, they called Quæſtor.

De Curatore Urbis, vide Annotat. Valeſii in Ammiani Marcellini, lib. 14. P. 18.

Curator eſt is, qui pecuniam Reipub. & generaliter quicquid ad Civitatis rem pertinet, adminiſtrat; Græcè Logiſta, & nonnunquam ab Imperatore dari ſolitus.

102. There

Zygoſtates.

Procuratores Metallorum.

Actor or Syndicus.

Stationarii, or, Irenarchæ.

102. There being wont to be much Controverſie about the Goodneſs and Weight of Gold, for deciding thereof in each City, one skilful in that way, was appointed, whom the Greeks called Zygoſtates. In Macedonia or other Countreys adjoyning, after the finding out of Mines, from among the Decuriones certain were appointed to ſee that the Eight Scruples of Oare were duely paid to the Prince, and theſe were Termed Procuratores Metallorum, who were under the Comes Metallorum, and he and they Reſponſible to the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum. And whereas Places Corporate might Sue and be Sued, they made choice of ſome one, who, if unwilling, was conſtrain'd to accept of the Duty, to be their Sollicitor General, who by the Latins was called Actor, and by the Greeks Syndicus : although it was a thing not out of uſe, for the Decuriones to leave it to the Diſcretion of the Duumviri, to find out ſome fitting Perſon to ſollicit ſome particular Cauſe. It was a Cuſtom alſo in old time, for prevention of Tumults, Suppreſſion of Thieves and Troubleſome Perſons, to have Souldiers or Armed Men placed at certain Poſts in a City or Country, who gave notice of ſuch Crimes as were committed in theſe kinds, to the Preſident of the Province; and from the ſeveral Stations they held, they were called Stationarii, being firſt appointed to this Service by Auguſtus. Their Duty was to give Notice of ſuch Perſons, but ſcarcely to commit them to Priſon, except they were Fugitives; and it was at their Peril, if they Accuſed Innocent Perſons. As in the Weſtern Parts of the Empire they were called Stationarii, ſo in the Eaſtern, Irenarchæ, or Keepers of the Peace; which Name, in a peculiar Manner, ſeems given to their Officers, or Commanders. Theſe Stationarii, or Irenarchæ had Allowance from the Publick, both for Man and Horſe; having, beſides the Employment but now mentioned, another of taking Cuſtom of ſuch Merchandize as was imported. But whether, as often we ſee in Military men, their Idleneſs corrupted their Manners, and their Debaucheries caſt them into ſuch Want, as provoked them, for Supply, to take ſuch Courſes as tended to the Diſturbance of thoſe Countries and Places, to which they were appointed for a Defence and Security; in time they grew ſo ſcandalous, that Theodoſius the Younger, thought fit by a Conſtitution now extant in his Code, to aboliſh them, and give order to the Præfectus Prætorio to commit their Employment to others of the richer ſort of the Towns, or Country, who from any Want, as it ſeems, might not have ſuch Temptation to Rapacity. Afterwards, when Juſtinian's Code was compoſed, Tribonian utterly prevented this Conſtitution of Theodoſius, and by one interpolated, or patcht up together, ordains the Irenarchæ (whom contrary to what Theodoſius ſaith, that they hindred the Concord of the Provinces, ſaith, that they were the Procurers of Concord, Peace and Quietneſs;) to be choſen by the Decuriones, and appointed by the Preſident of the Province. And indeed otherwiſe it appears, that the Decuriones themſelves were employed about the Apprehenſion of Thieves and Robbers; and therefore the Title of Irenarchæ is placed in Theodoſius his Code, as Gothofred obſerves, amongſt ſuch as belong to Decuriones; becauſe this Task of Diligence was impoſed upon the Wealthier ſort, and conſequently upon the Decuriones; who moſt commonly, were the richeſt Perſons in the Corporations.

Vide Gothofred. Comment. in L. unic. Cod. Theod. lib. 12. tit. 14. de Irenarchis.

Pancirol. de Magiſtrat. Municipalibus, C. 18.

Limenarchæ.

Archeota, or, Antiquarii.

103. But as in moſt Cities and Places adjoyning to them, through which the ordinary Roads did lye, theſe Stationary Souldiers were appointed to keep Watch; ſo in the Havens, where Ships were wont frequently to arrive, were other Officers ordained to take Care againſt the Invaſion of Enemies or Pyrates, for Security of Ships, Apprehenſion of Thieves, Prevention of Tumults, and of conveying any Oyl, Wine, Lard or Iron to Barbarians, who were Enemies to the Empire. Theſe were called Limenarchæ, and created out of the Body of the Decuriones, where there were Havens: of which the moſt Famous were theſe of Capua in Campania, Dyrrachium in Epyrus; and Brunduſium in Calabria; Beſides theſe Aquileia whence they ſailed to Cyrene, and Berytus in Syria, whence they paſſed to Brunduſium. But thoſe that excelled were that of Alexandria, then the Emporium of the World; and Hoſtia, or the Haven of Rome, to which the whole Empire had Recourſe. In ſome Places were created Ædiles, for diſcharging thoſe things incumbent upon the Curators of the Cities, who looked to the Rivers, Bridges, Walls and High-ways, eſpecially having Power of Fining, and of deſtroying any thing that annoyed Travellers. Further there was another Officer, whom they termed Archeota, becauſe he had the overſight of the Place where the Records of the Town were kept; in Greek called Archeum; as alſo Chartophylacium, and Grammatophylacium, in Latin Tabularium, and Antiquarium, as thoſe that had the Care of them Antiquarii. There were Limenarcha, Græcè, Portûs Præfectus.

Tabularii.

De Tabulariis vide omnino Comment. Gothofr. in L. 1. de Tabulariis, Logographis & Cenſualibus, Cod. Th. lib. 8. tit. 2. Cave Tabularios cum Tabellionibus commiſceas.

others that went by the General Names of Tabularii, and Scribes: ſuch were properly Tabularii, that kept Books of Accounts, and therein Entred ſuch as paid Tributes; being, both they and their Sons obnoxious to this Service. Such as kept the Accounts of Tributes were alſo called Logographi: Thoſe that were properly termed Scribes, and their Office or Employment Scribatus, were the Clerks of Courts, who wrote down what paſſed before the Magiſtrates and the Duumviri, or Defenſores Civitatum. There were others known by the Name of Cenſuales, who under the Magiſter Cenſûs wrote, and kept the Publick Records wherein Teſtaments were proved; but eſpecially was kept an Account of the Patrimony of each Citizen. The Decuriones were not to be compelled to this Employment, but having willingly taken it up, had not the liberty to lay it down at pleaſure. At firſt the Tabularii were Publick Slaves, but afterwards it was ordained, that Free Perſons only ſhould be Elected.

Gymnaſiarchæ.

Xenoparochus.

Camelarii.

Nyctoſtrategi.

Agonothetæ.

Maſtigophori.

Legati, or Meſſengers Employed to the Emperour.

104. The Greeks were wont in Large places compaſſed with Galleries, to Exerciſe themſelves; in Inner Chambers adjoyning, to Waſh and be Anointed; and near to thoſe Rooms were the Exhedræ, where Philoſophers met and Diſputed; the Overſeers of which Places had the Name of Gymnaſiarchæ. It was a Cuſtom, that when Ambaſſadours came into Cities, they ſhould be preſented with Neceſſaries at the Publick Expenſe, for which a peculiar Officer was appointed, with the Name of Xenoparochus. There were Camelarii, who had the care of Camels, which carried the Baggage of the Army in Expeditions; as alſo others, who looked to the Conveying of Proviſions and Souldiers clothes, which the Towns were bound to find. All which were Perſonal Employments, not obliging to any Expenſe, but only Perſonal Labour. For prevention of Fires, which ordinarily happen by Night, there were the Nyctoſtrategi. And for the Regulating of Publick Paſtimes, Exerciſes, or Races, the Agonothetæ, who had thoſe that went with Rods before them, to beat away, and remove the Crowd, and thence had the Name of Maſtigophori, though unwilling, compelled to this Perſonal Service. And laſtly, from out of the Body of the Decuriones, were certain choſen, and termed Legati, being conſtrained to go as Meſſengers from the Corporation to the Prince, if the number of three Sons alive, or a Meſſage ſent on within two years before, could not Excuſe them. At firſt, upon very ſlight Errands theſe Legati were wont to be ſent, as, merely to ſalute the Emperour, which put the Cities to great Charge; but afterwards it was Ordained, that none ſhould be ſent but upon Neceſſary Buſineſs, and that to be, as ſuch, approved by the Preſident of the Province, who was obliged to Accompany them with his Letters, as the Præfectus Prætorio was to Approve the Meſſage of the whole Province. None was compelled to undertake the Journey and Employment at his own Charge, but received a Viaticum, or Allowance termed Legativum; being firſt choſen by the City, and thereupon a Decree made and Signed by the Decuriones, which they called Pſephiſma.

How choſen.

105. The Cuſtom was, for ſuch to be employed according to his Place and Degree, the more ancient and honourable firſt, and then the reſt in order downward, except the Greatneſs of the Affair required ſome of the better ſort to be ſtill employed. At the time of Legation they were not to embroil themſelves with Buſineſs, either their own, or of other Perſons; and had the Privilege not to be ſued, but in caſe they committed any Offence, they, or their Servants were puniſhable at Rome. They were allowed Carriages; and the Legates of the Provinces, publick Horſes. The number of the Meſſengers was not to exceed that of three. The Employment was perſonal, and could not be diſcharged by any Deputy, except a Son. Debtors to the Publick, and Infamous Perſons, were not permitted to manage it. When the whole Diœceſe reſolved to ſend to the Emperour, it was determined by the major Part of the Primates or Chief of the Cities. If the Province determined to ſend, the Primates of the Courts met in the Metropolis, at the Place where they were wont to aſſemble, and the Major part carried it, the Aſſent of the Præfectus Prætorio being obtain'd. When the Legati came to the Court, they were firſt heard in the Auditory of the Præfectus Prætorio then in waiting, and their Petitions were examined, but without any Determination; for afterwards their Requeſts were reported in Conſiſtory by the Epiſtolares, and received ſuch Anſwer as the Prince directed.

106. Theſe were the Officers, and ſuch was the Government of the Cities and Places corporate; which beſides their Courts and Bodies for Government, had alſo ſeveral Bodies, and Companies of Artificers, as we here at London, which were privileged with Immunity from Perſonal Burthens. Of them ſome have reckoned up two and thirty, and others thirty five. The Names and Deſcriptions of which, the Reader if he pleaſe, may find in Pancirolus, and elſewhere. For we ſeem in this Deſcription of the Polity of the Empire to have been too tedious already; but the Profit, and Improvement of the Reader ſeems alſo to have required it: theſe things being not commonly known, and few making it their Buſineſs to underſtand the State and Condition of thoſe Ages whereof we write; chiefly becauſe they imagine them Jejune and Barren, and that little can be ſaid, or known of them. Without a moderate Underſtanding of the Nature of theſe ſeveral Officers, he can little benefit by peruſal of the Writers of theſe Times, and much leſs Profit in the Study of the Imperial Conſtitutions. And ſo we return to our Hiſtory; which will both give to, and receive from this Apparatus very much Illuſtration. For what we have ſaid briefly, and altogether concerning the Polity of the Empire, will for the moſt part be particularly explained, and amplified, when we come to ſpeak of the ſeveral Laws, as in time they were enacted.

Some Knowledge of the Polity of the Empire neceſſary, for underſtanding the Writers of theſe Ages, and this following Hiſtory.

Vide L. 2. de Excuſationibus Artificum lib. 13. Cod. Th. Tit. 4. & Comment. Gothofredi.

Sect. III.

The Joynt Government of the Sons of Conſtantine;

From his Death to that of his Son Conſtans, and the Uſurpation of Magnentius: The Space of Thirteen Years.

The Iſſue of Conſtantine.

1. CONSTANTINE the Great had four Sons, and two Daughters. The Eldeſt Son was Criſpus, and he begotten of Minervina his Concubine. By Fl. Maximiana Fauſta, the Daughter of Maximianus Herculius, he had three other Sons, Conſtantine, Conſtantius, Conſtans, and his two Daughters, Conſtantina and Helena. Now Conſtantine had a Wife married to him in his Father's time. Afterward, being Emperour, by an Embaſſy he procured another, of a moſt Noble Family out of Spain. For Conſtantius, he firſt married the Daughter of his Uncle Conſtantius, the Siſter of Gallus, Betrothed to him alſo by his Father. After her, he wedded Euſebia, and at laſt Fauſtina, the Mother of Conſtantia, born after his Deceaſe, and afterward married to Gratian. To Conſtans was given in Marriage Olympias the Daughter of Ablabius. Of his Daughters, Conſtantina was firſt married to Hanniballianus, the Son of Dalmatius, the Brother of Conſtantine, who by his Uncle was made King of Pontus, Cappadocia, and Armenia the leſs, being inveſted with a Purple Robe; and after his Death to Gallus Cæſar. Of Helena, his Brother Julian was the Husband.

Vide Annot. Valeſii in lib. 14. Ammiani Marcellini.

The Grief which all men expreſſed at his Death.

2. None of the Sons were preſent when he died, though Conſtantius arrived not long after: but there was no need of their Preſence to make a Reſentment of the Loſs the Empire ſuſtained by their Father's Death: for the Souldiers that then waited, upon Knowlege of it, tore their Cloaths, caſt themſelves proſtrate on the Ground, knock'd their Heads againſt the Walls, and otherwiſe expreſſed ſuch Sorrow, as was agreeable to ſo publick a Calamity. And their Officers were no whit behind them in teſtifying their Grief with mournful and paſſionate Expreſſions; calling him their Preſerver, Deliverer, and Common Parent. Neither were the Townſmen backward herein, to follow the Example of the Court, and Camp, running like mad men about the Streets, and bewailing their Loſs, or ſitting at Home dejected and oppreſſed with Sorrow. When Grief would give them leave, the Souldiers took up the Body, and carried it to Conſtantinople in a golden Coffin covered with Purple, where it was expoſed in the Palace to be ſeen of all, with Lights burning round about it, and Attendants to watch it. Here Court was kept, as if he had been ſtill living. The ſeveral Comites, and other Perſons that were wont to adore, or ſalute, now doing their Duty to him as formerly. The Senate alſo paid him the ſame Reſpect, together with all the Magiſtrates; and the Citizens were not wanting to teſtifie their deep Senſe of his Loſs, who had been ſo noble a Founder and Benefactor to their City. Neither did old Rome forget to ſympathize with her Daughter, the new: for as ſoon as the Report of his Death there arriv'd, they ſhut up their Shops, and publick Baths; abſtained from the Forum, and their uſual Sports, and intermitted all thoſe Recreations, which in Times of Proſperity were wont to be uſed. It's ſaid alſo, that they pictur'd him ſitting in Heaven, and deſired to have his Body ſent to them to be buried in their City.

Vide Diſſert. Gothofredi in Philoſtorgii lib. 2. C. 17. Sigonius.

Conſtantius makes away his Uncle and Kinſmen.

Vide Gothofred. ut prius, & Cod. Theodoſii Chronic. Hiſtoricum ad Annum 337.

The Sons of Conſtantine ſhare the Empire.

How often Partition of the Empire hapned.

3. But this was not agreed to by Conſtantius his Son, who being not ſo far diſtant as the reſt, upon Notice given, haſted to Court, and thought it moſt fit he ſhould reſt in that City, to which he himſelf had given Original. Conſtantius, either for that his Father had left ſuch Command in his Teſtament becauſe they attempted to poiſon him (as ſome improbably have reported) or rather to prevent more Competition, (for three Brothers might ſeem to ſuffice for the Government of the Empire) put to Death, or permitted to be put, his Uncle and Kinſmen; viz. Conſtantius Dalmatius, and his Sons, Dalmatius Cæſar, and Anaballianus. Zoſimus relates this, as done after the Diviſion of the Empire amongſt the Brothers; of which he will have the Uncle, and Kinſmen in a certain manner to have been Sharers. But the Brothers were by the Souldiers declared Auguſti, or Emperours, not till the fifth of the Ides of September; which was more than three Months after their Fathers Death; ſo that if the other Princes were killed by Conſtantius, preſently after the Deceaſe of Conſtantine, as ſome write, it muſt rather have been done before the Diviſion, and moſt probably to prevent, as was ſaid, more Competition. Conſtantius, and Conſtans, for ſome time, continued together. Firſt in Macedonia, at Theſſalonica, then at Naiſſus and Viminacium in Myſia, and thence removed to Sirmium in Pannonia; in which Country, the Diviſion of the Empire was made. In this Diviſion, Gall, Spain, Britain, and part of Africa Proconſularis fell to Conſtantine, the Eldeſt: to Conſtans the youngeſt, Italy, with the reſt of Africk, Illyricum, Macedonia, and Greece, with what bordered upon the Euxine Sea; and to Conſtantius, Myſia, Thrace, with Conſtantinople, Aſia, Ægypt, and the Eaſtern Empire, as far as from Illyricum to Niſibis. This Partition was not made without ſome Diſſatisfaction and Diſturbance, which was compoſed by Conſtantius, for ſome time; but broke out afreſh betwixt the other two, and after three years proved Fatal to the Eldeſt. The Diviſion of the Empire was firſt made by Probus, and Florianus, and this Example followed by Maximinus, Conſtantius, Conſtantine, and Galerius. Theſe firſt divided the Empire into ſeveral Appropriate Parts, or Portions; for although formerly M. Antoninus Reigned with his Brother Verus, and Severus, with his Son Antoninus; yet they Reigned as one man, and there was no Partition made of the Roman World. The next Diviſion was this of the Sons of Conſtantine, whereof Conſtantius, the Survivor, reunited the Empire, and ſo it continued, till Valentinian parted it again, betwixt himſelf and his Brother Valens, to whom he granted the Eaſt, for his Share, with part of the Forces. But they after a few years, and the Sons of Valentinian dying Childleſs, it returned to Theodoſius alone, who again parted it at his Death, aſſigning to his Son Arcadius, the Eaſt, and to Honorius the Weſt; yet were all things done joyntly, as in one and the ſame Empire. This Diviſion continued till Valentinian the third, and Martian, about which time the Barbarians began to ſeize on all parts of the Weſt; ſubduing Britain, Spain and Gall, and at length Italy, with Illyricum and Africk, and ſo fell the Empire of the Weſt; to which Fall and Ruine many conceive this Partition of it to have conduced. And it is eaſie to imagine, that hence might be multiplied Wars and Diſſenſions, whilſt ſeveral Princes were not contented with their Shares, but each one ſtrived to be Lord of all. But indeed we may conclude, that it was neither capable of bearing many, nor of one alone. More than one procured it's Ruin by Diviſion, and one alone was not able to manage it; therefore muſt it decay by Degrees, as all Kingdoms and Principalities of too great Extent and Burthen; for which the Life, Force, Authority and Underſtanding of Man are altogether Inſufficient.

Quicquid exceſſit modum Pendet inſtabili loco. Seneca in Oedip.

The Brothers fall out about the Partition of the Empire.

Chronicon Hiſtoric. Gothofredi.

4. That Conſtantine himſelf by his Teſtament, or otherwiſe before his Death, divided his Empire amongſt his Sons, hath been believed; yet it is not certain, whether, he or they, after his Deceaſe made the Partition. For what Euſebius, or the Author of his Life writes concerning his aſſigning them ſeveral Countries, might be underſtood of his giving them Governments, at ſuch time as he made them Cæſars. However long it was not, before they fell out about their Shares, it being a rare thing for Partners in Sovereignty to agree. And whether from Confidence in their Diſſenſions, or by Reaſon of the Death of their Kinſmen, or other Reaſons; the Diviſion was ſcarcely made, when Tumults and Seditions hapned in the Empire. Before Conſtantius and Conſtans parted aſunder, and ſtill reſided at Vimina-

cum

Sect. 3.

A. D 338.

cum in the lower Mæſia, they ſent out an Edict againſt Informers, or Accuſers, which is thought to have had Reſpect to thoſe, who were falſly accuſed, as being of the Party of the Princes that were put to Death, or of Ablavius the Præfectus Prætorio, or Optatus, the Patrician, whom Zoſimus writes to have been alſo ſlain by Command of Conſtantius. It bears Date of the twelfth of June, and on the eighteenth of the ſame Month, another Conſtitution was given forth from Conſtantine their Brother againſt Libels; wherein telling the Africans, that his Father took “ Care for the ſuppreſſing of ſuch ſcandalous Writings; and Commanding, That they “ ſhould neither be made known to him, nor publickly ſeen, leſt by ſuch Devices “ the Life or Dignity of any one ſhould be endanger'd; he alſo commands, that “ they be all committed to the Fire. It ſeems the Provincials of Africk had by their Meſſengers to him (whoſe Subjects they were by the Partition) complained of their Sufferings in this kind, and prayed to be relieved; and not unlikely it is that the Occaſion alſo aroſe from the Tumults and Seditions, which about this time had been in the Empire. Conſtans continued ſtill in Pannonia, as appears by another Edict of his which bears Date at Sirmium on the twenty ſeventh of July, concerning publick Works, commanding the Judges to give Diſpenſations to none that ought to contribute towards them; for from the Indulgence of the Prince alone ſuch Immunity was to be ſought for, which was wont to be granted in reſpect to ſome Dignity, or Service, as to Senators of Courſe, with ſome others; and Veterani, or old Souldiers enjoyed it. Now theſe publick Works were the Bridges, Walls, and publick Buildings, wherein the Splendor and Ornament of the Cities and Towns conſiſted.

An Edict againſt Informers.

L. 4. Cod. Theod. lib. 10. Tit. 10. de Petitionibus &c. & Comment. Gothofr.

Lib. 5. de famoſis Libellis Cod. Theod.lib. 9. tit. 34. Comment. Gothofred.

L. 5. de operibus publicis Cod. Th. lib. 15 tit. 1. Vide Gothofred. in L. L. & Paratitlon hujus tit. de operibus Publicis.

5. Conſtantius from Pannonia, after the Diviſion of the Empire, departed for Syria, to go againſt the Perſians, whoſe King, Sapor by Name, encourageing himſelf by the Death of Conſtantine, and deſpiſing his Sons, now waſted Meſopotamia, and ſate down before Niſibis, which near two Months he beſieged. Upon Notice hereof Conſtantius removed to Antioch, where, on the eleventh of October, in the Conſulſhip of Urſus and Polemius, he made an Edict concerning the Decuriones, lately ſpoken of. This Edict is followed by twenty ſix more publiſhed by this Emperour concerning the ſame Subject; from which appears what the State and Condition of the Curiales was at this time, and how he conſulted for their Advantage. Theſe Laws having reſpect to four things eſpecially; theſe are The Form and Order of their Nomination. That the Courts might be ſupplied againſt the Pretences of ſuch as would be excuſed. That by Puniſhment inflicted on ſuch as failed, the Magiſtrates and Decuriones might diligently diſcharge their places. And in the laſt place, he confirms to them their Privileges. The other precedeing twenty two Conſtitutions in the Code were made by Conſtantine the Great, his Father, by which as the State and Condition of the Places corporate, as they ſtood in his time do appear, ſo Gothofred tells you, that it's evident with what, and how great Study and Endeavour that Prince laboured to promote the Intereſt of all ſuch Places. The Scope and Deſign of all which, it behooved thoſe to exhibit, who endeavour to expreſs the Humour, and Genius of that Prince by his Conſtitutions, eſpecially; and not that of one, or two only, as Baldwin hath done, whoſe Commentaries, ſaith he, concerning Conſtantine the great, that I may ſay it once for all, contain rather a Shadow or Pourtract of a full Work, than a compleat Treatiſe, as ſome eminent men have before obſerved.

Conſtantius goeth againſt Sapor the Perſian King. His Edicts concerning the Decuriones.

Chronicon Hiſtor. & Chronol. Legum. Hieronymus in Chron.

L. 23. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. & vide Comm.

ad L. primam hujus Tit.

6. Ere Conſtantius could reach Niſibis, his Work was done to his Hand; for Sapor deſpairing of any Succeſs, had quitted the Place, which is aſcribed to the Prayers and Sanctity of James, the Biſhop; during whoſe Life and Preſence there, none of his Deſigns could ſucceed againſt the City. Conſtantius to divert the Perſians by giving them ſomething to do, procured by his Ambaſſadors the pilfring Arabians, to fall upon them, while he attending this Buſineſs, made ſome ſtay in thoſe Parts of the Phœnician Syria, bordering upon Arabia; as at Emeſa, Laodicea, and Heliopolis, Cities of that Tract. Having given ſuch order to his Affairs, as he thought convenient in thoſe Parts, he returned to Antioch: but the following year, (wherein he himſelf the ſecond time, bore the Title of Conſul, with his Brother Conſtans) came back again into theſe Quarters, as appears by the Dates of ſeveral Edicts now made by him. For being at Laodicea, and there inſtructed, as is probable, by the Lawyers of Berytus (the Univerſity for that Science) he reformed many things of old Cuſtom, but very ill Conſequence, and particularly took away captious Expreſſions uſed in Forms and Words of Law by a Conſtitution directed to Marcellinus, the Preſident of Phœnicia, and to the People of that Province. From Laodicea he removed again to Antioch, whither carrying an Obſervation he had made

He ſtirs up the Arabians againſt Sapor.

By ſeveral Edicts endeavours Reformation.

Quam nonnulli Antiochiam Mygdoniæ appellant.

Chronic. Hiſtoric. ad Ann. CCCXXXIX.

of

Sect. 3.

A. D. 339.

of the ill Practices of his Subjects of Phœnicia, or being put in mind by others of a ſcandalous Cuſtom in thoſe parts, by a ſevere Edict he endeavour'd a Reformation. The Matter this: By the moſt ancient Laws and Cuſtoms of the Romans, it was unlawful to marry, as well the Daughter of a Brother as of a Siſter: but afterwards, when Licentiouſneſs increaſed, a Difference was made, and it was permitted the Uncle to marry the firſt, but not the ſecond, this being occaſioned by the extravagant Affection of Claudius to his Niece Agrippina; for the ſake of whom the Fathers, by a Senatuſconſultum, made it lawful to marry the Brother's Daughter, which before was accounted Inceſtuous. By this Example and Permiſſion encouraged, Domitian married the Daughter of his Brother Titus; but not long after, the old Law was reſtored, and this diſtinction betwixt the Daughter of a Brother and a Siſter was taken away by Nerva, who ordained, that the Uncle ſhould no more marry his Niece by the one, than by the other. Yet after Nerva's Death, what order he took herein proved ineffectual; for the Diſtinction again returned, it being as appears, by ſeveral Laws of the Digeſt, and by Ulpian, lawful in his time (who lived in the Reign of Caracalla) to marry the Daughter of the Brother, though not of the Siſter. And this Cuſtom was in uſe in the days of Diocleſian and Maximian; but taken away by Conſtantine the Great, as ſhould ſeem from Sozomen the Hiſtorian, who relates, that he reſtrained ſuch profane and licentious Marriages, as formerly were not prohibited, although, no ſuch Conſtitution of that Prince be now extant. To be ſure his Son Conſtantius by an Edict did now reſtore the moſt ancient Law and Cuſtom, prohibited not only the Marriage of the Siſters but the Brothers Daughter, and not only Marriage, but any Carnal Knowledge or inceſtuous Copulation betwixt them, and this under no leſs a penalty, than that of Death. Now the People of Phœnicia were they to whom the Conſtitution was directed; becauſe they, and the Inhabitants of the other Provinces, bordering upon the Perſians, from them received ſeveral corrupt Principles, which were much contrary to the Roman Laws; as appears both from ſeveral Laws, that are yet extant, and were made to bridle their Extravagance; as alſo, by what the Author of Conſtantine his Life, and Socrates, do write of the Heliopolitans, their uſing Wives promiſcuouſly, till Conſtantine reduced them into Order, by the Propagation of Chriſtian Religion amongſt them.

Siquis filiam Fratris, ſororisve faciendam crediderit abominanter uxorem, aut in ejus complexum, non ut Patruus, aut Avunculus convolaverit, Capitalis Sententiæ pœna teneatur.

L. 1. de Inceſtis nuptiis Cod. Theod. lib. 3. tit. 12. vide Com.

7. Conſtantius ſpent much of this year, in thoſe Parts of Syria and Phœnicia, being intent upon the War with Perſia, for which he made more than ordinary Preparations: for he raiſed a Tax, or Sum of Money from his Subjects upon this Account, which being not in the common Courſe of Payments, many Perſons might by their Privileges pretend Excuſe; but to obviate all ſuch Pretences, he publiſhed an Edict, whereby all Perſons were compelled to contribute, and none per- “ mitted to inſiſt upon their Immunity from extraordinary Services in a time, when “ the extraordinary State and Condition of the Empire called for an univerſal Sup- “ ply; which was counted good Reaſon alſo in after-times, to diſpenſe with ſuch Privileges, as we may ſee in due Place. But to leave Conſtantius for a ſpace and to enquire how his two Brothers managed their matters in the Weſt. By the Dates of ſeveral Laws we find Conſtans about this time at Naiſſus in Dacia, and at Aquileia, at both which Places he publiſhed Edicts. By one directed to the City of the Cirtenſes in Numidia, which had lately got the Name of Conſtantina; he reſtrains the “ Liberty which Duumviri, or Magiſtrates of Cities took to deſert their Offices; for “ being obliged to be at the Expenſe of Games and Showes, they were wont to get “ themſelves to be made Senators, and otherwiſe to decline theſe Services, which “ to prevent (as his Brother Conſtantius much about the ſame time dealt, much what in the ſame manner with Prætors) he Commands the Corporation to lay out the “ Money upon the wonted Recreations, and to conſtrain the Duumviri afterward “ to pay it, by deſtraining their Goods, if need ſhould ſo require. By another Law “ he took Care for Cauſes relating to the Treaſury, that thoſe depending therein, ſhould be ſpeedily, and juſtly determined. But while he buſied himſelf with making Laws, the noiſe of Arms diſturbed and diverted him; the Diſpute between him, and his Elder Brother being now come to that height, that Conſtantine made War upon him; the Controverſie being no leſs, than concerning Africk, that belonged to Carthage, and alſo Italy. Zoſimus tells us, that Conſtans deſirous to fall upon and deſtroy his Brother at unawares, diſſembled his Diſpleaſure for three years together, and watching his opportunity, when he came into a Country, that was kind and faithful to him, ſent a Party of Souldiers with Show and Pretence of aſſiſting Conſtantius againſt the Perſians, to make him away; which, when he thought of nothing leſs, they effected. But the general opinion is, that Conſtantine

For Maintenance of the War, he raiſes an extraordinary Supply.

L. 5. de Annona & Tributis Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 1.

Conſtans publiſheth ſeveral Edicts.

L. 29. de Decurionibus.

Vide Chronic. Hiſtor. ad Ann. CCCXL. Acindino & Proculo Coſſ.

Conſtantine his Brother makes War upon him for Africk and Italy.

Lib. 2.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 340.

And is ſlain.

ſtantine was the Aggreſſor in this War; and that invading the Territories of his Brother Conſtans, he was ſlain by his men, near Aquileia, in the third year of his Reign; and that before the ninth of April, at what time, as appears from the Dates of ſeveral Laws, Conſtans was Maſter of all Africk, which was not till after the other's Death. On the twenty ninth of the ſame Month he publiſhed another Edict, whereby he took away Immunities and Privileges from Tribute granted by his, and the publick Enemie, as it is worded. Now by a publick Enemy, whoſe Acts are hereby reſcinded, can be no other than an Emperour meant, and conſidering, the time, none but Conſtantine, by whoſe Death Africk, as well as his other Provinces, falling into the hands of Conſtans, he thought it incumbent upon him, to take Care of the publick Revenue by repealing thoſe Immunities through which it had been diminiſhed.

Chronic. Hiſtoric. adject. Chronol. Legum Cod. Theodoſii.

Publicus, ac noſter Inimicus diverſis Immunitatem dederat, jugorum Capitationibus & Profeſſionibus amputatis. Jubemus ergò, ut omnibus omninò hæc Privilegia derogentur.

L. 1. de Immuditate conceſſâ lib. 11. Cod. Theod. Tit. 12. & vide Gothofred in L. Annal. Tom. 3.

Zonaras his Story of his Death.

8. But as to the Death of Conſtantine, Zonaras tells the Story with ſome further Circumſtances. He writes, that he firſt expoſtulated with his Brother Conſtans about the late Partition of the Provinces, requiring him, either to ſurrender him part of his Share, or elſe to come to a new, and more equal Diviſion. This he flatly refuſed to do, not yielding in the leaſt to what he demanded; whereupon Conſtantine took up Arms, and invaded the Countries of Conſtans, who being in Dacia, and underſtanding what he attempted, ſent away ſome of his Captains againſt him, reſolving to follow in Perſon with the reſt of his Forces. Theſe Officers being come near to the place, where Conſtantine was poſted, a party of men lying in Ambuſh, roſe up, and then counterfeiting Fear and Flight, drew him into the Snare, wherein being beſet, he periſhed with moſt of his Followers; for his Horſe, vexed by the Wounds he had received, threw him; and his Enemies taking the Advantage of the Fall, killed him in the Place. Others add, that they caſt his Body into the River Alſa, which runs near to Aquileia, whether his Brother Conſtans coming, celebrated his Funeral, and cauſed him to be reckoned amongſt the Divi; though this ill ſuits with the Character given in the Edict lately mentioned of his and the publick Enemy. But thus was the Empire of the Weſt devolved upon Conſtans alone, who from Aquileia travelled into other Parts, to ſettle his Matters in his newly gotten Poſſeſſions. Coming to Milan, he gave out there an Edict againſt ſuch as Violated Sepulchres, concerning which it will be more proper for us to ſpeak in another Place. From Italy, the following year, he paſſed into Gall, and came to Lauriacum, a place, as is probably conjectur'd, Situate in Batavia over againſt the ancient Country of the Franks. Before his Departure out of Italy, at Capua he publiſhed an Edict, whereby he much gratified his Subjects of theſe Parts; forbidding Souldiers in their Quarters, to take any thing by Violence from their Landlords. At Lauriacum he made other two Laws, for Prevention of Municipal Officers (as the Tabularii, Scribes, and Decuriones,) their forſaking their Charges in the Corporations, forbidding it upon Pretence of other Service, or Employment (Militia) although it was in the Court it ſelf, except they had ſerved already in the Office, the ſpace of five years. Now as to the Place whence theſe Laws bear Date, on the twenty fourth of June, in the Conſulſhip of Marcellinus and Probinus; there were in thoſe Times three ſeveral Towns, that bore the Name of Lauriacum; the one in Noricum and the Weſtern Illyricum, where the ſecond Legion and Navy lay; where was a Fabrick, or Forge for Targets, the principal Place on the Road betwixt Italy and Pannonia, at this Day Lorch, but in an ancient Inſcription called Colonia Aurelania Laureacenſis. Another in Italy, between Cremona and Mantua. And a third in Batavia, over againſt the Franks, perhaps now the ſame with Larens a Town lying betwixt Utrecht, and the River Flevio; and hence, probable it is, that theſe Laws were dated.

Sigonius uti ſuprâ.

Thereby the Empire of the Weſt being devolved upon Conſtans, he removes into Gall.

L. 1. de Salgamo Hoſpitibus non præbendo.

L. 1. de Tabulariis, Logographis & Cenſualibus Cod. Th. L. 8. Tit. 2. & L. 31. de Decurionibus. Lib. 12. Tit. 1.

Vide Gothofredum in D. L. 1. de Tabulariis.

Comes over into Britain.

9. For in this year, which was the CCCXLI of our Lord, Conſtans reſided, neither in Noricum, nor in Italy, but in Gall, where he had to do with the Franks, with whom for this year he fought with ſucceſs, but in that following overcame, and quieted them; it being in his ſecond Conſulſhip, which Office his Brother Conſtantius alſo bore now the third time. After his Conqueſt of the Franks, the Winter following he came over from Gall, hither into Britain, in very hard Weather, againſt the Scots and Picts, who it ſeems, at this time were tumultuous, even to Rebellion. Of what paſſed here in particular, as of moſt other Matters relating to War, at this time we have but very ſlender Intelligence; upon which account we have great Reaſon to bewail the Loſs of the former part of Ammianus Marcellinus his Hiſtory. But from a Law, which he paſſed at the Sea-ſide, before he embarqued, it is probably conjectur'd, that for this Expedition he laid a Tax, or extraordinary Payment upon his Subjects; as alſo certain baſe Services, termed by them Sordida munera) from which by this Law, he frees his own private Eſtate, “ and the Tenants of his Lands. Theſe Services ſeem to have been no other, than the Building of Ships, and others neceſſary for Tranſportation of his Army, now lying at Bononia, from which the Edict bears Date, and which is not to be underſtood of Bononia in Italy, as ſome have miſtaken it; but of that Maritime Town in Gall, which now is known by the Name of Bulloigne, in old time of Geſſoriacum, and from which the ordinary Paſſages lay then into Britain. To return into the Eaſt, and make Inquiry after Conſtantius: while his Brother was yet in Italy, we find him in Beſſa, a Town in Thrace, whence in the Moneth of Auguſt, he publiſhed another Edict concerning Decuriones. The Moneth following he departed to Antioch, and thence gave out other Laws to the Senate, concerning Prætors, their uſual ſetting forth of Publick Games and Paſtimes, by the firſt of them moderating the extravagant Expenſe they were at therein; and by the other providing, that by Reaſon of their Abſence they ſhould not be omitted. For the Charge was wont to be ſo great, that to ſhun the Burthen, they would ſhift out of Town, and abſent themſelves: therefore he moderates their Expenſe by confining the firſt Prætor ‘ of Conſtantinople, who bore the Title of Flavialis, to that of twenty five thou- ‘ ſand Folles, and fifty pounds of Silver; him that had the Name of Conſtantinianus to ‘ twenty thouſand Folles, and forty pounds of Silver; and the third, known by the Title ‘ of Triumphalis, to fifteen thouſand of the former, and thirty pounds of the latter ſort. ‘ Having ſettled the Expenſe thus moderately; by his ſecond Law he commands, that ‘ if any one abſented himſelf, the Games ſhould be ſolemnized at the Publick ‘ Charge, and refunded by the Prætor, at his Return. Now the Folles (no Silver Money) ſeem to be mentioned for the Expenſe of the Games, and the Silver for the Sportula, or Preſents they were wont to make. Hence alſo we may learn, that at the making of the former Law, there were but three Prætors at Conſtantinople; but otherwiſe it appears, that even in the Reign of this Prince, there were ſometimes five; four under the Emperour Valens, and no fewer than eight under Theodoſius the Great. Of theſe ſome received Names from the Families and Names of Emperours; as Flavialis, Conſtantinianus, Theodoſianus and Arcadianus; and ſome from other things; whereby the Glory of the Roman Empire was expreſſed; as Triumphalis, Auguſtalis, Romanus, Laureatus.

Idem ibid. & in Chronic. Hiſtoric. ad Ann. CCCXLI. Conſtantio 3. & Conſtante 2. Coſſ.

L. 5. de Extraordinariis ſive Sordidis Muneribus Cod. Theod. lib. 11. Tit. 16. Gothofr.

Conſtantius makes a Law concerning Prætors.

L. L. 5. & 6. de Prætoribus & Quæſtoribus lib. 6. Cod. Theodoſ. tit. 4.

10. The two following years Conſtantius reſided ſtill at Antioch, the Court, or Body Politick of which City ſeems to have been much exhauſted at this time, eſpecially, for that moſt that could find any Evaſions, ſhunned the Offices and Employments thereof. To prevent the Excuſe of Poverty, and to ſettle ſome conſtant Rule therein; by an Edict he ordained, That he that poſſeſſed above twenty five “ Acres of Land, ſhould be thought of ſufficient Wealth to qualifie him for Em- “ ployments, but not under that Quantity. But though he had it not all of his “ own; yet if he held in his Hand ſo much belonging to the Prince his Patrimony “ as to make up the number of Acres, he ſhould be bound to hold. And if any “ ſhould fraudulently ſell their Lands, all ſuch Lands are hereby declared confiſ- “ cate, and all ſuch puniſhed in the ſame ſort, as ſhould obtain captiouſly under “ hand, any Reſcript for Diſpenſation from theſe Employments, having ſuch Eſtates “ as now mentioned. This bears Date of the fifth of April, and is directed to Rufinus, Comes of the Eaſt. And on the eighth of the ſame Moneth another Law was directed to Auxentius, Preſident of Auguſtamnica (in Ægypt, and now firſt mentioned, as a Province) whereby Order is taken, that none by pretence of any Ho- “ norary Dignity ſhould evade the Burthen of theſe Offices; ſo great Care had Emperours for Corporations. Part alſo of the following year Conſtantius ſpent at this City of Antioch; as is evident by a Law dated hence, on the firſt of March, concerning falſe Coin. For in his Time, as appears otherwiſe, beſides what we have from the Laws, there were many guilty of that treaſonable Crime. But it had not it's Riſe in his own Reign; being very common alſo in the Days of his Father, who took very much Care for Redreſs of this Miſchief, by the ſeveral Laws he publiſhed, wherein he encouraged all ſuch as would diſcover the Offenders, and ordained other things very remarkable: Baniſhment, and Confiſcation of Eſtates (he making the Offence capital only to Slaves) proved not ſufficient for Prevention of coining Braſs Money, or Silver. As to Gold, Conſtantius now by a new Edict propoſing Rewards to the Diſcoverers, ordains, that ſuch as counterfeited the “ Aureus, or Golden Coins ſhould be burnt alive, as his Father formerly had done “ in the like Caſe, and as even by ancient Laws, a greater penalty was wont to be inflicted upon ſuch as counterfeited this ſort of Money. And this Puniſhment he “ will have undergone, all Delay and Appeal removed.

Takes Care for ſupplying the Corporation of Antioch;

L. 33. de Decurionibus.

L. 34. ejuſdem tit.

For preventing falſe Coin.

L. 5, de falſa Moneta lib. 9. Cod. Th. tit. 21.

& in L. 5.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 343.

11. From Antioch he removed to Hierapolis, where we find him this ſame year in the Moneths of June and July, and as is probably conjectur'd, upon the Account of the Perſian War, wherein he was again at this time engaged; although we have little Light concerning the Methods, or Management thereof. But for this purpoſe he ſeems hence to have publiſhed an Edict, to conſtrain the Sons of the Veterani, or old Emerit Souldiers, to ſerve in the Armies; thereby on the twenty ſeventh of June commanding, that if after the Age of ſixteen years, they either refuſed, or were unable to bear Arms, they ſhould then be condemned to the Offices and Services of the Curiæ, or Corporations, from which otherwiſe they were excuſed. And this he did, as he hints, in Imitation of what his Father had enacted in the like Caſe, when he was alſo embroil'd in the Gothick War. And for the like Reaſon we muſt believe, that the year alſo that followed, he was ſtill engaged with the Perſian, againſt whom, as the Army marched, or lay encamped, leſt the Subject ſhould be haraſſed by free-Quarter; he publiſhed an Edict, bearing Date of the eleventh of October, whereby he prohibits, not only common Souldiers, but all Comites, Tribunes, or Officers, not only to exact Wood and Oyl, but even Mattreſſes, Pallets, Quilts, (Culcitas) or ſuch like Stuff from their Landlords, under great Penalty; if without their Conſents, or the Allowance of the Magiſtrates, they took any ſuch thing. Now by Magiſtrates here may be meant thoſe called Magiſtri Pagorum, whoſe Employment it was amongſt other Matters, to gather up Proviſions for the Army, and therewith to ſupply the Souldier in his Paſſage, without the Orders of whom, no Proviſions could be taken up; therefore they are ſtyled Patroni Vicorum, becauſe they protected the Villages, and common People, from all Inſolencies of this Nature. But while Conſtantius exerciſed himſelf and his men in Preparations and Skirmiſhes againſt the Perſians; thoſe he left behind, and his Subjects in other Places were not idle, but buſied by him in ſeveral publick Works, For at this time he cauſed to be made, at vaſt Expenſe, a commodious Haven at Seleucia, cutting down a part of the adjoyning Mountain, and repaired the City. He alſo built Antaradus in Phœnicia, which he named after himſelf, Conſtantia, and cauſed to be erected publick and magnificent Baths, which alſo bore his Name. Moreover, at the ſame time Antioch was repaired, and beautified with many and great publick and private Buildings. Therefore there being great need of Architects and Artificers, as his Father formerly had done, when by reaſon of the Building of Conſtantinople, and his Churches, there was great occaſion for Workmen. He alſo publiſhed an Edict, this ſame Summer, on the ſixth of July, for their Encouragement, both to work themſelves, and to teach others their Myſteries. Conſtantine in his ſecond Law (if indeed it be his) whereby he frees thoſe Workmen from perſonal Employments, reckons up five and thirty ſorts of Artificers; but Conſtantius in this Edict, only four, under the Names of Mechanici, Geometræ, Architecti, and ſuch as taught how to lay Pipes in Aquæducts, and to convey Water; concerning the Nature of whoſe ſeveral Employments, it's not proper for us here to enquire.

He ſummons the Sons of the Veterani into the Field.

L. 35. de Decurionibus.

Forbids Souldiers to exact any thing of their Landlords.

L. 2. de Salgamo Militibus non præbendo. Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 9.

Makes an Haven at Seleucia, and other Works.

Hieronymus in Chronico. Cedrenus ad Ann. Conſtantii 10. Gothofred. in Chronico. Hiſtor. ad Ann. 344. & in Comm. ad L. 3. de Excuſationibus Artificum. lib. 13. Cod. Th. tit. 4.

12. But this we muſt needs obſerve; that not only by reaſon of his new and ſumptuous Works, Conſtantius might be induced to renew the Privileges granted to Artificers, but conſtrained alſo by a Senſe of publick Calamities. For during this War with Perſia, and about theſe times, great Miſchiefs had proceeded from many and moſt terrible Earth-quakes. St. Jerom in his Chronicon tells us; that the year following the Death of Conſtans the Younger, many Cities of the Eaſt fell to the Ground by an horrible Motion of the Earth, and ſome three years after this, that Neo Cæſarea in Pontus was overturned, and all it's Inhabitants periſhed, except ſuch as were ſaved with the Biſhop in the Church. As alſo, that the year following this, and preceeding the building of the Haven in Seleucia, Dyrrachium was by an Earth quake demoliſhed; Rome trembled for three dayes, and as many Nights; and many Towns of Campania were ſorely troubled. To theſe Cedrenus adds, that in the fourth, or ſifth year of Conſtantius, Antioch was endangered by an Earth quake of three Days continuance; that in his eighth, Rhodes was much diſtreſſed by the ſame Accident; that when Dyrrachium, the City of Dalmatia, periſhed, and Rome was in ſuch Danger, twelve Cities of Campania were deſtroy'd; and that in the twelfth of Conſtantius the greater part of Berytus, the City of Phœnicia alſo miſcarried. This hapned in the ſecond year after the making of the Haven at Seleucia, or the Building of Conſtantia; or Antaradus; in which year alſo hapned an Eclipſe of the Sun, on the ſixth day of the Moneth Dæſius. Cedrenus further writes, that the year that followed the Miſfortune of Berytus, Sapor the Perſian King, with all the Force he could make, fell upon Niſibis, againſt which he turned the River, and by all ſorts of Engines attacqued it, but with ſuch ill Succeſs, that having loſt the greateſt part of his Army, he was forced to fly. This he placeth at the thirteenth year of Conſtantius, how truly, as to matter of Fact, or Time, we cannot ſay: but whatever Succeſs of Sapor was in this Siege, that of Conſtantius by the Agreement of Writers was generally bad in all this Perſian War; which the more Orthodox Chriſtians, according to the Judgement of Parties, concluded to have hapned to him, becauſe of his adhering to, and countenancing the Arrian Hereſie.

Terrible Earth-Quakes.

Sapor flyes from Niſibis.

13. To be ſure in the year following the publiſhing of the Edict lately mentioned, for Encouragement of Artificers, by the Date and Subſcription of another Law, we find, though not the Perſian Sapor, yet the Roman Conſtantius at Niſibis in the Moneth of May. In this very year ſeveral teſtifie, that he fought a Battel with the Perſians, not far from that City, at a Place called Singara, and that by Night, and with no good Succeſs; but this hapned ſeveral years before the Defeat of Sapor, as Cedrenus placeth it. But the May following, we find him returned to Conſtantinople, where he reſided the whole year, or the greateſt part of it. For on the Nones, or ſeventh of May, out of his tender Affection to this City, and to cheriſh that, which his Father had founded, he excuſed by an Edict the “ Citizens thereof, as well as his own Courtiers, from extraordinary Services, and “ Payment of Money for finding of Souldiers, willing that they ſhould only pay for “ their Heads and Lands. Thus did he, as to this Privilege, make New Rome equal to the Old; providing in many other Reſpects beſides, for the Peopling, and Adorning of it. But here he took Notice of a great Miſcarriage, at this time, in the Payment of the ordinary Taxes and Revenue, which was, that if one had Lands in two ſeveral Cities or Provinces, they would get the Payment due in one to be removed to the other Place, and ſo both to be diſcharged in one together, which was termed Tranſlatio Conlationis. Now the Advantage aimed at by obtaining a Privilege to do this, was not ſo much, for that they were any whit eaſed thereby, in finding the Payments leſs in one Place, than another; but becauſe one Town might be more convenient than another, for Conveyance of the Money, by Reaſon of Diſtance, or the Badneſs of Ways; or when one had ſeveral Payments to make, he found it leſs inconvenient to be anſwerable to one Collector, than many. For theſe Reaſons, one or more, it was ſometimes indulged; but by manifold Experience, both formerly, now, and afterward, it was found to tend to the defrauding of the Publick, and leſſening the Revenue. Upon which Account, it was ſeverely prohibited under heavy Puniſhments inflicted, both upon ſuch as obtain'd the Privilege, and the Officers of the Præfectus Prætorio, by Means of whom it was procured. For under this Pretence many might withdraw themſelves from publick Burthens; the Collectors might well be ignorant what, and how much was due in another Place, and the Town from which the Tranſlation was made, was but more burthened by it, no leſs a Sum being ſtill Exacted, than what was before the Subtraction of the mans Share thus privileged. Beſides the Order and Courſe of the Fiſcale, Accounts were hereby much perplexed. “ Therefore “ did Conſtantius by this Edict reduce it into the former and uſual Channel, and by “ the ſame Law, at the ſame time, grant Immunity from extraordinary, and ſordid “ Employments to Senators, and their Dependants. And this was but an Abridge- “ ment as it were of a larger Conſtitution of Conſtantine the Great, whereby he diſtinguiſhed betwixt Privileges granted to Perſons, in Matters relating to the Collatio, or Tax; defining, that ſuch as reſpected a certain Order and Dignity ſhould ſtand; but thoſe that were given to particular Men, to the leſſening of the publick Revenue, ſhould be aboliſhed.

Chron. Hiſtor. Gothofr. ad Ann. 345. L. 5. de Exactionibus, lib. 11. Cod. Th. Tit. 5. Dat. 4. Idibus Maii, Niſibi. Amantio & Albino Conſs. i. e. A. D. 345.

L. 6. de Extraordinariis, ſive ſordidis, vide Gothofredum.

A. D. 346. Conſtantio & Conſtante 3. A. A. Conſs.

L. 1. Ne Conlationis Tranſlatio poſtuletur. lib. 11. Cod. Th. tit. 22. Vide Comment.

Conſtantius excuſeth the Citizens of Conſtantinople from finding of Souldiers.

He removes a Miſchief in his Revenue.

Grants to Senators Immunity from Extraordinary & Sordid Employments.

14. The next year, into which fell the Conſulſhip of Euſebius and Rufinus, being of our Lord the CCCXLVII, Conſtantius had his Reſidence ſome time in Galatia. For from Ancyra, a City of this Country, he gave forth an Edict to Theodorus, the Conſularis of Cœlo-Syria, bearing Date of the fifteenth of March, and forbidding any Appeal to lye in Debts evidently due to the Treaſury; which by another “ Law afterward he reinforces; by no means permitting theſe Appeals, either for “ Debts belonging properly to the publick Treaſury, or that of the Patrimony of “ the Prince, leſt the Commonwealth ſhould be endamaged by ſuch Delays. From “ Ancyra he removed, not long after: for in May following he was at Hierapolis in Syria, whence another Conſtitution of his bears Date, which renewed the old “ Law, whereby the Eſtate of ſuch Souldier, as died inteſtate, and without lawful “ Heirs, is adjudged, not to the Treaſury, but to the Company wherein he ſerved; “ it being preſumed that by the Aſſiſtance of the Company, or Legion, he had gotten “

A. D. 347. Euſebio & Rufino Conſs.

L. 8. Quorum Appellationes non recipiuntur, lib. 11. Cod. Th. tit. 36.

L. unic. de Bonis Militum, Cod. Th. lib. 5. tit. 4.

He Prohibits Appeals for Debts due to the Treaſury.

By another Law further encourages Souldiers.

ten ſuch Eſtate: and this is thought now reinforced, for the Encouragement of Souldiers, that ſtill ſerved in the Perſian War. For in this War Conſtantius was ſtill exerciſed, making often Expeditions, and viſiting the Borders of his Empire. The year following, though not from any Dates of his Laws, yet otherwiſe it appears, that he ſpent ſome time at Edeſſa, and at the beginning of the next, he ſeems alſo buſily employ'd in the ſame Country of Meſopotamia; to the Dux whereof, Antonius by name, he gave out a Conſtitution (now divided into two Laws) whereby he prohibits, both ſuch as ſerved the Preſidents or Magiſtrates of Provinces to be forced to go to War: and alſo, that the Sons of Veterani, or old Souldiers be admitted into the Service, or Attendance of the ſaid Magiſtrates; which it was the Cuſtom for them to look after, thereby to ſhun the bearing of Arms: and therefore in times of Danger (as in this time) and in great Exigency of Affairs, they are by the Laws of ſeveral Princes drawn back into the Field. But by the beginning of April following, he was back at Antioch. “For thence he gave forth another Edict for the freeing of Curiales, or Officers of Corporations from corporal Puniſhments; it being too ordinary for the publick Miniſters of the Provinces, to whom they were often ſubſervient in publick Buſineſs, to beat and handle them too ignominiouſly; and this had been taken Notice of and forbidden by former Emperours, as alſo it was by others that followed: But this Immunity ſometimes extended to all, ſometimes was limited to the Principal among them; and other whiles Exceptions were made as to ſeveral Caſes, according as the Occaſions, or the Pleaſure of Princes were different. The year that next followed Conſtantius made another Expedition into Meſopotamia, and there continued ſome time at Edeſſa, being called by freſh Provocations from the Perſians, with whom he had a tedious and Unfortunate War, though we be ignorant of the Particulars, being no ſeldomer than nine, or ten times worſted in Fight. But the Brunt being over for this Turn, he came back to Conſtantinople; whence after ſome Stay, he removed into Pannonia, having new Work made for him by this time in the Weſt. For there his Brother Conſtans was Overpower'd by a Rebellion, and ſlain in Gall, in the Streights of the Pyrenæans; which how it hapned, we muſt, as we have Intelligence, declare, after we have drawn down his Story from that place, where laſt we left it.

Publiſheth ſeveral other Edicts.

One whereby he frees Curiales from Corporal Puniſhments.

Vide Chronic. Hiſtor. ſæpius citatum ad An.D. 348. CCCXLVIII.

L. 4. *de Cohortalibus, Cod. Th. lib.*8.*tit.*4. & *L.*6. de Filiis Militarium, Apparitorum & Veteranorum, Cod. Th. l. 6. tit. 22. *Dat.*4. Nonas Febr. Limenio & Catullino Conſs.

L.39. de Decurionibus.

Variè admodum hoc Jus habitum ſub quadruplici Diſcrimine. Vide Comment. in L.L.

15. And his Story we muſt fetch from the ſame Fountains of the Laws, out of which that of his Brother is alſo derived, little of other Concernment being found written till after his Death. We find him, as well as the other, much concern'd for Corporations. For whereas other Laws forbad any to forſake the Duties and Offices thereof, upon Pretence of bearing Arms, he extended the Prohibition to the three ſeveral Companies or Bodies of the Calcarienſes, Fabricenſes, and Argentarii; commanding, that if any were found obnoxious to the aforeſaid Duties, they ſhould be forced back to their ſeveral Courts, without Benefit to be obtain'd by any Reſcript or Diſpenſation. The Reader, by what has been already ſaid, may ſufficiently underſtand what the Fabricenſes were, viz. ſuch as made Arms; and the Argentarii, thoſe that adorned them with Silver and Gold; amongſt whom were reckoned the Barbaricarii; to which we ſhall here add, that the Calcarienſes were others, whoſe Task and Employment it was to Burn and Prepare Lime, for Publick Works; for preparing of which, there were, not only certain Perſons appointed, but certain Countreys bound to find the Stone, and particular Lands charged with this Service for the City of Rome, as appears from ſeveral Laws. This Edict bears Date of the twenty ſeventh of June, and on the twenty ninth of the ſame Month he ſent out another Conſtitution to Eubulides Vicar of Africk; whereby he both gives an Hiſtorical Account of ſome Diſorders and Oppreſſions of his Subjects of Africk, and endeavours to prevent the like for the time to come. He tells us, that beſides the Solemn and Set Payments, much more was required of the Provincial Africans; and that moſt Unworthily by thoſe called Officiales, and Scholaſtici; not only in the ſeveral Cities, but in Manſions alſo: Proviſions being Extorted without Money, both for themſelves and their Horſes or Animals. And he adds, that he is not ignorant how theſe Scholaſtici very often, beſides Fees, received for Pleading Cauſes, Proviſions and Expence for their Journeys, by ſo great Incomes to Gratifie their Avarice. Therefore he gives Command to all Judges to protect the People of their Provinces, and not to ſuffer theſe Injuries to go unpuniſhed. Here are mentioned two ſorts of Oppreſſors, and two ſorts of Oppreſſions. The firſt is that of the Officiales, and their Crime is Superexaction, beſides what was due to the Publick, for the ordinary Tributes of which they were the Gatherers, requiring their Charges over and above, Conſtans alſo concern'd for Corporations.

And for the Provincials of Africk.

L.37. de Decurionibus.

Gothofred. in L.

L. 2. de Concuſſionibus Advocatorum ſive Apparitorum. Cod. Th.*lib.*8. *tit.*10.

Præter Solennes & Canonicas Penſitationes, multa à Provincialibus Afris indigniſſimè poſtulantur ab Officialibus & Scholaſticis, &c.

*Dat.*3. Cal. Jul. Leontio *& Salluſtio Conſs. A.D.*344.

above, which the Law did not allow them. By Scholaſtici are to be underſtood, as is evident from the Law it ſelf, no other than Advocates or Counſellors, by which Title Agathias, an Eminent Hiſtorian of this Profeſſion, of whom hereafter we make much uſe, is alſo known. But being Accuſed, together with the Officiales, for the Exaction of Proviſions, for themſelves and their Horſes, they ſeem not to have had Private Perſons, but Towns Corporate, and Churches for their Clients.

Preſcribes Rules for diſcovering forfeited Eſtates.

and for Senators.

L. 7. De Petitionibus &c. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 10. Dat. Trev. Id. Maii Amantio & Albino Conſs. A. D. 345.

Dudum meminimus ſancientibus nobis eſſe Decretum, ut Juris veteris Autoritate ſubmotâ nullus Clariſſimus &c. P. P. Rom. Sext. Non. Jul. Amantio & Albino Conſs. vide Comment.

16. In the following year, happened the unſucceſsful Engagement of Conſtantius at Singara, near to Niſibis; and at that very time Conſtans lay at Treviri (or Triers) whence he gave out an Edict to Euſtathius, at this time his Comes Rei Privatæ, preſcribing Rules, how Diſcovery of any Goods or Eſtates belonging to his Patrimony ſhould be made. As that firſt, the Informer ſhould go to the Preſident, or Governour of the Province, before whom, if the Information was found Good, and Approved, this Judge was to make Report thereof to the Comes Rei Privatæ; and then at length the Papers of the Information might be brought up to the Officers at Court; whither, or to the ſaid Comes, leave was then given to the Informer to repair. By another Law dated not long after, on the ſecond of July, he repealed a former Conſtitution made by him; and that at the Requeſt, as it ſeems, of the Roman Senate. It had been the Law and Cuſtom of old, that Appeal might lye from the Præfect of the City, and that by what Perſon ſoever made. But Conſtans, ſome years before, had abrogated this Law; ſo far as it concerned Senators at leaſt, whoſe Præſul and Judge of Courſe the Præfect of the City was, and therefore he forbad them to betake themſelves to any other. But this Conſtitution ſtanding as Probationer for ſome time, was found at length to be very inconvenient, and unreaſonable in this Reſpect, that what was firſt introduced for the Benefit of Senators (as this of the Præfect being their Judge) ſhould be wreſted to their Diſadvantage, for a ſtrange thing it was indeed, that privileged Perſons, as thoſe of that Order were, ſhould be barred of any Relief that the Jus commune afforded them, eſpecially this of Appeal. And probable it is, that Ruſticus, who at preſent bore the Office of Præfect of the City, abuſed his Power, and therefore to him this new Edict for repealing the former Conſtitution, and Reſtoring the Old Law and Cuſtom to its Antient Vigor, was directed: for within three dayes after, he was out of his Place, and one Probinus made Præfect in his Room. Some two years after this, we find him reſtraining a ſevere courſe of Proceeding in Sardinia, againſt ſuch as delayed the Payment of Tribute. It had been the Cuſtom to put ſuch as denied it to Torture, or to beat them with Bullets of Lead; which, as Cruel and Servile, Conſtantine had forbidden, and given this Reaſon for it, that ſuch Puniſhment was to be inflicted, not upon Innocent, but Criminal Perſons. This Law Conſtans; his Son, now Reinforced by a New Conſtitution, by which alſo, as here, he provided for the Quiet of his Subjects, ſo he took care that his Revenue ſhould not be Leſſened, and that by removal of another Cuſtom, which much tended to it. It happened, that when Perſons were Owners of Ground, whereof ſome were good and fertile, but others barren, or good for little; upon all which, taken one with another, a certain Charge of Tribute lay; rich men catching Advantage ordinarily of the Neceſſities, or Poverty of ſuch as ought theſe Lands, would buy of them good and fertile Grounds, then pay for them only according to their Quantity, and leave the other Share to be diſcharged by thoſe that were poor, and whoſe Lands, Barren as they were, could not ſuſtain the Charge. To obviate this Practice he ordains, that the Barren be added to thoſe that were Good; and that ſuch as had purchaſed the fertile ſhould pay the whole Tax ariſing from all when laid and counted together. This was called an Epibole, concerning which ſome have been egregiouſly miſtaken, and thence raiſed ſlanderous Reports againſt Juſtinian, as in due time and place will be diſcovered.

For ſuch as paid Tribute, and yet for his own Revenue.

L. 7. de Exactionibus. Cod. Th. L. 11. tit. 7.

L. 4. de Annona & Tributis Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 1. Quæ Conjicitur fuiſſe Pars ejuſdem Conſtit. Vide Gothofr. in L. L.

17. About this time there were great Complaints againſt the intolerable Inſolence of the Officers of the Prince his Patrimony; ſuch as the Accountants, Solicitors, Farmers, and Huſbandmen belonging to his Lands; who bearing themſelves high upon their Relation to him, imagined they might uſe greater Liberty than other Subjects; and becauſe of the Privileges they enjoy'd, no Officer, or Judge dared to meddle with, or correct them; the Rationales, as is probable, to ſhew their Authority bearing them out in what they did. Conſtantine ſenſible how malepert they were, had by an Edict given Power to the ordinary Judge of the Province, where they committed any Crime, to puniſh them no otherwiſe than any other unprivileged Perſons; but their Confidence, either overpower'd the Modeſty

Sect. 3.

A. D. 349.

ſty of the Judges, or overawed the People, ſo that either no Complaints were made againſt them, or elſe the Governours of Provinces dared not to exert that Authority which was given them by the Law. By a new Conſtitution therefore “ Conſtans puts the Judges in mind of, and encourages them to their Duty, willing “ them to animadvert upon theſe Men no otherwiſe, or leſs than upon the Provin- “ cials; whether by Impriſonment, Torture, or Death it ſelf, which Remedy he hopes may prove effectual againſt this Inveterate Diſtemper. And indeed ſuch wholeſome and ſevere Laws were found neceſſary againſt theſe Officers belonging to the Prince his private Eſtate, againſt the Inſolence of Souldiers, and the Agentes in Rebus; which three ſorts of men preſuming upon their Relation, lived, as if obnoxious to no coercive Laws; yet had Conſtantine thought fit to have them more ſeverely puniſhed than others, as ſuch, who ought themſelves to preſerve good Rule, and give good Example: and they have been judged to be burnt alive, all Encouragement being given to the People to come in, and inform againſt them. And whereas their Inſolence made them as peremptory to refuſe the Payment of Tribute, or publick Duties, as bold to commit greater Offences; by the ſame Conſtitution (divided into theſe two Laws) he commands, that they be forced to diſcharge theſe publick Debts. This ſame “ year being at Sirmium, he directed another Conſtitution to Silvanus, the “ Comes, and Magiſter Equitum and Peditum for the Reinforcement of Military “ Diſcipline; forbidding any Tribune, or Officer to give leave (Commeatus the “ word is) to any to depart from his Colours, or connive at his Departure, un- “ der pain of forfeiting five pounds of Gold. And as hereby he provided againſt Souldiers their quitting of Service; ſo alſo by the ſame Edict (divided, as “ the former, into two Laws) againſt the Attendants, Officers, or Servants of the “ Magiſtrates, their forſaking their Attendance upon other Pretexts. This Conſtitu- “ tion was ſigned on the 27th of May; and on the thirtieth of the ſame Moneth, followed another Edict directed to Titianus, the Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, and therefore muſt have been of Conſtans his making, within whoſe Diſtrict or Share of the Empire that Country then lay. It was not lawful for Souldiers to take Families with them, when they went upon Service; and if they did, they muſt have Warrant and Leave expreſly granted for it. Now it hapned, that many getting Licenſe to convey their Families; the Curſus Publicus, of which in ſuch caſe they were permitted to make uſe, was much burthened, and ſeveral Inconveniences hapned from theſe Impediments in the Camp; therefore there was need to have it explained, what was meant by a Family, that ſo it might be known what Company they might be allow'd to take with them. “And this Conſtans by this Edict performs, interpreting by Families, their Children and “ Slaves; not all, but ſuch as had been purchaſed by their Caſtrenſe Peculium; “ whereas otherwiſe, the word Family was of a far larger Significa- “ tion.

He provides againſt the Inſolence of the Officers of his Revenue.

L. 1. de Juriſdictione Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 11. Dat. 5. Id. Mar. Limenio & Catulino Conſ. A. D. CCCXLIX.

L. 6. de Exactionibus Cod. ejuſdem lib. 11. tit 5.

Againſt Souldiers deſerting the Service.

Eſt enim Commeatus Epiſtola Miſſionis.

L. 2. de re Militari Cod. Theod. lib. 7. tit. 1. & L. 3 de diverſis Officiis. Dat. 6. Calen. Jun.

For the Curſus Publicus.

L. 3. de re Militari vide Comment.

18. But, it is probably conjectured, that for the making of this Law, a Matter of far greater Conſequence gave the occaſion, and That no leſs than his own Safety and Preſervation. For now about this time, ſo great a Faction aroſe, that at length he was overpowered, and deſtroyed by it. The Riſe of this Faction was in Gall, to the Præfect of which, this Edict is directed; the Army whereof he might have juſt Cauſe to fear, would, under Pretext of Souldiers having their Families with them, be filled with a Confluence of Barbarians, and particularly the Nation of the Franks, now hovering upon theſe Parts, and ſerving in the Armies. To be ſure ſhortly after, if not at this time, brake out the Rebellion of Magnentius, who himſelf was deſcended of the Læti Franci, was ſupported by that People, and to whom this Titianus the Præfect did adhere. Zoſimus, no Friend to Conſtantine, and his Sons, fetches the Original of the Revolt from the great Extravagancy of Conſtans his Life, who after the Death of his Brother, as he writes, carried himſelf like a Tyrant, and haraſſed his Subjects with all ſorts of Cruelty; whom he permitted to be oppreſſed by ſuch Barbarians, as he had bought for the gratifying of his Luſt, and by ſuch as were Hoſtages in his Court. This his Followers taking to Heart, and ſeeing him wholly given up to the Pleaſure of Hunting, began to contrive his Deſtruction, under the Guidance, and Encouragement of two conſiderable men; whereof the one was Marcellinus, Præfect of his Treaſury; and the other Magnentius, who commanded the Joviani, and Herculiani; two Legions ſo called. The Device to bring about their Deſign was this: Marcellinus gave out, that he would celebrate the Birth-day of his Son, and invited to the Feaſt, both Magnentius, and Magnentius Rebelleth.

Hiſt. lib. 2.

Sigonius de Occid. Imperio l. 5.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 349.

and many other of the moſt eminent Commanders. The Entertainment laſted till Midnight, at which time Magnentius withdraws himſelf, as upon ſome neceſſary Occaſion, and within a little time returns to the Company, dreſſed in Imperial Robes, and attended by his Satellites, or Guard. Some of the Company were doubtleſs provided and prepared before hand; but moſt, as it ſeems from Zoſimus, looked upon it but as a Play, or a Jeſt; and probable it is, that if the Plot had not taken, for ſuch it would have been owned, and might have paſſed. But thoſe that were of the Conſpiracy ſaluted him with the Title of Emperour; and the reſt, whether ſurprized with the thing, and for want of Recollection, or affrighted at ſo ſtrange a Paſſage, did like their Fellows; there being among them alſo ſeveral of the chief Citizens of Auguſtodunum (or Autun,) where this part was acted; by means of whom all the Inhabitants were induced to ſalute, and own him, as Auguſtus; ſuch as had any mind to oppoſe, wanting Strength, and Aſſiſtance, ſo that he ſeized on the Palace, and diſtributed Money amongſt the Rable.

Ἐφαίνετο τοῖς συμπόταις ὥσπερ ἐν σκηνῇ τὴν βασιλικὴν ἠμφιεσμένος στολήν.

Procures Conſtans to be murdred.

19. Having thus far proceeded, he cauſed the Gates to be carefully watched, admitting every one in, but ſuffering none to go out, and give Intelligence what was done. And now having got the Approbation of certain Illyrian Troops, who were newly arrived for a Supply, as well as that of the Gallick Forces, he ſent away one Gaiſo, with a Party of Men, to make ſure of Conſtans. He having got ſome Notice of what had paſſed, had caſt off the Robe, and endeavouring to make his Eſcape, came to a place called Helena, a Village adjoyning to the Pyrenæans, where Gaiſo having made Inquiry for him about the Rhoſne, at length found him, and murdred him with his own hands; fulfilling, as is ſaid, what was foretold him, that he ſhould dye in his Grand-Mother's Lap, becauſe this Village bore her Name. And ſo periſhed Conſtans in the tenth year, after the Death of Conſtantine, his Brother, in the Conſulſhip of Sergius and Nigrinianus. A. D. CCCL. This Prince was much Subject to the Gout, which Diſeaſe is to be aſcribed to his intemperate Courſe of Life; for of this, moſt Authors do make him Guilty. Being not able to look much after Buſineſs himſelf, it behooved him to get able Miniſters; but he is accuſed to have made no good Choice; and not have preferred men for Merit, but for Money; which neceſſarily hurried him into great Inconveniences: For ſuch Perſons by their oppreſſing the People, brought great Odium upon his Government; while they laboured, not only to reimburſe, but enrich themſelves. And whereas his Infirmity of Body rendred him unfit for Action, he was no way acceptable to Military Men, in whom that inveterate Humour of making, and unmaking Emperours was ſtill Predominant, and ſo continued for many Ages. Yet did he keep the neighbouring Nations in Peace; which he effected, rather by procuring Hoſtages, than any Awe or Terrour of his Arms. He was alſo fortunate herein, that no publick Calamity hapned in his Time, but the Provinces under his Juriſdiction rejoyced in conſtant good Weather, and plenty of all things. Nay Eutropius, one of the beſt Writers, aſſures us, that at firſt his Government was both Vigorous and Juſt, and that he had atchieved very noble Enterprizes by his Arms, and was through all his Life-time feared by the Souldiers, yet without any great matter of Cruelty. However, (a) another wiſhes that his Vices had continued; for by reaſon of the Diſaſters which afterward hapned, and the Wickedneſs of ſuch as followed him, they were all utterly forgotten; and that Reign of his deſervedly wiſhed for, to have returned, if it had been poſſible.

Conſtans his Character.

A. D. CCCL.

Aurelius Victor.

(a) Victor de Cæſaribus. Quæ tamen Vitia, utinam manſiſſent; namque Magnentii, utpote Gentis Barbaræ, diro atroque Ingenio, ſimul his quæ poſt accidêre, adeò extincta omnia ſunt, ut illud Imperium haud injuria deſideraretur.

Sect.

Sect. IV.

From the Death of Conſtans, to that of Conſtantius.

The Space of Eleven Years.

Magnentius cauſeth the Magiſtrates in the Countrey to be Murdered.

Nepotianus ſets up for himſelf.

Is Defeated and Slain.

1. FOR, the Diſpoſition of Magnentius, was very Naught, which the Romans much attributed to this, that he came of a Barbarous Nation. Elevated by his Succeſs, before he heard of the Death of Conſtans, he ſent, in his Name, for ſuch Magiſtrates in the Country as were moſt Eminent, and cauſed them to be Way-laid and Murdered; in which point he ſpared not ſome of his own Conſpirators. His two Brothers, Decentius and Deſiderius, he declared Cæſars, and ſent them to make ſure of Gall and Spain; as he alſo Diſpatched others into Italy, to ſecure that Country; that after he had killed, he might take poſſeſſion of the whole Inheritance. But, as ſoon as the Death of Conſtans was heard of in Italy, one Nepotianus, the Nephew of Conſtantine the Great, by his Siſter Eutropia, had taken the Purple; and having got the Aſſiſtance of a Company of Gladiators, and Perſons of Deſperate Fortunes, went to Rome; which when he found ſeized by thoſe that Magnentius had ſent (the People being betray'd by Heraclides, a Senator) he laid Siege to the City. Upon ſight hereof, Anicius, who had been by Magnentius made Præfectus Prætorio, brought ſome of the ordinary ſort of Romans out againſt him, and engaged in Fight; but finding them to be Worſted, he Retired into the City, ſhut the Gates, and left them all to be ſlaughtered by him. But the Encouragement which Nepotianus receiv'd by this Succeſs, was ſhortly turned into the other Extreme, by the coming of Marcellinus, now the Magiſter Officiorum, who being ſent by Magnentius with an Army, Engaged, and Defeated him in Battel, took him Priſoner, and cut his Head from his Shoulders; which he cauſed, with Inſolence enough, to be carried in Triumph, and ſhewn about the City. Such was the end of Nepotianus, who having on the third of June aſſumed the Name of Emperour, periſhed in this manner, the twenty eighth day after. But though he was Dead, Magnentius was not freed from the fear of Competition, over and above the Apprehenſions he had of what Conſtantius from the Eaſt might attempt againſt him. For, this year was fruitful in Tyranny and Uſurpation. He began the Tragedy on the firſt of February, and on the firſt of May following, one Veteranio, who Commanded the Army in Pannonia, hearing thereof, reſolved to Act his Part too, having as much Right and Encouragement as the other; and being alſo ſaluted Auguſtus by his Souldiers, placed his Scene at Murſa, a Town of that Province. We have ſeen already how Nepotianus made his Exit, and now muſt fetch Conſtantius out of the Eaſt, before we can ſee the finiſhing of the reſt.

Sapor beſieges Niſibis.

Sigonius.

And departs with loſs.

L.4. de Re Militari, Dat. 5 Kal. Jul. Sergio & Negriniano Coſs. A.D. 350. Abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſtiniani.

2. Conſtantius had received news of his Brother's Death, and the Uſurpation of Magnentius with ſuch Regret, as was ſuitable to Natural Affection, and the Intereſt of his Family; and deſired above all things to Chaſtize the Treaſon. But at this time he was deeply Engaged in the Perſian War, with Sapor, who having news of theſe Diſturbances in the Weſt, with a great Army Invaded, and Haraſſed Meſopotamia. He laid Siege to Niſibis, Attacqued it with his Battering Engines; and finding ſtout Reſiſtance from thoſe within, by a Ditch drew the River away from them, that the want of Water might conſtrain them to yield. But the Towneſmen, by digging of Wells, and the Fountains in the City, made ſhift good enough to ſupply this want: which he perceiving, by a ſudden ſtoppage of the Stream, forced the River againſt the Town, and it broke down part of the Walls, which yet the Defendants again, by their extraordinary Induſtry Repaired. So that having in vain betaken himſelf to other ſhifts, but none ſucceeding, he deſpaired of Succeſs; and word being brought him, that the Maſſagetes had Invaded his Dominions, he returned home, having loſt a great part of his Army. Conſtantius, glad of the Leiſure hereby afforded him to attend his Affairs in the Weſt, and ſenſible in what danger they ſtood, bent all his Endeavours for the Ruducing the Provinces Revolted. In the firſt place, he took care for the Reinforcing of his Armies, and that by an Edict directed to Cretio, one of his Comites of the Militia upon this occaſion. It was not lawful for Officers at any time, no not in Peace, to diſmiſs any Souldier, or give him leave to lay down Arms, except he was either Emeritus, (had ſerved his whole time) or elſe want of Health and of Ability required it. Yet this had been practiſed, and Commanders adventured to do it at ſuch time when there was no danger of any Irruption from the Enemy, and the Borders ſeemed to ſtand in no need of Defence. Cretio appears to have been guilty of this Indulgence, as well as his Brethren, and to have preſented an Excuſe of this nature to the Emperour, pleading, that in his Diſtrict there had been no occaſion for the Uſe of his Men. Of this Conſtantius ſo takes notice, as ſeeming to remit what was “ paſt to him and his Fellow-Officers, he yet enjoyns them, upon this Occaſion, “ to force back to their Arms, all that without Legal Cauſe had been Diſcharged. “

The year 351 had neither Laws, nor Conſuls.

Chronic. Hiſtor. ad An.D. 351.

3. From Meſopotamia he removed into Pannonia, the following year, which was very Notable in this reſpect, that there were no Laws made in it, (however that appear to us) neither any Conſuls; at leaſt, for ſuch acknowledged. For though Magnentius and Gaiſo were ſo made in the Weſtern Parts; yet being in the Uſurpation, they are not named; and therefore the Year is thus Characteriz'd: After the Conſulſhip of Sergius and Negrinianus. Conſtantius, in his March from Conſtantinople, met with Meſſengers ſent from Magnentius, to deſire, that with his Approbation he might Reign in the Weſt; which he thought he might with the more Confidence ask, becauſe he ſhould be content, that the other might have the Precedence in the Dignity. While Conſtantius conſidered what to return in Anſwer, they report that his Father appeared to him the Night following, in a Dream, and holding Conſtans in his hand, ſhould bid him look upon his Brother, whom, deſcended from ſo many Emperours, a Tyrant had Murdered. That therefore he ought to revenge his Death, and not ſuffer the Imperial Throne to be ſo much Abuſed. Awaking in the Morning, he committed the Meſſengers to Cuſtody, and marching away with all ſpeed, came to Sardica, a Town in Dacia. But conſidering the Importance of the Affair, that he might not have two Enemies to deal with at once, he reſolved, if poſſible, by ſome Art or other, to gain over to him Veteranio, that with his Forces he might joyntly make War againſt Magnentius, and ſo Deſtroy one Uſurper by means of another. Neither was Magnentius ſo dull, as not to apprehend, the like Advantage would make alſo for his Intereſt; and therefore each of them endeavoured to make him his own. But Conſtantius came ſo ſuddenly upon the Old Man, that the Surprize gave Perfection to his former Inclinations already bent towards him, as moſt fit for his Friendſhip and Alliance; would, as the Lawful and Undoubted Emperour, bring ſufficient Repute to his Enterprize, and give him an Undoubted Title. Therefore he went out to receive him upon his Approach; who, when they met, embraced him, and called him Father, in reſpect to his Age; carried him along with him to Sirmium, ſet him at his Table, and conſulted with him how to carry on the War.

Poſt Conſulatum Sergii & Nigriniani.

Sigonius.

Conſtantius goes againſt Magnentius.

Zoſimus ubi ſuprà.

Brings over Veteranio to his Party.

4. Matters being accorded betwixt them, they both aſcended the Tribunal, to ſpeak to the Souldiers; where the Dignity of Conſtantius his Original requiring that he ſhould have Precedence in Speech, as well as in Place; by all the moving words he was able, he put them in mind of his Father's Liberality to them, and how many Oaths they had taken to bear intire Affection and Allegiance to his Sons; and therefore he laid before them, how inexcuſable a thing it would appear, if they ſuffered Magnentius to go unpuniſhed, who had laid Violent hands upon a Son of Conſtantine, that had been to them ſo great a Patron and Benefactor. The Souldiers were ſo much herewith affected, that (being alſo Bribed luſtily beforehand, if you will believe Zoſimus) they Cried out, Away with all Counterfeit Emperours, and pulling Veteranio down from the Bench, drew the Purple over his Ears, and Voted him to a Private Life. Who thereupon caſt himſelf at Conſtantius his Feet, and he, moved by the extreme Age of the man, eaſily pardoned him his Uſurpation; and Confining him to Pruſias, a City of Bithynia, aſſigned him a ſufficient Revenue, and befitting his Quality, where he ſpent the Remainder of his dayes: A man of a rough and ungentile Humour, and very ſilly. Conſtantius thus rid of one of the Uſurpers, and ſtrengthned by the Acceſſion of his Forces, was much encouraged to proceed in his Enterprize, and to March for Italy: But ſeriouſly conſidering further of his Affairs, he found the Eſtate of his own Family but very Uncertain and Ticklish; which, though ſecur'd from the Uſurpations of Strangers, yet was like to fall to Nothing of it ſelf. His Brothers were both Dead, and he himſelf having no Iſſue by his Wife, there remained only of his Family, Gallus and Julian, the Sons of Conſtantius, his Uncle, the Brother of Conſtantine the Great; after whoſe Death he miſcarried, as was before ſaid. Now ſo

The Souldiers, moved by his Speech, Depoſe Veteranio.

Propè ad Stultitiam ſimpliciſſimus Victor.

long

Sect. 4.

A. D. 351.

Baronius ad A. D. 350.

Conſtantius confers on his Coſin Gallus the Title of Cæſar.

long as he himſelf had hopes of Iſſue, leſt they ſhould ambitiouſly Attempt any thing, he held a ſtrict hand and eye over them, and put them not into any manner of Employment; no not ſo much, as one obſerves, as amongſt the Suffecti, or Honorary Conſuls. But now perceiving, that by means of theſe Uſurpations, there would be a conteſt, not only betwixt particular Perſons, but Families too, it was in vain to Conteſt for that, which was likely of it ſelf to fail, if the Succeſſion were not ſettled in it. He therefore conferred on Gallus the Title of Cæſar, and gave him for Wiſe his Daughter Conſtantina. Whether more for this Reaſon let the Reader judge, than that which Zoſimus out of his palpable Malice to Conſtantine and his Poſterity aſſignes, viz. That he might thereby have an Occaſion to deſtroy him. For after his Death he did the ſame to his Brother Julian, as we ſhall ſee. But there was alſo need, which Zoſimus and others hint, of having ſome one in his abſence to watch the Perſians, and ſecure the Provinces of the Eaſt. The Care and Endeavour, as we have formerly ſaid, of one Man, not ſufficeing for the Adminiſtration of Authority and Power in all Countries, at ſo great a Diſtance.

He proceeds againſt Magnentius.

Is ſtopped at the Streights of Adranæ.

Zoſimus. Sigonius.

5. Gallus therefore having then received the new Name of Conſtans, and being made Cæſar on the fifteenth of March, was ſent away to Antioch, there to attend the Motions of the Perſians. Conſtantius was wholly intent upon the War againſt Magnentius, and reſolved to find him out; but he prevented him, thinking it more prudent to begin elſewhere, than to expect any Action in thoſe he called his own Dominions; and from Gall, and Italy departed unto Noricum, and thence into Pannonia. In his March he ſent to Conſtantius, to let him know, that he would expect him in the Plains lying near to Sciſcia, which the Emperor liked well enough, that Ground being very Convenient for the Fighting of Horſe; but was ſtopped at the Streights of Adranæ by an Ambuſh laid for him by Magnentius; who much Elevated by the Succeſs, endeavoured to break into the Inner Pannonia, deſirous to fight near the City Sirmium. While he was conſulting how to paſs his Army over the River Savus; one Philip came to him on a Meſſage from Conſtantius, under pretence of making a Peace and Alliance; but indeed to make a Diſcovery of his Strength and Deſigns. Magnentius calling his men together, gave him Audience. To which admitted, he declared his Errand was, to make known to the Army how unſeemly a thing it appear'd, that they who were Subject to Romans, ſhould againſt Romans bear Arms; eſpecially having Conſtantius, the Son of Conſtantine the great, for Emperour; that Conſtantine, under whoſe Conduct they had obtained ſo many Victories over the Barbarians. As for Magnentius, he was to be admoniſhed to Reverence the Memory of Conſtantine, and call to mind the ſeveral good Offices done by that deceaſed Prince, both to him and his Parents; to quit Italy out of a Senſe of his Obligations to the Family, and content himſelf with being Emperour over the Tranſalpine Provinces. This Speech of Philip ſo moved the Souldiers, that they would ſcarcely give Magnentius leave to anſwer. Who in ſhort replied, that he gladly embraced Peace, and would give in his final Determination, the Day following. Then did he invite the principal Officers of the Army to Dinner, and having brought them fully over to his Intereſt, conſulted what to do. The next day he again called the Souldiers together; and to obliterate the Senſe they had of what Philip had ſaid concerning Conſtantine, he much inculcated the ſeveral Affronts they had received from Conſtans, his Son; and how to avoid theſe Injuries and Indignities, they had promoted him to the Imperial Dignity; with which or the like Words, they were again ſo poſſeſſed, as to cry out, that the War was to be proſecuted; and reſolved it was, that they ſhould paſs the Savus. This being known to thoſe that lay in Garriſon in Sciſcia, on the oppoſite Shore, they reſolved to hinder their Paſſage, and repulſed ſuch as endeavoured to land from off the River, or from the Bridge, with ſuch Succeſs, that they routed, and put them to flight, to a great Diſtance. Magnentius ſeeing into what Danger he was brought, made a ſignal for a Treaty; and gave Notice, that without the Emperour's leave he would not paſs the River. To which Philip anſwered; that if he quitted Italy and Noricum, and departed into Illyricum, then would the Emperour conſent to a Treaty.

Magnentius attempting to paſs the Savus, is repulſed.

Conſtantius ſuffers him to come into the Plains of Pannonia.

6. He pretending to Acquieſce herein, Conſtantius cauſed his men to leave the Purſuit, and ſuffered afterward Magnentius to enter into the middle of the Plains of Pannonia, becauſe his own Strength lay moſt in Horſe, and if he came to an Engagement with him, that Place would be moſt convenient, which lay near Cibalæ, where Conſtantine had formerly defeated Licinius. Part of his Army lying now in the Town, he drew a line from the adjoyning Hill, all a long the ſpace of Ground Magnentius takes and razeth Sciſcia.

Repulſed from other Places.

Conſtantius goes to the Relief of Murſa.

which at the Foot of it, lay towards the River: by which means he fortified all that Side which the River did not touch; and over the River he laid a Bridge of Boats, which he might remove at his Pleaſure. Here entertaining his Officers at a Feaſt, one Titian a Roman Senator, had the Boldneſs to come from Magnentius, and in his Name reviling Conſtantine, and his Sons, to command Conſtantius to quit the Purple, if he would ſave his Life. With whoſe Language, though the Emperour was very much moved, yet he ſuffered him to return unpuniſhed; although Philip his own Ambaſſador, was retained in the Enemies Camp all this while. Shortly after, Magnentius ſet upon Sciſcia, took it by Aſſault, and laid it even with the Ground; and having waſted all the Country lying upon Savus, went to Sirmium to ſeize on that too, but was repulſed and defeated in his Councils by the vigorous Oppoſition made, both by the Townſmen and the Garriſon. Thence he departed, and haſted to have better Succeſs at Murſa, where yet he was more deceived in his Expectations. For the Inhabitants ſo ſtrenuouſly demeaned themſelves, and ſo plied him with Darts and Arrows, that not having with him any Engines of Battery, or other means to approach the Walls, he was very much diſtreſſed. And now Conſtantius having Intelligence hereof, quitted Cibalæ, and the Country lying upon Savus, and haſted to relieve the Place. Magnentius endeavoured by Fire to make his way through the Gates, and this Attempt being alſo defeated by the great quantity of Water, which the Defendants poured down from the Walls, he then heard of the Approach of the Emperour, and reſolved to ſurprize him by an Ambuſcade, laid in a Place adjoyning, which was very full of Trees. There he beſtowed four thouſand Galls, with Command, that when the Fight ſhould begin before the Town, they ſhould fall upon the Back of the Enemy; that being on all ſides beſet, he might not Eſcape. But Notice hereof being given to Conſtantius, by thoſe that obſerved it from the Walls; he ſent away Scolidoas and Manadus, two Tribunes, with the choiceſt Souldiers they could take out of the Legions; who ſtopping up all the Avenues to the Place, that none might get out, cut off the whole Party.

Zoſimus.

Overthrows Magnentius in Battel who flies into Italy.

Sigonius.

7. Magnentius ſeeing his cunning Devices to take no Effect, then reſolved to try what plain and open Force would do, and gave Battel to Conſtantius in the Champian lying before Murſa; and ſo fierce a Battel was fought, with that Reſolution and Pertinacy, as in the Opinion of Zoſimus, none in all this War was like it; which much afflicted Conſtantius, though he himſelf ſhould get the Better, foreſeeing how exceedingly the Empire would be weakned thereby (ſo many Brave men falling) and expoſed to the Attempts of the Barbarous Nations. This made him, while the Fight yet continued, to caſt in his mind how to end the Controverſie by a Treaty; but the Animoſity of both ſides was ſo great, that the Darkneſs of Night it ſelf could not part them; but they ſtill with their Swords and Spears laid at one another; as eſteeming it their Happineſs all to dye together upon the Spot. The Officers omitted nothing becoming them, either as Souldiers, or Commanders, and many of them loſt their Lives; whereof two or three deſerved to be recorded to Poſterity. One of theſe was Arcadius, Tribune of the Abulci; and another Menelaus, who was Captain of the Armenian Archers, that fought on Horſeback. Zoſimus tells us how it was reported, that this Menelaus with one and the ſame Bow would ſhoot three Arrows all at once, and therewith kill three ſeveral men; by which Means he deſtroyed great Numbers of the Enemy, and in a manner was the Author of their Defeat: but being on Conſtantius his ſide, he was killed by Romulus, the General of Magnentius his Army, who yet had no great Cauſe to boaſt of his Succeſs; except in this, that he killed his Killer; for he firſt received a Wound from his Hands, which notwithſtanding he gave not over till he had revenged it; but of it he died. At length Magnentius his men began to give Ground, and a great Slaughter followed; of the Event whereof he being ſenſible, and fearful that he ſhould be given up by them into the Emperour's Hands, reſolved to abandon theſe Places of Pannonia, and get into Italy, there to recruit, and try his Fortune another time. And for this Purpoſe he quitted his Horſe, adorned, as he was, with the Imperial Ornaments, and let him go looſe, that the Enemy might imagine the Rider to be ſlain. Conſtantius as ſoon as it was light, from an adjoyning Hill viewing the Plain, and ſeeing the River, which run by it, full of dead Bodies, wept at the Sight; and being more troubled at the Slaughter of ſo many men, than joyed at the Victory, commanded, all that died to be buried without Diſtinction, and ſuch as were wounded to be carefully look'd to. Some ſay, that thirty thouſand of Magnentius his ſide fell in this Fight. But in few Battels was the Strength of the Empire more impaired than in this, which was fought on the twenty ninth of Auguſt.

8. Con-

Conſtantius ſtays in Pannonia.

Makes a Law in favour of Eunuchs.

Confirms what his Father had Granted out of the Res Privata.

8. Conſtantius ſtaid the Remainder of this Year at Sirmium, and the greateſt part of the next alſo, as appears by the Dates of ſeveral of his Conſtitutions, made, when he himſelf was Conſul the fifth time, together with Conſtans Cæſar, although Decentius and Paulus were Named in Italy by Magnentius. Into Italy Conſtantius ſent ſome to purſue the Uſurper, but without any Good Succeſs, their former Proſperity Engaging them too far in Proſecution. He himſelf in Pannonia attended as well the Civil Affairs of the Empire, as Preparations for a Vigorous Reinforcement of the War, which is Evident from ſeveral Laws he made, while he had his Reſidence in theſe Quarters. He was a great Favourer of Eunuchs, being much Governed by them; and whether at the deſire of any of them or no, now Directed an Edict to Rufinus, the Præfectus Prætorio, whereby he Granted them liberty to make Teſtaments, or Declared them to have Power ſo to do. For whether they could do it, or not, there was cauſe of Doubt, for that this Liberty was granted only to thoſe who had arrived at Puberty, whereas Eunuchs do not pubeſcere at all; they being, as the Emperour Alexander Severus termed them, a Third Kind of Men; and for that reaſon Mamercus the Conſul, denied to Genuſius the poſſeſſion of an Eſtate, according to the uſual way. And though formerly ſuch had Power to make Wills, yet it was not till the Eighteenth year of their Age, at what time Puberty ordinarily is found with all men. But Conſtantius gives them by this Law the ſame Privilege as others enjoyed, both as to the making of Wills and Codicils, provided the uſual Solemnities were ſtrictly obſerved. But it was his Intereſt to Oblige other ſorts of Perſons, beſides Eunuchs. Removing to Sabaria, another City of Pannonia, by another Edict he removed the Fears of ſuch as were in danger to be caſt out of Poſſeſſion of what had been given them by Conſtantine his Father; That Prince had been the moſt Bountiful of all others, eſpecially to Churches; and that out of the Res Privata, or his own Private Patrimony; which Gifts, while he yet lived, ſome Perſons went about to make Void and Null: and this moved him by ſeveral Conſtitutions to provide for the Eſtabliſhment and Enſuring of them. Now, being Dead, ſeveral Courtiers and Eunuchs eſpecially, to have the greater opportunity of getting, endeavoured alſo to Reduce theſe Grants to their Fountain, and Reſtore them to the Emperour's Eſtate, which he obviates by this Conſtitution. Being again returned to Sirmium, he did a thing Grateful to the Souldiers Emerit, or Veterani, by a Decree directed unto Helpidius, the Conſularis of Pannonia, whereby he Confirmed the Privileges formerly Granted to them; and particularly, Immunity from Perſonal Services.

Cod. Juſtin. lib.6. tit. 22. L.5. (& vide Notas) 5 Kal. Martii. Dat.Sirmio.

L.6. *de Petitionibus,&c. Cod.Th. lib.*10. tit. 10. Dat. Sabariæ 8 Id. April.

L. 6. de Veteranis, Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 20. Dat. 8. Kal. Jul. Sirmio.

Purſues Magnentius into Italy.

Publiſhes an Act of Oblivion to draw away his men.

And another Edict about the choice of new Souldiers.

9. But Magnentius, as we ſaid, being Beaten out of Pannonia, went into Italy, and betook himſelf to Rome, whom Conſtantius, when all things were ready for his Expedition, purſued in Perſon. His Captains, though at firſt they ſeemed to have had no good Succeſs, yet now, Animated, as it were, by the Emperour's Preſence, had the better of the Tyrant; and Conſtantius himſelf breaking into Aquileia, he was driven from the City, and out of the Country about Autumn, or the Month of September, and fled into Gall. About this very time, to remove Deſperation from all that had taken part with him, or been drawn into his Party, Conſtantius publiſhed an Edict, whereby he granted free and full Indemnity and Pardon to them, ſuch only excepted, as had together with him, been guilty of the many Murders committed ſince the Revolt. And the more to inhaunce the juſt Repute of the Military Profeſſion, by an Edict he forbad, that any ſhould obtain Privileges granted to the Veterani, or thoſe that had ſerved up their full time in the Camp: But for a vigorous Proſecution of this and other Wars, all Encouragements would little prevale, if there were not had an eſpecial Care of the Choice of Tirones, or new Souldiers; concerning which we muſt acquaint the Reader with a matter of Importance, relating to this very Age whereof we write. They were wont, in old time, to raiſe Tirones, or new Souldiers, for Supply of the Armies; but this was nothing comparable to the Invention of theſe Ages. For now (as is at this day practiſed here in England, in forming the Militia of the Counties) Perſons were charged with finding men to ſerve in the Armies, according to the value of their Lands, or other Eſtates; which Inſtitution was good and laudable, tending in it ſelf, to the increaſe of the Power Imperial, and the Defence of the Provinces: but ſo it was managed, that it proved rather the Deſtruction of them. For ſome furniſhed out, either ſuch as were either unfit for Service, or elſe Cowards, which abſented themſelves, and often ran away. Therefore to obviate the Fraud of the Provincials in this Matter, Conſtantius now publiſhed another (a) Conſtitution, for the Proof of the Original, Age, Stature and Condition of ſuch as were ſent to ſerve. Their Original was to be approved, and that before the *Chronic.Hiſtor. ad A.D.*352.

L.2.*de Teſtim. ex Tribun. & Protect. Cod. Th.lib.*7.*tit.*21. Abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſtin.

L.1.*de Tironibus. Cod. Th. lib.*7.*tit.*13. *Dat.prid. Non.Jul. Conſtantio Aug.*6. & Conſtante Cæſare 2. *Conſs. A.D.*353. Vide Notas & Comment.

Decuriones; leſt that any by betaking himſelf to the Army, ſhould deſert the “ Service of Corporations, or any other ſhould quit the Army, and ſhelter himſelf “ in their Employments. To prevent which, ſeveral Laws were made, as we have already hinted. Now the Service which Legions performed, was very hard and ſevere, in Compariſon, eſpecially, of the Auxiliary Troops; ſo that in them there was no Fear, that any would liſt themſelves to ſhun the Services of Corporations; but that of the Auxiliaries, being mild and eaſie, he ordains, that into them none “ ſhould be admitted without a Certificate obtain'd from the Judge of the Pro- “ vince, that the Perſon was no Decurio. And laſtly, whereas the Age of ſuch as “ were ſent into the Armies was wont to be raw, (and indeed it differed, both ac- “ cording to the Cuſtoms of Countries, of ſeveral times, and the Laws) he “ limits it at perfect Puberty (Puberty being always the General Rule, but “ ordinarily the Firſt, and Beginning) when they had paſſed their nineteenth “ Year.

Magnentius again Defeated.

Chronicon. Hiſtor.

Once more Defeated; and Killeth himſelf.

*Vide Chronic. Hiſtoric. ad A.D.*353.

10. This Law, we may Rationally enough conclude, was made, on purpoſe for the more Vigorous carrying on of the War againſt Magnentius in Gall; for now was it Proſecuted with all Induſtry imaginable; and the Succeſs was ſuch, that in the very following Month, after the Date of it, Conſtantius reaped the Fruit of his Labours, and the other received the Reward of his three Years and ſix Months Uſurpation. But the Oppoſition he made was ſo Reſolute and Pertinacious, that ſeveral Fights happened betwixt them, with various Succeſs. At length being Worſted in a place not far from Lugdunum (or Lions) he betook himſelf to an adjoyning Hill, where, ſeeing his Men diſcouraged, even as almoſt to Deſpair of any Safety, he made a Speech to them, to cheer their Spirits; to which, when they Acclamed, as the manner was; by a ſtrange Miſtake, they ſaluted him by the Name of Conſtantius Auguſtus, inſtead of Magnentius. Herewith, as an ill Omen, exceedingly dejected, he departed to a Village call'd the Hill of Severus, belonging to the Cottian Alps, and thence ſent to the Emperour a Meſſenger a Perſon of Senatorian Rank, about a Peace, whom Conſtantius did not admit to his Preſence, ſuppoſing him but to be a Spy, as neither ſeveral Biſhops employed on the ſame Errand; but, many of his Souldiers falling off to him, haſted to find him out, and put an End to the Controverſie. Magnentius perceiving there was no Place left for Pardon, reſolved then to do his Worſt, and reinforcing his Army, as well as he could, that he might give a Diverſion to the Enemy, he ſent one away to Antioch to murder Gallus Cæſar, who afterward was diſcovered, and ſuffered as a Traitor. Then followed, at the Place laſt mentioned, whither Magnentius had betaken himſelf, another Engagement, wherein he was again Worſted, and thence fled to Lions. Thoſe that eſcaped with him, now utterly deſpairing of their Cauſe, reſolved to give him up to the Conqueror, and for that Purpoſe watched the Houſe where he lay; which obſerved, drove him into ſuch Fury; that his Friends and Relations that were about him, he firſt ſlew with his own hand, and having mortally wounded his Brother Deſiderius, amongſt the reſt, at laſt diſpatched himſelf, leſt he ſhould fall alive into the Power of Conſtantius, and be put to a lingring Death. Having ſet his Sword-Hilt to the Wall, he ran againſt it, and ſo with a great Iſſue of Blood at his Noſtrils and Mouth, as well as the Wound, he let out his Life, about the beginning of Auguſt: For as to the preciſe Day, Writers differ. Decentius, his Brother, haſting to his Relief, when he heard of his End, hanged himſelf, at Senonæ, on the eighteenth of Auguſt. Magnentius was a man of a vaſt Body, and as extravagant Morals; and thus having reaped the Fruites of his Uſurpation, and Tyranny (for he firſt by murdring his Sovereign, caſt dirt upon the Chriſtian Name, if a Chriſtian he was) the Monarchy of the Roman Empire was again devolved upon Conſtantius, in the ſeventeenth year of his Reign, the eleventh Indiction. A. D. CCCLIII; he himſelf the ſixth, and Conſtans (Gallus) the ſecond time being Conſuls.

A Statue Erected at Rome to Conſtantius.

Reſtitutori Urbis Romæ, atque Orbis, & Extinctori Peſtiferæ Tyrannidis Dn. N. Fl. Jul. Conſtantio Victori ac Triumphatori ſemper Auguſto, Neratius Cerealis. V.C. Præfectus urbi vice ſacra judicans D. N. M. que ejus.

11. The Report of Magnentius his Defeat and Death, being arriv'd at Rome, Neratius Cerealis, who had been Præfect of that City ſince the twenty ſixth of September of the preceding Year, Erected a Statue to Conſtantius, with an Inſcription, Declaring him to be the Reſtorer both of the City and the World, and the Extinguiſher of the late peſtiferous Tyranny, as he terms it; which Inſcription, as Baronius tells us, by the Miſtake of him that Copied it out, was judged to have related to the Times of Conſtantine; but he now reſtores it to its proper Place, which indeed, had been already done to his hand, whether the Cardinal knew it or not, by Sigonius. But Conſtantius coming to Lions, that he might take away the Fears of ſuch as had been guilty of the late Defection, and ſo ſettle theſe Parts in their former Obedience to him and his Family, made an Edict bearing Date of the ſixth of September, from this City, and Directed to this Cerealis, whereby he Grants, as all Wiſe Princes have been wont, Indemnity and Pardon to all Perſons concern'd, except ſuch as had committed any of the five Crimes to which Death, as a Puniſhment, was Adjudged, and amongſt which Murder is ſuppoſed to have been one, and hereby he made good, what by another Edict he had promiſed to the Followers of Magnentius, to bring them off. And to Quiet their Minds, there was great need of ſuch an Amneſty, or General Pardon and Oblivion; ſo many having been drawn into Offices and Employments under him, and thoſe not of the Meaneſt, but often of the Greateſt Quality: for not only in Gall, but in Italy, and the City of Rome, Magnentius ordained Judges and Præfects of the City; he beſtowed the Dignity of Comites, and the Supreme one of Conſul. But, leſt the Unjuſt Acts, either of him or his Judges, ſhould have any Force to the Oppreſſion of the Innocent, or ſuch as had ſtood to their Integrity and Fidelity; by another Neceſſary Law, he Commanded all ſuch Acts to be Null and Void; which Law, although the Date of it Aſſigns it to the preceding Year; yet all things conſidered, we cannot, but, with Gothofred, be of Opinion, that it was not made till after the Death and the Deſtruction of the Uſurper; and ſome Errour was committed as to the Numerical Letters, and Aſſignation of the Conſulſhip of the ſame Perſons. For Conſtantius the Emperour, and Conſtans the Cæſar, were Conſuls for three years together. Chriſtians do tell us, that ſeveral Acts of Cruelty were exerciſed by the Tyrant towards Chriſtians. Heathen Writers ſpeak alſo of the moſt grievous Proſcriptions made by him, beſides ſeveral heavy and unjuſt Laws. Hereof one required half of the Eſtates of his Subjects, and another permitted Slaves to accuſe their Maſters. He conſtrained whom he thought fit to buy Lands, or Things belonging to the Imperial Dignity, and ſpoiled many of what they had; which whether Lands, or other Matters, were reſtored by Conſtantius to the right Owners by this Edict; as indeed the Cuſtom was in all well ordered Commonwealths, after the end of any Rebellion or Uſurpation; but as we have already ſaid upon another Occaſion; Spontaneous Acts, ſuch as Emancipations, Manumiſſions, Bargains and Tranſactions betwixt man and man were to be held good, elſe all would have been unravelled, and put out of Order; therefore by this ſame Edict he declares them Valid.

Who publiſhes another Amneſty.

L. 2. de Indulgent. Crim. ubi ſuprà. Vide Comment.

L. 5. de Infirmandis his quæ ſub Tyrannis Cod. Th. lib. 15. Tit. 14.

12. But foreſeeing how upon the Diſbanding of ſo many men, as, being old Souldiers, might now receive their Miſſion, or Eaſe, great Robberies poſſibly might enſue, to the great Damage and Regret of the Countries; by an Edict he commanded ſuch (as his Father before him had done) either to apply themſelves to Tillage, or to Traffick, and Merchandize under pain of Death: Aſſigning this Reaſon, that ſuch ought to loſe all Privilege as diſturbed the publick Peace; ſo as if they offended in the leaſt, no Puniſhment ſhould be thought too great for them. Being rid of the Uſurper, to ſecure the Weſtern Parts; he ſeized and fortified the Mouth of the Rhone, and the Paſſage of the Pyrenæan Hills. Then he removed to Arelatum, or Arles; where for Joy, he celebrated the Circenſian Games, and obviated an Abuſe which was committed by occaſion of the Privileges granted to the Veterani. For when Letters teſtimonial were given to them concerning their Service perform'd, the Dignity of Protectors (of which formerly) was uſually alſo conferred on them, which was both great in it ſelf, and had great Immunities accompanying it: As, Excuſe from ſordid and extraordinary Employments, and from ignominious Beating, to which others were Subject; Enjoyment of great Privileges in Traffick; Allowance of the Preſcription of the Prætor's Court; freedom from finding of Tirones (or new Souldiers) and the like. Therefore well was he that could attain to this Dignity of Protector; and not only the Veterani required it, as they might, but Tirones alſo, and other ſorts of Perſons ſought for it; even thoſe that were obnoxious to, as members of, Bodies Corporate; as Decuriones, thoſe that were of Companies, as Tradeſmen, and the Officiales or Attendants of Magiſtrates. Now all theſe, to prevent ſuch defrauding of the ſeveral Bodies, and Magiſtrates concerned, the Emperours by ſeveral Laws, did before prohibit the Enjoyment of the forenamed Dignity and Privileges, and Conſtantius now in particular, forbids them to the Curiales (as did his Brother Conſtans in the like Caſe) this being a Rule, both with him, and other Princes; as to hinder the leſſening of their Armies by Pretences of Souldiers their Relations to Magiſtrates, or Corporations; ſo alſo to prevent the deſerting of Duties and Services of Places corporate, under Pretext of Relation to, or Privileges received from, the Military Employment.

And upon pain of Death commands the Rebellious Army to apply themſelves to ſome courſe of Life.

L. L. 2. & 3. de diverſis Officiis &c. Cod. Th. lib. 8. tit. 7.

13. The

Sect. 4.

A. D. 354.

*A.D.*354. *Conſtantio A.*7. & Gallo Cæſare 3. Coſs.

Gallus acts like a Madman.

Ammianus Marcellinus rerum Geſtarum lib. 14. initio.

13. The former part of the following Year, which was the eighteenth of his Reign, when he himſelf the ſeventh, and Conſtans (or Gallus) Cæſar the third time were Conſuls, he continued at Arles; but thence removed in the Spring to Valentia, undertaking an Expedition againſt Gundomadus, and Vadomarius, two Brothers, and Kings of the Almans; who with their frequent Incurſions waſted the Borders of Gall, and the Provinces thereto adjoyning. At Valentia he made ſome ſtay for the Proviſions of the Army, of which the great Floods now abroad hindred the Conveyance out of Aquitain. And here he was entertained with unwelcome News out of the Eaſt; where his Nephew Gallus acted the Tyrant and Madman, to ſuch a Degree, that his Government of thoſe Provinces was utterly intolerable. So mightily was he puffed up with the height of his Place, to which from the depth of Miſery and Deſpair, he had been unexpectedly advanced; that, as one who from long Impriſonment in a dark Dungeon, is brought ſuddenly into the Light, growes giddy and diſturb'd in his Phancie, not knowing well what he ſaid, or did, he brake out into all Acts of Extravagance; to which would have been added Violence againſt him that raiſed him, had he had as much Power and Opportunity, as Ambition. And if ever his Paſſions a little cool'd, they were ſuddenly blown again into a Flame by the as reſtleſs and extravagant Spirit of his Wife; a Woman above Meaſure puffed up with the Conceit of the Greatneſs of her Birth, having been formerly married by Conſtantine, to King Anniballianus (ſo our Author calls him) his Brother's Son; a very Mortal Megara, ſaith Ammianus, a daily Inflamer of one, who of himſelf continually raged; and as greedy of Man's Blood, as her Huſband. For the more effectual Shedding hereof, lying at Antioch; they made uſe of cunning Spies and Tale-bearers, who inſinuating themſelves into Company, reported back, not only all, but more than they had heard, and accuſed ſeveral innocent Perſons of Treaſon, and other feigned and heavy Crimes. Under theſe Pretexts, if any one deſired to be rid of a Perſon againſt whom they bore Malice; it was eaſie to procure for a good Reward, the party to be made away. There was one Clematius, a noble man of Alexandria, whoſe Wife's Mother burning in Luſt towards him, and not able to prevail, turned her Love into ſo great Hatred, that getting Admittance to Conſtantina, by a Preſent of a Rich Bracelet, ſhe procured a Warrant to Honoratus, Comes of the Eaſt, to put him to Death; which was done accordingly. Some upon mere Suſpicion were murdred, and others turn'd out of their Eſtates to beg their Bread; no Accuſer being ſeen, no not ſo much as a Slave, which the greateſt Tyrants moſt commonly were wont to make uſe of, to put ſome Colour of Juſtice upon their Proceedings. But leſt there ſhould be wanting Informers, Gallus himſelf would take the Pains to make Diſcoveries in his own Perſon, walking Incognito by Night through the City, and in the Greek Tongue, inquiring what People ſaid of Cæſar, till he became notoriouſly known. Thalaſſius, the Præfectus Prætorio, who was with him, might have much obviated theſe Miſchiefs, if he had prudently gone about it. But being a man alſo of an arrogant Humour, he contradicted and oppoſed him with too much Heat, and at unſeaſonable times; and ſent Informations of all his Actions to the Emperour; not covertly, but (none can tell out of what Deſign) with Purpoſe that it ſhould be known.

And by the Indiſcretion of Thalaſſius.

Is hurried into all Acts of Deſperation.

14. This drove him into all Acts of Fury and Deſperation, and hurried him into outragious Proceedings, without any Hope of being reclamed: at what time the Eaſtern Provinces received ſufficient Damage otherwiſe, without the Miſchiefs ariſing from his ill Adminiſtration. For the Iſauri, a people addicted to a ravenous and pilfring ſort of Life, by their ſudden and ſecret Invaſions much diſtreſſed the neighbouring Countries; to be revenged (as they pretended) for the Injury and Affront offred to their Nation at Iconium, a Town of Piſidia; where ſome of their Countrymen were, contrary to Cuſtom (now in times of Chriſtianity) expoſed to Wild Beaſts upon the Theatre. They firſt applied themſelves to rifling of Merchants Ships that lay upon the Coaſts; ſtealing by Night out of their lurking Holes, and when their Booty there failed them, betook themſelves into the Inland Countries; where killing and ſtealing all they could; at laſt they laid Siege to Seleucia, the Mother of Cities, as Ammianus ſtyles it. Hereof many Complaints having arrived, Gallus therewith moved, for that the Magiſter Equitum was then employed elſewhere; commanded Nebridius, now Comes of the Eaſt, to relieve the Place: who with as great Forces as he could, haſted to raiſe the Siege; but was prevented by the Rovers; who upon Notice of his coming, forſook their Ground, and without any thing more performed, diſperſed themſelves throughout the adjoyning Mountains. At the ſame time an Attempt was made by the Perſians, but with-

The Iſauri-Rovers diſperſed.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 354.

without any better Succeſs, upon Batne, a Municipium in Anthemuſia, a Province of Oſdruena. Nohodares, the General, had Orders to fall upon Meſopotamia, as that which lay moſt conveniently for their Incurſions; but the Danger it was expoſed to was a means of its Safety; all the Gariſons and ordinary places of the Souldiers Reſidence upon the Borders, Prætenturæ & Stationes Agrariæ, being ſo well Furniſhed, that he could not with the leaſt hope Attacque any of them. Therefore he Aimed at this Batne, a Town Famous for a Mart held there yearly, about the beginning of September, for Wares of no ſmaller Conſequence than thoſe of India, the Seres, and others Imported both by Sea and Land from other Places. And by the Wilderneſs adjoyning, and the Paſtures, he endeavoured to ſteal upon the Town; but was timely diſcovered, and all his Endeavours that way rendred Ineffectual. The Saracens in the mean while had better fortune, who neither being ſuch as the Empire could wiſh its Friends nor Enemies, Roving far and wide, Deſtroyed on a ſudden all they met with; therein reſembling much the nature of the Kite, ſaith our Hiſtorian, who, if from on high he eſpy his prey, with a ſpeedy Wing inſtantly ſnatcheth it; and if he be Maſter of it, ſtayes not ſo long as to afford any opportunity to the Injur'd Party of Recompenſation, or Revenge.

De Prætenturis & Stationibus Agrariis vide Annot. Valeſii in hunc locum Marcellini. Prætenturæ ſunt Præſidia Militum, quæ pro Caſtris ſecuritatis cauſâ prætendebantur; hoc eſt, ante tendebantur. Stationes Agrariæ ſunt Præſidia Militum, quæ in Caſtellis, aut Aggeribus Publicis Explorandi gratiâ Conſtituuntur, cùm Hoſtis non procul abſit; vel Pacis tempore circa limitem. Prætenturæ ferè de Peditibus tantùm dicuntur.

Conſtantius his Severity.

15. Conſtantius, in the mean time Wintering at Arles, though he had celebrated the Circenſian Games at the entrance of his Tricennalia, with great Magnificence; yet therewith could not be ſo diverted, as to ſatisfie his Melancholick and Suſpitious Humour. So Fearful he was made of Plots againſt his Life, by the late Treaſon of Magnentius, that Diſtruſting all men, he interpreted whatever they did or thought, to be intended againſt himſelf; and by the Death of ſeveral Perſons, rendred the late Victory no way acceptable, notwithſtanding the Law of Indemnity we not long ſince mentioned. For, if Credit may be given to our Hiſtorian, ſuch of the Army, or Nobility, or the Middle ſort, called Honorati, (or ſuch as had born Offices,) who were but Accuſed, or Slightly mentioned to have been of the Tyrant's ſide, were firſt fettered like Beaſts, and then either put to Death, deprived of their Eſtates, or Condemned to Iſlands, without any Accuſer appearing. And this increaſed the Hatred of the People, hence conceived, that he was Inexorable, and Pardoned none that were once Sentenced; being provoked by thoſe about him, who would not ceaſe to inculcate, that the Safety of the whole World depended upon the ſlender Thread of their Emperour's Life. He that moſt inſiſted hereon, and filled the Emperour's Jealous Head with Suſpicions was Paul, a Notary, born in Spain; one who being like a Thief, crafty in finding out and taking ſuch like as himſelf, was ſent hither into Britain, to reduce ſuch Souldiers as had fallen off to Magnentius: and having made his Ends of them, and taſted the bewitching Sweetneſs of Money, was now by his greedy Appetite driven headlong into all vilanous Practices againſt the Lives and Liberties of all ſorts of Perſons, how innocent ſoever, that he might go Sharer in their Eſtates. This procured a diſmal Tragedy, which in our Writers Opinion, and that deſervedly, caſt a great Blot upon the Reign of Conſtantius. One Martin, at this time governed theſe Provinces, as Vicar; who often endeavoured by his Interceſſion to ſtop the Career of this Vilany, and procure Reſt for thoſe, who had not given any Occaſion for Diſturbance; and the Conteſt betwixt him and Paul came to that height, that he threatned to be gone, and quit his Place, rather than torment his Senſes by a continual Apprehenſion of ſuch Outrages, as he committed. Paul ſeeing how this would put an end to his Trade, reſolved to put him amongſt ſuch as he had yet reſerved to his falſe Accuſations, and importuned them at Court, that he might be brought up as well as the reſt, of which Martin having Intelligence, made an Attempt to kill the Vilain, and when he failed therein, puniſhed himſelf for his Failure in the ſame kind. Paul having thus eſcaped, purſued his Enterprize, and carried up his Priſoners in Chains (from which he received the Sirname of Catena) to Court; where ſome were committed to a tedious and irkſome Priſon; others delivered into the Hangman's hands to be tortured; ſome proſcribed and ſent into Baniſhment, and others put to Death. This being obſerved for a Rule in Conſtantius his Days, that none eſcaped Condemnation in ſome of theſe Kinds, of whom it had been but whiſpered, that they were guilty Perſons.

Paul, a Notary, a covetous and malicious Backbiter.

Agens illas Provincias pro Præfectis. Aliud eſt agere pro Præfectis, aliud agere pro Præfecto. Agere pro Præfectis dicitur, qui ordine Codicillorum Vicariam poteſtatem Exercet: Agere pro Præfecto, cui Præfectus Urbi, vel Prætorio in ſpeciali quodam Negotio vices ſuas mandavit. Vide Valeſii Annotationes.

16. At this time Memmius Vitraſius Orfitus was Præfect of Rome (from the tenth of December of the preceeding year) a man prudent enough, and underſtanding in the Practice of Courts; but not ſo learned in the Liberal Arts, as became a man of his Nobility and Rank; and inſolently proud upon this his Preferment. Through his careleſs Adminiſtration great Tumults were occaſion'd in the City, for want of Splendore liberalium doctrinarum minùs quàm nobilem decuerat inſtitutus.

Gallus Cæſar a Plague to all Good men under his Power.

Conſtantius endeavours to Maſter him.

Domitian the Præfect indiſcreetly demeans himſelf.

Wine, which the Præfect, of courſe, was to provide; all ſorts and Degrees of Men being Degenerated, and nothing Serious or Memorable acted there, as Ammianus ſhews at large, in divers particulars. And at Antioch things were more out of Order, where Gallus Cæſar was a Plague and Burthen to all good men, as well the Honorati and Primates of Cities, as Plebeians (ſo our Author diſtinguiſheth;) and upon a Trivial Occaſion had put to Death the Principal Senators, if Honoratus, the Comes of the Eaſt, had not with a moſt conſtant Reſolution oppoſed it. With Bloody, and for that reaſon Prohibited, Shows upon the Theatre, he was wonderfully delighted. Being on his way to Hierapolis, and on a pretended Expedition, the Citizens of Antioch put up a Petition to him, to find out ſome courſe to prevent the great Scarcity of Victuals, of which they were apprehenſive; in anſwer to which, he did not enter into any Conſultation, or make Uſe of ſuch Means, as other Princes were wont in the like caſes; but delivered up into their hands Theophilus, the Conſularis of Syria; often proteſting that it was the Governour's Fault, if any Inhabitant wanted Neceſſaries: and this his Encouragement drove the Rabble into that Rage, when it wanted Bread, that they ſet fire to his Houſe, and ſo Beat and Abuſed him, that thereof he died; leaving a Warning to other Magiſtrates, what they muſt expect from ſo Worthy a Prince. This, and other Matters being brought to Conſtantius his knowledge by Thalaſſius, or others, he Reſolved, in order to the Maſtering of him, firſt to withdraw his Strength, and under pretence of Danger, which he ſaw might ariſe to his Perſon from the Conſpiracy of ſo many idle Souldiers, as ſerved under him, he removed ſuch Forces as there lay under his Command; bidding him be content with the Palatine Scholes, and of the Protectors, with the Scutarii and Gentiles; and enjoyned Domitian, (now from Comes Largitionum made Præfect) that when he came into Syria, he ſhould by Gentle means labour to reclame him from theſe Extravagant Courſes. But he being with great ſpeed arrived at Antioch, took a quite contrary courſe; for he did not ſo much as go to Wait on him, as his Duty was, but with great Pomp paſſed on to the Prætorium; and after this, pretending Indiſpoſition, neither came at Court, nor appeared abroad; but keeping himſelf up, plotted how to deſtroy Cæſar: and for that purpoſe, amongſt the Accuſations he ſent to the Emperour, ſhuffled in ſome things, which might better have been omitted. Being, with much intreaty, at laſt brought into the Conſiſtory, without any Complement, or any other expreſſion of Civility, he raſhly and indiſcreetly bade him be gone, as he was Commanded; and told him, he would have him to know, that in caſe he did not Obey, he would order both his own Allowances, and thoſe belonging to his Court to be ſtopped; He, as Præfect, having the Charge of Proviſions, which to Cæſar were allowed, and Diſtributed to his Attendants from the Emperour, as well as to Apparitors, or any other Miniſters. Having arrogantly ſpoken ſo much, he departed Frowning, being, as he was Born, a Clown; and though often ſent for, would come no more into Gallus his Preſence.

He and Montius the Quæſtor murdered by Gallus his men.

17. Gallus hereat vehemently moved, as one who formerly did but pretend, but now in earneſt did ſuffer, and was rudely dealt with; ordered the Præfect to be ſafely Watched, by ſuch of his Protectors as he could truſt. This being known, one Montius, at this time Quæſtor, a man by Nature ſevere enough, but yet more inclining to Gentleneſs than the other, as one Concerned by Common Intereſt: firſt, Tampered with the Advocates of the Palatine Scholes, to whom he inculcated, that theſe things ought not to be, neither would any Good come of them; and in an upbraiding manner he added, that if ſuch Courſes were purſued, they would firſt Demoliſh the Statues of Conſtantius, (the uſual way of beginning a Rebellion) and then proceed to conſider about the Life of the Præfect, which was to be taken away. Cæſar having notice hereof, found his Affairs in a deſperate Condition, and therefore Reſolving to Fence for his Life and Security, as well as he could cauſed all the Souldiers to be drawn together, told them, that he and they ran, the ſame hazard; and that by means of Montius, who Accuſed them all as Rebels and Traitors, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had Committed to Cuſtody the Wilful and peeviſh Præfect, who would not know his Duty and Place; out of juſt Apprehenſion of the Danger that might ariſe from his Contumacious Humour. The Souldiers, who were not given much to Conſider, but alwayes greedy of Trouble and Innovation, ran furiouſly to Montius, who lay near at hand, and ſeizing on him, a feeble, old Man, and ſickly, bound him, and dragged him ſtraight to the Prætorium of the Præfect, whom, throwing headlong down the Stairs, they bound them both together with cords, and ſo drew them with haſte through the ſtreets, till they had torn them Limb from Limb; which done, and having trampled upon their Carkaſſes, and mangled them as they liſted, then they caſt them into the River. Being ſufficiently moved to this outragious Act by Gallus, they were further Animated by two Turbulent Fellows; whereof one was Luſcus, who had been ſuddenly Advanced to be Curator of the City, and another called Sthenelaus, the Head of the Bajuli, or Veſpillones, who carried out the Dead (as is thought) or of the Porters, or ſuch as carried Burthens; who often roared out, that they ſhould make quick Diſpatch, and perfect what they had begun; for which he was burnt alive not long after. But becauſe Montius, as he was about to Expire, amongſt his Tortures had blamed Epigonius and Euſebius, only mentioning theſe Names, and neither their Dignity nor Profeſſion, there was wonderful Inquiry made, who theſe ſhould be; and before the Matter ſhould grow cold, Epigonius the Philoſopher was fetcht from Lycia, and Euſebius Sirnamed Pictacas, an Eloquent Orator, out of Myſia from Emiſſa; whereas the Quæſtor meant neither of them; but exclaimed againſt two Tribunes of the Fabricks or Forges (it ſeems of theſe Names,) who had promiſed him a Supply of Arms, in caſe any ſuch Diſturbance ſhould happen.

18. At the ſame time Apollinaris, the Son-in-Law of Domitian the Præfect, and who had lately the Charge of Cæſar's Palace, having been ſent about ſome Affairs into Meſopotamia, was narrowly ſearched, by the Souldiers there for Papers, which might manifeſt the great Deſign which Gallus now had in his Head. Having received News of what had hapned at Antioch, and ſuſpecting his own Safety, he withdrew himſelf, through the leſſer Armenia to Conſtantinople; but was fetcht back by thoſe called Protectors, and committed to cloſe Priſon. Not long after a Diſcovery was made at Tyre, of an Imperial Robe, which by whoſe order made, or how it came there could not be known. Whereupon Apollinaris the Father, who then governed that Province, was laid hold of, and together with many others, burthened with moſt heavy, but idle Accuſations, and haled to Cuſtody. For now Cæſar did not at all conceal himſelf, nor pretended to any Excuſe, but with the greateſt Impudence ran through thick and thin, making no diſtinction between Right or Wrong, Juſt or Unjuſt, but what his Will and Luſt procured. A mock-Court of Juſtice was erected, a mock-Judge, the Magiſter Equitum, and as mock-Notaries appointed, who carried Intelligence to Gallus of all that was ſaid by the Parties. The firſt that was thus tried was Epigonius the Philoſopher; who knowing little of the World, could not endure the Tortures; and without pleading any thing of Law, confeſſed he knew not what, and accuſed thoſe as complices, who knew no more than himſelf of the Matter; but Euſebius, as one well verſed in the Law, demanded that his Accuſer ſhould be produced to his Face, denied ſtoutly what was objected, and plainly called thoſe Proceedings no courſe of Judgement, but of Robbery and Murder; for which Liberty as an inſolent and audacious Slanderour he was, by Cæſar's command tortured to Death, together with his Fellow-Sufferer, calling to Heaven for Vengeance; yet altogether as unconcern'd as Zeno is ſaid to have been; who in the midſt of his Torments bit off his Tongue, and ſpit it into the Face of the Cyprian Tyrant, if our Author do not miſtake. As for the Robe that was found at Tyre; the Workmen there confeſſed that one Maras a Deacon, had written a Letter to procure the haſtening of it; but he being apprehended choſe rather a painful Death, than to confeſs any thing. Hereupon great Stir was made about it; and after that many upon ſlight Preſumptions, had been made away: at length the Apollinares, both Father and Son, were ſent into Baniſhment, as was pretended; but being come as far as Crateræ, a Town of their own, twenty four Miles diſtant from Antioch, they had there their Thighes broken, and were murdred according to Order. Yet with their Blood Gallus was not glutted; but like a greedy Lyon ſtill ranged about for more, the Effects whereof were ſo various, as Ammianus profeſſes, that the Inſiſting upon Particulars would be too tedious for his Deſign.

Several others put to Death by a mock ſort of Juſtice.

Vide Annotationes Valeſii in hunc locum.

Others plainly murdred by his Order.

Conſtantius prepares againſt the Almans.

19. Thus groaned the Eaſtern Provinces under the tyrannical Government of Gallus; when, as we hinted, Conſtantius had removed from Arles to Valentia, undertaking an Expedition againſt the Almans. There ſtaying for the Proviſions of the Army, he was fully acquainted with his Nephews Demeanour, by Herculanus, a Protector Domeſticus, Son of Hermogenes, who had been a Magiſter Militum, and was killed in a popular Tumult at Conſtantinople. His Vexation and ſollicitous Thoughts how to redreſs the Miſchief, was diverted for ſome time, by the Diſcontents of his Army, which lying at Cabillon, was ready to Mutiny for Proviſions. This brought Rufinus, now Præfectus Prætorio of theſe Parts,

His Deſign againſt them is betrayed.

He makes Peace with them.

into great peril of his Life, being required to give the Souldiers an account how their Neceſſaries were ſo long kept from them; and this was done of purpoſe, it's thought, that he being the Uncle of Gallus by the Mother's ſide, might Miſcarry, and Periſh by their Rage; who, beſides their uſual Fierceneſs and Animoſity againſt Men of High Place and Truſt, were now Irritated by their want of Victuals: but thoſe Concerned, ſo beſtirred themſelves, that Euſebius the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, being ſent with Gold to Cabillon, therewith underhand Quieted thoſe that were moſt Turbulent, and in capacity to do Miſchief; and ſo the Army was kept in Peace, and the Life of the Præfect preſerved; the Proviſions arriving in Abundance, not long after. The Day following they marched, and having paſſed many Difficulties, beſides thoſe Hills that were all covered with Snow, they came at length to Rauracum on the Bank of the Rhine, where the Almans vigorouſly oppoſed them. It was thought fit to lay a Bridge over the River; but the Enemy ſo plied it with Darts and Arrows, that there was no Appearance for Workmen upon the Water, which caſt the Emperour into a great Conflict what Courſe to take, when unexpectedly, one that knew the Place very well, offered himſelf a Guide, and for a good Reward to conduct them over, where it was Fordable: and this had by Night been effected, but that the Almans, had privately the Deſign diſcovered to them by ſome of their own Country-men, that ſerved in eminent Places in the Army: the Suſpition lighting on Latinus the Comes Domeſticorum, Agilo the Tribunus Stabuli, and Scudilo, who commanded the Scutarii: Men, who were in thoſe Days accounted the Pillars of the Commonwealth. Yet notwithſtanding the Almans, whether diſcouraged by their unlucky Auſpicia, as our Author will have it, or for that they deſpaired of good Succeſs by Reſiſtance, ſent ſome of their principal Officers or Nobility, to beg Pardon, and a Peace. Their Overtures were not unkindly received; but being long conſidered of and debated, were at length approved of by the Emperour, and his Council; yet to ſeem to do nothing without the Knowledge and Approbation of the Army, he reſolved to make the Souldiers acquainted with what he little doubted but they would approve. Aſcending the Tribunal, and attended by all his great Miniſters, after a ſhort Preamble ſuited to the Occaſion, he told them, That if they would but conſent, his Opinion “ was to grant the Requeſts of thoſe, who ſought Peace with ſo great Submiſſion. “ His Reaſons were; firſt by a certain Treaty to prevent the Uncertainties of “ War; that of the Almans, inſtead of Enemies, they might have Aſſiſtants and Allies, “ as they had engaged. The next was, to prevent the Miſchiefs, which from “ their frequent Incurſions, fell upon the neighbouring Provinces, and he added, “ that he only was not to be eſteemed an Enemy conquered, who being overpower'd “ by the Weight of Arms, or number of men, was ſlain in the Field; but much “ more he, who was ſubdued by an unbloody Victory, who voluntarily turned to “ Obedience out of a Senſe, that neither Valour was wanting to the Romans againſt “ the rebelliouſly Contumacious, nor Lenity towards ſuch as did ſeriouſly deſire it. “ In concluſion, he was minded to uſe temperately the preſent Advantage, but left “ it to them wholly, to conſider what was to be done, with this Aſſurance, that it “ was not any Sloth or Cowardize that engaged him to ſuch Sentiments, but merely “ Principles of Modeſty and Humanity. He had no ſooner ſpoken, but the Multitude, prone enough to whatſoever he inclined, commended his Councils, and conſented to the Peace, taking eſpecial Notice, that little or no Good, but rather much Evil hapned by theſe frequent Expeditions; for when Wars were managed abroad, great Miſchiefs fell out alſo at home, not uſual in Governments united, and of moderate Extent, but in the Empire too frequent by Reaſon of it's too great Bulk, and the Variety if notuſual Diſagreement of it's Princes, who often were not virtuouſly inclin'd, even as at the preſent time.

The Eunuchs plot againſt Urſicinus.

20. The Peace being fully accorded, and all ſolemn Acts, relating thereunto performed, Conſtantius departed for Milan, where being now eaſed of other Cares, he made it his Buſineſs with his moſt intimate Councellors and that ſecretly, and by Night, to conſult how to ſuppreſs, and ruine his Couſin. And it was agree'd to prevent any further Acts of Deſperation and Pertinacy, that it ſhould by good Words, and fair Promiſes be effected, under the Pretext of a publick Treaty; that ſo without any Difficulty or obſtacle, being deſtitute of Aſſiſtance, he might be circumvented. Theſe Councils were not approved by ſeveral Courtiers, and the Eunuchs that attended him, who bearing Malice to Urſicinus, the Magiſter Equitum in the Eaſt, contended that he was by no Means to be ſuffered to continue in thoſe Provinces, if none were there left to over-aw him; who having Sons both in reſpect of their Perſons, and Age very acceptable, as well as for their Military

Skill, to which they were continually Exerciſed and Trained up; they whiſpered, that this ſeem'd to look towards Uſurpation, and that Gallus, of his own Nature, being Fierce and Cruel, was by ſome, on purpoſe ſet on, and Animated to theſe Extravagant Courſes; that he being brought into Univerſal Ignominy and Hatred, the Empire might at length be Transferred upon the Sons of Urſicinus. Theſe things thus inſinuated, could not but exceedingly perplex Conſtantius, who never had his Ears ſhut to Arguments of this nature; yet he reſolved on the beſt courſe, as it hapned, Commanding Urſicinus, with the Equipage and Honour belonging to his Degree, to come to Court, under pretence, that they might take Advice what was to be done in this Juncture of time, when the Arms of the Parthian Nations threatned the Safety of the Empire. And that there might be no ſuſpition of any Evil intended him, Proſper, a Comes, was ſent to ſerve as his Deputy, till his Return; with which way of Procedure ſatisfied, and having the Advantage of the Vehicula, or Curſus Publicus, he haſtened with great Journeys to Milan. To get Cæſar to Court, no leſs care was taken; and that he might neither Suſpect any thing, his Wife Conſtantina received from the Emperour, her Brother, many kind Letters, wherein he expreſſed an earneſt Deſire to ſee her, which ſhe was cunning enough to Suſpect, and Apprehend the worſt; but ſhe hoped by the Intreaties and Inſinuations of a Siſter to charm him. They began then their Journey, but it ſo fell out, that ſhe was ſuddenly ſnatcht away by a Fever, at a Place called Cæni Galliciani in Bithynia, as ſhe was on her way; which caſt her Huſband into a great Perplexity, not knowing what to do: For now ſhe was gone, on whoſe Intereſt alone he could rely. And as for her Brother, conſidering his Nature, he could not but conclude, that he would be peremptory in his own Opinion; receive no Satisfaction, nor pardon what was paſt, (being ſufficiently inclined to the Deſtruction of his Kindred) but, if he could compaſs it, having entrapped him by ſome Secreet Wile, take him at the Diſadvantage, and put him to Death. Being now driven to ſo great Neceſſities, and expecting nothing but the utmoſt Extremity, if he ſtood not ſufficiently upon his Guard, he was deſirous enough to take the Title of Emperour, if he had had any Encouragement; but he was deſerted by thoſe about him; partly for his bloody and fickle Humour, and eſpecially, becauſe they feared the Greatneſs of Conſtantius, which appeared abundantly able to cruſh and bring to nought all his Deſigns.

Gallus, having loſt his Wife, is exceedingly perplex'd.

21. Thus perplexed in his Mind, he received frequent Diſpatches from the Emperour, requiring, nay, intreating him, to haſten to his Preſence; for that the Empire, neither could, nor ought to be divided, but each of them to ſuccour it, when in a Tottering Condition, as the Provinces of Gall at preſent were. And for an Example of no very old Date, he added, that Diocleſian and his Colleague were ſerved by their Cæſars, even as by Apparitors, who continued not in any place, but moved to and fro upon occaſion; and how in Syria, Galerius, though in Purple, as he was, walked well nigh a Mile before the Litter of the angry Emperour. Many Meſſengers were ſent, and after all came Scudilo, the Tribune of the Scutarii, a crafty, inſinuating Man, under the vizard of a downright, blunt Fellow; who, by Flattering, and ſerious Diſcourſe mixed together, was alone able to prevail with him to take the Journey; for he made him partly believe, that his Brother and Couſin (as he termed him) moſt paſſionately deſired to ſee him; That he had Meekneſs and Clemency enough to Remit what hitherto had been Committed through Imprudence; and that having made him his Companion in the Empire, he deſired he ſhould ſhare alſo in the Toil thereof; the Northern Provinces now exceedingly requiring his Aſſiſtance. As the Apprehenſions of ſuch as are near to Deſtruction, are wont to be Darkned and Perverted, by theſe vain Flatteries he was brought into vain Hope; and departing from Antioch, went out of the Smoak into the Flame, (as our Author tells us the old Proverb was.) And coming to Conſtantinople, as if all things had been well and ſecure with him, Celebrated there the Horſe-Games, and put the Garland upon one Corax a Chariot-driver, who had won the Prize. Conſtantius grew more ſuſpitious when he heard of his Confidence, and was exceedingly provoked to deſtroy him. And that in his Journey he might not, out of Deſperation, attempt any way to provide for his Security, cauſed all the Souldiers to be removed out of the Towns, through which he was to paſs. Several Great Officers alſo, under pretence of other Buſineſs, were ſent to Watch him. After a Tedious Journey, when he was come to Hadrianople, (a City ſtanding on the Mountain Hæmus, formerly called Uſcuduma) where he Refreſhed himſelf for twelve dayes together; the Thebæan Legions which Quartered in the Neighbouring Parts, ſent ſome to Adviſe him to ſtay, and offered

Is perſuaded by Scudilo to move towards the Emperour.

Prorſus ire tendebat de fumo (ut Proverbium loquitur vetus) ad flammam.

ed him their utmoſt Aſſiſtance: but the Meſſengers were ſo narrowly watcht, that they could not get any opportunity to ſpeak with him.

22. Now came Letters after Letters to haſten him away, and for his Journey ten Publick Carriages were provided, but all the Attendants of his Court were left behind, except ſome few that waited in his Chamber, and at his Table; and ſo he was hurried away, a miſerable Spectacle to look on, Weeping, and bewailing his Raſhneſs, that he ſhould Betray himſelf in this manner into the Hands and Power of his Enemies; and otherwhiles Affrighted by the Terrour of his Conſcience, and Dreams, ariſing from the Guilt he had contracted by the baſe Murder of Domitian, Montius, and many others; at length he arrived at Petovio, a Town of Noricum, where he had occaſion fully to diſcover the Snares laid to Entrap him. For now, on a ſudden, appeared to him one Barbatio, who had under him borne the Office of Comes Domeſticorum, with Apodemius, one of the Agentes in Rebus, attended by a Company of ſuch Souldiers as the Emperour had ſufficiently obliged, and was well aſſured, that neither for Pity nor Reward, would they be drawn from Proſecuting ſuch Orders as they received from him. Now without any Diſſimulation of what was to be Acted, the Houſe was beſet with Armed Men; and Barbatio entring his Chamber, when it was ſcarcely light, took away his Royal Apparel, and put on him an ordinary and common Habit; yet, by frequent Oaths, aſſuring him, as from the Emperour, that now he had ſeen and felt the worſt. But he bade him riſe inſtantly, and all on a ſudden clapping him into a cloſe Litter, carried him away into Iſtria, to a Place near to Pola, where Criſpus, the Son of Conſtantius, was reported to have been made away. There being cloſe ſhut up and expecting nothing but Death; Euſebius, now the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, Pendatius, a Notary, and Mellobandes, a Tribune, by order of Conſtantius, came and examined him about thoſe he had put to Death at Antioch. To this he anſwered with a pale and gaſtly Countenance, that moſt of them were ſo handled at the Inſtigation of his Wife Conſtantina. Upon Report of this Anſwer, as thinking it ſeems it reflected upon his Siſter, and conſequently on himſelf too much, Conſtantius fell into greater Indignation than ever, and placing all his Security in the Deſtruction of Gallus, reſolved to put an end to his own Fears, and the others Life both together. And for this purpoſe ſent away Serenianus (who having been accuſed of Treaſon, was odly acquitted) Pentadius, the Notary, and Apodemius, the Agens in Rebus, to put him to Death, which was executed upon him, as if he had been a Thief, by cutting off his Head, his Hands being bound together; after which, his Body lay a miſerable Spectacle, which had lately been ſo terrible to Cities and Provinces. But to ſuch an End came Gallus Cæſar, in the Iſland Flavona, near to Pola, (as others write) in the twenty ninth year of his Age, and the fourth (begun) after his Promotion. He was born in Tuſcia, at a place called Maſſa Veternenſis, of Conſtantius, Brother to the Emperour Conſtantine, and Galla, the Siſter of Rufinus and Cerealis, Perſons, both of them of Conſular Dignity, and who had borne alſo that of Præfect. A man comely enough, and well-proportion'd, of yellow Hair, and a thin Beard; but in Morals differing as much from his Brother Julian (of whom hereafter) as Domitian, the Son of Veſpaſian, came ſhort of his Brother Titus, in the Opinion of Ammianus. He ended his Life after ſuch a manner as he had deſerved, and that by Command of his Couſin; though there were that wrote, how he, repenting of what he had ordered herein, ſent other Meſſengers to ſtay the Execution; but Euſebius the Eunuch, his bitter Enemy, cauſed them to be ſtopped, till all was paſt, For this Treachery, if ſo it was, Euſebius paid dear afterwards, being put to Death by Julian, for having been ſo inſtrumental in his Deſtruction. And Ammianus obſerves, how other two, who under the Covert of Perjury and deep Diſſimulation laid Snares to entrap him, came to untimely Ends. For Scudilo vomited up his Lungs, and died; and Barbatio, who accuſed him of more Crimes than he committed, being ſuſpected to aſpire to greater things than the Office of Magiſter Peditum, to which he had attained, was condemned, and ſent out of the World, as we ſhall ſee.

His Attendants removed.

He is carried into Iſtria;

Juxta Flavonam maritimam Civitatem in ora Liburniæ, non procul à Neſactio. Unde Italiæ finem, alii Polam eſſe dicunt, alii Nefactium. Valeſius in Locum.

And made away.

Philoſtorgius L. 4. c. 1. & vide Diſſert. Gothofredi.

23. The News of Gallus his Death was brought to Conſtantius, now lying at Milan, by Apodemius, who having been a notable Incendiary betwixt them, now caſt the ſhoes of Cæſar (of Purple they were wont to be) down at his Feet; as if it had been the Spoiles of the Parthian King. The Emperour by his Flatterers was exceedingly elevated, who extolling his Power, and magnifying his Felicity; put him in mind, how he had brought to nothing the high Thoughts, and Ambition of two Princes, meaning Gallus, and Veteranio; which had ſuch Operation upon his unwary Phancy, that eſteeming himſelf rather more than a Mortal, he aſſumed

Ammianus lib. 15.

Conſtantius thereupon exceedingly elevated.

med the Title of Lord of the whole World; though all this while he pretended an Earneſt Endeavour to equal the Morality of the very beſt Princes. But ſo open were his ſuſpitious Ears to all Accuſations, that his Eunuchs, and other fawning Courtiers, procured the Ruin of many Good Men; and numbers were brought out of the Eaſt in Chains, to Aquileia, who were ſaid to have been Inſtruments to Gallus his Cruelties and other Diſorders. And thither were ſent to ſit upon them as Judges, one Arbora, and Euſebius, lately mentioned, the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, both of them very bad bad Men; both Unjuſt and Cruel; who, without any ſufficient Evidence, or Diſcrimination betwixt Innocence and Guilt, Sentenced them; ſome, after Torture, to be ſent into Baniſhment, others to ſerve in the Armies, in the meaneſt Capacity, and the reſt to Death it ſelf. After the ſlaughter of whom, they returned, as in Triumph, to their Prince. Conſtantius ſtaid ſome time at Milan, for we find him by Subſcription of his Edicts there, in the Months of May and June. Some other Laws he made before theſe, Dated from this Place, but where he then Reſided, is not Expreſſed; though probably in ſome part of Italy. The firſt of theſe, which are proper to our preſent Cogniſance, is, the very firſt Law now Extant in the Code, concerning the Agentes in Rebus, of whom we have already ſpoken. In this Age, it was a Cuſtom for thoſe who were Members of Corporations, and obnoxious to the Services thereof, to get themſelves Entred, as into other ſeveral ſorts of Employments, and the Armies, ſo amongſt them alſo, hereby to ſhun the Duties and Charges incumbent upon them, as we have already hinted. Now, to prevent this for the time to come, Conſtantius, by this Law (which was Part or Title of a larger Conſtitution) Defines; That none, by his Service, " amongſt the Agentes in Rebus, ſhould be freed or diſcharged from his Relation to " Corporations, except he had ſerved the term of Twenty years, which he ordains " ſhall alſo be obſerved as a Rule, and Bind the Scriniarii of his Palace, " the Cancellarii, Largitionales, and Officiales of the Comes Rerum Privatarum. "

Many cruelly handled upon the account of Gallus.

Regradatio, ſive Gradûs Dejectio, quæ inter Pœnas Militares fuit.

Cod. Th. lib. 6. Tit. 27. Dat. 8. Id. Mart. Conſtantio Auguſto 7. & Conſtante Cæſare Coſs. A. D. 354.

Conſtantius publiſheth an Edict in favour of Corporations.

24. By another Edict directed to Orphitus, the Præfect of Rome, and Dated ſeven dayes after the other, it appears; That not only the Officers of Corporations, but even Senators, were wont to skulk and keep themſelves out of the way, to ſhun thoſe Charges and Duties which lay upon them. To prevent this, he now ſignifies, " that he had formerly ſent his Orders to Hilarianus, the Præfectus Prætorio, " to Compell Senators to return to the City, that they might be conſtrained to " Diſcharge thoſe Duties that there lay upon them; and that ſuch of them as continued " their Abſence, ſhould, according to the Laws made by his Father, be condemned " to bring Fifty thouſand Modii of Wheat into the Publick Granaries of " Rome. Now what theſe Duties were, we have already touched, as, to make known to the Senate the worth of their Eſtates, that accordingly they might Contribute to the Glebalis Collatio; as alſo to pay what was due toward the Charges of Publick Shows and Paſtimes; an uſual Duty incumbent upon Prætors, to the Title of whom (and Quæſtors) this Law is aſſigned in the Code. This Fine impoſed upon Abſence was very great: for at this time the ordinary rate of Wheat was an Aureus, or Golden Solidus for every ten Modii; ſo that the whole amounted to five thouſand Solidi. Indeed ſome years after, in the Reign of Valentinian, that Emperour by a Law (as Suidas writes) took Order, that no fewer than twelve Modii ſhould be ſold for a Solidus; but then had he Enhaunced the Value of a Solidus, as we have already ſaid. For whereas from Conſtantine's, till his Time, Eighty four of them went to the Pound of Gold; he cauſed out of the Pound but Seventy two to be ſtamped. This was an heavy Fine for all ſorts of Senators; but by the Law of Conſtantine all were not liable to it; but according to their Quality and Degree, Condemned as to the Quantity of Wheat. Probable it is, that this of Fifty thouſand Modii was impoſed upon Prætors, but a leſſer upon Quæſtors; who, as appears by the firſt Law of this Title in the Code, were diſtinguiſhed both from them and Conſuls in theſe Frumentary Mulcts. But by this it is evident what great Charges the Prætors were at in Solemnizing theſe Publick Games and Paſtimes, to which the People of Rome had been ſo accuſtomed, from the time that the Riches of the World flowing into that City, had, to pleaſe them, found ſuch Iſſues as theſe; that when the Reaſon ceaſed, they would not be ſatisfied that the Effects ſhould ceaſe: And Chriſtianity it ſelf could not, but by degrees, and after much time, wean them from thoſe Exceſſes in Cruelty, and other parts of Immorality, which ordinarily accompanied theſe Divertiſements.

L. 7. de Prætoribus & Quæſtoribus. Dat. pridie Id. Mart. vide Comment.

Another to compell Senators to diſcharge their Duties in the City.

25. Theſe (and ſome other Laws) were made this year, though uncertain at what place; but from Milan bore Date two others, which ſeem to have made up

A. D 354.

Another for providing Wines for his Cellar.

L. 6. de Annona & Tributis Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 1.

but one Conſtitution. The firſt is, concerning the Furniſhing of his Cellar with Wines; which, though it may appear a thing of no great Concernment, yet hath been Ennobled by the Diſquiſitions of ſuch Learned Men, as have Diſputed concerning the Suburbicarian Provinces. It ordains, That the Wine, which was wont to be ſerved in for the Uſe of his own Cellar, ſhall be provided by all the Poſſeſſors of Italy, according to the Appointment of his Brother Conſtans; which, that it may more eaſily be done, ſaith he, let that Quantity of Money be contributed by all our Italians, which the Moderation of Rufinus (to whom he gives the Attributes of Clariſſimus and Illuſtris) the Præfectus Prætorio, our Parent and Friend, thought fit to be Allowed. So runs the Law, which is directed to the Order or Body of the Cæſenates. As to which the Reader muſt know, that the Provinces were wont as we formerly hinted, to contribute ſeveral ſorts of Proviſions and Materials, termed in thoſe Days, and by the Laws, Species Annonariæ and Cellarienſes. The Annonariæ were (when ſtrictly taken; for in a large ſenſe Annona ſignifies all ſorts) Wood, Straw, Fodder and other Neceſſaries; the Cellarienſes were the Eſculenta, & Poculenta, Meat and Drink; and not only Drink, as the Word now in Engliſh ſeems to denote. Now both the kinds were contributed for the Uſe of the Army, the Service of Expeditions, the Maintenance of the Comites, and other Governours of Provinces, and to the Prince his own uſe in his Houſe, which laſt is that here intended. But the great Queſtion is, what here ſhould be meant by Italy or Italians; whether all that, which vulgarly went under that Name, or only ſome Part, or Portion of it. As to this we muſt know, that of old time, all Italy was Subject to a moderate Tax, or Contribution. But when the Empire was embroiled in manifold Wars, and divided betwixt Diocleſian, Maximian, Conſtantius and Galerius; Maximian having obtained Africk and Italy for his ſhare, brought up a new ſort of Tax or Tribute of Proviſions, which he impoſed upon part of Italy (and being then but ſmall, afterwards grew very heavy and burthenſome) upon that part, as appears from Aurelius Victor, where he lay moſt commonly with his Army. Now to find out what part of Italy this was, we muſt know where he had his uſual Reſidence, which was at Aquileia, Milan and Ravenna, where uſually his Succeſſors, as Conſtantine the great, this preſent Conſtantius, Valentinian, and others afterwards made their ordinary Abode, when they came into theſe Quarters. The Countries adjoyning to theſe Cities carried the Title of Regiones Annonariæ, or the Regions of Proviſions, being theſe: Tuſcia, Picenum, Flaminia, Æmilia, Liguria, Venetia and Hiſtria; and theſe Conſtantine freed from all Extraordinary Services by an Edict publiſhed in their Behalf, in Conſideration of thoſe Supplies of Proviſions with which they were taxed, to the Uſe of his own Houſe. In like manner as Africk, becauſe it afforded in theſe Days Proviſions to Rome, enjoyed the ſame Immunity. Therefore it is to be obſerved, that the Word Italy is taken in four ſeveral Significations. Firſt, for whole Italy, wherein Rome is alſo included, and the Suburbicarian Regions. Secondly, ſometimes Sicily, Sardinia and Corſica come under the Name and Acceptation of Italy. In the third Place is to be underſtood by Italy what was not taken up by the City, and the Suburbicarian Regions, or an hundred Miles about. And in the laſt place, as in this Law, by Italy is meant Italia Annonaria, or the Provinces lately mentioned. Now the Law is directed to the Order or Body of the Cæſenates; moſt probably, becauſe, in their Territory which lay near to Ravenna, in the Country called Flaminia, there being Abundance of the moſt excellent Wine, that theſe parts afforded; as formerly Conſtans, his Brother, ſo now Conſtantius himſelf would have his Italians (as he calls them) there to buy the Proviſion for his Cellar.

Takes Care for ſupplying the Body of the Cæſenates.

L. 43. de Decurionibus. Dat. 11. Cal. Junii Med.

L. 41. de Decurionibus.

26. But by the ſame Conſtitution (now divided in the Code into two Laws) he farther gratified this Corporation of Cæſena; which being at this time much emptied, by Reaſon that the Curiales thereof, under Pretenſe of other Employments and Privileges, withdrew themſelves from the publick Service; he took Order for the calling back of three ſorts of Perſons to their former Duty and Employment. The firſt was of thoſe, who by Letters had obtained Honorary Dignities without any Government; as thoſe of Ex Præſes, and of the Title of Perfectiſſimus; yet ſo as they ſhould enjoy the ſaid Titles and Præeminences, provided they diſcharged the Offices in the Corporation, which about this time he ordered in an Edict concerning this Subject, directed to the Citizens of Carthage. The ſecond ſort of Perſons whom he will have drawn back, is thoſe, who pretending to the Dignity of Senators, could not ſhew any Letters Patents, granted from the Prince; for there were two ways whereby the Emperours conferred theſe Titular Honours, viz. one by Letters obtained for this Purpoſe, and another by word of Mouth. Now ſuch as had obtained the Letters, he would have enjoy the Immunity from Services in Corporations; though other Emperours would not indulge them that favour, and the Law as to this Particular was various and Ambulatory. The third ſort which he commands to be drawn back to their Employment is, of ſuch as had got themſelves admitted amongſt the Officiales, whom he will not have this new Relation to profit, if originally they belonged to the Body of the Cæſenates. And yet, if we compare this Law with ſome others he made, this very year, concerning the ſame Subject, we ſhall find, that what he here ſaith of calling back the Curiales to their Charges in Corporations, muſt be admitted with this Exception, provided they had not ſerved as Officiales the ſpace of five and twenty years, in which Caſe he forbids that they be forced back to ſuch Employments. But as for them that attended on the Emperour in his Court, as theſe termed Miniſteriales, who waited at Table, or in the Pantry, Pages, the Silentiarii and Decuriones were to be excuſed, if they had ſerved but fifteen Years. Nay the Primipilares, who ſerved in the Curſus Publicus were excuſed, if thereon they had attended but ten years. And here it will not be amiſs to obſerve other Privileges at this time granted to the Officiales by other Laws, which with theſe now mentioned, and that of the Agentes in Rebus ſeem to have made up one and the ſame Conſtitution. The firſt is, that they were permitted to adore the Purple; which Ceremony heretofore we have touched. At firſt this was only granted to the Officiales of the higher Dignities, as to thoſe of the Præfecti Prætorio (who in this Age were properly called Cohortales, though this Name afterward, and that of Cohortalini was alſo given to them that belonged to the Governours of Provinces) the Præfects of the Cities, thoſe of the Magiſtri Equitum and Peditum; but here Conſtantius limits it to thoſe of them only who had done Service, and been preſent in all Expeditions. This Privilege was alſo given to the Numerarii of the Præfecti Prætorio, after they had ſerved up their three years; to the Cornicularii alſo, as well as the Principales of the Office, after their Term was out. Theſe belonged to the higheſt Dignities, or to thoſe ſtyled Illuſtrious; and to ſome others alſo it was indulged to adore the Purple once a year; as to the Officials of the Vicars, and to other Officers of ſuch Magiſtrates, as bore the Title of Spectabilis, as Proconſuls, the Comites Rei Militaris, the Præfectus Auguſtalis; and ſome Duces, as thoſe of Scythia, Mæſia Prima, Mæſia Secunda, and Dacia. The Principals of their Attendants were permitted to Adore, at the going out of their Offices; but ſome did it with thoſe that were of Proconſular Dignity, viz. they that belonged to the Proconſul of Achaia, Comes of the Eaſt, the Præfectus Auguſtalis, the Vicars, and the Comes of the Ægyptian Limit. Others only were permitted to do it amongſt the Protectors, as thoſe that appertained to the Duces of Scythia, Mæſia, and Dacia Ripenſis. But this Honour was utterly denied to the Officials, though they were the Principal of thoſe Governours of Provinces, who had but the ſtyle of Clariſſimi: which Honour this Privilege accompanied amongſt others, that being admitted once to it, they could not be forced away to any other Employment, as in Corporations.

What Officials were permitted to adore the Purple.

Vide L. L. 4, 5, 6. de Diverſis Officiis &c. & Comment.

27. But to Proſecute the Acts of Conſtantius of another nature. While he employed himſelf at Milan in making Laws, and in too ſtrict Inquiſition after Offenders, word was brought how the Lentienſes, a People that inhabited ſome Villages upon the Borders of Germany, made frequent Incurſions into the Roman Pale; and it ſo appearing, War thereupon was denounced againſt them. The Emperour in Perſon undertook the Expedition, and came into Rhætia, and the Plains called Campi Canini; where a Council of War being held, after a long Conſultation it was Reſolved, that Arbetio, the Magiſter Equitum, with the Choiceſt part of the Army, ſhould, by the ſide of the Lake called Lacus Brigantiæ, through which the Rhine paſſed, march away, and fall upon them. Arbetio did as his Orders Enjoyned, but the Almans having timely Notice of his coming, lay in wait for him, and ſo Diſtreſſed him, that his Men ran away, and moſt of them, by the Darkneſs of the Night, eſcaped, and got back to their Fellows; although a great number of them was loſt, and with them no fewer than ten Tribunes. With this Succeſs the Almans exceedingly animated, renewed their Excurſions, and made frequent Sallies before it was light, well nigh as far as the Roman Camp. The Scutarii, provoked by their Inſolence, made ſome Oppoſition, but finding themſelves too weak to withſtand their Violence, did what they could to Animate the whole Army to joyn with them; yet had the Memory of the late Defeat made ſuch an Impreſſion on their Phancies, that only three Tribunes went in to their Relief, by name Arintheus, Seniauchus, and Bappo, who taking their Advantages as they could, without any ſet Form of Battel, did ſo great Execution, that they put the Enemy to a ſhameful War denounced againſt the Lentienſes.

Who defeat Arbetio.

Yet are they humbled.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 355.

and the Emperour returns to Milan.

Flight, and made great Slaughter of them, while one hindred another from getting away; which the reſt of the Army eſpying from the Camp, was then ſo hardy as to give the Chace, and kill thoſe that were Conquered to their hands. This done, and great multitudes left dead upon the place, the Emperour returned Merrily, and as in Triumph, to Milan, and there took up his Winter-Quarters.

A. D. 355. Arbetione & Lolliano Coſs.

A ſtrange Device againſt Sylvanus.

28. There he had not made any long Continuance, when his Jealouſie and Credulity brought upon him ſuch an Inconvenience, as under it he might eaſily have Miſcarried. At this time Gall was very much haraſſed by the Inroads of the Neighbouring Barbarous Nations, whom, waſting it at their Pleaſure, with Fire and Sword, Sylvanus, then the Magiſter Peditum, oppoſed ſo Effectually, as to Reſtrain their Violence, being ſent away upon this Service by Arbetio, who, for this year bore the Conſulſhip with Lollianus; and that by the uſual trick of Emulating Courtiers, who are wont to put their Rivals in favour, upon ſome tickliſh and dangerous Employment. Dynamius, that overſaw the Emperour's Carriage-Beaſts, had deſired Commendatory Letters from Sylvanus, as his Intimate Acquaintance, which he Simply and Honeſtly, as not imagining the leaſt Inconvenience would follow, Granted under his Hand. Theſe Letters Dynamius kept, till he could find an opportunity to do him miſchief; and at length, his Envy being further provok'd, when he ſaw him buſily employ'd againſt the Barbarians in Gall, he took in the Advice and Aſſiſtance of Lampadius, Præfectus Prætorio, Euſebius, formerly Comes Rei Privatæ, who had the Sirname of Mattiocopa, and Ædeſius the Ex Magiſter Memoriæ, then Præfect. They raze out all he had written in the Letters, only leaving the Subſcription intire; and in the room thereof, deviſe an Exhortation to his Friends at Court, and others, amongſt whom was one Fuſcus Albinus, to Aſſiſt him in his Deſign, which was no leſs than to take the Purple, and Uſurp. This Paper is produced, and Dynamius appointed to make Inquiſition after the Treaſon. Such as were named in the Letter, and they could then come by, were taken into Cuſtody, and Officers ſent to Apprehend others that were in the Provinces. This making a great Noiſe, as well at the Court, as elſewhere; Malarich, who then Commanded the Souldiers called Gentiles, and was appointed to go and fetch Sylvanus, Exclamed ſore againſt it; affirming, that thoſe Perſons were Innocent, and merely, by the Tricks and Inventions of their Enemies, Circumvented and brought into Danger. Yet notwithſtanding, at the ſollicitation of Arbetio, was Apodemius ſent with Orders to him, that he ſhould come up; that Apodemius, who was an inveterate Enemy to all Good men, who coming into Gall, never ſent him the Orders, nor let him know on what Errand he was ſent; but Aſſociating himſelf with the Rationalis of thoſe Parts, began to Vex and Diſturb the Friends and Clients of the Magiſter Peditum, as one already Proſcribed, and to be put to Death. While the Arrival of Sylvanus was expected, and Apodemius thus behaved himſelf in Gall, Dynamius, to gain Credit to what he had already done, reſolved to add one Cheat to another. He frames another Letter in the Name of Sylvanus and Malarich, to the Tribune of the Fabrick at Cremona, whom, as Conſcious to their Plot, it Adviſes to have all things in readineſs, and that ſpeedily. The Man was Exceedingly Diſturbed at what he had read, not knowing what it ſhould mean, nor remembring, that ever he had any Intercourſe with theſe Perſons concerning any Matter of Secreſie or Concernment: therefore he ſent away the Letter to Malarich, beſeeching him to tell him plainly what the meaning was; for he was, for his part, ſo Simple and Ignorant, that he could not underſtand it.

A notable Cheat diſcovered.

29. Malarich hereat as much concern'd, as one whoſe Safety was brought into ſo great Hazard, bewailed his own Condition, and that of Sylvanus his Countryman, and opened it to the Franks, of whom a great Company in thoſe Days flouriſhed in the Palace; and now more openly than before inveighed againſt them by whoſe ſubtile Devices they were ſo much endanger'd. The Emperour acquainted therewith, by Advice of thoſe of his Conſiſtory, and the Military Officers, gave Order for a ſtrict Inquiry into the Matter; and the ordinary Judges evading the Buſineſs, Florentius, who then executed the Place of Magiſter Officiorum, more narrowly ſearched into it; and ſeriouſly viewing the Letter pretended to be writ by Sylvanus, diſcovered evidently ſome Remains of the Character, wherewith the Commendatory Epiſtle had been written, and a maniſeſt Interpolation. Hereupon the Emperour abrogated the Authority of the Præfect, and ſubjected him to Examination; but by the Conſpiracy of many together, whom he had made his Friends, he eſcaped as well as the reſt, and Dynamius was honoured with the Dignity of Corrector of Tuſcia. In the mean time Sylvanus being advertiſed by his Friends how his Affairs ſtood, conſidering how induſtrious his Enemy Arbetio was to

A. D. 355.

Sylvanus forced for his own Preſervation to uſurp.

Tunc Dux prudentiſſimus, & Conſtantini Magni fuerat Commilito.

to deſtroy him, and how ticklish and credulous the Humour of the Emperour was wont to be in ſuch Caſes, was very apprehenſive, that he ſhould be condemned Abſent, and Unhear'd; and as one exceedingly perplexed, and not knowing what to do, had ſome thoughts of committing himſelf to the Fidelity of the Barbarous Nations; but Laniogaiſus, a Tribune, telleth him that there was little Doubt, but the Franks, from whom he was deſcended, would betray him for a Reward, or elſe kill him; he then after ſome ſecret Conſultations with his Officers, and great Promiſes made them, aſſumed the Imperial Habit (taking the Purple which was upon the Engines or Standards, as the Cuſtom of Uſurpers was, till they could provide themſelves of Robes) as thereto forced for his own Preſervation. The News thereof flies faſt to Milan, and arrives there in the Evening, bringing ſuch Aſtoniſhment and Fear to Conſtantius, that in the ſecond Watch of the Night, all his Councel was ſummoned to the Conſiſtory; whither being come, every one's Courage and Tongue failed him; but at length, upon Inquiry, who ſhould be ſent againſt the Uſurper, mention was made, yet coldly, of Urſicinus, as a man exceedingly skill'd in Military Affairs, though of late diſgraced. Him they ſent for by the Magiſter of Admiſſions, to do him the more Honour; and being entred the Conſiſtory, the Purple was given him to kiſs; and ſo he who not long before, through the malicious Inſinuations of the Court-Backbiters, was termed the Whirlpit of the Eaſt, and ſaid, by means of his Sons, to aime at no leſs than the Sovereignty; now was called a moſt prudent Captain, and ſpoken of with ſuch Reſpect; as was due to a Fellow-Souldier of the great Conſtantine, as one alone fit to extinguiſh the Rebellion by Honeſt, though cunning and crafty Means. By his Endeavour they concluded, that Sylvanus would be brought to Ruin; or elſe he, whom they ſuſpected as Angry ſtill, and revengeful for the Injuries he had receiv'd, would miſcarry in the Attempt. In both or either of theſe things, they thought they could not but be Gainers.

30. Conſultation then being had of haſtening his Journey, he thought it convenient, before his Departure, to clear himſelf of thoſe things formerly laid to his Charge, and began to refell the Accuſations. But the Emperour interrupted him, ſaying; that now it was needleſs, and unſeaſonable, when ſuch danger impended. A Debate was then held about the method wherewith Sylvanus ſhould be attacqued. And it was reſolv'd; that, as if Conſtantius knew nothing of his aſſuming the Title, Letters ſhould be writ to him to accept of Urſicinus for his Succeſſor, and return to Court, with the Dignity and Place he formerly enjoyed. Then was he diſpatched away, and took with him (for he had deſired that he might have that Liberty) ten domeſtick Protectors, amongſt whom was Ammianus Marcellinus himſelf, who wrote the Hiſtory; and Verinianus, his Colleague. They uſed all the Speed they poſſibly could to prevent the Fame of their coming; but notwithſtanding all their Diligence, the News flew before them to Collein, where they found a great Multitude, and many Forces met; and therefore they reſolved by all fair Means poſſible to addreſs themſelves, and colour their Deſigns, by the ſpecious Show of Obſequiouſneſs; conſidering alſo how near they were to moſt certain Deſtruction. Urſicinus therefore taking this courſe, was kindly receiv'd, and kiſſed his Purple, as the manner was of ſaluting Emperours, for which he was Admitted into Inward Familiarity, to his Table, and into the moſt ſecret Conſultation what was now to be done for their Joynt-Concernments. Sylvanus would ever and anon be complaining, with much Indignation, how moſt unworthy Perſons being preferr'd to the Conſulſhip, neither he nor Urſicinus ſhould be thought worthy of any ſuch Honour, but on the contrary, moſt unhandſomly Treated; the one by Falſe Accuſations and Surmiſes of Treaſon, and the other by being hurried away out of the Eaſt, and Expoſed to the Crafts and ſubtil Practices of his Enemies. This Security and Confidence of his, gave good Encouragement to Urſicinus and his Companions; but the Army now wanting Pay, began to talk of paſſing the Cottian Alps, which Terrified, and forced them to venture upon the Execution of what they came about. They therefore tampered under hand, by fit Inſtruments, with thoſe Companies called Braccati, and Cornuti; knowing them of an inconſtant Humour, and eaſily to be moved by the Temptations of Gain and Advantage; and ſo throughly wrought with them, that early in the morning they ſet upon thoſe that Guarded the Palace, and having killed them, drew Sylvanus out of a Chappel whither he had fled, and cut him in pieces. So periſhed a Captain of no mean Merits, whom the Craft of his Enemies, joyned with the Emperour's Credulity, had forced to this Uſurpation, merely for his own Security; for though he knew he had ſufficiently obliged Conſtantius, by delivering over the Armaturæ (of which he was Tribune) to him before the Battel of Murſa, and beſides his who entraps and procures him to be ſlain.

Urſicinus ſent againſt him,

own Deſerts, could plead the Services of his Father (Bonitus by Name, and a Franck by Nation) performed to Conſtantine in his Wars againſt Licinius; yet he aſſured himſelf all theſe would not over-power the Natural Jealouſie and Credulity of the Prince. Ammianus relates, that before his Death hapned in Gall, the People in the Great Cirque at Rome, uncertain upon what ground, or whence moved thereto, cryed out, that Sylvanus was overthrown.

Conſtantius makes bad Uſe of the Deliverance.

31. Sylvanus thus having Periſhed, Conſtantius, as delivered from a Dangerous Rival, thence conceived extraordinary Joy, but made no good Uſe of ſo great a Deliverance: for he grew, as more Confident, ſo more Inſolent and Proud; and, like to Domitian, as he hated all that Gallantly Demean'd themſelves, he was ſo far from Commending what was done, that he pick'd a Quarrel about ſome Publick Money, that he pretended Urſicinus and his Followers intercepted in Gall, and ſent Orders to have a ſtrict inquiry made about it, whereas there was never any ſuch matter. It was in a manner his whole Employment to brag of his own Power and Greatneſs; to which Vanity he was much incited by the egregious Flattery of thoſe about him; and indeed he would not endure any, but ſuch as were endued with that Faculty: for as a Prince is, ſo is his Council and Attendants. Bad Princes are uſually ſerved with ſuch like as themſelves, which pleaſe them beſt; neither are Wiſe Councellors choſen, but by thoſe that have good Underſtanding. It cannot be, but the next thing we hear of Conſtantius is, that he is buſily induſtrious to make Inquiſition, and frame Proceſſes againſt thoſe of Sylvanus his Party, uſing the Diligence of Paul, that Flagitious Accuſer and Incendiary. To begin the work, Proculus, the Domeſtick of Sylvanus, is put to the Rack; a man lean and ſickly, who not able to endure the Torture, would accuſe, right or wrong, and bring Numbers into Trouble, as all men feared; but it fell out quite contrary. For, being warned in a Dream, as he affirmed, that he ſhould not name any Innocent Perſon, he endured the Pains, almoſt to Death, with wonderful Conſtancy, and without Accuſing, or Mentioning one man; ever affirming, that what Sylvanus did was meerly out of Neceſſity, and not Ambition; which he evidently Demonſtrated by this paſſage. That having paid his Army five dayes before he Aſſumed the Imperial Title, he then uſed the Name and Authority of Conſtantius, and Exhorted them all to be conſtant in their Fidelity to him; which he would not have done, if he had had then any ſuch Deſign; but certainly have employ'd that Treaſure for his own Advantage. This, as Matter of Fact, there were many that could Atteſt. Yet notwithſtanding was he put to Death, and after him Pœncenius, as alſo Aſclepiodotus, Lutto, and Mandio, of the Degree of Comites, with many others.

Domeſticks were the Privados of great Officers.

And rages againſt Sylvanus his Friends.

Yet makes ſome Juſt and Gratious Laws.

32. This, we muſt believe from our Grave Hiſtorian, was the Humour and Behaviour of Conſtantius; although, if from him, and others, we were not aſſured thereof, an Edict made by him about this very time, and Directed to the People, would induce us to think him rather of a contrary Diſpoſition. For herein he Ordains, That no man whatſoever receive any prejudice from Libels, which neither “ with himſelf, he ſaith, nor with the Judges, have any place; and he gives this “ Reaſon, He is eſteemed Innocent who wants an Accuſer, though he want not an “ Enemy. By the Date of this Law it appears, that it was made at Milan, and after that he had there taken up his Winter-Quarters. Gothofred thinks it made in relation to what paſſed after the Death of Gallus, when the Emperours Ears were ſo open to the Inſinuations and Flatteries of his Backbiting Courtiers. But from the late Date it bears of the laſt of October, I ſhould rather judge it to have had reſpect to what hapned after the Death of Sylvanus; and that when he was wearied, if that was poſſible, with the many Accuſations and Inquiſitions. But as that learned man obſerves, he who was credulous otherwiſe enough, yet thought fit to put a ſtop to ſcandalous Libels; and he gives a very good Reaſon, viz. that he ought to be eſteemed Innocent whom no man, with a free Intention, or by courſe of Law, doth accuſe, but endeavours only to wound by invenom'd and ſecret Darts of Accuſations. This was therefore an Act of Juſtice if duely obſerv'd. And another Edict of Grace he made this ſame year, and dated from the ſame Place, though three Moneths before the other; by which he gives free Liberty to the Provincials of Africk, freely to meet in Councils, to deliberate therein, make Decrees or Reſo-“ lutions, and ſend up their Meſſengers, with their Petitions or Deſires then and “ there reſolved on, to the Prince. We have already ſpoken of ſuch Legati or Meſſengers, as were wont to be ſent up to Court from the Cities, or Corporations: But beſides theſe, there were others employed by the Provinces on ſuch Errands, which were agreed on, or approved in their Provincial Meetings or Aſſemblies. Theſe

Nemo prorſus de famoſis Libellis, qui neque apud me, neque in Judiciis ullum obtinent locum, Calumniam patiatur: nam & Innocens creditur, cui defuit Accuſator, cùm non defuerit Inimicus. Dat. Prid. Kal. Nov. Med. Arbetione & Lolliano Coſs. A. D. 355. Abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſt. Invenitur in Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 34. & L. 6. ejuſd. Tit. de Famoſis Libellis

(b) L. 1. de Legatis & Decretis &c. Dat. Kal. Aug. Med. Cod. Th. lib. 12. tit. 12. Abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſtin. Vide Gothofredi Comment. & in Paratit.

Theſe Meetings which were termed Concilia, and conſiſted of the Primates of Cities, were either ordinary, or extraordinary. The ordinary were held once a year, the extraordinary upon the like Occaſions, called together by the Præfectus Prætorio. If any Neceſſity urged, if they were oppreſſed, or any publick Grievance required their Complaint, they ſent it up to the Emperour by their Meſſengers; of old, not without leave firſt obtained from the Magiſtrate of the Province. But it ſeems at this time, there were ſome that ſpake againſt theſe Meſſages, as uſeleſs, ſuch as derogated from their Authority, or fearful they ſhould therein be accuſed, as ſome way or other abuſing their Power. Therefore Conſtantius, upon the Complaint of thoſe concerned, gives them, by this Edict directed to Taurus the Præfectus Prætorio, full Licenſe and Authority to make known their Grievances: forbidding the Magiſtrates to Interpoſe or Hinder them. In like manner as this very ſame year, he alſo encourages Appeals to be made to him, which for fear of the Judges were forborne. In the Law concerning the Aſſemblies, he uſes this Expreſſion: Let no Dictator hinder the Meetings; let none ſpeak againſt the Councils. By which word Dictator may either be meant Figuratively, ſuch as imperiouſly interpoſed in this Caſe, or properly ſome Magiſtrates of certain Cities, who bore this Title. But to our Hiſtory.

L. 2. de his qui per metum Judicis.

Nullus igitur obſiſtat Cœtibus Dictator, Nemo Conciliis obloquatur.

33. At this time Leontius govern'd Rome with great Equity and Moderation, and by his extraordinary Courage and Prudence quieted the People, which was falne into Sedition, for want of Wine. But in the mean time Conſtantius, at Milan, was much diſquieted by continual Reports of the Diſturbances that hapned in Gall, where the Barbarous Nations waſted the Country without Controle. He was very doubtful what in this Caſe to do; for he himſelf had no mind to ſtir out of Italy into any remote parts, and therefore muſt have ſome other, to repreſs the Barbarians, who ſhould be furniſhed with ſufficient Authority for ſo great a Command. He thought therefore of promoting Julian, the Brother of Gallus, to the Dignity of Cæſar; and when one difficulty preſſed upon another, communicated his Deſign to thoſe about him; proteſting, that he alone was not able to undergo ſo weighty a Burthen, as that of the Empire. Theſe Flatterers manifeſted a great Deſire to draw him from his Purpoſe; affirming, that nothing was ſo difficult, but his moſt powerful Courage, and Conduct was able to manage it: and they ſuggeſted (perhaps their own Conſciences provoking them) that he ought to beware of the Name of Cæſar, putting him in mind of what had hapned in Relation to Gallus. So obſtinately they behaved themſelves in the Matter, that they had diverted him, if the Empreſs had not concerned her ſelf: and, whether out of an Averſion to Tedious Expeditions, or her own Native Prudence, fully perſwaded her Husband to purſue his Intentions. Julian had lately been ſent for out of Achaia, and wore the Pallium ſtill, as a Philoſopher, having all this while applied himſelf to Study. But now Conſtantius, having called the Army together, mounted the Tribunal, for this purpoſe made higher, and more Conſpicuous than ordinary; and taking him by the hand, Addreſſed himſelf unto the Souldiers. In fair words he told them, That after the Overthrow of ſeveral Tyrants and Uſurpers, that had ſet up for “ themſelves, the Barbarous Nations had broken the Peace, and Invaded Gall; and “ this begat their Confidence, and encouraged them ſo to do, that he many times was neceſſarily employed in other remote Parts of the Empire. That if they “ would approve thereof (for the Roman Emperours were wont ſo far to condeſcend “ in Matters of greateſt Moment, as to make their Souldiers their Councellors) he had found out a way for repreſſing their Inſolence, and preſerving “ the Borders; which was to dignifie with the Title and Authority of Cæſar, his “ Couſin Julian a young man, as they knew, notable for his Modeſty; and one who “ gave hope, that he would prove induſtrious. As he was going on, the Aſſembly “ interrupted him, telling him, it was the Will of God, that ſo it ſhould be. To which he anſwer'd, that in Compliance with his and their Deſires, he would give him the Robe, and therewith put the Purple upon him, and declared him Cæſar. Then, with a grave and ſober Countenance, giving him the Title of Moſt Loving Brother, he told him, he eſteemed it the greateſt part of his Glory, that he had “ Opportunity to confer this Dignity, in a manner hereditary, to ſo near a Relation. “ That now he was to be Aſſiſtant, and Partaker of his Labours and Perils, “ and he committed to him the Care and Protection of Gall; wherein, if there “ ſhould be need of Fighting, he muſt himſelf be preſent in the Front of the Battel; “ by his Example and Advice to encourage the ordinary Souldiers, and make his “ own Eyes the Diſcoverers of the Merits, or Demerits, of his Men. He added, “ That he being himſelf Courageous, was now to undertake the Command of a “ Stout

He has Thoughts of promoting his Couſin Julian.

Notwithſtanding the Oppoſition of his Courtiers, he declares him Cæſar to the Army.

Stout and Valiant Army. That he ſhould find him ever Loving, and Aſſiſtant “ to him; and he hoped by God's Aſſiſtance, they ſhould Govern the Roman “ World with equal Piety and Moderation. What he had ſaid and done, the Souldiers Approved by their uſual Sign, which was, to make a noiſe with their Targets upon their Knees; whereas they were wont, on the contrary, to teſtifie their Anger, or Sorrow, by beating their Shields with their Lances; and few there were but exceedingly Rejoyced; and (as our Author tells us) Admired the Perſon of the New Cæſar, as preſaging Wonderful Things to be Atchieved by him. This paſſed at Milan, on the ſixth of November, in the Conſulſhip of Arbetio and Lollianus, as Ammianus expreſly writes.

Julian marries Helena, the Siſter of Conſtantius, and goes into Gall.

34. Julian, a few dayes after, received in Marriage Helena, the Siſter of Conſtantius; and, all things prepared for his Journey, ſet forward for Gall on the firſt of December, with a ſmall Train, which Zoſimus writes to have conſiſted but of three hundred and ſixty Perſons, having been brought on his way by the Emperour, as far as a Place (thought to be Duriis) famous for two Pillars Erected betwixt Laumellum and Ticinum, or Pavia. He came to Taurinum (or Trent) where he firſt received the ſad News of Collein, then a Famous City in the Second Germany, its being taken and razed by the Barbarians; which the Emperour had notice of before, but concealed it, leſt he ſhould be Diſcouraged. With this he was much Diſmayed, as Ominous to him at his firſt Undertaking, and was often heard to Complain, and ſay, that he got no more by his Preferment, than to Periſh with greater Turmoil and Buſineſs. Being arriv'd at Vienna, he was received there with great Applauſe by all ſorts of People, who Rejoyced, as upon the Riſing of ſome Lucky Planet, and at the ſight of their Deliverer. And an old blind Woman, asking who it was that made his Entrance, upon Anſwer that it was Julian, Replied, and cryed out, that He ſhould Reſtore the Temples of the Gods. Having here entred his firſt Conſulſhip, which the Emperour bore (together with him) now the eighth time, and paſſed over the Winter in Anxious Cares and Conſultations, he received Intelligence, that Auguſtodunum was Beſieged by the Barbarians; a City of great Antiquity, and Large; but ſo Antient, that with Age the Walls were well nigh Conſumed. To its Succour he moved, and Arrived there on the Twenty fourth of June, where he found not the Enemy, who, it ſeems, durſt not abide his Coming; and therefore he Reſolved to purſue him; and for that purpoſe taking only the Cataphracti, and Baliſtarii along with him, though but a ſlender Guard for his Perſon, Marched with ſpeed to Autoſidorum; where having made a ſhort ſtay for Refreſhing himſelf and his Army, he haſted away to the Tricaſſini, and there ſo entertain'd thoſe Rovers, who in great multitudes Engaged him, that ſome he Took, more he Kill'd, and the reſt he put to Flight; though far he could not purſue them, by reaſon of the heavy Armour which his Souldiers wore. After this Action he departed to Rheims, and ordered the Army to be in a readineſs, and ſtay for him; Marcellus, the Succeſſor of Urſicinus, then Commanding, though Urſicinus himſelf was Ordered alſo to ſtay in thoſe Parts till the end of the Expedition. Thence, after Serious Deliberation, did he march againſt the Almans; who, taking the Advantage of a wet and dark Night, fell upon his Rear, through places which they themſelves alone knew; and had cut off two Legions, if upon a ſudden noiſe made, the beſt of the Army had not gone in to the Reſcue. Perceiving hence, that there was no proceeding without being endangered every day, by reaſon of their Knowledge of the Countrey, and his own Ignorance; he reſolved to make himſelf Maſter of the Cities upon the Borders, wherein he might lye ſecurely, and thence make Excurſions, as he ſaw convenient.

A.D. 356. Conſtantio Aug. 8. & Juliano Cæſare Coſs.

Ammian. Marcel. lib. 16.

Puts to flight the Almans.

Seizes on Places lying upon the Borders of Germany.

35. After a proſperous Fight againſt the Germans, who endeavoured to hinder what he had Deſigned; he got poſſeſſion of Brotomagum, and thence made for Collein (Agrippina, our Author calls it;) which had been Razed before his coming into Gall, in the Country adjoyning to which, there was no City to be ſeen, nor ſo much as a Caſtle; only at the Place called Confluents, where the Moſelle and the Rhine do meet, there was a Village, by name Rigodulum, and one Tower or Fort, near to Collein; for it's reported, that to give Diſturbance to Magnentius, the Emperour Conſtantius procured the Barbarians to break into the Roman Pale, where they deſtroyed above forty Towns. In Colein he abode ſo long, till he had made a Peace with the Kings of the Francks (the Fury of whom now Abated;) and received of them a ſtrong Town. With which Proſperous beginnings Encouraged, he Reſolved to take up his Winter-Quarters about Triers. Here he found himſelf Involv'd in various Difficulties. The Garriſon-Souldiers had forſaken their Poſts,

Sect. 4.

A. D. 356.

and were to be brought back to the Places moſt Expoſed. The Neighbouring Nations had Conſpir'd together againſt the Romans; In their Councils they were to be Diſunited, if poſſible, and the Army wanted Proviſions, which in the chiefeſt place was to be conſidered. But, as Cares for the future are wont to be forgotten, when preſent Neceſſities fall upon us; he had Diverſion given him by the Enemy; who, having learned from ſome Fugitives, that thoſe of the Army, called Scutarii, were abſent; and that the Gentiles were Diſperſed through the Country for convenience of Quarter, laid Siege to Senonæ, where he now lay. He himſelf, with his Officers, watched Day and Night upon the Walls, having a great deſire to make a Sally: but his Numbers being too ſcant for ſuch an Attempt, he yet Manfully held it out, till the Beſiegers, being tired, and having no hope to prevail, went their Ways. All this while Marcellus, the Magiſter Equitum, quartered not far off, neither was he ignorant what Danger Cæſar was in; yet never ſtirred to his Relief, notwithſtanding his Duty had been to ſuccour and preſerve the Place, though Julian had not been in it. But he thus delivered, applies his Care to the Refreſhment of his men, though the Country, ſo haraſſed with the Wars, afforded little Advantage. However by his Induſtry he procur'd Supplies elſewhere; and as to himſelf, though his Allowance was good from the Emperour, he was contented with the Diet of an ordinary Souldier; and ſo lived as if he had governed himſelf, according to the ſumptuary Laws, or after the Rules preſcribed by the Rhetræ of Lycurgus, for ſo our Author writes; who further adds, that as Alexander of old, ſo he now appointed the very Nights, not only to ſleep and reſt; but to two other Employments, of publick Buſineſs, and his private Studies; yet, he more ſtrenuouſly than the other: for Alexander held in his Hand a Silver Ball out of the Bed, under which was ſet a Baſon of Braſs, that when, through Sleep, he let it fall, it might make a Noiſe, and thereby admoniſh him of his Drowzineſs. But Julian had no need of any ſuch Monitor, waking as often as he pleaſed himſelf, and was wont to riſe at Midnight; not out of any ſoft or ſumptuous Bed, but his mean and ordinary Couch, ſecretly to make his Prayers to Mercury, whom he imagined to be, according to his, and our Hiſtorian's Divinity, the more quick and vigorous Senſe of the World, and was wont to excite the Motions of the minds of men. This in ſo great Defects of things, he endeavoured to ſearch out and diſcover; which Diſquiſition, both difficult and ſerious (you muſt know) being finiſhed, he then applied himſelf to the whetting of his Wit. And incredible it is with what and how great Ardour, making Inquiry after the high Knowledge of the greateſt things, and ſeeking out, as it were, Food for his Mind, ſtill climing up to higher Matters in his Diſputations, he ran through all the parts of Philoſophy.

Ammianus the Hiſtorian his extraordinary Commendations of him.

36. Theſe Matters (for we ſhall ſtill follow Ammianus) he effectually and fully furniſhed himſelf with, and yet did he not deſpiſe thoſe of lower Concernment. For he was reaſonably well skill'd in Rhetorick and Poetry, as his handſom, though grave Orations and Epiſtles manifeſted; to which was added a manifold Knowledge of Roman Hiſtory, as well as that of other Nations, and a ſufficient Readineſs in the Latin Tongue. If that therefore be true, which ſeveral Writers relate (thus he proceedeth) of King Cyrus, of Simonides the Lyrick Poet, of Hippias the Elean, (the moſt Acute of all Sophiſts) their having ſo great Memories by Virtue of ſome ſmall Quantities of Potions and Receits which they uſed; it is to be believed, that he now Adult, drank off the whole Barrel of Memory, if any where it could be found. And theſe are the Evidences by Night of his Modeſty and Vertues. As for his handſom and Facetious Speeches, and how he behaved himſelf, either before his Advancement, or in Battles, or with what Magnanimity and Freedom he reformed Matters in the State; they ſhall all (he tells us) in their proper Places be demonſtrated. When he, being a Philoſopher, was, as a Prince, conſtrained to exerciſe and train his Souldiers, he would often make mention of Plato; and add, that this was a Pack, or Fardel, fit for an Oxe to bear, and not a Burthen for his Shoulders. The Agentes in Rebus, being brought into the Conſiſtory to receive their Gold, one of them amongſt the reſt, did not as they were wont, receive it in his Coat, but took it away in both his hands, at the ſight of which he uſed this Expreſſion; The Agentes in Rebus are skilful in taking, not in receiving, alluding to that rapacious Humour of theſe Officers, which heretofore we have obſerved. Having condemned a man to Baniſhment, who had raviſhed ſome Virgins; when he heard it was taken ill, that he had not put him to Death, he ſaid; hitherto the Laws may blame Clemency; but it becomes a Prince of a moſt mild Diſpoſition, to excell the Laws. As he was on his March, he referred the Complaints of Petitioners Credendum eſt hunc etiam tum adultum totum Memoriæ Dolium, ſi uſquam reperiri potuit, exhauſiſſe.

Rapere, non accipere ſciunt Agentes in Rebus.

oners to the Governours of the Provinces; and at his return in Perſon Examined each particular, and Mitigated, by his Genuine Mildneſs, the Rigor of the Puniſhments. Not to ſpeak of his Victories, whereby he often overthrew the Barbarians, how further he Relieved Gall, almoſt utterly ſpent by the Miſery and Poverty under which it Groaned; hence appears, that when he firſt entred that Province, he found an Exaction for every Caput *, or Capitum (that is, ſuch a quantity of Land) of twenty five Aurei by way of Tribute; but at his Departure he had reduced it to Seven, for which the Inhabitants Rejoyced in him, as a Bright, Irradiant Sun riſen upon them, after ſo groſs and palpable Fogs of Darkneſs. And this he conſtantly obſerv'd, till his Death; To grant no Indulgences or Pardons relating to Payments of Tribute, unto any particular men; knowing well, that by ſo doing he ſhould add to the Wealth of thoſe that were Rich, whereas the poorer ſort were at the very beginning compelled to pay all their Dues. But while he thus Exerciſed himſelf in ſuch moderate Methods of Government, (ſaith he) as ought to be imitated by Good Princes; the Barbarians renewed and increaſed their Fury, Roving up and down the Country, and like to Starved and Ravenous Beaſts ſeized upon all things that Gratified their Appetite. And ſo went Matters this year in Gall, Doubtfully at firſt, but the Concluſion was proſperous, as ſaith Ammianus, notwithſtanding he concludes his Narration with a Furious Depopulation of the Province.

The Almans again furiouſly Depopulate the Province.

Arbetio ſuſpected at Court.

37. In the mean time Arbetio was looked on with Envy and Jealouſie in the Emperour's Court, as having no lower thoughts than Aiming at the Sovereignty; to which the Splendor of his Living did contribute. There was one Veriſſimus, of the Degree of Comes, who openly ſtuck not to ſay, that having from an ordinary, or Common Souldier, riſen to ſo great Command, he therewith contented not himſelf, but Aſpired after the very Empire. But he was eſpecially Perſecuted by Dorus, who had been Phyſician to the Scutarii (for every Legion and Schola had its Phyſitian) and under Magnentius Executing the Place of the Centurio Rerum nitentium, at Rome, had formerly Accuſed Adelphius, Præfect of the City, as Guilty of the ſame Crime of Uſurpation Deviſed. But now, when the Matter was Inquired into, and an Expectation was raiſed, that the Fact ſhould be proved; both the Perſons, who, as Conſcious, had been committed to Priſon, were Diſcharged; and that by Approbation of the Privy-Councellors, or thoſe of the Conſiſtory, as the Report went; Dorus vaniſhed, and Veriſſimus held his peace, the Curtain of the Play being as it were let fall. Much about the ſame time, Conſtantius, being given to underſtand by ſuch as came out of Gall, how Marcellus had omitted to Relieve Julian, put him out of Commiſſion, and confined him to his own Houſe; who thereupon conceiving himſelf highly Injur'd, thought to be Reveng'd upon Cæſar, by whiſpering into the Credulous Ears of the Emperour ſuch things as would make him Jealous of him to the utmoſt Extremity. Julian was ſufficiently aware hereof, knowing well the Malice of the one, and the Supine Credulity of the other; and therefore, upon the Departure of Marcellus, ſent away Eutherius, his Præpoſitus Cubiculi, to Anſwer to ſuch things as ſhould be Objected againſt him. Marcellus, not aware hereof, haſted to Milan, and in a great Chaſe and Diſorder (being an Idle Tatler, and almoſt a Mad man) when he was admitted into Conſiſtory, Accuſed Julian, as a forward Deſigner, and one who was preparing and ſhaping himſelf Wings wherewith to ſoar to an Higher Fortune. He uſing all liberty in Diſcourſe of this Nature; Eutherius, upon his Deſire, was admitted, and having leave to ſpeak, Modeſtly and Mildly affirmed, that by Lies and Fictions he had concealed the Truth; told the Story how Marcellus having failed him, Julian, by his own Induſtry and Valour had removed the Barbarians from the Siege; and he offered to engage his Neck, that he would remain a Faithful Servant to him that had been the Author of his Promotion. Ammianus ſpends many words in Commendation of this Eutherius, and finds none of the Eunuchs amongſt the Antients (for an Eunuch he was) worthy to be compared to him. Some kind of Reſemblance indeed, but not proportionable, he owns in Menophilus, who ſerved Mithridates, the Famous King of Pontus. This King, having committed to him the Cuſtody of his Daughter, after he was Defeated by Pompey, and the Place where the Lady was kept being Beſieged by Manlius Priſcus; when Menophilus perceived the Garriſon-Souldiers talked of Yielding; he, fearing ſhe ſhould ſuffer Violence or Indignity, killed her firſt, and then ſheathed his bloody Sword in his own Bowels.

Marcellus accuſeth Julian.

His objections refelled by Eutherius.

38. But ſo Julian Evaded the malicious Accuſations of his Adverſary; but others found far greater difficulty to get off. For if any Perſon conſulted any ſuch as were accounted ſkilful (in ſuch profound Myſteries) about the Squeeking of a Rat,

---

* Caput ibi non accipiendum eſt pro Capitis perſonæ Tributo, ſeu Cenſu, ſed pro Jugo vel poſſeſſione; unde Capitatio & Jugatio adeo frequentes in L. L. ut mirum ſit Valeſium hic adeo graviter erraſſe, & de Plebeiis tam multa dixiſſe, quaſi Pauperes pro ſe, uxoribus, & Liberis Adultis (ſingulis ſcil.) aureos viginti quinque ſolvere potuerint. Vide de hac re Com. Gothof. in L. 15. de Annona & Tributis Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 1.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 356.

Many Perſons put to Death upon frivolous Pretenſes.

Rat, or the Sight of a Weeſel, or any ſuch like Sign of ill Luck, or took an Inchantment from any old Womam to prevent ſo impending a Miſchief, (which ſaith our Author the Authority of Phyſick doth admit) he was beyond Expectation, Apprehended, Arraigned, Sentenced, and Capitally puniſhed. There was one Danus, betwixt whom and his Wiſe a Quarrel hapning, ſhe accuſed him of ſome ſlight Matters, to which Rufinus, the Principal of the Apparitors belonging to the Præfectus Prætorio of Africk, and who lived in Adultery with the Woman, perſwaded her to add; that he was guilty of Treaſon, and namely had ſtolen the Purple Covering from off the Sepulchre of Diocleſian, and ſome few knowing of it, kept it hid for ſome dangerous Deſign. This Fellow himſelf came to Court, and framed a Story, which would have brought many to certain Deſtruction, if it had not found Honeſt and Reſolute Judges. The matter was committed to be examined and heard, to Mavortius, then Præfectus Prætorio, a man of the greateſt Conſtancy imaginable; with whom was joyned Urſulus the Comes Largitionum, a Perſon of commendable Severity. The Crime was aggravated, as ſuited with the Humour of the Times, but by Torture of many Perſons nothing could be diſcovered, and the Judges were very doubtful what to determine; when the mans Wife, urged by her Conſcience, and the Neceſſity wherein her Huſband and others were involved, confeſſed Rufinus to be the Contriver of the whole Device, and concealed not how Familiar they had been together. After Mature Deliberation had hereupon, they were both Sentenced, and put to Death. At which Conſtantius was very angry, and in a menacing manner ſent Command to Urſulus to come up to Court; as having executed him, who had been the Preſerver of his Perſon. He was adviſed, not to commit himſelf to ſo great Hazard; but up he came with great Courage and Reſolution; and being call'd into the Conſiſtory, with open Heart and Mouth, both declared all that had paſſed, and therewith ſo daunted his Adverſaries that they held their Peace; and ſo he free'd both himſelf and the Præfect from a manifeſt and imminent Danger. Others there were, who were not ſo happy as to evade the ſnares laid for them, but miſcarried, through the great Jealouſie of Conſtantius, which his Miniſters fomented out of a greedy Deſire of Wealth, wherewith all ſorts of men at this time were wonderfully inflamed, without any Diſtinction of Right or Wrong, Juſtice, or Injuſtice. Amongſt thoſe of the ordinary Magiſtrates there was Rufinus, the firſt Præfectus Prætorio; of Military men Arbetio the Magiſter Equitum, and Euſebius, the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, beſides the Quæſtor; and in the City, the Anitii, of whom the Poſterity imitating their Grandfathers could never be contented with an Eſtate far greater.

Some ſaved by the Conſtancy and Courage of the Judges.

39. But we hear too much of Conſtantius his jealous and credulous Humour, and the ſad Effects thereof; let us divert our thoughts by a view of what elſe he acted this year, in Reference to Civil Matters; for as to War, he himſelf in Perſon was not now Engaged. Lying ſtill at Milan, in the beginning of the year, he took Notice of a great Abuſe committed in the Coin, by melting it down, and ſelling of it, as other Merchandize; through which Practices ſo great Detriment came to the Publick, that by an Edict he forbids them both, upon Pain of Death; and that for this Reaſon, becauſe the End and Deſign of Money is to be the Price of Things, and not like Wares to be bought and ſold. For Prevention hereof, he not only inflicts Capital Puniſhment upon the Offenders, but provides againſt the Crime ſeveral other ways preſcribed in the ſame Law. He appoints Searchers in the Ports, Havens and Highwayes, for Diſcovery of ſuch Money to be Tranſported by any Merchant, Travellor, or Navigator. In the next Place he limits Merchants to a Sum, which they ought not to exceed in their Voyages; viz. a thouſand Folles, which is not to be underſtood of the leſſer ſort of Folles already ſpoken of, but the greater, whereof in the Age of Conſtantine, an hundred were of the value of a Solidus; ſo that for their Expenſe in their Journeys, he will not allow them above ten Solidi. A third way he preſcribes, that the very Merchants Ships of Burthen, at their Return, be ſearched, and that thoſe concerned produce all their Coin, for Diſcovery of any ſuch prohibited Money. To theſe he adds, that if any Money forbidden or not current, be found with any Merchant, both it, and his whole Eſtate beſides ſhall be confiſcated; charging all, that no Merchants, either buy or ſell Money like as other Commodities or Merchandize.

Conſtantius prohibits the Melting and Selling of Coin.

L. 1. Siquis pecunias conflaverit &c. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 22. Accept. 8. Id. Mart. Conſtantinop. Conſtantio Aug. 8. & Juliano Cæſare Coſs. A. D. 356. Abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſtin.

40. About the ſame time he ſent a (a) Conſtitution, or (as the Word is in the Latin of thoſe Times) an Oration to the Senate, divided in the Code into three ſeveral Laws, concerning Pretors, the Nomination of them, and other Matters relating to theſe Officers. It had been a Cuſtom for the Judges in Rome to aſſume to themſelves the Nomination

(a) L. L. 8, 9, 10. de Prætoribus. Dat. 3. Id. April. Med. Nominatio diſtinguenda eſt à Deſignatione. Nominatio erat, cùm ad certum Præturæ genus quis antea deſignatus Prætor nominabatur. Vide Gothof. Comment.

Regulates the Election of Prætors.

mination of ſome ſorts of Prætors, and this was alſo ſometimes practiſed by the Cenſuales. But in the firſt place, Conſtantius Abrogates all ſuch Cuſtoms, and will “ have theſe Nominations only made by the Senate. And, whereas, before the “ time of Auguſtus, at the making of a Senatuſconſultum, no ſmaller number of Sena- “ tors was to be preſent than Forty, and this being leſſened by that Prince, was “ afterward various, either according to the Humour of the Times, or the Weight “ of the Matter therein Determined; in this Buſineſs of the Nomination of “ Prætors, he will have no fewer preſent than Fifty. In the third place (by “ the third Law) he Appoints the Time for this Nomination to be on his own “ Birth-day, or on the Ides (the thirteenth) of Auguſt, and the dayes following, “ if that alone be not ſufficient; it being a Cuſtom for the Birth-dayes of “ Princes to be Aſſigned to the beginning of other Offices alſo. Next after “ this, he Declares, he will have none to Purchaſe of the Senate by Money or Reward, “ Immunity from the Service and Charge of the Prætorſhip, but only ſuch “ obtain that Privilege, whoſe Merits ſhall deſerve that they be taken into the “ number of Adlecti by the Emperour himſelf; by which Adlecti, we have already “ obſerv'd, that thoſe are to be meant, who, having never diſcharged an “ Office, were, by the Favour of the Prince, or his Letters, Admitted into the “ Dignity and Honour of that Employment. He Declares alſo, that ſuch as by “ their Merits had deſerved to be Præfecti Prætorio, or of other Dignity, ſhall enjoy “ this Immunity. And laſtly, he Ordains, that none ſhall Diſcharge the Office of “ Prætor by a Subſtitute, viz. his Son, Grand-ſon, or any other, but in his own Perſon; “ this being the reaſon, as Gothofred concludes, becauſe this Son, or Grand-ſon, if he lived, being a Senator, was to be Prætor himſelf; and ſo having Diſcharged the Office both for himſelf, his Father, and Grand-father, his Patrimony might be too much Exhauſted. We ſhall only further obſerve, that this Oration is ſaid to be read in the Senate by Praxius the Proconſul, on the Ninth day, or Seventh of the Ides of May, whereas by the Rule of Auguſtus, the Senate could only be held on the Calends, and the Ides themſelves.

A. D. 357. Conſtantio A. 9. & Juliano Cæſare 2 Coſs.

41. The Year following, into which fell the one and twentieth of his Reign, and the CCCLVII of our Lord, according to vulgar Computation, he himſelf the Ninth, and Julian Cæſar the ſecond time bearing the Title of Conſul; he continued ſtill at Milan, till about the end of April. And at this time however his Jealouſie might prevail with him againſt the Lives and Fortunes of Innocent Perſons; yet he publiſhed ſome Edicts, which made well for the Eaſe of his Subjects. It was a thing ſometimes practiſed by the Magiſtrates of this Age, in certain Caſes, to lay extraordinary Taxes or Impoſitions upon the People Subject to their Juriſdictions; and namely, they that carried the Title of Spectabilis, as the Proconſuls and Vicars; but they eſpecially, who in theſe Dayes took too much upon them in other Matters, as that of Appeals. This bringing, both great Damage and Inconvenience to the Provincials, and thence as great Scandal to the Government; by two ſeveral Laws he obviates the Practice; whereof the firſt is directed to the People to give them therein Satisfaction, and the other to Taurus, the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, to whom belonged, as the Care and Overſight of Tributes, ſo an Inſpection over the Governours of Provinces, and alſo the Levying of Extraordinary Taxes or Impoſitions. By theſe Laws he prohibits any ordinary Judge “ or Magiſtrate of the Dignity of Spectabilis, or Clariſſimus, to lay any extraordinary “ Charge upon the Subject, under Pain of paying himſelf the Double “ of the Sum, and his Officium, or Officers, twice as much as the Double, or fourfold. “ But thinking it not reaſonable to force the ſame Inhibition upon the Præfecti Prætorio, “ he makes a Diſtinction betwixt ſudden and urgent Neceſſities, and “ ſuch as were not at hand, but might be foreſeen, and at Diſtance. In the latter “ Caſe, when there was Leiſure enough, the Præfect ought to impoſe nothing, “ but at the time to certifie the Prince, that according to the Cuſtom, ſuch Tax “ was to be impoſed; that he might Conſider of his own Occaſions, and Rate the “ Provinces accordingly. But when there was urgent and inexcuſable Neceſſity, ſo “ as the publick Safety would not diſpenſe with Delay, then might the Præfectus “ Prætorio Impoſe an extraordinary Tax, (not Extraordinary as to the Quantity “ of the Sum is to be meant, but in Oppoſition to the ordinary or Common “ Tributes) and this done, he was therewith to acquaint the Emperour, “ that by his Authority the thing might be confirmed, or receive Alteration before “ the Gathering of it. Other ſucceeding Princes, as we may ſee hereafter, denied this Power to the Præfects; the ordinary, and extraordinary Indiction of Tributes, both alike, belonging to the Sovereign Authority. But

L. 7. & 8. de Extraordinariis &c. Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 16. Dat. 4. Non. April. & Dat. Kal. April. Conſtantio A. 9. & Juliano Cæſare 2 Coſs. A. D. 357.

Leſſens the Power of the Governours in raiſing Money.

But here Conſtantius Grants it with two Reſtrictions. The one in caſe only of Inſuperable Neceſſity, which admits of no Delay; and the other, ſo as it be Approved and Confirmed by the Prince, who before the full Exaction or Collection might be Certified of the Occaſion, and both of that, and the Sum Impoſed, ſend his Approbation, or Diſlike.

Publiſhes an Edict for regulating the Curſus Publicus.

42. Some fifteen dayes after, he Publiſhed another Edict to the ſame Taurus, concerning the Management of the Curſus Publicus, Determining of what ſort of Men the Curioſi, or thoſe that had the Charge of it, ſhould be Choſen; how many in number, and what their Duty ſhould be. Hitherto out of the Officium, or Attendance of the Præfecti Prætorio, and oftentimes from amongſt thoſe of their Vicars Perſons were wont often to be Deputed to this Charge, nay, from amongſt the Memoriales, and other Palatines. But by this Law “he Forbids this to be Practiſed for the time to come; Commanding that the Agentes in Rebus alone be appointed to this Employment. Their number he will have to be two in every Province, which he thinks ſufficient for the Publick Charge of the Curſus. As to the Duty of the Curioſi; he firſt Requires, that they take Care, leſt any make Uſe of it but ſuch as have Licenſe ſo to do, obtained from the Prince himſelf, or from other Magiſtrates who had Power to Grant it, as the Magiſter Officiorum. As alſo, that none exceed the Liberty Granted to them; as if they have only Permiſſion to make Uſe of one Chariot or Carriage, that they have not two, or inſtead of a Leſſer, a greater Waggon. Here, as to the uſual Carriages, mention is made of theſe four ſeveral ſorts, viz. of Rheda, Birotum, Veredus, and Clabula. That called Rheda was drawn by no fewer than Eight or Ten Mules; the Birotum with three: Veredus was a ſingle Horſe, and the Clabula was drawn by four Oxen. He further requires, that ſuch as pretend Licence from the Prince, do produce it, and make it appear to theſe Curioſi, of what Condition or Degree ſoever they are; whether Tribunes, Notaries, or ſuch as bear the Title of Comites.

L. 2. de Curioſis Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 29. Dat. 15. Cal. Maii Med. L. 2. Cod. Juſtin. hinc interpolata eſt.

The Perſians infeſt the Eaſtern Provinces.

43. In the mean time, the Perſians Infeſted the Eaſtern Provinces; not Fighting, as they were wont, but like Thieves and Robbers, ſnatching away what they could get; in which courſe of Hoſtility they ſometimes Fared well, and other whiles came by the Worſt, and ſhort home. Muſonianus, the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, being a Man of Good Parts, but, as the Humour of the Times was, Mercenary, and eaſie to be drawn aſide by Money, by certain Cunning Emiſſaries he employed, diſcovered their Deſigns, having taken in to his Aſſiſtance Caſſianus, the Dux of Meſopotamia; one who was Hardy enough, as an old Souldier. Although by their Spies they knew ſufficiently that Sapor the King was Employed in a Bloody War againſt ſome Neighbouring Nations; yet did they ſollicit Tam Sapor, one who Commanded the Forces which lay neareſt to the Empire, to perſwade his Prince by Letter to make Peace with the Emperour, that being thereby rendred Secure on this ſide, he might with the more Eaſe and Security Grapple with his other Enemies. This he undertook, and ſignified to his Maſter, that Conſtantius, being Involved in moſt Difficult Wars, earneſtly begg'd Peace; but in the paſſage of the Meſſengers to the Countries of the Chionitæ and Alani, where the Perſians Wintred, much time was ſpent. While Matters went thus in the Eaſt, Conſtantius lying ſtill at Milan, and having little to do, reſolved to take a Journey to Rome; there, as our Author Cenſures him, without any good Pretence, to Triumph over the Roman Subjects whom he had kill'd; the firſt that did thus after the Deſtruction of Magnentius: as if he had now ſhut the Temple of Janus, although neither he in Perſon had Conquer'd any Nation, nor by the Valour of his Captains had Subdued any, nor added New Provinces to the Empire. So far was he from this, that he was never ſeen in the greateſt Dangers, nor to go on with the Forwardeſt; but loving to make a great Show, that the People, who little cared for it, or at all deſired it, might behold his Banners Gliſtering with Gold, and his Guards with Silver. He was pleaſed to be ſeen abroad, not knowing, perhaps, that ſome Princes of old would in times of Peace be content with a few Lictors; but when the Caſe required it, venture their Lives with all Alacrity, and refuſe no Dangers, that they might leave the Memory of their glorious Actions behind them. By the Greatneſs and Splendour of his Train, as well as the great Dignity which he enjoyed, he drew the Eyes of all Men upon him, and, as with a Complete Army, purſued his Journey towards the City.

Conſtantius having nothing to do, makes a Journey to Rome.

The manner of his Entry.

44. When he came nigh to it, he was met by the Senate, and all the People, and ſo great was the Confluence, that he thought all the World was met at Rome. In his Golden Chariot he made his Entry, ſhining like the Sun, through the Quantity and Luſtre of its Gems. The Dragons Embroydered upon Purple, fluttered in the Air about him from the ends of their Staves, which Gliſtered with Pearl and pretious Stones; and while they were toſſed in the Wind, by their Length and Wavings, they ſeemed to imitate the True and Living ones, in Hiſſing, and in the Tortuoſity of their Tails. He was Encompaſſed with double Ranks of Armed men, who wore Targets and Helmets, as alſo Corſlets bright and ſhining; and amongſt them rode here and there the Cataphracti, (whom the Perſians called Clibanarii) ſo Fenced about their Bodies and Limbs with Iron, that one would have imagined them to have been Images, poliſhed by the Skilful hand of Praxiteles, and not Men; their mour being ſo wrought with Joynts, that what Part ſoever they moved, it gave way. The Emperour now being Saluted on every ſide with lucky Acclamations, and the Noiſe, both of Voices and Inſtruments, ſate as it were Aſtoniſhed, and kept himſelf as Immoveable, as he was wont to do in the Provinces. For as he entred the High Gates, he ſtooped with his very low Body; but kept his Eyes ſtill fixed before him, and as if they were ſet in his Head; looking neither on the one ſide nor the other, neither when the Chariot ſhaked, at all moving; not ſo much as Spitting, wiping his Face, or blowing his Noſe, or in the leaſt ſeen to ſtir an Hand: which poſture of an Image, though he did affect, yet (ſaith our Hiſtorian) this, and ſome other paſſages of his Life, were ſigns of no ſmall Patience; and as one would have thought, to him alone granted. But again, he ſeemed as rigidly Supercilious, on the other ſide, that during his whole Reign, he never took any man up to him in his Chariot, nor uſed other marks of Civility wont to be beſtowed, upon Diſcretion, by other Princes. When he was come to the Roſtra, he was amazed at the Sight of the Forum (that Demonſtration of the ancient Power of the Inhabitants) and when looking on every ſide, he could behold nothing but Miracles, he ſpake to the Nobility in the Curia, or Senate-Houſe, and made a Speech to the People from the Tribunal. He was wonderfully delighted with the Place, and was thereby moved to ſo good Humour, that when the Equeſtrian Games were celebrated, he was well pleaſed with the uſual Tatling of the Multitude, which carried it ſelf towards him, neither ſawcily, nor yet abating any thing of it's wonted Liberty at ſuch Solemnities; and he accordingly kept his Mean, neither bearing himſelf haughtily, nor deſcending from his grave Deportment. In the view of the City theſe Rarities he moſt admired: the Temple of Jupiter Tarpeius, excelling, if you believe Ammianus, as much other Buildings, as Divine things are wont to ſurpaſs thoſe that are but humane; the Baths built in manner of Provinces, he means as large. The Amphitheatre, to the Top whereof the Sight of man could hardly reach. The Pantheon, famous for it's Arches and Pillars, having the Trophies and Statues of Conſuls, and ancient Emperours on the Top; the Temple of the City, the Forum of Peace, the Theatre of Pompey, the Odeum or Place of Muſick, the Stadium or Courſe, and other Ornaments of this Eternal City; the ordinary Epithet our Author gives it, as do the Emperours in their Laws.

He greatly admires the City.

But what in it chiefly.

Urbis Templum primus condidit Hadrianus Anno U. C. 874.

45. But when he came to the Forum of Trajan (that Structure of all Structures, under Heaven, as we ſuppoſe (ſaith he) and by Aſſent of the Divine Powers, Wonderful) and conſidered the Gigantick Workmanſhip, neither by words to be ſet forth, nor to be imitated by Mortals, he ſtood aſtoniſhed. But ſome Emulation the ſight thereof wrought in him, though he Deſpaired of doing what might equal any thing in it, except the Statue of Trajan on Horſeback, which, he ſaid, he both could and would Imitate. To which Hormiſda, one of the Blood Royal of Perſia, ſtanding by, Replied, that he firſt ſhould do well to Build ſuch a Stable, and then bring a like Horſe into it; who being alſo Demanded what he thought of Rome, made Anſwer, That He was only Pleaſed (Diſpleaſed Sigonius reads it) in this one thing, that Men died there as well as in other Places. The Emperour Amazed with what he Daily ſaw, Complained of Fame, for her either Weakneſs, or Malignity, that uſually Enhancing the Repute of other things, was Deficient in what concerned Rome; and Deliberating much what to do, he reſolved to add to the Ornaments of the City, and to Erect an Obeliſk in the Great Cirque. In the mean time, Euſebia the Empreſs practiſed too much her skill upon Helena, the Siſter of her Husband, and Wife of Julian; which Lady, having in ſhew of kindneſs brought along with them to Rome, ſhe perſwaded her to take ſomething which made her Miſcarry; for, being Barren her ſelf, ſhe could not endure that She ſhould be a Mother; and therefore, when ſhe had formerly in Gall been brought to bed of a Boy, ſhe Geſtu Gentili, vel Aſtu Gentili, ut Valeſius legere mavult.

Sect. 4.

A.D. 357.

He is called away by the Invaſions of the Northern Nations.

ſhe Bribed the Midwife to Deſtroy him, by cutting off too much of his Navel: ſo great endeavour was uſed to prevent that moſt Valiant man his having any Iſſue, ſaith our Writer. As for Conſtantius, he had a great deſire to ſtay ſtill at Rome; but was called away by frequent Meſſages; that the Suevi had invaded Rhætia; the Quadi, Valeria; and the Sarmatæ, a People ſkilful in pilfring above others, had made their Incurſions into the Upper Mæſia, and Pannonia the Second. He therefore Departed the City, the Twenty ninth of May, the Thirtieth day after his coming thither. Sigonius, Baronius, and others, place this his Journey to Rome in the preceding year, viz. the CCCLVI of our Lord, and the Twentieth of his Reign, but that it happened in this following, we are induced to believe, from the Dates and Subſcriptions of ſome Laws, which Declare him to have been at Rome this year, and at this very time of the year; whereas in Laws of the preceding, of Rome there is no mention. There were certain Accomptants, or Clerks, belonging to the Armies, though no Souldiers, yet under Command of the Magiſtri Militum; their work being to keep Books of what Proviſions were due, and paid to every Company, and of every man that ſerved in them. Theſe men, to prevent the Auditing of their Accounts, in which they were often found Careleſs or Diſhoneſt, were wont to procure themſelves to be raiſed to Places of Dignity, of which Conſtantine the Great taking notice, had prohibited that practice; yet notwithſtanding was it grown again to ſuch a Grievance, that by an Edict “ Directed to Taurus, the Præfectus Prætorio, Conſtantius Reinforces what was Ordained “ by his Father, and Orders him to write to the Magiſtri Militum, that the “ Law be put in effectual Execution. This Edict bears Date from Rome, on the ſixth of May, in the Ninth Conſulſhip of Conſtantius, and the Second of Julian. There is another Edict, Dated alſo at the ſame Place, and directed to Olybrius, (rather Orphitus ſhould be read) the Præfect of this City, in Favour to which the Edict is made, Prohibiting any Perſons to Injure or Moleſt the Navicularii, who brought “ thither Proviſions, either in their Coming or Return, under pain of Forfeiting “ Ten Pounds of Gold. Indeed the Date of this Law is on the firſt of June, whereas Ammianus writes, that Conſtantius departed three dayes ſooner; but a Miſtake of three dayes is eaſie; or inſtead of Dated, is rather to be read Received; they being both uſually ſet to the Conſtitutions of Princes.

Vide Chronic. Hiſtoric. ad A.D.CCCLVII.

Some Laws he made at Rome.

L. 5. de Numerariis. Cod. Theod. lib. 8. tit. 1. Dat. Pr*id. Non. Maii. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.*

L. 9. de Naviculariis Cod. T*h. lib.* 13. tit. 5. Dat. Romæ, Kal. Junii.

Data pro Accepta.

He comes to Milan.

46. Conſtantius departing from Rome, came to Milan, and there made his ſtay till toward the middle of December. Here he received Complaints, how the Agentes in Rebus abuſed the Favour he had ſhewed largely to them; by which Encouraged, and preſuming, they Committed many outragious Acts, both of Violence, Rapine, and Adultery. For they were under the Diſpoſition, as the Notitia of the Empire ſets them, of the Magiſter Officiorum, and from his Office, or Attendance, were ſent abroad into the Provinces, as occaſion ſerved. Now Conſtantius, forced to it by the many Complaints of the People, by an Edict bearing Date of the Twenty “ fourth of September to Taurus, the Præfectus Prætorio (or at that time Received) “ takes away all benefit they had from ſuch Relation or Dependance, and ſubjects “ them and all other Palatine Officers whatſoever, in caſe of any Crime committed, “ to the Juriſdiction of the Ordinary Judges of the Provinces; in like manner, as by “ another Law he Enacts, That the Curioſi, whom he Ordered, as we have ſeen, to “ be Choſen out of their Body, be Judged by the Præfecti Prætorio. In caſe of “ Violation of Chaſtity, he Commands, that they be puniſhed according to the uſual “ manner. But in caſe of Rapine, or taking away any man's Goods, that they “ Reſtore Double; as he alſo the ſame year, by another Edict, threatens the Curioſi, “ with payment of Four-fold the Value of what they unjuſtly took away. We lately mention'd how, in a Law made concerning theſe Curioſi, he took care of the Curſus Publicus, or Poſtage. But beſides that, by two other Edicts made this very “ year, and Directed to the ſame Taurus, the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, did he “ further provide for the due Management of that Publick Service; which, as “ thence appears, was of extraordinary Concernment at this time, and ſcarcely ſufficed “ to ſerve Publick Ends: of which this might be one reaſon, that there were many Synods to which Biſhops poſted up and down in thoſe dayes, (touched at by Ammianus) and they had the Uſe thereof Granted them in their Travels: but beſides the Expreſs Charge, that none of what Quality ſoever (the Præfecti Prætorio, “ and the Magiſter Officiorum excepted) might make Uſe thereof, without “ having produced a Licence (if they did, their Names were to be Certified, either “ to the Præfect or the Magiſter;) ſeveral other wayes he preſcribes for prevention “ of Abuſes. Leſt the Beaſts ſhould be over-wrought and ſpoiled, he ſettles “ what Weight the three ſorts ſhould carry: as the Rheda, not above one thouſand “

Where he reſtrains the Extravagances of the Agentes in Rebus.

L. 3. de Juriſdictione, & ubi quis Conven. Deb. Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 1. Data & Accepta 8. Kal. Octob. Abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſtin. quia T*emporaria & Hiſtorica eſt. Vide Comment.*

L. L. 8, & 9. de Curſu publico Cod. T*h. lib.* 8. tit. 5.

And further provides for the Curſus Publicus.

ſand pound Weight; the Birotum, not above two Hundred; and a ſingle Horſe, or Veredus, no more than Thirty. He will have the Rheda, which had four wheels, in Summer to be drawn by eight, and in Winter by ten Mules; but thinks three ſufficient for the Birotum, which from its two wheels had its Name. Then doth he Reſtrain and Limit the Power of the Præfectus Prætorio, as to Granting Licenſes, as not to give leave to any to make ſtay upon the Road, and have Allowances or Proviſions, at the Manſions or publick Inns. Which Indulgence the Prince Reſerves to himſelf. That he ſhall not Lightly Grant the Uſe of the Rheda and Birotum; but as to the Veredus, he being a ſingle Horſe, was not of that Importance, and he muſt not Grant any Licenſes at all to the Agentes in Rebus, when ſent on a Meſſage into the Provinces; becauſe they were to receive them, either from the Magiſter Officiorum, or the Emperour himſelf.

How Matters in the mean time went in Gall.

47. While the Emperour Employed himſelf in making of Laws, let us ſee how Cæſar behaved himſelf in Gall. He was much pleaſed that Conſtantius had ſent Severus to Command under him in the room of Marcellus; a Man of a Facil and Compliant Humour, and of a very good Experience. Barbatio, who after the Death of Sylvanus was alſo Promoted to be Magiſter Peditum, was ſent out of Italy with a Supply of Twenty five thouſand men, by doubled Forces, if it were poſſible, to Curb the Almans, and Force them up into their Bounds. Yet herewith were they not ſo Terrified, but that paſſing betwixt the two Camps, in their pilfring manner, they Roved as far as Lugdunum, or Lions, and little miſſed, but that they had Sacked and Burnt it; but being timely ſhut out, and Repulſed, they Waſted the Countrey round about Julian having notice hereof, ſent away three ſtrong Parties of Horſe to lye in wait for the Barbarians in three ſeveral places, by which he concluded they would return, and his Deſign wanted not good Succeſs; for they were all cut off, and the Booty Recovered, except ſuch as eſcaped, where Barbatio had his Poſt Aſſigned him. There Bainobaudes and Valentinian (who afterward was Emperour) being with their Troops Commanded to keep the Guard, were forbidden by one Cella, the Tribune of the Scutarii, who Accompanied Barbatio in the Expedition, to watch and keep ſuch Ways as they had learn'd the Germans were to return by. This, as Cella afterward confeſſed, was done by order of the Magiſter Peditum; but he being a Coward, and Envying the Fame of Julian, to Excuſe himſelf, and make the other Suſpected, told another Tale to Conſtantius; as if theſe two Tribunes, under pretence of Publick Service, came to withdraw from their Obedience the Souldiers he Commanded; upon which Accuſation they were turn'd out of their Places, and ſent home. However, this Defeat, and the noiſe of the Approach of the Armies ſo terrifyed the Barbarians that lived on this ſide the Rhine, that ſuch ways as were difficult of themſelves to paſs, they endeavoured to make utterly impaſſable, by the cutting down of great Trees: others betook themſelves into the Iſlands, with which that River is beſpread, here and there, reviling and curſing Cæſar and the Romans. Cæſar demanded of Barbatio ſeven Boats with which he intended to make Bridges over into theſe Iſlands; but he, having Notice of his Deſign, burnt them all; ſo that being herein fruſtrated, he reſolved to ſend over ſome Auxiliary Velites, under Command of Bainobaudes, the Tribune of the Cornuti, at a place, where he underſtood from Priſoners, the River was fordable. Theſe men ſometimes wading, and ſometimes ſwimming by help of their Targets, got into the neareſt Iſland, where they ſlaughtered, like ſo many Sheep, all thoſe they met with, and there getting ſome ſmall Boats, paſſed over to the other Iſle; where having wearied themſelves with killing, they returned laden with Booty, but loſt part of it in the River. The other Germans finding in the Iſland but little Security, removed with all they had into places more remote.

Alii de 30000 ſcribunt atque nunc quidem Juliano Cæſari à Conſtantio eſſe conceſſum, ut ſuo Jure ageret, & Exercitus pro Imperio regeret. Nam antea ſub Marcello, nihil niſi Cæſaris Nomen atque Inſignia circumtulerat: idq; precibus Euſebiæ Auguſtæ Exoratum, Conſtantium conceſſiſſe ſcribit Zoſimus lib. 3. Vide Valeſium in L.

48. After this Julian bent his Study to fortifie the Three Tabernæ, a Fort ſo called, which having been lately demoliſhed by the Enemy, was now thought to be of that Conſequence, as to hinder the Irruptions of the Germans into Gall; and he finiſhed the Work ſooner than could be hoped, and laid in Proviſion for an whole year, which with much Hazard he got out of the Enemies Country. Beſides, he victualled his own Army for twenty Dayes: for of ſuch Corn as had been of Courſe provided, Barbatio, as it came that way, took half, and burnt the reſt; either of his own Head, as he was a vain and a ſick-brain'd man, or by private Hints from the Emperour how to behave himſelf toward Julian; who, as was whiſpered up and down, was not ſent on Purpoſe to Relieve the Province of Gall, but to be expoſed to the Wars, that he might miſcarry, being look'd upon as raw, and unexperienced, and one that would not endure ſo much as the claſhing of Weapons together. But while he buſied himſelf in building this Fort and other Works, the Barbarians barians ſet upon Barbatio, and beating him as far as the Rauraci, took the greateſt part of his Baggage, and return'd; which paſt, as if this Summer's Expedition had been very well over, he ſent his Men into their Winter-Quarters, and got to the Emperour's Court, there to do ill Offices to Cæſar, as he was ever wont, in Ammianus his Opinion. However, ſuch ill Effect his Rout and Departure had, that ſeveral Kings of the Almans joyned their Forces together, and ſate down near to Argentoratum, verily thinking, that Cæſar himſelf had, out of fear, run away, whereas he was ſtill buſied about the Fort but now mentioned. Though they found it otherwiſe, yet being told by a Souldier that ran away to them to eſcape Puniſhment; that he had with him only thirteen thouſand men, they had the Confidence to ſend to him, and in a Menacing, Imperious manner to Command him to be gone, and quit the Country, which he had Invaded: with which Meſſage he was not at all moved, but Laughing at the Inſolence of the Barbarians, kept the Meſſengers with him, till he had finiſhed the Work. Yet found he reaſon ſeriouſly to conſider, that he was intangled in no ſmall Difficulties, being Expoſed with a ſmall number of men, though very Valiant, againſt ſo Numerous an Enemy; who had ſome reaſon to be more Confident upon the departure of Vanquiſhed Barbatio, and were Animated by Chnodomarius, one of their own Kings, much Elevated by his good Succeſs; for he had formerly beaten Decentius Cæſar, the Brother of Magnentius, though Fighting on equal terms, had Waſted and Deſtroyed many Places, and ranged up and down Gall without Controul.

Tabernas intelligit quæ ſunt in Alſatia prope Argentoratum & Saliſonem, non verò Tabernas Rhenanas, quæ ad Rhenum ſunt in Nemetibus.

Rauraci, Rauraquois Peuple du Terroir de Bale Galliæ Celticæ.

49. Notwithſtanding, Julian thought fit to Engage them now, lying at one and twenty miles diſtance, and this Reſolution was approved by the Principal Officers, and amongſt others, by Florentius the Præfectus Prætorio, then preſent. By a Speech fitted to the occaſion, he Encouraged his Men, though they were by their own Inclination forward enough, ſo as they cried out to be led on to find out the Enemy. And the Enemy having notice of their March, ſtood ready to receive them in this manner. Having by the Fugitive Souldier underſtood, that the Roman Cavalry was placed in the Right Wing, they ſet oppoſite to them the beſt Horſe they had, but with them ſome Foot mixed here and there, with very good reaſon. For they knew very well, that the Clibanarii being ſo Armed as they were, the Horſemen holding the Bridle in one hand, could, with the Lance in the other, do little Execution upon men that were Incloſed, and, as it were, hid in Armour, but the Footmen Creeping and Inſinuating themſelves here and there, according to occaſion, could eaſily ſtab the Horſes, who then tumbling down with their Burthens, the Riders kept under by the weight of their Arms, without much ado might be Diſpatched. Chnodomarius and Serapio, more Famous than any other Kings, Commanded in Chief, being Aſſiſted by five others, and ten more of the Royal Families, beſides a great number of their Nobility, who altogether had brought into the Field thirty five thouſand men of ſeveral Nations, whereof ſome were Hired, and others were Obliged to it by an Offenſive and Defenſive League. When the Battel came on, the Foot began to Mutiny, and cry out, that their Leaders ſhould not fight on Horſeback; for they apprehended, that they purpoſed, if Danger ſhould threaten, to ſhift for themſelves by the Swiftneſs of their Steeds, and leave them as a Prey to the Swords of their Enemies; which Chnodomarius no ſooner heard, but he leap'd from off his Horſe, as did all the reſt, not doubting but they ſhould be Victorious. And they Fought very ſtoutly, ſome of them upon their Knees, Labouring to Gall and Diſcourage the Romans, who found their Matches in this Fight, now the one ſide, and then the other ſeeming to have the day.

The Battel of Argentoratum. or Strasburgh.

50. The Right Wing of the Roman Army gave ground, and began to run in much Diſorder, till one hindring another in the Flight, Shame ſo wrought upon them, as to make them ſtop their Career: but then again the Cataphracti perceiving their Commander to be wounded, and another by the Weight of his Armour fallen from his Horſe, thereat diſcouraged, turned their Backs, and ſhifted for themſelves; which ill Example ſo moved the Foot, that they had run too, if one had not alſo hindred another. Julian ſeeing the Horſe thus ſhamefully running away, by all the Rhetorick he had, laboured to ſtop them; and his Language ſo much prevailed with one of the Tribunes, who knew him by his Purple Banner, whereon was wrought a Dragon fixed to a longer Spear than ordinary, that he made an Alt, and endeavoured to perſuade his Companions to Rally. In the mean time the Almans having Routed the Horſe, were fallen with Violence upon the Foot; but found more Reſiſtance, after they came to Handſtroaks, from the Valour and Experience of the Cornuti and Braccati: yet was the Fury of the Germans ſo great, that it prevailed againſt the ſedate Cautiouſneſs of the Roman Legions ſo far, as that cutting themſelves a Paſſage through their Ranks, they pierced as far as the Body of thoſe called Primani, who being the choiceſt Legion of all, received them with ſtill more Care and Circumſpection; and taking Advantage at their Raſhneſs, did ſo great Execution upon them, that the Purſuers at length, after a great Slaughter, deſpaired of Succeſs, and were themſelves put to flight. The Roman confeſſed the Succeſs was more according to his Wiſh and Deſire, than Expectation; and giving the Chaſe, when his own Weapons were blunted with hacking and killing, ſheathed the Enemy's Sword in the Bowels of the owner. The Germans, not able to flie faſt enough for the Heaps of dead Bodies lying in their Way, many of them ventured to take the Rhine, which was near to the Place of Fight, and therein were moſt of them, either drown'd or killed by the Romans, whom Cæſar (with much adoe) reſtrained from entring the River, though the Rapacity thereof threatned them with preſent Deſtruction. Chnodomarius endeavouring to paſs the Water, was known by the great Bulk of his Body (as all his Countrymen were ordinarily Large and Tall) and being purſued was forced to yield, together with his Followers, two hundred in number, and three of his moſt intimate Friends. Of the Germans were ſix thouſand found dead in the Field, beſides vaſt numbers which periſhed in the River. Of the Romans fell but two hundred, and three and forty; and of theſe four Commanders, amongſt whom was Bainobaudes Tribune of the Cornuti. The Army ſaluted their General with the Title of Auguſtus; but he flatly refuſed it, Swearing, that he neither expected, nor deſired that Honour. Chnodomarius being brought before him and his Council, humbled himſelf upon the Ground, and beg'd Pardon, which was granted him; and being ſent afterward to the Emperour's Court, he ordered him to be conveyed to Rome, where he died at length in the Place called Caſtra Peregrina, on Mont Cælius. The News of the Succeſs being brought to the Emperour; they about him aſcribed it to his Felicity alone; and he was ſo much puffed up with their Flatteries, as in his publick Edicts to aſcribe this and other Victories to his own Valour, as if he had fought at the Head of his Army. Inſomuch, that when he was in Italy, if any of his Captains fought proſperouſly againſt the Perſians, by his Laureat Letters ſent into the Provinces, he would pretend to have engaged amongſt the Chiefeſt, making no mention at all of him that had wone the Battel. This prodigious Story Ammianus tells of him; though amongſt his Laws now extant, we find no ſuch Edicts; and Aurelius Victor attributes the Succeſs of his Officers to his Councils.

Wherein Julian beats the Germans.

Zoſimus plus æquo Juliani Gloriæ ſtudens (niſi Error in Textum irrepſerit) ſexaginta Millia Alamannorum dicit in Campo conſtrata, totidemque vi Fluminis Conſumpta, quod eſt Falſiſſimum. Valeſius in L. Libanius 30000. tantum in Exercitu Germanorum eſſe dicit & in his 8000. fuiſſe occiſa.

Ammianus Marcellinus lib. 17.

51. Julian, after the Battel, Commanded all the Bodies to be buried; and then ſetting at Liberty the Ambaſſadors of the Almains, who had brought that Imperious Meſſage, returned to the Three Tabernæ, the Fort he had lately repaired; whence ſending the Priſoners, and all the Booty to the Mediomatrici, there to be kept, till his Return; he reſolved to go to Maguntiacum (now Mentz) and by a Bridge to fall upon the Germans in their own Country. Surprized by ſo unexpected a thing, and to divert him, they ſent and beg'd a Peace; but then ſuddenly changing their Minds (upon what Grounds it's not eaſie to ſay) by other Meſſengers they threatned him with War, in Caſe he would not depart out of their Territories. Cæſar, to begin firſt, ſent over a Party into their Country, which waſted all with Fire and Sword, and reſolved to repair a Fort, that Trajan formerly had called after his own Name; which ſo exceedingly diſcouraged them, that they ſent and again beg'd Peace, and a Truce he granted them for ten Moneths, reſolving in that time to finiſh thoſe Fortifications that he had begun. But returning to his Winter-Quarters, he found other Work cut out for him. For ſix hundred Franks, encouraged by his Abſence in Germany, and finding none to make any Reſiſtance, had rifled all the Country about Rheims; and when they heard of the Return of the Army, ſeized on two Forts which had been diſmantled, and therein fortifyed themſelves as well as they could. Julian very much ſtartled at the News, concluded that they were not to be ſuffered to eſcape without Chaſtiſement, and laid Siege to one of the Caſtles, ſtanding upon the Moſa (or Meuſe) which held out three and fifty Days, almoſt all December and January; ſo pertinacious and obſtinate were the Defenders. But reſolving to ſtarve them out, leſt by night they ſhould eſcape over the River, that was then Frozen, and bring in Proviſions; he cauſed the Ice to be broken, and Boats all the Day long to ply to and again, on Purpoſe to keep the Water open: with which, and other Courſes, they were ſo diſcouraged, as to yield themſelves; and were by him ſent away to the Emperour. A multitude of their Countrymen were coming to their Relief; but underſtanding how they had Fared, and were diſpoſed of, returned to their own Homes. All Coaſts being now clear, Julian went to

He hath the better of the Franks, who waſted the Parts about Rheims.

He goes to Paris.

He goes to Paris.

Provides for the Eaſe of the Provinces.

to Paris, there to ſpend the remaining part of the Winter, and to Conſult how to Improve the ſmall time of the Truce, to the Eaſe and Refreſhment of the Exhauſted Provinces: and about this Matter hapned a Conteſt betwixt him and Florentius, the Præfectus Prætorio. For the Præfect, whoſe Duty it was to take care of the Tributes, finding ſo much behind of the Sum, would have it made up by greater Burthens laid upon thoſe that were able to pay, after the manner we have already related, how in caſe the Grounds or Eſtates of ſome failed, the Sum was to be Compleated by the Neighbours. But Julian oppoſed it, ſaying, he would loſe his Life before he would ſuffer ſuch a thing to be done; knowing well, that this way of Proviſions Ruined the Provinces, and particularly, had brought Illyricum into a ſad condition. The Præfect exclaming, and urging, that he muſt not betray his Truſt to the Emperour, who had committed to his Management things of this nature; he endeavoured to Pacifie, by gentle words, and caſting up the Accounts, ſhewed him, that the Tribute, as now Collected, would ſuffice, over and above, for the Publick Expence. Notwithſtanding, afterwards, there was offered to him a Bill for an Additional Tax, which he would not ſo much as read, nor ſubſcribe, but caſt it to the Ground. And when the Emperour, by Letters, admoniſhed him not to be ſo Nice, nor Detract from the Repute of his Miniſter; he wrote back, that the Provincials paid what was ſufficient, and more could not be got, where it was not to be had. His Conſtancy and Reſolution herein ſo far prevailed, that no greater Burthen than uſual was laid upon Gall: and, which thing otherwiſe was not heard of; he prevailed with the Præfect, to have the Management himſelf of the Revenue of Belgica Secunda, which was grievouſly haraſſed; ſo that no Officer or Apparitor belonging either to Præfect or Preſident, ſhould meddle with the Collection; which proved a very great Eaſe to the Inhabitants, who paid their ſhares rather ſooner than they became due.

He ſubdues the Salii Franci, and the Chamavi.

His Army wants Proviſions, and Mutinies.

52. Having ſettled theſe and other Matters, as he thought convenient, he made all proviſion he could to prevent the Almans, and be upon them e're they could be united. He had not the Patience to ſtay for the Month of July, at what time the Gallicean Armies were wont to take the Field; for, being ſupplied with Corn out of Aquitain, they could not March till they had the Proviſions with them, which coming, both ſo far, and ſo ſlowly, by reaſon of the Weather, could not be ready before that time. But, as Reaſon and Diligence are wont to Conquer Difficulties, that he might come upon the Barbarians unexpected; he reſolved to take with him twenty dayes Proviſion, and went his way; hoping, at this rate, to Finiſh two Expeditions in the ſpace of five or ſix Months. He firſt Attacqued the Franks, called Franci Salii, who in former time had taken the boldneſs to plant themſelves in Toxandria *, (now Brabant) within the Roman Pale. Being come as far as Tongres, their Ambaſſadours met him, deſiring, that living Quietly, and Inoffenſively, they might find ſutable Uſage from him; whom he ſent back rewarded, with a doubtful and perplexed Anſwer, and, as if he intended to ſtay in the ſame Place till their return; but meaning nothing leſs, he was well-nigh with thoſe that ſent them, as ſoon as they; and ſending Severus with a Party on before him, fell upon them like a Tempeſt, and by the Surprize forced them to give up themſelves, and all they had into his Hands. After this, the Chamavi, who had Deſerved juſt as much as they, he Treated not after the ſame manner, though he uſed the ſame circumſtance of Haſte and Surprize; for they made very ſtout Reſiſtance, and ſome he killed, others he took alive, and caſt them into Bonds, and the reſt he ſuffered to eſcape; and when their Meſſengers, proſtrate on the ground, begged Pardon, he granted it to them. Things thus far ſucceeding according to his wiſh; he thought fit to deferr his further March till ſuch time as he had Reinforced three Caſtles upon the Meuſe, that by the Barbarians had been then Diſmantled. This Effected with great Celerity, and having ſeventy dayes Proviſion ſtill with him, he thought fit to ſupply thoſe that he left therein, with part of it, in hope to make it up, with advantage, out of the Fields of the Chamavi; though it happened otherwiſe. For the Corn was not yet Ripe; and the Army, now wanting what had been left in the Caſtles, when the Countrey afforded no Recruit, began to Mutiny, and to Threaten their General; calling him in deriſion, Aſianus, Græculus, Cheat, and a Coxcomb under the Vizard of Wiſdom. They complained, that they had formerly endured the Snow and Froſts, and now were to be expoſed to Extremities of Famine, which cauſed the moſt Lazy kind of Death of all others. That they only in what they ſaid Pleaded for their Lives, neither for Gold nor Silver, things, they had not the happineſs, either to Handle or See; as if they had undertaken ſo many Labours and Dangers, not for, but againſt the Commonwealth. Neither wanted the Souldier juſt reaſon for theſe Complaints: for though the Gallican Army had undergone ſo much Toil, and was ſo much Exhauſted, it had never receiv'd a Donative[*], nor ſo much as the ordinary Pay. For Julian, ſince his Arrival, had not wherewith to do it, and Conſtantius would not permit the Money to be raiſed the uſual way; which Ammianus interprets to have proceeded, rather from Deſign than Covetouſneſs. For when a Common Souldier, on a time, asked Julian ſomething, as the Cuſtom was, to cut his Beard, and he gave him ſome Inconſiderable Matter, he was moſt Contumeliouſly traduced for ſo doing, by Gaudentius, then a Notary, who lay a long time in Gall, to pry into his Actions, and whom (to be even it ſeems with him) when he came to be Emperour, he Commanded to be put to Death.

* Ita dicta à Toxiandris, ſive Toxandris, quos in Belgica locat Plinius. lib. 4. c. 17. non longè à Scaldi fluvio. Hoc in loco ſedes fixerant Salii, tunc cùm à Saxonibus Patriâ pulſi Bataviam Inſulam, & vicina loca occupaverunt, ut refert Zoſimus lib. 3. Valeſ.

He diverts them, by an Invaſion, into Germany.

53. But with various Arts, and much ado, he Appeaſed the Tumult; and to Divert them by Action, laid a Bridge of Boats over the Rhine, and Invaded the Territories of the Almans. In this Expedition, Severus, the Magiſter Equitum, having formerly had the Reputation of a Valiant and Induſtrious Man, now turned Coward; and he, who was wont to Exhort others to demean themſelves Gallantly, now ſtood in need to be ſpurred on to Action. Yet were the Almans ſo Diſcouraged at the Invaſion, that Suomarius, one of their Kings, who had formerly been ready enough to Fight againſt the Romans; thinking it a great Atchievement, if he could but ſave himſelf, on his bended Knees, came and yielded his Perſon and all he had, to the Diſcretion of Cæſar, who granted him Pardon, on this Condition, that he ſhould Releaſe his Priſoners, and, upon occaſion, ſupply ſuch Romans as Marched that way, with Proviſions. The Country of another petty King, Hortarius by Name, being by their Guides led through difficult and tedious Courſes, out of Anger, they waſted all they could; and when he made what means he might to prevent the Deſtruction of himſelf and Dependants, by Fighting and Taking of Priſoners, being Worſted, he was not only enjoyn'd to ſet at Liberty all the Captives, but to find Materials and Carriages, for Rebuilding thoſe Caſtles which his Countrymen had Deſtroyed. For, to Impoſe finding of Proviſions upon him, as upon Suomarius, would have been in vain, his ſmall Territory (Pagus, our Author, more properly calls it) being ſo Exhauſted, that nothing of that kind was to be found therein. And in this manner (ſaith Ammianus) thoſe vaſtly Swelling Kings (and great reaſon they had to Swell, if we knew of what vaſt Extent their Kingdoms were) who were wont to grow Rich by the Robberies they committed againſt the Romans (as little Matter then would make them Rich as Great) were conſtrained to ſubmit their Necks to the Roman yoke, and did it as quietly, as if they had been Born and Bred amongſt Tributary Vaſſals. Which things being Atchieved, and the Souldiers diſperſed into their Quarters, Cæſar returned to his wonted Place to Winter; having done as great Matters, if the Reader will believe it, againſt theſe Kings of Collein, as was performed by the Antient Captains, even againſt the Carthaginians, or Cimbrians; ſo great is the force of Favour to one, and Prejudice to another, that Poſterity muſt be defrauded of ſincere Relations, even by thoſe that moſt pretend to the Hiſtorical Vertue of Veracity.

Two Kings ſubmit themſelves.

He is envied at Court.

54. But when the Report of theſe things came to Court (for Cæſar was bound to give an Account to the Emperour of what paſſed, as much as any Ordinary Apparitor) thoſe men that were Learned Profeſſors in the Science of Flattery, turned all, that was both Prudently undertaken, and happily concluded, into Ridicule. They called him Goat, becauſe of his long Beard; a Pratling Mole, an Ape clad in Purple, the Greek Schollard, and other Terms they uſed fully as obliging, thereby endeavouring with impudent Language to transform all his Glorious Actions into Folly and Cowardiſe, before Conſtantius; to whom this Noiſe was very pleaſing Muſick. But this was no new thing. The greateſt Glory is moſt expoſed to Envy, which of old time, feigned Crimes, and fixed Diſgrace upon the moſt Illuſtrious Captains. So Cimon the Son of Miltiades was accuſed of Inceſt; that Cimon, who near to Eurymodon, the River of Pamphilia, cut off an innumerable company of Perſians, and compelled that Nation, before Elevated through the Inſolency of their King, to ask Peace in an humble manner. Scipio Æmilianus was alſo by his Malevolent Æmulators, taxed with Sloth; even he, by whoſe conſtant Vigilancy, two Cities of the Carthaginians, obſtinately bent for the Deſtruction of Rome, were themſelves Deſtroyed. Neither did Pompey eſcape ſuch Tongues; whoſe Detractors, after much Inquiry, not being able to find any thing Material againſt him, had the confidence to lay two Heavy Crimes to his Charge; whereof the one was, That he had a Cuſtom to ſcratch his Head with one Finger; and the other, that he bound his Leg with a white Garter: the one, they ſaid, was the ſign of Idle Affectation, and the other, that he was greedy of Innovation, though he did it only to hide a Scar received by a Wound. But they Argued, with great Wit, that it matter'd not on what part of his Body he wore the Badge of Royalty (the Fillet or Diadem) laying the height of Ambition to the Charge of him, than whom, as is evident from good Authority, none was, either more Couragious or Cautious for the Good of his Countrey. So Ammianus.

---

[*] Hæc falſa ſunt, ſi verum eſt quod narrat Sulpitius Severus in Principio. lib. 1. de vita B. Martini. Julianus, inquit, Cæſar, coacto in unum Exercitu, Donativum cœpit erogare Militibus apud Vangionum Civitatem, ut eſt conſuetudinis. Singuli Citabantur, donec ad Martinum ventum eſt. Tam rem, quàm locum diſertè nominat. Vide Valeſium.

55. But let us, leaving Cæſar a while, ſee how Conſtantius all this while behaved himſelf at Sirmium; whether he went from Rome, as we ſaid before, upon News, that the Suevi, Quadi, and Sarmatæ had Invaded the Empire; and whether he had no other Employment than to receive the ſatisfaction from his Flatterers, of hearing his Couſin Julian made Ridiculous. Being arrived in Illyricum, he ſent Severus to ſucceed Marcellus, and ordered Urſicinus to come to Court, who, gladly obeying him, haſted to Sirmium; where long Conſultation being had concerning a Peace, which Muſonianus had reported might eaſily be had from the Perſians, he was ſent away into the Eaſt, with the Title of Magiſter, and took along with him the eldeſt of thoſe called Domeſtick Protectors, to Command under him, and ſome of the younger ſort to Execute other Orders, amongſt whom was Ammianus the Hiſtorian himſelf; as from his very bad Latin we gheſs. But to fetch the Perſian Matters whence we left them. That King having received Letters from Tam Sapor, importing, that the Emperour being intangled with other Difficulties, deſired to be at Peace with him, as we formerly ſaid, and having now made a League with the Chionitæ and Alani, his Troubleſome and Warlike Neighbours on that ſide, he conſidered what to Anſwer. He concluded, that the Empire was in a Weak and Tottering Condition, and therefore Reſolv'd to make Uſe of his time, to Accept of a Peace, but upon very extraordinary Conditions. He ſent an Ambaſſadour to Conſtantius, one Narſeus, with Preſents, and a Letter ſtuffed, both after the Humour of the Man, and of thoſe Eaſtern Princes, from the Time of Arſaces (which ſtill the Turk and others imitate) with ſwelling Titles and lofty words: as, I Sapor, King of Kings, Partner of the Stars, Brother of the Sun “ and Moon, wiſh much Health to my Brother Conſtantius Cæſar; for by this word “ Cæſar, however at this time, whereof we write, the Romans by it denoted, in a proper and peculiar ſenſe, the Second Perſon of the Empire, yet Foreign Nations uſually ſo called the Emperour himſelf, and ſo do ſtill at this day, except thoſe, the Body of whoſe Language is Latin corrupt, or who have mixed and ſpoiled their own True and Antient Speech with it, as we have done. King nor Kæſar is an uſual ſaying, and the Germans call their Emperour by that Title. He tells him, he is glad that at length he begins to uſe Conſideration, and to Acknowledge Equity and Juſtice, being ſenſible what great Miſchiefs a greedy Coveting of what belongs to other Men, hath uſually procured. He Appeals to the Roman Records, whether his Anceſtors had not been Maſters of all, as far as the River Strymon, and the Borders of Macedonia: and, foraſmuch as He himſelf (without Arrogance ſure it was ſpoken) Excelled, by a large Series of Vertues, all Antient Kings, and had, from his Infancy, done nothing he found cauſe to Repent of, he could not but Require and Demand what had been Poſſeſſed by his Predeceſſors, and Affirm, that he ought to have Reſtored to him Armenia and Meſopotamia, of which his * Grand-father had been cheated. In concluſion, he Adviſes him, as a Friend, to Quit ſome part of his Empire, which always was bringing him Trouble and Sorrow, that he might with Quiet and Eaſe Retain the reſt: even as cunning Chirurgeons are wont to cut off ſome corrupt Member, which endangers the whole Body; and as brute Beaſts themſelves, of their own Accord, part with that for which their Lives are purſued. And in caſe he comply not with what he Demands, he profeſſes he will, with all the Power he can, haſte, by Force to obtain it, as ſoon as the Seaſon will permit.

The Perſian King ſends a Letter with lofty Titles to Conſtantius.

* Narſeus Saporis Avus à Maximiano Galerio ingenti prœlio victus, A.D. 297, Meſopotamiam, cum quinque Regionibus Tranſtigritanis, reddere Romanis coactus eſt, ut uxorem & Filias captas reciperet. Vide Valeſium in L.

56. Conſtantius thought fit to Anſwer this Braggadocio by Letters thus directed: I Conſtantius, always Auguſtus, a Conquerour both by Sea and Land, to King Sapor, “ my Brother, wiſh much health. Then he tells him, he Congratulates his Proſperity, as a Friend, if ſo he pleaſe; but that he much condemns his Extravagant Ambition. As to what he ſtrangely Mentions concerning Armenia and Meſopotamia, he bids him receive for Anſwer, that he perceived his Præfectus Prætorio had, out of good Intentions, as he thought, by Interpoſition of ſome inconſiderable Perſons, mentioned ſomething about a Peace, without his Knowledge or Approbation; yet was he not againſt it, provided it might be ſuch an one as would be Safe and Honourable; but neither the one or the other he was ſure it would be, after having Defeated all Uſurpers, and Recovered all the Roman World to his Obedience, to part with thoſe his Provinces in the Eaſt. He Adviſes him to forbear his Threats, or to think to ſcare him with words, who, more out of Moderation than want of Courage, had hitherto rather Defended himſelf, than otherwiſe, as he ſhould do for the time to come; foraſmuch as he well knew, both by Reading and Experience, that the Romans were ſeldom worſted in Battels; to be ſure, as to the Main, were never wont to be Loſers in War. Without any good Effect was the Perſian Ambaſſadour ſent back; and, after a few dayes, followed Conſtantius his Anſwer.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 357.

By Meſſengers of his own.

Proſper, a Comes, and Spectatus; a Tribune, and Notary, with one Euſtachius (at the Suggeſtion of Muſonianus) a Philoſopher, and eſteemed an able Artiſt in Perſuaſion, carrying with them this Letter and Preſents to Sapor, if poſſible, to preſerve the Eaſtern Countries in Quiet. While they were on their Journey, the Juthungi, a German People, broke the League and Peace, which, by much Intreaty they themſelves had procured; and waſting Rhætia, laid Siege to ſeveral Towns; but were ſo handled by Barbatio, lately promoted to be Magiſter Peditum, in Place of Sylvanus, that few of them eſcaped home; which hapned, as Ammianus will have us believe, not by any Care, or Valour of the General, who was a Coward in all things, except his Tongue, but through the Alacrity of the Souldier. At the ſame time moſt dreadful Earthquakes diſtreſſed Macedonia, Aſia and Pontus, which not only overthrew many Towns, but levell'd Mountains; and killed, and Maimed great Numbers of miſerable People.

Conſtantius Erects an Obeliſk at Rome.

57. Conſtantius now, who by various Laws, and otherwiſe, took Care of the State of the City of Rome; to increaſe it's Ornaments, cauſed an Obeliſk to be conveyed out of Ægypt, from Thebes, where had been plenty of them, and erected in the great Cirque. Wintring at Sirmium, he was perpetually vexed with freſh Alarms of the Sarmatæ and Quadi; who very much agreeing, both in their Cuſtoms and way of Fighting, infeſted both Pannonia's and Mæſia. Being accuſtomed rather to Robberies, than open War, they uſed Lances longer than thoſe of the ordinary Siſe; wore Corſlets made of poliſhed Horn, placed upon Linnen, as if it had been Feathers, and rode upon Geldings, as thoſe that would be quiet, though with Mares, and as tame in all other Reſpects, as one would deſire; withal ſo ſwift, and diſciplined, that they would fetch off ſometimes one, and ſometimes two, or more Priſoners, if they had careful Riders. At the Vernal Æquinoctial Conſtantius prepared to be in the Field; but, in the mean while, ſpent ſome time in Conſideration of Civil Affairs, as well as for things relating to his Arms. One Miſcarriage he took Notice of in the Province of Africk, which redounded to the Burthen of the Subject. The Reader cannot but remember, how we have formerly told him, that there were Proviſions for the Army, called Species Annonariæ, wont to be gathered and laid up by the Præfectus Prætorio, or his Vicar, in the publick Storehouſes. Now as by theſe great Officers, the Proviſions were raiſed from the People, ſo without their Knowledge and Authority, they could not legally be taken thence; otherwiſe, the Publick Stores might be imbezelled, the Souldiers want when there might be urgent Occaſion, and the People oppreſſed by new Exactions. But the Comes Rei Militaris throughout Africk, either not knowing his Duty, or preſuming too much upon Impunity, had on his own Head, and without Conſent of the Vicar of that Province, made Uſe of the Proviſions there depoſited. Of this, by an Edict, Dated this Winter from Sirmium, on the eighteenth of December, and directed to Taurus, Præfect of Italy, Conſtantius takes particular Notice, and forbids the Practice “ for the time to come; ordaining, That the Comes aforeſaid ſhould in ſuch Caſes “ write to the Vicar, what Quantity of Proviſions, and for whom it was wanting; “ which done, and the Vicar thereof approving; ſo much ſhould be taken out, and “ accordingly employed.

L. 3. de Erogatione Militaris Annonæ, Dat. 15 Kal. Jan. Sirmio; Conſtantio Aug. 9. & Juliano Cæſ. Coſs. A. D. 357. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

By Laws provides for the Authority of the greateſt Magiſtrates.

58. By another Law made at this ſame Place, and as ſeems, in this ſame Moneth, directed as the former, to the ſame Taurus, he determines ſomething conſiderable in behalf of his Juriſdiction, as Præfectus Prætorio of that Diſtrict. He tells him, That he ſhall hear and determine Appeals made out of Sardinia, Sicily, Campania, Calabria, Brutii and Picenum; as alſo Æmilia, Venetia, and the reſt. Neither can any “ Confuſion happen betwixt his Juriſdiction herein, and that of the Præfect of the “ City, to whom he had given order, not to meddle with, or take Cogniſance of “ the ſaid Appeals. As to the Interpretation of this Law, great Diſpute there hath “ been, whether now firſt of all, the Right of receiving Appeals was granted to the Præfectus Prætorio, which formerly had belonged to the Præfect of the City, or only by it that Authority and Right, which before he had enjoyed, be ſettled and eſtabliſhed in him. And rather we are to think, that this was given him de novo; which formerly did belong to the Præfect of the City, an antient Officer, and of great Authority in thoſe Parts. But we muſt not conclude, that all Authority in theſe Provinces was taken away from him by this Law, which plainly Hints the contrary, in that it ſaith, No Confuſion ſhould happen, nor Interfering, betwixt “ their Juriſdictions. For other Acts of Authority he might there exerciſe; although the Præfectus Prætorio received Appeals. However this Law did not, as to all thoſe Provinces, continue long in force; for that, from ſome of them, namely, Campania, it's evident, that the Præfect of the City receiv'd Appeals; to whom alſo Valenti-

L. 27. de Appellat. & Conſultation. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 30. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin. velut Hiſtorica & Localis.

Vide Gothofredi Comment.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 358.

nian ordain'd, when many of the Provinces of Africk were fallen into the Hands of Barbarians, and the Power of former Magiſtrates ceaſed there; that Appeals ſhould lye from all the Judges, of ſuch Parts as continued in Obedience to the Empire. Whereas, beſides the Provinces expreſsly mentioned, this Edict points at others by that Word, the Reſt; by theſe are to be underſtood Lucania, Apuleia, Flaminia and Tuſcia. Neither are any of them to be thought to have been of the Number of the Suburbicarian Provinces, as ſome have thought, which were Included within an hundred Miles Compaſs from the City; and being the proper Diœceſe of the Præfect thereof, are conſtantly, in the Code, both diſtinguiſhed from theſe, and from Italy, taken in a peculiar Senſe. But hence it's rationally conjectured, that the original of theſe Urbicarian, or Suburbicarian Regions, is to be fetched, as oppoſed to the Regions, or Provinces of Italy; whereof the firſt expreſs Mention ſeems to have been made two years after; of which in it's Place.

59. Some few dayes paſſed, we find him Employed in making another Edict, which rather more than any other gains Credit to what Ammianus Marcellinus writes, of his great Propenſeneſs to the Confiſcation of Eſtates, and Puniſhing of Offenders; but eſpecially of the Inſatiable Avarice of his Begging Courtiers, which ſeldome is wanting in any Prince his Palace: but theſe Leeches more abounded in his time than any other, and expoſed him to more Odium by thoſe Courſes they put him upon, than the double of what was got thereby amounted to. Two years before, being very moderately inclined, by an Edict directed to the People from Milan, he rather relaxated the Severity of former Laws, againſt the Children, or Poſterity of ſuch Criminals as were put to Death. For as to the Eſtates of ſuch Perſons, to whom they ſhould fall, the Law was very various in this Point, according to the Diſcretion and Pleaſure of Princes. Before the time of Conſtantine, the Eſtates of their Wives and emancipated Children were not at all Diſtinguiſhed from thoſe of ſuch proſcribed, or criminal Perſons, but all were without any Diſtinction Confiſcated; neither was there any Reſpect had to the Iſſue, but all forfeited by Force of the Cornelian Law. This that Good Emperour by a New Law did correct, as moſt cruel and unequal; but yet ſuch Proviſion was not made for the Children in general, as Conſtantius his Son thought afterwards fit to make. Therefore did he ordain, That the Eſtates of Condemned Perſons ſhould fall to their Parents, or Children, as far as the third Degree; ſo as the Treaſury ſhould not at all intermeddle; but it ſhould be free for any Perſon, with that Limitation, to enter upon them, to whom by the Civil or Prætorian Law they became due of Courſe, except in the Caſes of High Treaſon and Magick; concerning which he leaves the Law in force, as it ſtood before. By Sentence whereof the Eſtates of ſuch as committed theſe Offences were all confiſcated, and at all times, except afterward, when a ſixth part was allowed to their Children, by a Conſtitution of Theodoſius the Great. As now by the common Conſent of Princes, ſo by the eſpecial Humour and Inclination of Conſtantius, that of Magick is joyned to the other Crime of Treaſon. For, of this he was continually in Fear, and hated it ſo much, that not only by ſeveral Laws he teſtified his Hatred; but as we have already in the Hiſtory of that year obſerved from Ammianus; if upon the Squeeking of a Rat, the ſight of a Weeſel, or other Fooleries, any one conſulted the Wizards of thoſe Times; he was apprehended and Sentenced, as a dangerous Perſon; which Jealouſie of his was fomented by ſuch about him, as gaped after the Eſtates of Condemned Perſons.

L. 1. de Bonis Proſcriptorum, Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 42.

L. 2. ejuſdem. Tit.

60. And they Gaped not in vain, for he was apt enough to ſtop their Mouths. But whereas ſuch as had begg'd thoſe Eſtates were wont to Conceal, as much as they could, the true Value of them; by another Law made the following year, he preſcribed Rules for Prevention of ſuch Craft; and that he might underſtand what he gave for the time to come, He would have an Inventory made thereof, and ſent to him: for, the ordinary Judge, who paſſed the Sentence of Forfeiture, was thereof to Certifie the Officials of the Procurator of the Patrimony; that they, in the Name of the Emperour, and for the Publick Uſe, might make a Record of all ſuch Goods or Lands. He would not truſt therewith the Officers of the Ordinary Judge, but thoſe of the Procurator of the Patrimony; which courſe Valentinian afterward Altered; Reſolving to Truſt neither the one nor the other ſort; but Ordained, That firſt thoſe of the Ordinary Judge ſhould make an Inventory, and then this Inventory ſhould be Tranſmitted to the Officiales of the Rationalis Rei Privatæ; to whom a Second Inquiſition was then enjoyned, that ſo all fraud in making Inventories might be prevented, which ordinarily happened in favour of the Parties, whom moſt People are wont to pity. But by both theſe Courſes Com-

A.D. 358. Datiano & Cereale Coſs.

L. 3. ejuſd. Tit. Abeſt & hæc à Cod. Juſtin. Datur Celeſtino Conſulari Bæticæ. Meminit Procuratoris Patrimonii per Hiſpaniam Bæticam, cujus hoc Nomine, nulla alibi mentio oscurrit; etſi in Notitia Imp. poſteà memoretur, ejus loco, Rationalis Rei Privatæ per Hiſpanias.

Command is given, that a Copy be ſent up to the Emperour. By this Second Law he took order, that he might know what he gave away; but by a Third, which gave occaſion to this Diſcourſe, he made way for a greater opportunity of giving, though we ſcarcely call it Charity, which to be ſure muſt proceed from well-gotten Goods. For now, this year, whereof we write, wherein Datianus and Cerealis were Conſuls, being the CCCLVIII of our Lord, and the two and twentieth of his Reign, by another Edict Directed to Taurus, of whom we have made often mention, he Repeals that Moderate and Favourable Law, made two years before, “ Commanding the Eſtates of all Perſons Condemned, to be Confiſcated, without “ any Account given why; but that the former Law he had made under a certain Condition, we know not what, except he mean, if his Pleaſure ſtood to have it continue in Force, to which Condition, all other Conſtitutions are obnoxious; For, thoſe that Make, may both Explain and Abrogate. But his Timorous Humour Betrayed him to the Crafty Inſinuations and Flatteries of his Favourites; yet ſcarcely to any further degree of Severity than what was Legal before the dayes of his Father, and Emperours became Chriſtian, as we have ſeen.

He makes a ſevere Edict about the Eſtates of Criminals.

L. 4. ejuſd. Tit. Abrogata eſt hæc Lex, etiam poſtea, à Valentiniano. Vide Comment.

He overthrows the Sarmatæ and Quadi.

61. But the Vernal Æquinoctial being paſt, provoked by the Inſolence of the Sarmatæ and Quadi, he ſet forward from Sirmium with a very good Army, and by a Bridge of Boats paſſed the River Iſter, at this time much ſwolne by reaſon of a Thaw. The Barbarians expected nothing leſs, than that he ſhould be ſo early with them; and being utterly unprepared to receive him, or make any Reſiſtance, by ſhifting for themſelves, as they could, they endeavour'd to ſhun thoſe Miſchiefs that impended; although ſuch as eſcaped, as ordinarily it happens, might have prevented the Deſtruction of their Friends and Relations, and ſaved their Country from being overrun, if they had made Oppoſition, and fought with as much Reſolution and Earneſtneſs, as they ran away. But thus was that part of Sarmatia waſted, which lay neareſt to Pannonia Secunda, and that Country called Valeria, fared no better. But the Inhabitants being moved with Shame and Indignation, to ſee ſo great Havock made of their Country; at laſt laid their Heads together, and the Reſult of their Debates was, that they would ſet upon the Romans in no leſs than three ſeveral Bodies, under Pretence of coming to beg Peace, hoping under that Diſguiſe abſolutely to ſurprize them. And for the better effecting of this Device, the Quadi aſſiſted their Friends the Sarmatæ, but with ſo ill Succeſs, that all were put to Flight, and miſerably ſlaughter'd, if their Heels did not befriend them. After this, it was thought by the Emperour and his Council, as Juſt, as Prudent, to invade the Territories of the Quadi themſelves, and that with the Army reinforced; but they being taught from Experience abroad what they were to expect at Home, made timely Applications to Conſtantius, and beg'd Peace. Matters being agree'd on, and a Day appointed for Performance of the Conditions; Zizais, one of Royal Blood amongſt the Sarmatæ, a young man of no ſmall Bulk, perſwaded his Countrymen to enter into the ſame Courſe; and coming to the Emperour, upon ſight of him, caſt away his Arms, and fell proſtrate with his Face upon the Ground, where he lay Speechleſs out of Fear, and moved more Compaſſion, than if he had uſed many Entreaties. After many Sighs, coming by Degrees to himſelf, and being bidden to riſe, when he had got the Uſe of his Tongue, upon his Knees he beg'd Pardon for his Offences, and when raiſed up, gave the Sign to thoſe that followed him, who with Fearful Looks alſo caſt down their Arms, and with their Hands teſtified their Joyning with him; and by whatſoever other Signs they could, they further expreſſed their Deſires; ſo joyful were they at the Hope of Pardon, that to make ſome Satisfaction for their former Offence, they were content to deliver themſelves, their Wives, Children and Territories into the Emperour's Hands. But his Benignity, as Ammianus himſelf affirms, prevailed above Equity, and they were bid to be of good Chear, and ſtill to hold their Lands. So, being only Commanded to reſtore thoſe Priſoners they had taken, they returned back with them they purpoſed to have left as Hoſtages, promiſing for the time to come, moſt readily to ſubmit to his Commands.

Divers of the Petty Princes and Captains Submit themſelves, with their People.

62. This Act of Clemency towards Zizais, and other Subreguli (as our Writer terms them) had ſuch operation upon their Neighbours, that Arabarius and Uſafer ſpeedily came in; two of the moſt notable Commanders of theſe Nations, whereof the one Governed the Quadi beyond the Mountains; and the other part of the Sarmatians next adjoyning to them; ſuch Multitudes they brought along with them that the Emperour thought fit, not to admit them all together to his Preſence, leſt under Pretenſe of making a League they ſhould break Peace, fall to their Arms, and offer him Violence; but, parting them aſunder, commanded that ſuch as ſupplicated in behalf of the Quadi, ſhould firſt approach. They ſtood there with their bended Bodies, like to humble Supplicants, as their manner was; but were not able to make Excuſe for the Outrages they had committed; but apprehenſive of the worſt thing that could befal them; when unexpectedly they were only commanded to deliver up their Hoſtages, which they freely did, having never done ſo much before. After Arabarius and his Company, was Uſaſer and his Followers admitted to their Submiſſion, at which Arabarius cried out, that he ought to have the Benefit of thoſe Terms he had obtained, as his Aſſociate; though an inferiour, and one that was obnoxious to his Commands. But upon Debate of the Matter, it was thought fit to declare the Sarmatians exempt from Obedience to others, as ſuch as had been always the Clients of the Romans, and they alſo were ordered to deliver up their Hoſtages, which they moſt readily performed. After this flocked vaſt numbers of the Barbarous People, and their Kings; perceiving how well Arabarius was come off, they alſo obtain'd the Pardon they beg'd, and gave up their Hoſtages, being choſen by Lot, out of the Sons of their choiſeſt Nobility; and with them ſuch Priſoners as they had taken, whom they parted as ſorrowfully with, as their own Relations. But this hapned well for theſe Sarmatæ, and brought them into their antient State of Liberty. For, as we have formerly hinted, they had been outed of their Country by their own Slaves, for whom riſen up in Rebellion, finding themſelves too weak, they fled, and betook themſelves to the Victobuli, living at ſome Diſtance, and chuſing rather to ſubmit to them, as their Protectors, than become Vaſſals to their own Servants. Now, being received into Favour by the Emperour, they deſired their Liberties might be ſecured, whom pitying, he gave them gentle Words, and ordered they ſhould be Subject to the Commands of none but himſelf, and his Captains. And to gain him more Reputation, he promoted Zizais to be their King, a man, both worthy in himſelf, and faithful to the Empire; which done, he diſmiſſed them all, but not till ſuch time as all the Priſoners were returned.

Conſtantius receives into Protection the Sarmatæ, that had been Expelled by their own Slaves.

The Remainder of the Quadi ſubmit.

63. From theſe Quarters the Army removed to Bregetio, there to finiſh the Controverſie with the Remainders of the Quadi, that lived in thoſe Parts; the Princes and Magiſtrates of whom, ſeeing ſo great a Force in the Bowels of their own Territories, followed the Example of the reſt, and begging Peace, delivered up their Hoſtages; then drawing out their Swords, which they worſhipped for Deities, thereon they ſwore, that they would continue in Fidelity. There remained yet the Sarmatæ Limigantes, or thoſe that had been Slaves to the other, who having committed ſuch Outrageous Villanies, Juſtice, and the publick Utility required that they ſhould be puniſhed. For, imagining their former Condition, and what they had acted to be quite forgotten; now when they had Children alſo grown up, to make good what they had unjuſtly got, they as well as others had entred the Roman Pale, in this thing only agreeing with their former Lords, and now Enemies; yet it was reſolved they ſhould be more gently dealt with, than they had deſerv'd, only be removed farther off, that they might not have ſo good Occaſion to Infeſt the Empire, which it was feared they would ſtill do, as doubting of Pardon for what they had formerly committed. They were not ſo inconſiderable but to expect the whole Brunt of the War would be turned upon them, and therefore reſolved they would Treat and Intreat both, but with their Weapons in their Hands. And at firſt they made Show, as if they had been ſtruck with Fear, at the Sight of the Army, and expected nothing but Deſtruction; they beg'd Pardon, promiſed a yearly Tribute, both of Money and Souldiers, to remain the Servants of the Empire; and ſeemed further to be willing to leave the Places they now held, and go further off; for they truſted to the Strength of the Country, out of which they had beaten their Maſters. This Country is watered with the River Parthiſcus, which after many Turnings and Windings, poures forth it ſelf into Iſter; but before it comes thither, by degrees it haſtens nearer and nearer: and both together they form the Land into a Strait, to the great Security of the Inhabitants. For, on one Hand Iſter ſecured them from the Roman Coaſts, and on the other, Parthiſcus defended them from the Incurſions of other Barbarians: The Ground thereto adjoyning being alſo ſo Fenny, and perpetually Wateriſh, what by Reaſon of the Nature of the Soil, and what by the overflowing of the Rivers, that together with an Iſland lying as a Rampart, almoſt in the Mouth of Parthiſcus, theſe Obſtacles barred all men of eaſie Acceſs.

64. But to proſecute the Story of our Limigantes. Upon the Emperour his Call, who it ſeems, gave too much Credit to their humble Deportment, they came over to the hither Bank of the River, not to receive Commands, but, at length, to ſhow, that they were not afraid to face his Army; and there they ſtood ſo Surly and Humourſom, as having come on purpoſe to refuſe what ſhould be enjoyn'd them. The Emperour perceiving their Temper, by degrees ſo diſpoſed of his men, as to encompaſs them, and then ſtanding on a Place on purpoſe to be ſeen and heard, waited on by ſome of his Principal Attendants, and his Guards, he gently admoniſhed them to be Quiet. But they fell into Diſorder, not well agreeing amongſt themſelves, and joyning Craft with their Fury, mixed their Deſires of Peace with a ſort of Stratagem; for preparing for an Onſet againſt the Emperour's Men, they caſt their Targets at a great Diſtance from them, as it were in Jeſt, that going to take them up, they might gain ſo much ground. The Day drawing to an End, the Army, with Banners diſplayed, fell upon them; and they uniting themſelves, with grinning Countenances, and menacing words made toward the Emperour, ſtanding ſtill in that Place we mentioned. This the Army not enduring to ſee, put it ſelf into the form of a Wedge, or, as the ordinary Souldiers in thoſe Days termed it, of an Hog's Snout, and then with great Violence removed them; and Conſtantius his Guard (or the Prætorian Cohorts) as they turned themſelves to Fight, ſo belaboured them on their Backs, that they ſlaughtered them like ſo many Beaſts; but they fell with inſuperable Conſtancy and Reſolution, ſhowing by the horrible Noiſe they made, that they did not ſo much Bemone their own Death, as they were tormented to ſee their Enemies rejoyce therein; and ſome of them lying with their Hams or Legs mangled, and ſo unable to Fly, others having loſt their Hands, and ſome not at all hurt by the Sword, but Bruiſed and Maimed by the Weight of thoſe that fell on them, and ran over them; yet endured their Pains, and concealed them in Silence; not one of them, in all the Torments they endured, asked Pardon, caſt away his Sword, or intreated to be diſpatched; but holding faſt their Arms, though in ſo much Miſery, they eſteemed it a leſſer Crime to be condemned by the Strength of an Enemy, than the Dictates of their own Conſcience; and were now and then heard to mutter, that what hapned to them was by Courſe of Fortune, and not for their own Deſert. Thus in the Space of half an hour paſſed a briſk Conflict, and that there had been a Fight, the Victory alone declared. But ſcarcely was it over, when the Relations of thoſe that were ſlain, of both Sexes, and all Ages, were drawn out of their Huts, and with another ſort of Countenance and Demeanour, beg'd that what was paſt might be forgotten. But the Souldier now Heated, and provoked to Fight, neither ſpared thoſe he found in this Poſture, nor ſuch as eſcaped from the Engagement; but ſetting fire to all before him, either burnt ſuch as fled for Shelter to their Houſes, or if they fled from ſuch weak Refuges, received them on the Points of their Swords, and Lances. Some that eſcaped ventured to take the River, but were either drown'd, for the moſt part, or killed by the Miſſile Weapons of the Purſuers, and now it was reſolved, that this ſort of People ſhould be rooted out.

The ſtrange Pertinacy of the Sarmatæ Limigantes, formerly their Slaves.

And the Deſtruction of thoſe called Amicenſes.

65. This being effected againſt thoſe they called Amicenſes, with all Expedition the Army was ſent againſt the other, which, from the Country they poſſeſſed, had the Name of Picenſes, and from the Miſery of their Neighbours, took warning to look to themſelves. It being difficult to find them out, or come at them by ſuch as knew not the Place, the Taifali were taken in as Aſſiſtants, and ſo were the Free Sarmatæ, their Maſters. That they might be ſure to catch them in one Place, or other, the Roman Souldiers choſe to range that part of the Country lying next to Mœſia, the Taifali, that which bordered upon themſelves; and the Free Sarmatæ what was moſt convenient for them, as lying over againſt their Seats. The Limigantes, or Slaves, ſeeing their Danger, conſulted whether they ſhould dye, or yield up themſelves, not wanting Arguments on either ſide; but the Opinion of the elder ſort prevailed, that they ſhould ſubmit. Having received then the Publick Faith for their Security, they came down from the Mountains, and flocked with all their Relations to the Roman Camp; and there they conſented to remove into other Places, where they might live in Peace and Security, and willingly they ſeemed to accept of theſe Terms, though, as the ſequel proved, they could not forſake their Natural Humour, with the Country; but fell again to their former Fierceneſs, and mad kind of Life. Matters ſo well ſucceeding, the Emperour provided well for the Security of Illyricum, and Reſtored an Injur'd Nation to their former Seats; which done, he ſet over them as King, Zizais, ſuch an one alſo, as they themſelves had made Choice of; hoping, that though they were Fickle enough, yet this would be a Means to oblige them to continue Quiet. The Victorious Army for theſe Atchievments, gave to their Emperour, the ſecond time, the Sirname of Sarmaticus, who by a gentle Speech as his manner was, much pleaſed them, and they return-

The other ſort, called Picenſes, ſubmit.

Conſtantius returns to Sirmium.

turned to their Tents with theſe words in their Mouths, that Conſtantius could not be overcome. Had Julian been the Man, we ſhould poſſibly have heard more of it from Ammianus. But, Matters thus ſettled, Conſtantius returned back to Sirmium in Triumph, for which he was afterward Jeered by his Couſin Julian.

L.L. 44, & 45. de Decurionibus Datæ Sirmio 11 Cal. Jun. & 10 Cal. Jul. Abſunt à Cod. Juſtin.

A.D. 359. Euſebio & Hypatio Coſs.

Ammianus Hiſt. lib. 18.

How Julian behaved himſelf in his Winter-Quarters.

66. And there we find him about the beginning of June, by ſeveral Edicts made at that City in this Month. Two of theſe have relation to Corporations; eſpecially thoſe of Africk, to the Vicar whereof, Martinianus, they are Directed. The one Deprives ſuch as had obtain'd in the Emperour's Court, the Honorary Dignity of " Perfectiſſimus, or Comes, and Orders them to be returned back to their Duties in " ſuch Places; and the ſecond ſo much denies any Privilege from ſuch Services to " Souldiers in the Armies, that the very Veterani, or thoſe who had obtained Letters " of Diſmiſſion, it alſo Remands back again. About the latter end of June, from Sirmium he went to Murſa, another Town of Pannonia, where he made another Law concerning the ſame Subject, but to be ſpoken of in another place; and thence returned to Sirmium in a ſhort time; where, by other Edicts, it appears, that he continued the remaining part of all this year. The next following, being the Twenty third of his Reign, and of our Lord the CCCLIX, into which fell the Conſulſhip of two Brothers, Euſebius and Hypatius; he remained at the ſame place, or thereabout, till near the Month of June, where we ſhall leave him for a while, and viſit Julian in Gall, and ſee how he there Employed himſelf in his Winter-Quarters. And there you may be ſure, that this Perſon, Famous for his continued Succeſſes, (for Ammianus and Zoſimus cannot ſpeak of him without ſuch Parentheſes and Flouriſhes) though at preſent he was freed from the Burthen of War, yet was no leſs Thoughtful for the Safety and Proſperity of the Provinces, diligently obſerving whether any one was Overcharged in the Publick Taxes; whether Oppreſſed by Great Men; whether any grew Rich by Publick Calamities; or any Judge was Corrupt or Partial. And yet, as to the laſt point, there was the leſs occaſion for him to ſhew his zeal, becauſe he himſelf Heard and Determined Cauſes with all Exactneſs poſſible, in reſpect to Juſtice; whereof, though many Teſtimonies were at hand, yet our Author thinks fit to Mention one Paſſage, by that to make an eſtimate of his other Acts in this very kind. Numerius, who a little before had Governed the Province of Narbon, was Accuſed of Rapine before him; and he was ſo Severe as to hear all that would object any thing; but he Anſwered, and ſo well Defended himſelf, that nothing would ſtick; at which, one Delphidius, a bitter Orator, who was Employed againſt him, thus Applied himſelf to Julian; Who can ever be Guilty, if it be ſufficient to deny? To whom he Replied prudently extempore, Who can be Innocent, if it be ſufficient to have Accuſed?

He marcheth.

67. This, and many other things of the like nature he did, but being now to take the Field, and knowing there were ſome of the Almans, who, having not yet felt the Smart of the War, would in all probability make him more Work, if they were not alſo Chaſtiſed, He conſidered how he might beſt come upon them on a ſudden. He Diſpatched one Hariobaudes, a Vacant Tribune, as they called him, a man of Approved Fidelity and Valour, upon a Meſſage, as was pretended, to Hortarius, a German King, with whom he had Peace; that under that Pretenſe, the Meſſenger might ſtep into the Countrey of thoſe he intended to Invade, which was near at hand; and being well skill'd in their Language, Diſcover their Intentions and Practices in order thereto. While he was about this Work, Julian, having Rendevouz'd his Army, marched firſt to ſuch places upon the Borders as had been Demoliſhed in the Wars, to take care for Rebuilding the Towns, and eſpecially Repairing the Publick Granaries, therein to lay up the Corn that he ſent for out of Britain; and this was vigorouſly proſecuted, and in good time well Effected; the Store-houſes being both Repaired and Repleniſhed, and theſe ſeven Towns Reinforced, viz. Caſtra Herculis, Quadriburgum, Triceſimæ, Niveſio, Bonna, Antennacum, and Bingio. For, the Barbarians themſelves, according to the Agreement of the preceding year, though more out of Fear than Love to the Commander, ſent Plenty of Materials; and the Auxiliary Souldiers, who were wont to ſcorn ſuch Employments, were yet ſo won upon, by the obliging carriage of Cæſar, that they willingly put their ſhoulders and hands to the Work, both bearing Burthens, and ſerving otherwiſe in the Building. Hariobaudes having fully informed himſelf, return'd, and gave an Account how Matters ſtood: whereupon Julian, further ſtrengthened ſince his Departure, by the coming of Florentius, the Præfectus Prætorio, who brought both a good Party of Men with him, and Proviſions enough for a long time; ſet forward, and came to Moguntiacum, or Mentz, where Florentius and Lupicinus, the Succeſſor of Severus, the one after the other, contended, that there there he ſhould paſs the River by the Bridge: but Cæſar by no means would be brought to it; alleaging, that the Territories of thoſe that were now their Friends, they ought not to enter; leſt the Souldiers, as their Manner is, ſhould commit any Diſorders, and thereby the Peace be broken. And all the Germans (or Almans) thereabout were ſo concerned at the Approach of the Army, that they came to King Suomarius, who had made his Peace before, and in a Menacing manner Commanded him to hinder the Romans from paſſing the River, for they were his Territories that lay next to the Bridge, on the German ſide.

68. He proteſted, that of himſelf he was not able to do it; whereupon they all gathered together, and in great Multitudes ſtood over againſt Mentz, with all their Power to hinder Cæſar's Paſſage, whoſe Council now appeared to be very ſeaſonable. As he marched from Mentz, they alſo obſerved his Motions near the Rhine, and where they perceived he incamped himſelf, there ſate down over againſt him; taking no Reſt, but ſtill obſerving him, leſt he ſhould get over. But when he was come to the Place reſolved on, conſulting with Lupicinus, he gave order to certain Tribunes to make Choice of three hundred men with Stakes, without acquainting them what they ſhould do, or whether they ſhould go; but being put aboard the forty publick Veſſels, which lay in the Rhine, called Naves Luſoriæ; they were Commanded, without making the leaſt Noiſe, with Oars to get to the further Bank, and there Land, while the Germans ſtill watched the Fires that burnt at the Camp. In the mean time Hortarius, both Friend to the Romans, and to his Neighbours, without any Deſign, had invited all the Kings and petty Princes to a Feaſt, which according to the manner of the Nation (at this time pretty well inclined that way) they continued till the third Watch of the Night. The Romans being Landed, by chance fell upon them, as they departed; but could not Kill, or take any one, they making their Eſcape by the Darkneſs of the Night and the Swiftneſs of their Horſes, but ſlew ſome of their Servants that followed on Foot, whom the want of Light did not Conceal. But upon the Noiſe now that the Romans were Landed; they that ſo unanimouſly reſolved to hinder the making of a Bridge, as well Kings as People, all ran away, and endeavoured to remove their Goods and Relations further into the Country, giving the Roman Army free Paſſage. Through the Territories of Hortarius they paſſed without giving the leaſt Offence: but coming once to touch thoſe of the Kings, that ſtill continued Enemies, they burnt, and kill'd all before them paſſing without Oppoſition through the Countryes. After much Miſchief done in both kinds, they came to a Place called Capellatium, or Palas, at the Confines of the Almans and Burgundians, and there incamped, to receive Macrianus and Hariobaudus, two Kings, and Brothers; who perceiving Deſtruction to draw very near them and theirs; in great Anxiety came to be reconciled, whom followed Vadomarius, another King, formerly received as a Friend and Client of the Roman Empire. The Matter was debated in a Council of War, and Macrianus, with Hariobaudus, his Brother, was admitted to make his Peace: but whereas Vadomarius came to intercede for Vrius, Vrſicinus and Verſalpus, three of his Neighbour Princes, it was not thought fit at preſent, to ſhew them the ſame Favour; leſt, being according to the Humour of the Barbarous Nations, Fickle; after the Romans were departed, they ſhould make little Account of what was obtained by the Interceſſion of another. Yet when after their Corn, and Houſes were burnt, and many of their People ſlain; they again ſent, and owned themſelves to be in Fault. Peace was Granted upon Terms; whereof the moſt Important, and preſſing was, that they ſhould reſtore alſo thoſe Captives, which they had taken in their frequent Incurſions.

By a Stratagem Invades Germany.

Which conſtrains ſeveral Princes to ſubmit.

69. While the heavenly Providence thus corrected what was amiſs in Gall, as our Writer obſerves, new Diſturbances hapned in the Emperour's Court; which from ſmall Beginnings ſo far proceeded, as to end in Sadneſs and Lamentation. There hapned at the Houſe of Barbatio, then Magiſter Peditum, a Swarm of Bees; at which Prodigie, you muſt know, much concern'd, he ſollicitouſly conſulted ſuch as were skilful in ſo great Myſteries, and had for Anſwer, that it portended ſome great Danger, becauſe that ſort of Creature is driven from it's Habitation, and Wealth it hath heaped together, by Smoak, and the Tinkling of Metals. He went his way to the Field in great Anxiety and Fear; but left behind him his Wife, Aſſyria by Name, a Tattling and Imprudent Woman; who taking the Matter in good Senſe for her Huſband, but a bad one for her ſelf, wrote to him a Letter by the hand of her Maid, in a weeping Style; beſeeching him, that after the Death of Conſtantius now approaching, when he ſhould be advanced to his Place, (as ſhe hoped) he would not deſpiſe her, and marry Euſebia, the Empreſs, for her extraordinary Beauty, wherein ſhe excel-excelled moſt other Women. The Letter was as Secretly conveyed to him, as could be, but the Maid that wrote it, cunningly kept a Copy; and when all were returned to their Winter-Quarters, ran away with it by Night to Arbetio, to whom it was not a little Welcome. He, who was ever greedy of ſuch kind of Work, brought it to the Emperour; and thereupon the Parties were examined, who both confeſſed; he, that he received it, and ſhe, that ſhe wrote it; for which Crimes they were both Beheaded. But the Inquiſition did not here reſt: many, as well Innocent, as Guilty Perſons, being brought into Trouble: amongſt whom was one Valentine, that had been a Primicerius of the Præfects, now a Tribune; who being much tortured would not, becauſe truly he could not, confeſs any thing; for he was an abſolute Stranger to the thing, as to which Conſtantius, at length ſatisfied, made him amends, by preferring him to the Dignity of a Dux in Illyricum. As for Barbatio, there was ſcarcely any one that pittied him, being a man of a Surly and Arrogant Behaviour, and upon that Account hated by many. Having the Overſight of the Domeſtick Protectors under Gallus Cæſar, he was to him Falſe and Perfidious; and after his Death, when preferred to ſo eminent Place in the Army, he feigned the like Crimes againſt Julian; and to the Regret of all Good men, frequently ſuggeſted to the Emperour, whoſe Ears were open to all ſuch Matters, cruel things, not knowing that wiſe Saying of Ariſtotle to his Diſciple, and Kinſman Calliſthenes, when he ſent him to Alexander, that he ſhould converſe as ſeldome as he could; and when he did it acceptably, with him, who carried the Power of Life and Death on the Tip of his Tongue. To this Story of Calliſthenes thus applied, Ammianus adds another Obſervation; that not only men, the minds of whom may be believed, to be akin to Heavenly Bodies; but even other Animals, though they want Reaſon, yet are taught by Nature to keep Silence, when their Safety is thereby preſerved; as it appears, ſaith he, by one well known Example. The Geeſe leaving the Eaſtern Parts, becauſe of the Heat, and flying to the Northern; when they come to the Mountain Taurus, which abounds with Eagles, being in fear of thoſe valiant Birds, they ſtop their Beaks with Stones, on Purpoſe, that the greateſt Neceſſity may not draw from them any Noiſe, which might Diſcover them; but when they are over, and paſt the Mountain, they immediately let them fall again, and ſo ſecurely proſecute their Journey.

Barbatio, and his Wiſe put to Death through her Folly.

L. L. 1, 2. de Extraordinariis. Cod. Th. ubi ſuprà.

L. 9. de Extraordinariis &c. Abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſtin.

Conſtantius makes a Law about the Exemption of his Lands from extraordinary Services.

70. But, beſides theſe Matters of Jealouſie and Puniſhment, we find Conſtantius employed at this time about other Affairs. And firſt, we muſt take Notice of an Edict made now by him, than which ſcarcely any one Law hath given greater Occaſion to learned men of late time, to exerciſe their Critical Wits. Conſtantine the Great, had formerly thought fit to exempt his Patrimonial Lands, and thoſe called Fundi Emphyteutici, which lay in Italy, from extraordinary Services, as well as thoſe that lay in Africk, and that they ſhould be only Subject to the ordinary Payments of Tributes, or of the Species Annonariæ, and Cellarienſes, formerly mentioned. Now by another Edict directed to Taurus, the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, and propoſed at Rome, on the ſeventh before the Calends of March: Conſtantius his Son ordains, That this Privilege, after the Examples of Africk, and Italy, be alſo extended to “ thoſe kinds of Lands lying in the Urbicarian Regions, and in Sicily. “ What the Prince his Patrimonial Lands were, the Reader may underſtand, by what we have formerly ſaid of his Patrimony, and the Officers belonging to it, as the Rationales, and Procurators. As for the Emphyteutici, or Emphyteuticarii, they were thoſe of them, that were granted out to private Perſons by way of an Emphyteuſis; that is, for ſuch to hold them for ever, provided they paid ſo much as was requir'd (Canon they termed it) for an Acknowledgement; and they were uſually Barren Lands, which theſe Perſons were to Cultivate and Manure. But this Matter the preſent Nature of our Work allows us not to inquire further into; but to take Notice of ſeral other things very notable in this Law, and proper for our Hiſtory. As firſt, at this time there were theſe four remarkable Provinces in the Diœceſe of the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, diſtinct, and ſeveral, viz. Africk, Italy, the Urbicarian Provinces and Sicily; agreeable to what Zoſimus writes, though not with ſuch Diſtinction, concerning the firſt Inſtitution of this Præfecture in the Time of Conſtantine; although neither doth that Prince appear to have been Author of the four Præfects. In the ſecond Place, and eſpecially, are to be taken Notice of, the Urbicarian Regions, Separate and Diſtinct, as from Africk, ſo from Italy, and from Sicily. Now the Urbicarian Regions were thoſe Countries lying within an hundred Miles of Rome; and Italy, (when no more is added) ſignifies in the Conſtitutions of Princes, all the remaining Parts of Italy lying beyond them. And it is as important (almoſt) to take Notice, that in this Law is the firſt and moſt antient Mention made of theſe Vide Gothofredum in Legem.

The urbicarian Regions, which.

Urbicarian Regions, which occurrs no where before in the time of Conſtantine; whereof this may well be taken for a Reaſon, that about this time Conſtantius brought up this Diviſion and Diſtinction, for ſettling the ſeveral Juriſdictions of the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, and the Præfect of the City in the Point of Appeal, as was noted a while ago; whereas formerly the Præfect of the City received Appeals, or challenged them out of all the Regions of Italy. But now Conſtantius confined him within his peculiar Diœceſe, and brought up this new Appellation of the Urbicarian Regions, as being the Diœceſe of the City it ſelf, whoſe Præfect ſhould only within it, by his Order, have this kind of Juriſdiction. And indeed at this time, as Gothofred further obſerves, peculiar Governours ſeem to have been given to the Urbicarian Regions, or Provinces, as namely to Tuſcia, and Picenum; though afterward, they became again united with the Provinciæ Annonariæ, of which heretofore. This Law was propoſed to view at Rome, becauſe it belonged to it's Diœceſe. Further, Sicily, Sardinia and Corſica are mentioned by Zoſimus, as in equal Right under the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy. But here Sicily is ſeparated from them, as alone enjoying this Immunity, though all three had but one Rationalis. And neither is it reckoned here as United to the Urbicarian Regions, nor yet to Italy, which afterward it was.

71. On the fourteenth of March he made another Edict, directed to Helpidius, the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, relating, as we may eaſily gheſs, to the War now again drawing on againſt the Perſian (of which ſhortly;) and Commanding that “ the Souldiers ſhould carry with them Proviſion for twenty dayes March, out of the “ Publick Store-houſes. This Quantity of Victuals for juſt ſo many dayes, we lately obſerved Julian to have Ordered his Souldiers to take along with them in their Expedition againſt the Germans, and that from Ammianus Marcellinus, who calls it Buccellatum, which was Bisket, or a kind of Bread, but lighter than the ordinary ſort, and which would keep a longer time. The Souldiers were wont in Expeditions to take this Expeditionalis Annona, as the Law calls it, along with them, (yet the old cuſtom was but for ſeventeen dayes) and Ammianus ſaith, they carried it on their Backs. But, beſides this Edict, he Directed two others, concerning this ſame Subject, and to the ſame Perſon, Helpidius; and therefore we may well conclude, upon the ſame occaſion of the Perſian War, which we ſhall here add, though the one was made the year going before this whereof we write, and the other in that which followed it, becauſe it will not be unprofitable to the Reader to know the Uſages of the Romans in theſe particulars. The firſt was Dated not three Months before that of which we now ſpeak, and but four dayes before the beginning of the very year; and Commands, That when the Souldier is in Expe-“ dition, he have allowed him two dayes together the Expeditionalis Annona, and “ on the third day Bread and Wine. By Annona, the ſame with Buccellatum, or the Ammunition-Bisket, is meant, to which is to be added Vinegar; for, as the one is oppoſed to their common and ordinary Bread, ſo the other to Wine, which they had uſually in their Quarters, but not ſo in their Marches, becauſe of the convenience of Travel, as is moſt probable, the one ſort being much lighter than the other; but as for Vinegar, it ſeems added for Drink, being mingled with Water, and alſo perhaps to give a grateful Taſte to the Bisket, and make it go down; which kind of Fare, the Turks at this day, out of their great Humanity, afford to their poor Gally-Slaves, to whom, when they Row very long, they give every man in his Woodden Bowl, that ſtands by his Chain, ſome Vinegar, wherein to ſop his courſe Bisket, as a great and cheering Dainty. But in ſuch manner did Conſtantius order the Fare of the Souldiers by this Law, as gave him no great Encouragement for ſo long and tedious an Expedition; for inſtead of Encouraging, he cut him ſhort of the uſual Allowance, which ſtipend afterward he found reaſon to alter, and by another Edict to preſcribe another courſe of Allowance, thereby Repealing that ſcant and uneaſie Law. In this he tells Helpidius, That frequent Cuſtom ſhewed, “ how the Souldiers were wont in the times of Expeditions, to have allowed them, “ both the Bisket (or Buccellatum) and Bread, as alſo both Wine and Vinegar; “ and moreover, both Lard and Mutton, all in this Order: For two dayes together the Bisket, on the third day Bread; one day Wine, another day Vinegar; one day Lard, and Mutton for two dayes together. Theſe Laws were Enacted in reference to the Perſian Expedition: Now for the War it ſelf.

L. 5. de Erogatione Militaris Annonæ Cod. Th. Lib. 7. Tit. 4. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

Other Edicts in Reference to the Perſian War.

L. 4. ejuſd. Tit. Dat. Doridæ. 4. Kal. Jan. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

L. 6. ejuſd. Tit. Dat. 16. Kal. Jun. Hierapoli Conſtantio 10, & Juliano Cæſ. 3. Coſs. A. D. 360. Lex 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. Tit.

72. Proſper, Spectatus and Euſtachius being ſent Ambaſſadors, as formerly was ſaid, to the Perſian King, preſented the Emperour's Letters to him, now returned to Cteſiphon, and urged him, thereupon to make a Peace; though they kept themſelves ſo cloſe to their Inſtructions, and were ſo careful for the Honour of him that ſent them,

Sect. 4.

A. D. 359.

The Perſian King reſolute to have Armenia and Meſopotamia.

Euſebius, the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, Plots againſt Urſicinus.

Domitian his Law.

them, that they offered no unworthy or mean Terms; but required, that he would Engage in no Courſe that ſhould tend to the Diſturbance of Armenia, and Meſopotamia. But they found Sapor ſo obſtinate in that point, that except he might have thoſe Countreys ſurrendred to him, he would yield to nothing: and therefore having long ſtay'd, and preſſed the Matter, but in vain; they returned, and to ſee if they could ſpeed any better in their Errand, two others were ſent in their Room, which were Lucilianus, a Comes, and Procopius, a Notary, at this time; but who was afterward by Neceſſity driven upon ſuch High Undertakings, that we ſhall then hear too much of him. Neither were their Endeavours ſo effectual as to prevail upon that Reſolute King; who burning with a vehement Deſire of enlarging his Dominions, made all Preparations he could againſt the Spring; and, as if he deſired to fight againſt Conſtantius his Humour, as well as his Perſon and Territories, conſulted Wizards about the Succeſs, and what would after happen, than which nothing was wont more to diſcompoſe and vex the Emperour. What Diſturbance was wrought upon him by hearing of this Practice of Sapor, we know not; but his Jealouſie was ſupplied, and fed at that time by other Suggeſtions. For when the News of the Perſian Preparations was come to Court, and all were in Suſpenſe and Fear; the Fabrick, called the Comitenſis Fabrica (viz. they that were Chief in Comitatu, or about the Emperour) which always, both Night and Day, as our Hiſtorian breaks the Jeſt, hammered upon the Anvil what Eunuchs pleaſed, accuſed Urſicinus, the Magiſter Equitum, to him; as one, who after the Death of Sylvanus, when there was none left to take Care of the Eaſtern Provinces, deſigned no leſs than to ſet up for himſelf. This they did to gratifie Euſebius, the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, the only man with Conſtantius, and who plotted the Deſtruction of Urſicinus, both becauſe he alone was Independent of him, and needed not his Support, as the reſt did; and alſo becauſe he would not part with his Houſe at Antioch, which he moſt earneſtly Coveted. For theſe Reaſons he cauſed the Cubicularii (as thoſe that were under his Charge, and by their nearneſs to the Emperour, had full Opportunity to inflame his Jealouſie) to inſtill Suſpitions continually into his Ears againſt that valiant Man. Here Ammianus tells us, he cannot but commend Domitian himſelf, who, though by a Demeanour ſo unlike to thoſe of his Father and Brother, he blemiſhed his own Memory, and contracted an inexpiable Deteſtation of his Name; yet was Famous for one moſt received Law he made; Whereby he forbad, that any Boy ſhould be Gelded within the Bounds of the Juriſdiction of Rome; which if it had not hapned, ſaith he, how could the Swarmes of thoſe Creatures have been endured, the very ſmall number of which cannot be borne.

One Antoninus injured by the Great Officers.

Flies to the Perſian King.

73. But Euſebius, and his Complices were ſo cunning, that for Fear Urſicinus being again ſent for, out of Apprehenſion of Danger, might do really, what they but feigned he had a Deſign to do; they thought the Matter was to be kept Secret, till a convenient Opportunity could be preſented of puting him to Death, which while with ſome Impatience they expected, another Miſchief of no ſmall Conſequence befel the Empire. There was one Antoninus, formerly a Rich Merchant, afterwards an Apparitor Rationarius, but at preſent a Protector belonging to the Dux of Meſopotamia; a cunning Man, and very well verſed in Buſineſs, who by ſeveral of the great ones being oppreſſed, could obtain no Juſtice againſt them; the Judges being ſtill inclining to favour thoſe in Power, ſo that perceiving there could nothing be done, he confeſſed a Debt, which his knaviſh Creditor transferred to the Treaſury. But now deſigning in his head a profound Revenge, he began to ſearch out all the Intrigues of the Empire, and being ſkill'd as well in one as the other Language, he inquired into the whole State of the Army; of what Numbers the ſeveral Parties conſiſted; of what Strength they were; where they Quartered, and who Commanded them in times of Expedition: as alſo about Arms, and Proviſions, whence, where and how they were furniſhed. Having fully informed himſelf, when the Day of Payment of the Debt drew near, which the Comes Largitionum very rigorouſly exacted, he reſolved with all his Family to fly to the Perſians. And that ſo doing, he might eſcape the Stationary Souldiers, he bought a piece of Land, of no great Value, in a place called Hiaſpis, lying upon the River Tigris; which being known, he was not at all ſuſpected, or queſtion'd, for going to his own Eſtate. On the other ſide of the River lay thoſe Perſian Territories, which were governed by Tam Sapor, one of the Satrapa's formerly mention'd; with whom, being formerly known to him, he held now Intelligence by ſome skilful in Swimming, being ſuch as he could Truſt, who in the Dead time of the Night, ſent Boats, and fetch'd him over, with his Wife, and Children. Being conveyed to the King; as formerly Maherbal Blamed Hannibal, he often told him, that he knew how to get, but not how to uſe a Victory; inſtancing within the Memory of Forty years, in ſeveral Paſſages; as after the Battels of Hilcia and Singara, eſpecially in that bloody Battel fought by Night; ſo great a Slaughter having been made, he neither fell upon Edeſſa, nor ſeized on the Bridges of Euphrates, as the Conquerours in Prudence ought to have done; eſpecially the Romans, at that time, being embroyl'd in Civil Diſcords. Theſe, and many other things he Diſcourſed at Meals, while the Perſians, after the manner of the Greeks, conſulted of War and other Serious Matters; and thereby Inflamed the Perſian King with an Earneſt Reſolution to do his utmoſt the following year: and he made all ſutable Preparations, being Encouraged by the Skill and Promiſes of ſo underſtanding a Fugitive.

Urſicinus ſent for to Court, and an unfit Perſon ſent in his room.

74. In the mean time the Deſign againſt Urſicinus went on at Court, where the Emperour's Followers, by the eſpecial Aſſiſtance of Eunuchs, brought the Plot againſt him to ſome Perfection, &c. that ſort of Creature being over-greedy and Ravenous, and themſelves capable of no Children, moſt Fervently, (as Ammianus obſerves) embraced Riches as their Darling-Daughters. And it was Reſolved, that Sabinianus, a Decrepit, Old man, well-money'd, but Lazy and Feeble, hitherto thought too obſcure for ſuch a Dignity as that of Magiſter Militum, ſhould, in his room, be ſent to Govern the Eaſtern Parts; he being called to Court under pretenſe of Succeeding Barbatio, in the Command of the Foot; that ſo being greedy of Innovation (as they affirmed) he might be Expoſed to the Obſervations, and Arts of his greateſt Enemies. Sabinianus, Elevated by his New and Unexpected Dignity, went to his Charge; and being come to Cilicia, gave the Emperour's Letters to his Predeceſſor; the purport of which was, that he ſhould haſten to Court to receive a greater Preferment, at that Juncture of time, when, although he had been abſent, as far as Thule, there was great need of his Return, who had had ſo great Experience in the Conduct of Military Matters; and eſpecially in what concerned the Perſian War, which was now preſſed upon the Empire. The Rumour being ſpread abroad, that he was Recalled, the ſeveral Cities and Countreys concerned, by their Unanimous Deſires, and Cries, would needs ſtop him, beholding him no otherwiſe than as their Guardian: for they called to mind, how, though he entred upon his Charge with Forces of no value at all; yet had he preſerved his Diſtrict, and loſt nothing for Ten years together; and they very much ſuſpected their own Safety, being now to be Protected by a very Coward, and that in ſo Critical a Time as now was coming. But ſtrange it is, that the Report of this Deſigned Alteration ſhould ſo ſpeedily fly into Perſia, (our Writer tells us he doth not doubt but ſwift Fame flies through the aëry paths) where a great and ſerious Conſideration being held thereupon, by the Advice of Antoninus it was Reſolved, That ſeeing ſo unfit a Perſon was to Succeed Urſicinus, they ſhould take the fair Opportunity now offered, and paſſing by the Towns ſtanding upon the Borders, march with all convenient ſpeed into thoſe Countries under his Conduct, and ſeize upon them, the greateſt Atchievement of all others; they having never been touched ſince the Dayes of Gallienus, and by reaſon of the long Peace they had enjoyed, abounding with all things.

Hence the Perſian takes heart.

Urſicinus ordered to return into Meſopotamia, without a Guard.

75. In the mean time, Urſicinus and his Followers, (amongſt whom was Ammianus the Hiſtorian) having ſtaid a little on this ſide the Mountain Taurus, haſted, according to the Orders receiv'd, towards Italy, and were come as far as Hebrus, a River falling down from the Mountains of the Odryſæ. There he received other Letters from Conſtantius, requiring him without Delay to return into Meſopotamia without any Guard, for that the Power was put into another man's hands; which his Enemies contrived for this Reaſon; that in caſe the Perſian returned without any thing done, the Honour of the Defeat might be Aſcribed to the New Officer; but if he proſpered, the Miſcarriage on the Roman ſide might be imputed to Urſicinus, as a Betrayer of his Countrey. Being thus toſſed up and down, without any good reaſon, yet he obeyed after ſome Diſpute; and being returned, found his Succeſſor very ſcornful, a man of mean Stature, and as narrow a Soul; ſo far from being fit to manage a Battel, that without Fear and Trembling he could ſcarcely hear the Contentions, which occaſionally happened at the Table. One Meſſenger ſtill Confirming what another brought concerning the great Preparations of the Perſians; it was Reſolved to march to Niſibis, leſt the Enemy, however looking another way, ſhould make an unexpected Attacque upon it. Whilſt they were Fortifying the Place, the great Fire and Smoke ſeen from the Walls through the Countreys lying near to Caſtra Maurorum and Siſera, which grew greater and greater, as they nearer approached, gave warning evident enough, that the Perſians had paſſed

The Perſians paſs Tygris.

paſſed Tigris. Urſicinus then with ſome Forces went to Coaſt about the Country, and give ſuch Order as he ſaw convenient, for Prevention of ſo great Miſchiefs as impended: and it was thought fit, that the Inhabitants ſhould be compelled to quit the Country of Meſopotamia, and Retire, with all they could, into the ſtrong Holds; to leave Carræ, a City not tenable, the Walls were ſo much decayed; to ſet all the Corn and Graſs on Fire, and fortifie the hither Bank of Euphrates; ſo as the Enemy might find no eaſie Paſſage; and the Autumn being ſo far come on, that the Corn was now turned white, the Fire took and burnt up all; ſo that the Perſians could find no Forage, nor any Ford to paſs the River; till by Antoninus the Fugitive, they were led more unto the Right Hand, where there was Graſs and Corn enough, and the River near it's Head, was not ſo ſwoln with the melted Snow, which lower down in abundance fell upon it. The Roman Troops light amongſt thoſe of the Perſian, and Urſicinus had the Fortune to ſee Antoninus, whom, having eſpied, he Reviled as a Villain and a Traytor; but he not endeavouring to conceal himſelf, Leaping from his Horſe, took the Tiara from his Head, which had been given him as a Badg of the greateſt Honour, bowed himſelf near to the Ground, and giving him the Titles of Patron and Lord, holding his hands behind him, as the Cuſtom for Supplicants was in Aſſyria, prayed him to pardon him; for that he was engaged in a Courſe he knew to be naught, not by Choice but Neceſſity, through the Avarice of ſome Rapacious Perſons, againſt whom he himſelf could not but remember, that his high Place and Power was not able to protect him. Which ſaid, he withdrew himſelf, not turning his Back, but going backward, till out of Sight; as the Cuſtom was in thoſe times, and ſince hath been practiſed by the Eaſtern and Northern Nations.

Id erat Ornamentum ex Auro & Margaritis contextum, quo Perſarum Magnates, Regis permiſſu, Capita redimibant.

76. Sapor, the Perſian King, attended by Grumbates, King of the Chionitæ, beſides the King of the Albani, and followed by a vaſt Number of men, took two Roman Caſtles, called Reman and Buſan by Surrender, and to thoſe he found therein, ſhewed himſelf very merciful, to obliterate the prejudice which his former Cruelties had procured againſt him. Thence purſuing his Deſign, on the third Day, he came to Amida, where he did not think of making any Stay; but reſolved to purſue thoſe Councils that Antoninus had ſuggeſted. For he concluded, that thoſe within, at the firſt Sight of him would not dare to hold out; and he in Perſon rode to the Gates, on Purpoſe to be ſeen, having his Guard about him, and wearing on his Head an Ornament of Gold, reſembling the Head of a Ram, all gliſtering with Gems, for a Diadem. But with this Sight the Defendents were not ſo diſmayed, but that while he preſſed on, they had the Courage to let flie at him, and there he had periſhed in his Gaiety, if the Duſt had not intercepted their Sight; ſo that he eſcaped with Loſs of part of his Robe cut from him by a Javelin; though ſufficiently enraged: for he exclaimed againſt them, as equally Criminals, with thoſe that had Sacrilegiouſly robbed ſome Temple, in that they had offered Violence to the Majeſty of him that was Lord of ſo many Kings and Nations; and moſt earneſtly was bent to deſtroy the City, as contaminated by ſo great guilt, till by the gentle Inſinuations and Petitions of his Captains, he was mollified, who beſought him, that together with that Town, he would not Sacrifice the Hopes of ſo great an Enterprize, as he had undertaken, to his Anger. Next day therefore he reſolves to ſummon the Place, and for that Purpoſe Grumbates, King of the Chionitæ, goes with a Company that offered themſelves, towards the Walls, whom as a skillful Engineer ſaw approaching, he levelled, and let flie at him, and though he miſt his Perſon, yet he killed his Son; a Goodly, Proper Youth, that went cloſe by him. With this Accident ſuch as were preſent were ſo ſtruck, that they all ran away; but conceiving themſelves obliged to fetch off the Body, again returned, and by their great Cries and Lamentations, provoked thoſe other ſorts of People that were with them to do the like. Now followed a moſt deadly Conteſt, the Darts and other miſſile Weapons flying like Hail, and till Night it continued, by the Darkneſs whereof covered, at length they got off the Body, drawing it over Heaps of other Carcaſſes, and through Rivulets of Blood, and celebrated the Funeral, according to the Rites of his own Country, in this manner. He was placed armed, as he was wont to be, on an high and large Scaffold, and about him ten Beds, whereon lay ſo many Images, ſo well ordered, that they repreſented Bodies already buried; and for ſeven Dayes together, all the men that lay at their Quarter Feaſted, and Danced, and Chanted certain Songs, whereby they bewailed the deceaſed Prince, while the Women in the mean time, with miſerable Lamentations complained, that the Hope of their Nation was cut off in the Flower of his Age. This Solemnity finiſhed, the Body was burnt, and the Bones put into a Silver Urne, which the Father had intended Take two Roman Caſtles, and proceed to Amida.

Ammianus lib. 19.

Which, Sapor, conceiving himſelf affronted, reſolves to Deſtroy.

Grumbates, King of the Chionitæ diſſuading, goes to Summon the Town, and hath his Son kill'd.

His Funeral, after his own Country manner.

tended to be ſent to be buried in his own Country: but it was reſolved, upon a Conſultation, that by a Funeral Pile of this City it ſelf, a Parentation ſhould be further made to his Ghoſt; neither would Grumbates ſuffer the Death of his only Son to go unpuniſhed.

It's reſolv'd to Sacrifice the City to his Ghoſt.

The manner of the Siege.

A violent Attacque,

Renewed without Succeſs.

Urſicinus willing, but not able to Relieve it.

77. After a Repoſe of two Days, wherein yet a Party was ſent out to waſte that Fertile Country, round about, they began their Work; when early in the Morning from the Walls no Proſpect could be had, but that of Armed men, diſpoſed to ſeveral Quarters of the Town. The Perſians lay round about it. The Chionitæ had their Poſt toward the Eaſt, where the Prince was kill'd; the Vertæ lay toward the South, the Albani to the North; and to the Guard of the Weſtern Coaſts were Aſſigned the Segeſtani, of all others the moſt Warlike, and further ſtrengthned by a Company of Elephants, terrible to behold. Now did they within think of nothing, but how to dye with moſt Honour, the beſt thing they could hope or wiſh for. From Sun riſing to it's ſetting, the Army ſtood in that Poſture of facing the Town, not in the leaſt ſtirring, nor ſo much Noiſe, as that of the Neighing of an Horſe being heard; and their time once out, they retreated again to their Camps, where they refreſhed themſelves with Meat, and Sleep. But when it was almoſt Day, the Trumpets ſounded, and they again begirt the Place, which looked as if it would have been ſhouted down to the Ground by ſo great a Multitude; and when Grumbates caſt up his Lance, beſmeared with Blood, as the Manner of his Country was, they inſtantly attacqued the Walls; and a dreadful Fight enſued; the Beſiegers with all Alacrity giving the Onſet, and the Defendants with as much Reſolution receiving them, and defending themſelves with Engines, Arrows, and as otherwiſe they beſt could; ſo that on both ſides vaſt Slaughter was made, and all the Day it continued; neither could Night it ſelf force them to give over, ſo eager were they and obſtinate in the Proſecution of what they deſired, continuing in their Arms all the Night. The Hills echoed again with the Noiſe, while the Romans extolled the Virtues of their Emperour Conſtantius, as the Lord of the World; and the Perſians roared out, that Sapor was Saanſaan, and Pyroſes, whereof the one ſignifies King of Kings, and the other Conquerour in Wars. Before it was light the Alarme was again ſounded to renew the Storm, and Innumerable Companies flocked together; ſo that at Day-Break nothing could be ſeen throughout the Plains and Vallies, but the gliſtering Arms of theſe ſavage Nations. With a great Shout they gave the Onſet, and the whole day this ſecond Diſpute alſo continued; when the Numbers of Wounded on both ſides were ſo great; that the enſuing Night had now that Operation upon them, which the preceding could not effect; for the Beſiegers drew off, and they all applied themſelves, as well as they could, to cure their Wounds, of which there was a ſad Spectacle in the City. Urſicinus, though much diſdaining, that he was ſubjected to the Command of another Perſon, eſpecially ſuch an one as was Sabinianus; yet ſent to him, and adviſed him to bring his Velites into the Field, that they might take ſuch Advantages, as were preſented, and fall in upon the Enemies Trenches on a ſudden, or intercept him by Stratagems, as he removed from Place to Place. But he refuſed to do this; pretending publickly, that his Inſtructions were to act only in ſuch Wayes and Methods, wherein the Army could not be endangered; but indeed, he remembred what ſecretly had been agree'd on, betwixt himſelf, and thoſe that procured him the Command, to cut off all Occaſions whereby his Predeceſſor, who ever burned with Deſire of Glory, might do any thing that would procure him Honour; though the Provinces lay at the Stake. Therefore could he doe no more, than often to ſend abroad his Eſpials, to know the Condition of Amida; though they could not come near the Town; and other things he attempted, but, being without Power, to no Effect; and ſo fretted and tired himſelf, as a Lion, how Big and Grim ſoever, ſeeing his Whelps caught in a Net, Fomes and Rages; but dares not go in to their Relief, being deprived, both of his Claws and Teeth, as Ammianus frames the Compariſon.

A notable Attempt of the Perſians miſcarries.

78. But, to other great Difficulties wherewith the beſieged ſtrugled, this alſo was added; that by reaſon of the great Multitude of dead Carcaſſes lying in the Streets and Paſſages, greater than could preſently be buried; ſuch a Stench aroſe, as joyning with the Heat of the Seaſon, and the Infirmity under which the People laboured upon other Accounts, it bred a Peſtilence; but this again was aſſwaged, the Air being tempered by ſome Rain, which fell on the Night that followed the tenth Day of the Siege. Now with more Vigour than ever, to attacque the Place the Perſians raiſe many, and great Mounts and Turrets, on which they ſet their Engines to batter the Walls, and there being a Deſcent from a Tower down a ſteep Rock, by Staires; ſome ſeventy Archers of the King's Guard, and bolder than their

Fel-

Two Legions of Galls troubleſome in the City, and will needs make a Sally.

Fellows, upon Diſcovery thereof, made by a Fugitive, got up into the Tower, and thence ſhewing themſelves, put the Beſieged into great Fear; all the Army at the ſame time, as had been deſigned, giving a freſh Onſet; but five of the ſmalleſt Battering Rams being levelled againſt theſe Adventurers, did ſuch Execution upon them, that ſome were killed, and the reſt, wounded or ſcared, fell down the Precipice, and miſerably periſhed. This Succeſs much Animated the Beſieged, who now removing the Engines to their former places, with much more Alacrity and Eaſe defended the Walls: but they had hereby the more leiſure to ſee that which very much Afflicted them, viz. a great multitude of People miſerably led into Slavery, out of ſeveral Forts in the Countrey; into which, for ſecurity, they had flocked at this time of Danger; many of whom, of both Sexes, being ſpent with Travel, and not able to hold out, they cut their Hamſtrings, and left them behind in the Roads. There were in Amida two Legions of Galls, which formerly had belonged to Magnentius, very ſtout, and ſwift of Foot, and therefore fit for any Combat on plain ground, but for Defence of a Town very improper; nay, they did more Harm than Good: for giving no Aſſiſtance, either in the raiſing of Engines, or other Works upon the Walls, they hindred others; but they would make Sallies, without either Fear or Wit; and, though Fighting with all Confidence and Courage imaginable, often came ſhort home; and when the Gates were to be kept ſhut, and the Tribunes deſired them to Forbear, they would rage exceedingly: But now beholding the Droves of Miſerable People, they were more earneſt than ever, to be out, and threatned with Death the Officers and others, if they would not ſuffer them to Iſſue forth upon the Enemy; and they cut the Gates with their Swords, as eſteeming it the higheſt point of Indecency, for them to periſh in a Conquered City, without having ſomething Notably performed, and ſutable to the Magnanimity of their Nation. The Commanders knew not what courſe to take, and at length conſented, that if they ſtaid but a little, till the Beſiegers were further drawn off, they ſhould fall upon their Guards, and breaking through them, proceed further, as they ſaw convenient; for they knew they would do great Execution upon them.

79. In the mean time, the Walls were Defended all wayes poſſible, and the Perſians having raiſed two very high Batteries, to annoy the Town; the Beſieged raiſed other two higher than they over againſt them. Now came a Dark and Miſty Night, and the Galls would be kept in no longer, but out they went at a Poſtern, Armed with their Swords and Battle-Axes, and they Fortified themſelves by their Prayers. They endeavoured ſo much to ſurprize the Enemy, that they would ſcarcely breathe for fear of making a Noiſe, and, killing ſome of the Sentinels, came to the Fore-Guard, which eaſily cutting in pieces, as having not the leaſt Apprehenſion of any ſuch Matter, they purpoſed, and hoped to reach to the King's Quarter, e're they ſhould be much Diſcovered; but the Cries of the Wounded, and the Noiſe of ſuch as ſhifted away, gave the Alarm timely enough to his Guards, and the Souldiers were ſo ſoon on their Legs, and ran ſuch multitudes together, that the Daring Galls were preſently at a ſtand, finding themſelves fruſtrated of what they had Principally Deſigned, and without turning their Backs, retired by degrees out of the Lines, as utterly unable to ſuſtain the Violence of thoſe that came upon them. Now were the Gates cautiouſly opened to receive them, and in they were taken, with the loſs of four hundred of their Company, beſides ſome that were mortally Wounded, having narrowly miſſed of killing the Perſian King, though encompaſſed with an Army of an hundred thouſand men; for which, and other Bold, and ſometimes more Succeſsful Attempts, the Emperour cauſed the Statues of the chief Leaders of them to be Erected in a place of Concourſe, at Edeſſa. When the Light came and diſcovered what Miſchief had been done, much Lamentation there was heard of the Kings and Nobility, for the great Loſs they had ſuſtained of their Friends and Relations; for, many Satrapa's and other Great Perſons were kill'd, and a Truce was agreed on for three dayes; the Beſieged being glad to have ſo much time wherein to take ſome Breath. But the Enemy Enraged now more than ever, reſolved, either by the Deſtruction of the City to Appeaſe the Ghoſts of the Slain, or Periſh in that Glorious Attempt; and all ſorts of Engines and Devices they prepared, againſt the time the Truce ſhould be expired; reſolving to take that courſe, ſeeing that down-right Force could not prevail. By break of Day they came on, not as formerly, but in great Order, covered with their Machines; yet did the Arrows and Darts of the Beſieged great Execution, none of them falling in vain; and the Perſians were forced to ſeparate, though they ſorely annoyed the Romans by their Engines of Battery placed upon Turrets covered with Iron, which being much higher than thoſe of the Defendants, killed them many men. In this manner was all this Day ſpent; and the moſt of the next Night the Beſieged paſſed, in conſidering how they might beſt Obviate this Annoyance. After much Debate it was Reſolved againſt thoſe Turrets, whereon were Mounted thoſe Engines called Baliſtæ, to plant four of that kind, which had the name of Scorpions, and all Haſte was uſed to get them planted, e're the Light could diſcover them; which, though it could not fully be Effected, yet, when they came to play with round Stones caſt out of them, the Baliſtæ were Diſmounted, the Turrets broken down, and the Fall of them drove back the Elephants with Violence upon their Maſters; which Violence was driven into Fury by Fire caſt upon their Backs.

Fail of a great Deſign.

A Truce for three dayes.

Another Onſet.

80. Thus were the Batteries broken down, but the Fight, for all that, did not intermit. The Perſian King himſelf, though not obliged to be preſent in Battel, thruſting amongſt the thickeſt, like an ordinary Souldier, and Encouraging his Men; neither was he daunted by the ſhowers of Arrows that fell near him (being ſufficiently known by his Equipage to thoſe on the Wall) till many of his Guard falling about him, at length he retired, when Night came on. And the Night having given but ſmall Reſt to the Beſieged, the ſucceeding Day renewed their Sorrows, and Advanced them to the greateſt Extremity. For, whenas the Turrets were broken, and rendred Uſeleſs; the Perſians applied themſelves to Fight upon theſe Mounts they had raiſed near the Walls; to which, when they within oppoſed others, that ſo they might fight on even ground; one of theſe Mounts, as if it had been with an Earthquake, removed, and fell upon the Wall, bearing it down, and filling up the Ditch without, ſo that it lay in the poſture of a Bridge, or Cauſey, giving large Entrance to the Perſians. By this time was the greateſt part of the Gariſon Souldiers either kill'd or diſabled; yet without all fear of Death, Numbers flocked to make good the Breach, inſomuch that one hindred another; but the Alacrity and Vigour of the Perſian King, being more whetted by ſo notable an Advantage, he cauſed all his whole Force to Improve it; and now coming to dint of Sword, the Ditch was filled with dead Bodies, and thereby larger Acceſs made to the Town. No longer could any Reſiſtance be made, but the poor Defendants having done as gallantly as any in ſuch a condition could do, running here and there, were ſlaughtered like Sheep, without diſtinction of Sex or Age. Some of them getting together, made what Oppoſition they could, and reſolved to ſell their Lives as dear as poſſible: but Ammianus Marcellinus, who was in Town all this while, and wrote the Story, with two others, aſſiſted by the obſcurity of the Night, eſcaped through a Poſtern, which was not obſerved; and uſing as much Speed as ſuch a caſe required, got to a Place ten Miles diſtant, and thence overcoming many Difficulties, paſſed over the Countrey to Euphrates, which croſſing by a Ferry-Boat, they found out Urſicinus, who was now Travelling to Antioch. But, to return to Amida. Ælian, a Comes, and thoſe Tribunes by whoſe Valour and Conduct the Town ſo long held out, were Nailed to Croſſes. Jacobus and Ceſius, two of thoſe Officers belonging to the Magiſter Equitum, called Numerarii, were led away together with the reſt of the Multitude into Captivity, with their Hands bound behind them; and as for them that lived beyond Tigris, being carefully ſought out, they were put to the Sword, as well great as little. And now the City being Razed; for that Autumn was ſomething advanced, Sapor reſolved to return homeward, outwardly rejoycing, and making a ſhew of Triumph; but inwardly and ſecretly Fretting, for that he had loſt more men himſelf, than he had either taken alive, or killed in any of the late Engagements, as formerly it hapned at Niſibis and Singara; for, before this Town periſhed on his ſide Thirty thouſand; as was diſcovered by Diſcenes, a Tribune-Notary, who diſcerned them from thoſe of the other by this Token; that the Carkaſſes of the Romans ſpeedily putrified, ſo that after four dayes they could not be known by the Face; whereas thoſe of the Perſians, dried like ſo many pieces of Wood, without any Moiſture or Corruption appearing, by reaſon of their ſpare Diet, and the great Heat of the Countreys where they had lived.

Renewed the following day.

In which, the Wall being broken by the fall of a Mount, the City is taken.

Ammianus the Hiſtorian eſcapes.

The City Razed.

Sapor having loſt before it 30000 men.

81. Leaving now Sapor to proſecute his Retreat, we muſt return alſo into the Weſtern Parts, and inquire what becomes all this while of Conſtantius. As we left, ſo we find him at Sirmium, all the laſt Winter, till called again into the Field by the Motions of the Sarmatæ Limigantes, or Slaves, whom the Summer before he had cauſed to change their Dwellings, and remove into other Parts, at a greater diſtance: and Ammianus writes, that he was forced to march, e're Spring was full Ripe, or, as he words it, Adult: which, if we Conſult the Dates of ſome Laws made by him at this Time and Place, we muſt interpret at the later end of May. For on the five and twentieth of March we find an Edict by him Directed to Orfitus, the Præfect of Rome, which is more to be taken notice of, for the Mention it makes of the Urbicarian Regions, than out of reſpect to the Subject and occaſion of it; although thoſe Matters of ſuch Antiquity, and concerning that City, be not to be Neglected. There were, as we formerly hinted, Bodies or Companies of Lime-burners, called Calcarienſes, & Calcis Coctores, who prepared Lime for the

L. 1. de Calcis Coctoribus. Cod. Theod. lib. 14. *tit.*6. Abeſt hic Titulus à Cod. Juſtin. Vide Paratitlon.

Conſtantius takes Order about the Burners, and conveyers of Lime:

the uſe of Rome and Conſtantinople, and another ſort known by the Names of Vectuarii and Vectores, who Conveyed it thither. To the Maintenance of both theſe ſorts of Workmen, certain Lands belonged, as by Service, to find them Maintenance: and Conſtantius by this Edict Ordains; That (to clear all Diſputes, which “ in this caſe might happen) from all ſuch Lands ſhall be allowed to the Lime-makers, “ for every three Vehes, or Wain-Load of Lime, an Amphora of Wine, and “ to the Vecturarii the like Quantity, for the Conveyance of two thouſand and nine “ hundred Pounds weight of it. And he declares, that not the Perſons, or the “ Poſſeſſors, but the Grounds themſelves ſhall be lyable to this Payment, and moreover “ Wills, that three hundred Oxen be given, or allowed to the Vecturarii, out “ of the four Regions. An Amphora here is to be taken for a Meaſure, which contained eight and forty Sextarii, each of which held about as much as a Paris-Pint, or above our Wine-Quart. We ſee by this Law, that theſe Workmen were paid in kind, and not in Money, which was much in Faſhion before Gold and Silver came to be ſo common as now it is. But whereas it is ſaid, that ſo much Wine ſhould be afforded to them out of theſe Lands, it is not to be underſtood, that the Poſſeſſors thereof paid it immediately to thoſe Workmen; but there was a publick Office for Receit of this Wine, called Arca Vinaria, which was under the Charge of the Præfect of the City, and particularly under this Orfitus, who now held the Place, as Symmachus, one of his Succeſſors, and his Son in Law ſignifies, upon no pleaſing Occaſion. For, after Orfitus his Death, his Children were by the Treaſury troubled about the Accounts of this Receit, as Symmachus grievouſly Complains, though all had been Iſſued out that he had received; and what was behind was in Solvent hands. And as for his two Daughters, they had not medled at all with what he left; ſo poor he died. Under the ſame Præfect there was another Officer or Accountant called Rationalis Vinorum: but as for what Lampridius writes of a Body or Company of Vinarii, inſtituted by the Emperour Alexander Severus, and the Tribuneſhip of the Forum Vinarium, of which Symmachus alſo makes Mention, and cited by Juretus, I rather think them to have relation to the publick Sale of Wines, and not to theſe that were paid in kind; except the Præfect or under-Officers ſold theſe Wines, and gave the Price to the Workmen. This Law being directed to the Præfect of Rome, by the four Regions can nothing be underſtood, but the four Vrbicarian Regions, of which firſt mention is made in this Conſulſhip, of Euſebius and Hypatius, (upon what Occaſion we have already ſaid) and firſt obſerved by the Learned Gothofred.

Symmach. lib. 9. Epiſt. 121. & lib. 10. Ep. 42. 47. & vide Jureti Miſcel. in Ep.

And regulates Matters about Prætors.

82. At this time further Conteſts happened about the Office of Prætor, which being ſo Troubleſome, and eſpecially Chargeable, as we have often ſaid, all ſorts of Perſons endeavoured to ſhift it off, both from themſelves and their Friends. And upon this Account Diſputes aroſe about the manner of Elections; and ſuch as had been Pro-conſuls and Vicars, pretended, that they were above the Office. To Determine theſe and other Points, Conſtantius Directed his Reſolution to the Senate (divided now in the Code into two Laws) bearing Date from Sirmium, on the two and twentieth of May, whereby he declares his Pleaſure, That only ſuch have Voices in the Election of Prætors, as had been Prætors themſelves; ſuch being beſt “ Judges (from their own Experience of the Office) who were fit, and rich enough “ to manage it. In the next Place he will have the common Courſe in all ſuch matter “ to take Effect; viz. That the major part ſhould have the deciſive Power. “ Then in a pompous kind of ſtile, he uſes ſeveral Arguments to convince them, that “ the Employment was no whit below ſuch as had been, either Proconſuls or Vicars; “ telling them, that they could not but remember, nay, he believes, never could “ forget, how Facundus the Ex-Proconſul, and Arſenius the Ex-Vicar, had flouriſhed with the Enſignes of the Prætorſhip; neither of them having thought it too “ mean, or an Eclipſe to his former Dignity. By this it appears, that theſe two “ Perſons were very eminent for their Worth, at this time, though otherwiſe we hear nothing of them; he demanding what can be more Illuſtrious than their Examples? “ and ſaying that others ought by them to be admoniſhed, though indeed Proconſuls “ and Vicars were reckoned of great Dignity, as being the firſt in the Rank of Spectabilis: “ But in the laſt Place, he, who ever much favoured the Senate, gives it “ full and abſolute Power of Nomination and Election, according to theſe Rules, “ without any Recourſe had to himſelf, or the Præfectus Prætorio, as was wont to “ be practiſed in Matters of great Moment; and that ſo much toward the Præfect, “ that it was ſeaſonable to put ſome Reſtraint to his Power. And indeed the Cuſtom “ was, that the Præfect of the City (who as hath been often ſaid) was the Præſul of the Senate (the word Præſul was very proper, though applied to Lay-Perſons ſons in thoſe Times) had recourſe to the Emperour, about the choice of Prætors. We ſhall only, as to this Law, further add, that therein he gives but the Title of Clariſſimus to the Præfectus Prætorio. For, in Conſtantius his Time, that of Illuſtris was not received yet, in that diſtinct and proper Senſe, as we find it applied in the Notitia; though about this time Illuſtris and Clariſſimus, as by ſeveral Inſtances might be proved, were joyned together in the Title of one and the ſame Perſon.

L. L. 14, 15. de Prætoribus, &c. Cod. Th. lib. 6. Tit. 4.

Quid enim illuſtrius his reperitur Exemplis? Debuerat profecto res iſta, debuerat alios etiam commovere &c.

He removes from Sirmium to Singidunum, and ſo againſt the Sarmatæ;

*L.*28. de Appellationibus. Cod. Th.

83. From Sirmium, Conſtantius removed to Singidunum, a City of the Firſt Mœſia; for there we find him by the Subſcription and Date of another Edict, of the Eighteenth of June, with which we think not fit to trouble the Reader. For, he was perpetually Alarm'd at Sirmium, with freſh Reports, how the Limigantes, not Content with the Territories Aſſigned them, began to make Excurſions into thoſe next the Borders, and would create him more work if not prevented. Gathering therefore his Men together, he Reſolved to make as much ſpeed as he could, and the rather, becauſe he doubted not but the Army would think it, the ſooner they were in the Field, the better, they Fared ſo well the laſt Summer. And Anatolius, being Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, was before-hand with them in Proviſions, without any Diſadvantage to any Man. He Marched firſt into Valeria, (formerly counted part of Pannonia, but ſo diſtinguiſhed and named in Honour of Valeria, the Daughter of Diocleſian) and from the Banks of Iſter, obſerving the Motions of the Barbarians, ſent, and demanded of them the Reaſon why they kept not themſelves Quiet at home, but Roved up and down the Borders, contrary to what had been injoyned them. Not knowing what to ſay, Fear made them Lye, and after Frivolous Excuſes, they begg'd that he would give them leave to come over the River to him, and that he would pleaſe to Aſſign them ſome place to Inhabit within the Roman Pale; that they might betake themſelves to Reſt, and be able to pay him Tribute. At this he was exceeding Glad, as hoping he had gone through a Buſineſs of ſo much Difficulty without Blood or Sweat, and readily admitted them; being Flattered in his Expectation by his Attendants, who told him, how, by this means, all thoſe Quarters being in Repoſe, he would have a Supply of Freſh Souldiers conſtantly from that People; for the Provincials, they ſaid, would willingly Exchange Gold for Tirones; which ſort of Hope ſometimes Endamaged the Affairs of the Empire. A Line is drawn near a place called Acunincum, and a Mount raiſed inſtead of a Tribunal; near to which ſome Legionary Souldiers were placed in Boats upon the River, to come upon the Backs of the Limigantes, in caſe they ſhould prove Tumultuous. For a time, they ſtood with bended Bodies, in an Humble Poſture, but bearing another kind of Mind than they made ſhew of: for, when the Emperour from the Mount was about to ſpeak mildly to them, as thoſe that for the time to come would be Tractable and Obedient; one of them, in a Furious Mood, threw his ſhooe at him, and cried Marha, Marha, which with them was the Watch-word for Battel; and with that, they all made, with a great Noiſe, and in a Menacing manner, towards him. He ſeeing Darts fly, and Swords drawn, in great fear leaped down, and preſſing amongſt the Barbarians, and his own men now Thronging together, got on Horſeback, and made his Eſcape; ſome of thoſe about him, who laboured to keep off the Multitude, being trodden to Death in the Croud; and his Imperial Chair, with the Cloth of Gold Cuſhion, became fair Booty to thoſe that could firſt catch them, though it coſt them dear.

Whom he admits to his Speech, and thereby endangers his Perſon.

For which the Limigantes pay dear.

84. For, the Army hearing the Prince was in Danger, in great Indignation and Rage, though but half Arm'd, ruſhed into the Place, to revenge a thing ſo Ignominious both to the Empire and themſelves; and breaking with Violence into the Croud, they hewed and bore down all before them, without any Difference. There was no place now left for Intreaties; but thoſe that begg'd Pardon, as well as ſuch as were pertinaciouſly reſolv'd, periſhed alike; and when they were all either kill'd or diſperſed, (which were but few) ſome of the Romans were found Dead amongſt them, either trodden to death, or ſlain by the Enemy, at their firſt Onſet; as was Cella, Tribune of the Scutarii, who had caſt himſelf into the thickeſt of them. The Inſolence of theſe Limigantes thus puniſhed, and all things ſettled upon the Limits, as Convenience required, Conſtantius returned to Sirmium, where, getting all things in readineſs, as the time would permit, he ſet forward for Conſtantinople, Reſolving for the Eaſt, there to Heal the Wound lately received at Amida, and by a new Supply of larger Forces, to give a check to the Ambition of Sapor, who was reſolved to leave Meſopotamia at his back, and pierce further into the Upper Provinces. But while he prepared to wage War with an outward Enemy, he forgot not to raiſe Civil Storms, as it were, at Home (ſo Ammianus terms it) againſt ſuch, as the Inſinuations of Paul the Notary, that moſt covetous, and cruel Informer, and his own Jealouſie repreſented as Criminals in an higher degree of Enmity. There was a Fam'd Oracle at Abydus, a Town of Thebais, of an Idol called Beſas; to which, many flocking from the Eaſtern Parts, for Anſwers to their ſeveral Queſtions, it ſometimes happened, that both the Queſtion and Anſwer were left in Writing in the Idol's Temple. Some of theſe were maliciouſly ſent to him, which preſently Diſcompoſed him, and in this Fit of Jealouſie, Paul is ſent away into the Eaſt, with whom is joyned Modeſtus, the Comes there, a man fit for the purpoſe: whereas Hermogenes Ponticus, the Præfectus Prætorio, was far of another Temper, and no whit proper for ſuch an Employment. Paul ſo diligently plied his Buſineſs, that ſome were condemned to Baniſhment, and others to Death, he making his Markets out of their Eſtates, for which reaſon he ſo belaboured himſelf, that, if any Perſon had any Charms againſt a Quartan Ague, or any other Diſtemper, hung about his Neck, or by Night paſſed through the Monuments of the Dead, he was preſently Accuſed, and Condemned as a Necromancer and Enchanter, as if he had Conſulted Dodona's Grove, or the once fam'd Oracle at Delphos, againſt the Life of the Emperour. But, while Innocent Perſons were thus Tormented, as deſirous to know what the iſſue of things preſent would be, a Real portentous Prodigy happenned at Daphne, that Pleaſant and Renowned Suburb of Antioch, which Ammianus concludes, did ſignifie, that the Commonwealth was going to fall into an Ugly condition or ſtate, which, however, perceiving his Meaning to aim at a year or two hence, we are apt to believe was ſhortly to be fulfilled; A Monſter was there born with two Mouths, two Teeth, and a Beard, four Eyes, and two very ſhort Ears. We will not ſay, that this fore-ſhewed one to Succeed next in the Empire, that had two Mouthes, in a very ſhort time, being a Reader in a Church, firſt, a Profeſſor of our Religion, and then an earneſt Declamer againſt it, and a Perſecutor of it; one, that in a ſhort time look'd two ſeveral wayes, as if he had two Stories of Eyes, and began to purpoſe to ſhew another ſort of Teeth too, and, had he Lived, would have ſore bitten; withall wearing ſuch a Beard, that Ammianus himſelf, though no ſmall Friend, confeſſes it was Deformed, that it rendred him Ridiculous, and juſtly Expoſed him to the Jeers and Affronts, even of thoſe in Antioch, and about Daphne, where this Monſter was born (as we ſhall ſhortly ſee) and where this Perſon was as much Gazed at, as it, for that Deformity, and other ſtrange Sights he there procured to be ſeen, but had no Ears to receive any Advice, eſpecially as to Religion. We put no ſtreſs upon theſe things, but to Comply with our Hiſtorian, whoſe own Relation, for the moſt part, or altogether makes good our ſcarcely ſerious, Interpretation.

Conſtantius, out of Jealouſie, Cruel againſt ſeveral Perſons.

Præmonebat Rempublicam in ſtatum verti deformem.

The Iſauri make Depredations, and are Quieted by Lauritius.

85. About this time, the Iſauri, (a People of Aſia Minor, Bordering upon Cilicia, (of whom heretofore) having been long Quiet, began to return to their wonted, Reſtleſs courſes; and falling down from the Mountains, Rocks and Thickets (which ſo ſheltered them, that the Souldiers that lay thereabouts in Gariſon, or in the Prætenturæ, could do little Execution upon them) much Diſtreſſed the Neighbouring Provinces by their Thefts and Depredations. To Reſtrain them, either by Fair means, or by Force, was ſent one Lauritius, with the Dignity of Comes, a Prudent, and Civil Perſon, who, with ſuch Diſcretion managed his Matters, that he wrought upon them, rather by Threats, than any harſher Effects; and continuing there ſome time, reduced the ſtate of thoſe Parts into ſo much Quiet and Order, that nothing juſtly could be Blamed. But by this time Urſicinus, after the Deſtruction of Amida, was come to Court, whither he had been ſent for (as we ſaid) to Succeed Barbatio, as Magiſter Peditum Præſentalis; for ſo it was pretended. He was no ſooner Arrived, but his Adverſaries began to whiſper, and then to ſpeak out, of Heinous things done by him; to which Conſtantius, giving too much credit, committed the Hearing of the Matter to Arbetio, and Florentius, the Magiſter Officiorum, with Charge to inquire how Amida came to be deſtroyed. They could not for ſhame but reject ſuch Allegations, as carried ſufficient marks of Falſhood with them; neither, for fear of offending Euſebius, the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, durſt they lay the Load, as they ought to have done, upon the Baſe Cowardiſe of Sabinianus; but purſued trifling Matters, and foreign to the Buſineſs. Hereat he, who was moſt concerned, was ſo Enraged, that he openly ſaid, Though the Emperour was pleaſed to ſlight it, yet the Weight and Conſequence of the thing before them was ſuch, that it could not but be Heard and Puniſhed by the Prince himſelf, to whom he could eaſily foretell, that though he concerned himſelf ſo much about what had happened at Amida, after that manner which he truly related; ſo long as he was governed by Eunuchs, in the manner he was at preſent, though he himſelf went in Perſon with an Army the next Spring, yet

Ammianus lib. 20.

Urſicinus, through the Malicious practiſes of Euſebius, turned out of his Place.

yet ſhould he not be able to Protect Meſopotamia. This was told to Conſtantius, and many things more added, with a Malicious Interpretation; wherewith he was ſo extraordinarily incenſed, that, breaking off the Inquiſition, and not permitting ſuch things to be laid open, as had been kept from his knowledge, he put him out of his Place, and Commanded him to Retire, preferring to it one Agilo, by a great Leap from being Tribune of thoſe called Gentiles Scutarii. About the ſame time hapned a great Eclipſe of the Sun, ſeen in the Eaſt, where, from Morning till Noon, it was ſo dark that many Stars appeared.

Conſtantius ſends for part of the Army from Julian.

86. But while Conſtantius was preparing to go againſt the Perſians, he was, as we have it, from the two Pagan Writers, Ammianus and Zoſimus, much Troubled in his Mind, to hear the Fame of his Couſin Julian ſpread ſo far and wide, who had done ſuch wonderful things in Gall, and againſt the Almans. Grievouſly netled, you muſt know, and fearing his Renown would increaſe, at the Inſtigation of Florentius, the Præfect, he diſpatched away Decentius the Tribune and Notary, to bring from him the Auxiliary Heruli, and Batavi, the Petulantes, and Celtæ, with three hundred more to be picked out of the other Legions, and that with all Speed, that they might be ready by the Spring, to ſet forward with the Army againſt the Perſians. Julian, not perceiving the Deſign, or diſſembling it (as knowing it his Duty to obey) made no Oppoſition; yet could not forbear to ſay, that it was hard, that thoſe ſhould be ſent Eaſtward, who had left their Dwellings beyond the Rhine, on Condition that they ſhould not be removed further than the Alpes; for it was to be feared, that the Barbarians coming in hitherto chearfully to the Service, upon hearing of this, would, for the time to come, be very backward. But his Complaint was in vain, for the Tribune not at all regarding what he ſaid, but, following fully his Inſtructions, with a Choiſe Party he had pickt out here and there, reſolved to go his way. Cæſar was much troubled about the reſt that were to be ſent; on the one ſide, conſidering how much the Enemy might be thereupon encouraged in his Natural, and wonted Ferity; and on the other, that the Emperour's Orders muſt be obeyed, and the Abſence of the Magiſter Equitum making him to diſtruſt ſomething, he wrote to the Præfect to come to him, who was gone away to Vienna (now Vienne in Dauphiné) under Pretence of purſuing his Charge, as to Proviſions for the Army; but indeed, on Purpoſe to withdraw himſelf from it, having given Advice, that theſe Forces ſhould be removed from the Defence of Gall, which had done ſuch Service, and were ſo terrible to the Barbarians. Julian preſſed him to make haſte to Aſſiſt the State, which now wanted his Advice; urging, that the Præfect, in doubtful Junctures of time, ought not to be abſent from the General, and that if he would not aſſiſt him, he would deveſt himſelf of the Purple; concluding, it was more glorious for him to venture being put to Death, than that the Ruin of the Provinces ſhould be aſcribed to him. However, the Præfect obſtinately refuſed to come, and Lupicinus the Magiſter Equitum, being ſent away with ſome of the Forces, Julian knew not what Courſe to take; but at laſt reſolved, it was beſt to withdraw the Remainder out of their Quarters, and put them into the

A Libel hereupon ſpred abroad.

Road. This being once known abroad, a Libel was dropped near the Standard of the Petulantes, amongſt other Seditions Paſſages containing; that they were as Criminals, to be Baniſhed to the utmoſt Parts of the Earth; and now their Relations ſhould again become Slaves to the Almans, from whom they had delivered them by ſo many bloody Battels.

87. Word hereof being brought to Cæſar's Court; when he conſidered the ground of their Complaint, he ordered them to carry their Families with them into the Eaſt, (in what Senſe a Family is to be taken in ſuch Caſes, we have told the Reader already out of the Laws) permitting them the uſe of that ſort of the Curſus Publicus, called Clabularis, for that Purpoſe. And when it was doubted what way they ſhould go, at the Suggeſtion of Decentius, it was reſolved it ſhould be by Paris (which Zoſimus calls a little Town of Germany) where Julian ſtill lay, being not yet removed out of his Winter-Quarters. Upon their Approach he met them in the Suburbs, and according to his Cuſtom, fell on commending ſuch of them as he knew, and putting them in mind of thoſe gallant Things they had formerly done, gently admoniſhed them to go chearfully to the Emperour, where they ſhould each be preferr'd, according to what they had deſerved. Beſides this, he invited the Principal Officers to a Feaſt, and asked them what he could do for them, who being wonderfully taken with ſo great Kindneſs, were very melancholy to think of their Journey, as well becauſe thereby, through their hard Fortune they muſt be deprived of ſo ſweet a Commander, as baniſhed from the Places of their Nativity; and ſo in great Grief they went to their Lodgings. And now the Reader may eaſily gueſs Ἰουλιανοῦ δὲ ἐν τῷ Παρισίῳ (Γερμαμανίας δὲ αὕτη πολίχνη) διατρίβοντος. Hiſt. l. 3.

The Souldiers mutiny, and Salute Julian Emperour.

Ille mente fundatâ univerſis reſiſtebat, & ſingulis.

gueſs what this great Dearneſs, on both ſides, would come to. Their Sorrow would not let them reſt, till Morning, but in the Night they fell into great and heavy Lamentations, each as his particular Concernments preſſed him; beſides that General and Paramount one, of leaving ſo gracious a Prince; and making their Caſes known one to another, their Anger, as Coales, when laid together, into a Flame, brake forth into open Rage: Their Tongues now have the ſtrength to move their hands, and their Hands to graſp and brandiſh their Swords. To the Palace they march in a menacing manner, and beſetting it round, ſo that none could eſcape; with a horrid Noiſe ſalute Julian by the Title of Auguſtus, and vehemently urge him to come forth to them. For all their Haſte he made them ſtay till it was Light, but then he was forced to come down. At the Sight of him, with a Reiterated Shout, and an Unanimous and Reſolute Conſent, they again called him Auguſtus; to whom he anſwered, Nolo Imperare, as Seriouſly and Cordially, as ever any ſaid Nolo Epiſcopare in another Caſe. Nay our Author tells us, that All, Some, and every One (and ſurely they were a good many) of them, he reſolutely Opposed; one while ſhewing that he was diſpleaſed, another while ſtretching out his Hands, intreating, nay beſeeching them, that after ſo many and happy Victories, they would not do any unhandſome thing, nor by their unſeaſonable Raſhneſs give Occaſion to further Troubles.

He would decline it, but they compell him to accept the Title.

88. Having brought them to ſome Quiet, he then gently praid them to content themſelves, and without any Innovation or Diſturbance, they ſhould have what they ſo much deſired: for ſeeing they were ſo unwilling to leave their own Country, and go into remote Parts, they ſhould return to it again, and he would take upon him to argue it with the Emperour, who was a moſt prudent Perſon, and capable of Reaſon. Now can we imagine theſe men of Mars and Metal to have Hearts, as hard and invulnerable, as the Steel, or Iron they wore; that ſo ſweet ſo obliging Words could have no Impreſſion on them, but to leave them merely ſelfiſh and ingrateful? for one good Turn, doubtleſs, requires another. No, they would not endure he ſhould caſt ſuch a Blot upon them; but unanimouſly, and with the greateſt Earneſtneſs imaginable, nay with reproachful Language, mixt, as if they would not be ſo uſed, they compelled him to receive the Imperial Title, Then being lift on high, upon the Target of a Foot-Souldier, and Silence being made, he was declared Auguſtus, and now was bid to produce his Diadem, but he denied that ever he had any; whereupon they asked for that which his Wife wore about her Head, or Neck. For the Reader muſt know, that generally a Diadem in thoſe Times, was but a thing like a Fillet, or a Bracelet ſtudded with Gold, or Pearl, or ſome ſuch like things. But he told them, that it was neither ſeemly, nor lucky, to have his Beginnings graced with any thing belonging to a Woman's Ornaments (he would not for Manners take that Dreſs, which in his Tale of the Cæſars he ſo lovingly beſtowed upon his Uncle Conſtantine) and therefore they betook themſelves to his Horſe, to ſee if amongſt his Trappings and Furniture they might find ſomething to reſemble that Enſign of Sovereign Authority. But he as earneſtly affirmed this to be alſo unſeemly, and ſo without any more to do, one Maurus, who was afterward preferred to the Dignity of Comes, and ill behaved himſelf in a Matter of War, though at preſent but one of the Haſtati, took a Bracelet, or Chain he wore, and confidently put it about his Head. And thus Julian, driven to it by utmoſt Neceſſity, and conſidering, that he had no way to ſhun the preſent Danger if he had perſevered in his Refuſal, was forced to ſubmit, and promiſed them all five Aurei, and a pound of Silver.

89. The thing being over, he was Diſtracted with no leſs Care than formerly, ſo that he neither wore the Diadem, nor ventured abroad, nor minded any of the Publick Concernments, however preſſing; but mewed himſelf up cloſe in his Lodgings, frighted by the Variety of theſe ſad Accidents. Hereupon a certain Decurio of the Palace (a Place of Dignity Ammianus tells us,) ran ſuddenly to the Camps of the Petulantes, and Celtæ, and roared out; that a dreadful thing had hapned; for he, who by their Will and Reſolution had been declared Auguſtus the day before, was now privily murdered. The Souldiers enraged at that Word, (as, true Stories, or Falſe are apt equally to move them) with their Swords drawn, or other Arms, ran furiouſly to the Court, and with the Noiſe, the Guard, Tribunes and the Comes Domeſticorum himſelf was frighted away, as from preſent Death, not being able to imagine what they ſhould mean. At length, ſeeing no Body to oppoſe them, they ſtopt both their Courſe, and Fury; and being then demanded what the Matter was, would ſcarcely be ſatisfied concerning the Safety of their Emperour, till, admitted into the Conſiſtory they ſaw him glorioully ſet out with the Imperial Habit. But upon Report of what had paſſed at Paris; ſome of thoſe that had been ſent away toward the Emperour, under Conduct of Sintula, the Tribune of Julian's Stable, returned thither; and now it being time to ſhow himſelf publickly, like an Emperour indeed, all were ordered to meet together in the Field, the following Day. Againſt the time a more ſtately Tribunal was erected, which he mounted with greater Pomp, Encompaſſed, with the Eagles and Banners, and incircled with multitudes of armed men. After a little Pauſe, to take a view of their Countenances, and accordingly to Frame his Speech, when he ſaw them chearful and pleas'd, He put them in mind, how from the time that being very young, he had in ſhow worne the Purple, and by Heavenly direction been committed to their Protection, he never had been driven from his Purpoſe of a good Life, being preſent with them in all their Labours, and aſſiſting them to humble ſuch proud Barbarians, as were left, and ſurvived the Slaughters of innumerable Thouſands of their Companions, and the Deſtruction of their Cities. He added, that it was needleſs to relate, how often in the Cold and hard Winter, when Wars are wont to ceaſe, both by Sea and Land; they and he together had defeated thoſe Almans, which at other times had been invincible. But that was by no means to be paſſed over in Silence, that moſt Bleſſed Day, which brought in a manner perpetual Liberty to the Galls, when near Argentoratum, while he ran up and down where the Darts flew the thickeſt, they by the Srength of their Valour, and Military Experience, when whole Torrents of Enemies, as it were, fell with Violence upon them, either deſtroyed them with the Sword, or forced them into the River, there to Periſh, few of themſelves being left, whoſe Exequies they performed, rather by Praiſe and Commendation than by Mourning. Having done ſo many, and ſo great things, he believed that Poſterity (and that through all Nations) would talk of their wel-deſerving of the Common-wealth, if they would but defend to the utmoſt, him whom they had advanced to an higher Degree of Majeſty, if any thing otherwiſe than well ſhould happen. And for preſerving of good Order, that valiant Men might not go unrewarded, nor Secret Ambition ſeize upon the Honour that was due to Merit, with their Council, and Approbation, he was reſolved that neither any Civil, nor Military Officer, otherwiſe than as Deſert required, ſhould riſe to any higher Preferment; but ſuch be diſgraced, as ſhould but move in behalf of any that was not deſerving. This was much applauded by the ordinary Souldier; who having for all his Service hitherto received, neither Preferment, nor any other Reward; was encouraged to hope for better things, and teſtified the ſame by ſtriking his Lance upon his Target. And now the Celtæ and Petulantes intreated for ſome Actuaries, that they might be ſent upon ſome Employments deſigned them; which he would not grant, and they went away neither offended nor ſorry. But in Reference to what Julian had accepted, Ammianus further tells us that he told ſome of his intimate Friends, how that the Night before he was declared Emperour, ſomething appeared to him, in ſhape like the Publick Genius, and in a chiding manner told him; that formerly, though privately, he had watch'd at his Door, having a great deſire to increaſe his Dignity, and had ſometimes gone away, as being rejected; and if now he would not entertain him, the Multitude concurring in their Opinion, he would depart ſorrowfully, as one put away: but bid him think ſeriouſly of it, that he would dwell no longer with him.

His Speech to them in Commendation of himſelf.

90. Thus merrily went on Matters in Gall, when in the mean time the Eaſtern Provinces were in a far different Humour. For there the Cruel Sapor, being encouraged by the Advice and Aſſiſtance of two Fugitives (Antoninus, whom we ſpake of before, and one Craugaſius, who had fled to his Wife, that was taken Priſoner in a Caſtle) burnt ſtill with a vehement deſire of Conquering Meſopotamia, while Conſtantius was far diſtant with his Army; and paſſing over Tigris, began his Work, by laying Siege to Singara, a City on an Hill of that Name, and near that River. Thoſe that were in it were very Couragious, eſteeming it every way very well provided, and upon knowledge of his coming, ſtood ready to receive him on the Walls. At firſt he Attacqued them with fair words, in which he ſpent one whole day, to give them time to conſider; but that not prevailing, by that time it was light the next Morning, he ſet up his Bloody Flag, and began the Aſſault; they as valiantly Defended it, and ſeveral dayes paſſed in this manner, many being Kill'd and Wounded on both ſides; till at laſt, by a Tryal of many Engines, one Ram did ſuch Execution againſt a ſquare Tower, that it made a great Breach therein; and though they wrought very induſtriouſly to make up the place again; yet the Mortar being Green, and the Stones as yet looſe, it again continually Battered Sapor again paſſeth Tigris, and Beſieges Singara.

Takes it by Aſſault.

and lays Siege to Bezabde.

down their Work, and at laſt made ſuch a Paſſage as gave the Perſians a large Entrance into the Town; which being taken, a very few were kill'd in the Hurry, and the reſt were ſent away, by the Command of Sapor, to the fartheſt Parts of Perſia. The Gariſon conſiſted of two Legions, viz. the Prima Flavia, and the Prima Parthica, beſides numerous Inhabitants, and a Party of Horſe, taken in upon the ſudden Occaſion, who all, with their hands bound behind them, were led away into Captivity, there being none to reſcue them. For the greater part of the Army lay, for the Defence of Niſibis, at a great diſtance, and neither in old time could any Relieve Singara, when in danger, there was ſuch want of Water in the Countrey about it; ſo that though it was at firſt Built to curb the ſudden Motions of the Enemy, yet it brought more Damage than Advantage to the Romans, being ſeveral times taken, with the Loſs of them that kept it. This Town being Razed, Sapor very prudently ſhunned Niſibis, remembring how ill he had fared formerly there, but turned to the right hand toward Bezabde (more anciently called Phœnicha) a ſtrong Fort placed on an Hill, indifferent high, and bending towards the Banks of Tigris, where the Ground was low, and leſs Defenſible, Fortified by a double Work, and Manned by three Legions, viz. the Secunda Flavia, the Secunda Armeniaca, and Parthica Secunda, beſides many Archers of the Zabdiceti; in the Territories of whom, then living in Obedience to the Roman Empire, this Municipium ſtood.

And takes it in like manner.

But is repulſed at Urta.

91. Sapor, after his manner, firſt Summoning it, adviſed them to be Prudent, and come forth, and ſubmit to him, the Conquerour of Nations; and a Day and a Night being given them to conſider, when this would not do, by that time it was light the next day, he fell with all Violence upon the Wall; but found ſuch Reſiſtance, that on the third he, as well as the Beſieged, was glad to think of one day's Reſpit. Now came to him out of the Town the Biſhop of that Diœceſe, who, by all the Rhetorick he had, could not perſwade him to Raiſe his Siege; but on the contrary, rather the more encouraged, he ſware he would not depart, till he had taken it. A Slander was raiſed on the Biſhop, as if he ſhould diſcover to him the Weakneſs of the Town, becauſe afterward he ſet his Engines to the moſt rotten Place in all the Wall. But here was again ſuch vigorous Oppoſition, both by thoſe Engines called Baliſtæ, and alſo by the other termed Scorpions, whereof the one caſt Arrows, and the other Stones; Moreover by the tumbling down of Stones, ſcalding Pitch, and Bitumen by the Hand, that nothing could have prevailed with the Perſians to perſiſt in the Enterprize, but the violent Reſolution of their King, who they knew would be enraged, if the City was not his before Winter. This drove them on without any Regard had to Death, or Torment, which in ſo diverſe Shapes preſented themſelves to their View; and it hapned that one Ram, which was covered with a Raw Hide, ſo as no Fire could hurt it, creeping by Degrees, battered the Wall with ſuch Violence, that down it fell, and in it's Fall killed many of thoſe within. At this Breach did the Perſians enter; and now great Slaughter was made on both ſides: for the Defendants ſtill fought, and held out, till, borne down by Numbers, they fell merely by the Sword of the too powerful Enemy. Sapor, overjoyed at the taking of this Place, which was of ſuch Moment for his Deſign, repaired the Wall, and put in a ſtrong Garriſon, well victualled, leſt the Romans learning of what Importance 'twas, ſhould attempt to retake it. Then went he to a Fort called Urta, very ancient, as imagined to be built by Alexander the Great, in the utmoſt Quarter of Meſopotamia, of great Strength, and Inacceſſible. This by all Art imaginable he endeavoured to be maſter of, but neither words of both ſorts, nor Force prevailing, he broke up his Siege and departed.

Conſtantius Prepares againſt him for the following year.

92. So went Matters betwixt Tigris and Euphrates, the News whereof were brought to Conſtantius, then lying at Conſtantinople, or thereabout; for thither he was come out of Myſia, from the Expedition againſt the Limigantes; having in the Month of October reached the City of Nicæa in Thrace, as he travelled thither. Being now much concerned about the Progreſs made by the Perſian in the Eaſtern Parts, with all Induſtry he ſpent the Winter in Preparations for a vigorous Reſiſtance. He raiſed new Forces; filled up the Vacancies in the Legions; abundantly furniſhed them wirh Arms; and for a further Supply, procured as many Scythians as he could for Love, or Money. For Conveyance of all theſe men, and Arms, there muſt needs be great Need of the Curſus Publicus, or Publick Carriage; and therefore about this time we find a Conſtitution (now parted in the Code of Theodoſius into three ſeveral Laws) directed to the Agentes in Rebus, out of the Body or Company of whom, as we ſaid, only, he would have the Curioſi, or thoſe that managed it to be choſen. Now although Gothofred would have this Conſtitution to relate to Illyricum, the Præfectus Prætorio of which Diſtrict, Ammianus tells us, was very careful of getting Proviſions; from which Paſſage, and another cited out of Victor, that learned Man proves what Care Conſtantius took to provide for the well Management of this Curſus, and for the Eaſe of the Subject, againſt the Avarice and inſolence of thoſe that managed it. Yet ſeeing he was now come further Eaſtward, was moving towards thoſe Provinces which were infeſted by the Perſian, and, as Gothofred himſelf proves in his Chronicon (added to the Chronologie of the Laws) that in October he was got as far as Nice in Thrace; whereas on the laſt day of October this Conſtitution bears Date, or was propoſed; we cannot but conclude it to reſpect Thrace it ſelf, through which the Army, and Arms muſt paſs, and whence, as Ammianus writes, he Purpoſed to march, as ſoon as Spring ſhould be adult, or, as he means, the Seaſon would permit. But as to the Conſtitution it ſelf, Conſtantius had been indulgent to the Agentes in Rebus, thinking them fitteſt for this Charge, as we ſaid formerly, and they were often guilty of Inſolence, and Rapine; and the rather, becauſe they were Subject to the Juriſdiction properly of the Magiſter Officiorum, who being at a great Diſtance, when they were in the Provinces about their Buſineſs, hope of Impunity made them more bold to commit Diſorders. Therefore bad Princes, who intended to make Uſe of ſuch men as Spunges, would not have them under the Eye, or Awe of any other, but reſerved the Power of animadverting upon them to themſelves alone: as Caracalla ordered it towards the Frumentarii, to whom theſe Agentes in Rebus ſucceeded: but for Reſtrainment of all ſorts of Crimes, the moſt effectual Courſe is, that the Offenders be puniſhable in thoſe Juriſdictions, where they commit the Faults; becauſe the Apprehenſion of preſent Danger hath greater Force to reſtrain Enormities; and Eſcape, which often happens in removal of Priſoners, is prevented; and Satisfaction by a Sight of the Puniſhment is given to the Country, or Parties injur'd, who are diſcouraged from Proſecution by the Toil, and Charge of tedious Journeys. Therefore, in the firſt Place, Conſtantius gives Power to the Præfectus Prætorio over the “ Agentes in Rebus, and Curioſi, at ſuch time as they are employed about the Curſus Publicus; for two years before, he had in general given to the Præfect, and Governours “ of Provinces, Authority over them; yet they complain'd, and alleged, that the Præfect had nothing to do with them, and that they were puniſhable only by the Magiſter Officiorum. And he ſignifies himſelf to be ſo far from revoking any Sentence “ given againſt them by the Præfect, or any way encouraging them, if they “ had Recourſe to his own Perſon, that he aſſures them, he would animadvert upon “ them with more Severity; wherein he was imitated by ſome of his Succeſſors; although Tribonianus hath minced this Threatning in his Code, or that which goes under the Name of Juſtinian.

Prid. Kal. Nov. Euſebio & Hypatio Coſs. A.D. 359.

Auxilia ſuper his Scytharum poſcebat mercede, vel gratiâ, ut adulto vere, profectus è Thraciis loca ſuſpecta protinus occuparet.

Gives Power to the Præfectus Prætorio to reſtrain the Agentes in Rebus and Curioſi.

L. 3. de Curioſis Cod. Th. ubi ſuprà.

L. 3. Cod. Juſtin. eod. Tit.

93. But to prevent Abuſes in any Office, or Employment, the ſecureſt Courſe is, to make Choice of Honeſt and Fit Perſons to diſcharge it; for though Opportunities tempt men, yet the Impreſſions are made according to the Temper and Inclinations of the Parties. Now at this time, as well otherwiſe, as from this Law, it appears, that the worſt of men, and moſt covetous aſpired after the Office of Curioſus, to have the greater Opportunity to commit Rapine, and Diſorder. To prevent ſuch Avarice, and ſelf-ſeeking, Conſtantius, in the Second Place ordains; That none be preferred for his Ambition by Suffrage, or Favour, but according to his “ Courſe, and his Merits in Service, by the Judgment of the Schole, that is, the Body “ or Company; ſo that (through Knavery) nothing be kept from the Knowledge of the “ Prince of all that they had Learnt, or Diſcovered. For there were two Things the “ Curioſi were in thoſe times, employed in, viz. the Management of the Curſus Publicus, and alſo that of Intelligence; whereupon they had the Titles of the Eyes of the Prince, of Exploratores, and were ſaid Curas Reip. agere, whence they were alſo called Curagendarii. But further; that they might have no Pretence to Burthen the “ Country, he will have them know what they ſhould demand, and no more; viz. “ for every Rheda one Solidus, in ſuch Provinces only, wherein the Country was “ at the Charge of the Curſus; for in ſome the Country was to be at the Expenſe, “ and in others it was managed by Money Iſſued out of the Treaſury at this time. “ And laſtly, for to huſband well the Curſus Publicus; as alſo, perhaps out of Reſpect “ to the High-wayes, he tells them; that no Traveller muſt expect or hope “ for any more than one of that ſort call'd Clabularis, or Angaria, which was a great “ Waggon drawn with a Teme of Oxen, for Conveyance of Families, (as we “ have noted Julian to have granted the Uſe of it to the Souldiers, who were then deſtined to march into the Eaſt) it carrying fifteen hundred Pound-weight. Not long after, viz. the laſt day but one of the Year, he gave out another “

Con-

Vide Gothofred. in L. 5. de Curioſis Cod. Th. Abeſt hæc Lex à Cod. Juſtiniani.

And Enacts ſeveral other things about the Curioſi.

Ita ut nihil veſtri Principis, ex his quæ geri in Rep. videritis, notitiæ ſubtrahatis.

L. 5. ejuſd. Tit. Cod. Th. Abeſt etiam à Cod. Juſtin.

Rhedas i. e. inquit, quas Quadrigas, vel Flagella appellant. Flagella, quòd uno Flagello, vel Aurigâ regeretur. Vide Com.

Conſtitution to the Senate of Conſtantinople concerning the Prætorſhip; not in reference to the ſetting forth of Games, or Publick Works, which all his former reſpected; but to Juriſdiction, whereof he names five points, which, becauſe they belong rather to the Jus Privatum, than the Politie or Government, are not proper here to be inſiſted on. But beſides this Buſineſs of the Prætorſhip, by this Conſtitution (divided now into ſeveral parts) he provides that Appeals ſhould lye out of Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Lydia, the Helleſpont, the Iſlands, Phrygia Salutaris, Europe, Rhodope, and Hæmimont, that is, the nine Suburbicarian Provinces, to the Præfect of this City. For now, firſt of all, he removing the Duumviri, ordained a Præfect of Conſtantinople, in the latter end of this year, viz. Honoratus, who had been Præfect of Gall; and therefore ſent this Oration, as it's term'd (or Conſtitution) to the Senate, for limiting the ſeveral Juriſdictions of him and the Prætors. In Name, and other Privileges, Conſtantine had made this his new City equal to Rome, but it was not yet like it, as to Government: therefore Conſtantius, his Son, who had a great kindneſs for it, and perhaps ſome more, becauſe it was Founded at the ſame time that he was made Cæſar, gave it a Single Governour, that in this reſpect it might be equal with Rome and Alexandria; and for the more Honour, beſtowed on him the Title of Præfect, the ſame that he of old Rome enjoyed; for why he ſhould be firſt Conſularis of Byzantium, when the Laws Extant give him the Title of Præfect, there is no Colour, but a Miſtake of Pancirolus.

Makes a Præfect of Conſtantinople.

L. 16. de Prætoribus, &c. Cod. Th. unica hæc Lex ex hoc Tit. in Cod. Juſtin. relata eſt, interpolata. Vide omnino Com. Gothofr. in L. & Chronic. Hiſtoric. ad hunc Annum.

A.D. 359. C nſtantii 22. Euſebio & Hypatio Coſs.

94. Some ſix weeks after the Date of this Law, viz. the day before the Nones of February of the following Year; when Conſtantius himſelf, the Tenth, and Julian, the Third time, were Conſuls; by another Edict he obviated an Abuſe, frequently committed in thoſe Times; upon Complaint of Helpidius, who was now Præfect of the Eaſt, and conſequently, had the Diœceſe of Ægypt within his Diſtrict. It was the Cuſtom for the Inferiour ſort of People, as Husbandmen, when they found themſelves burthened by Tribute and Impoſitions, for ſhelter to betake themſelves to the Protection of Great Men, under whoſe Wings, or in whoſe Houſes, having Refuge, they often eſcaped Scot-free; not only to the great Defrauding of the Treaſury, but the loſs of their Neighbours, whoſe Lands adjoyned to theirs, and who were bound to make up the Sum required of the Village, if from the true Proprietors it could not be had. But this was not all. From an Eaſe, this Cuſtom grew to be a greater Burthen to theſe poor Men: for the Great ones, whom they choſe for their Patrons, would, for greedineſs of Gain, make their Ends and Markets out of their Neceſſities; and ſo much, that it often proved their Undoing, and became a mighty Grievance to Miſerable People. Now Helpidius obſerving how in Ægypt the Publick Revenue riſing by Tributes, was hereby Diminiſhed, or poſſibly that quantity of Corn, which of late years had been impoſed upon that Fertile Countrey (as we have already hinted) for the Maintenance of Conſtantinople, the raiſing of which was under his Charge, acquainted Conſtantius, how the Husbandmen (Free-holders, not Farmers) ſheltered themſelves under the Patronage of the Great ones of that Country; and particularly under the Duces themſelves, viz. thoſe called Duces Rei Militaris per Ægyptum, as of Lybia and Thebais, of whom heretofore. Now by an Edict directed back to him by way of Anſwer, to ſave harmleſs the Treaſury, and the Neighbours of ſuch as plaid leaſt in ſight, he Commands, That ſuch Perſons as afford ſuch ſhelter to Obnoxious men, be conſtrained to pay what was due to the Publick from them: and alſo that the Perſons ſo received be taken utterly, or ſeparated, from them. And ſo much doth Conſtantius to reſtrain this Cuſtom, againſt which, ſucceeding Emperours did more Severely provide, as we may ſee hereafter. Towards the latter end of the ſame Month of February, he made another Law for the Encouragement of Scholars; Ordaining, That none ſhould be admitted into the Chiefeſt Place of any Decuria in Rome, except he was well ſeen in the Liberal Studies, and in Eloquence. And for this purpoſe he will have Julian, the Præfect of that City, to whom he gives the Title of Sublimitas (who was, as the Head of the People and Senate of Rome, ſo alſo chief Commander of the Decuriæ) to preſent the Names of ſuch Perſons to Himſelf, that he might have the Preferring of them. Now by Decuriæ are meant certain Companies or Bodies of Men, who were Employed in Matters relating to the Conſultations and Decrees of the Senate, of whom the chief Scribes were in great Repute. For they framed the Acts and Decrees; and to them the Publick Records were of old committed; ſo that being skill'd in the Laws, they were Aſſiſtant, and gave Directions to the Magiſtrates in the Management of their Offices.

A.D. 360. Conſtantio A. 10. & Juliano Cæſ. 3. Coſs.

Provides by an Edict, againſt an Abuſe committed by the Husbandmen in Ægypt.

L. 1. de Patrociniis Vicorum Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 24. Dat. Prid. Non. Febr. Conſtantinop. Conſtantio A. 10. & Jul. Cæſ. 4 Coſs. A.D. 360. Abeſt hic Tit. à Cod. Juſtin.

Vide Gothofr. in L. Ne autem Literaturæ (quæ omnium Virtutum maxima eſt) Præmia denegentur, &c. L. 1. de Decuriis urbis Romæ, Cod. Th. lib. 14. tit. 1. Dat. 6. Cal. Mart. Conſtantinop. Accepta Id. Mart. Rom. 8 1. poſt die. Abeſt à Cod Juſtin.

95. In the mean time, Julian, ſtill lying at Paris, had his Thoughts at work; for he could not but imagine how well the News of his late Preferment would be Publickly Julian writes, to Pacifie the Emperour, a Letter concerning his own Praiſes.

Privately others, in Biting Language.

be taken by Conſtantius, by conſidering what he himſelf ſhould have thought of it, if one that he had Advanced ſhould have been made Emperour by a handful of Souldiers, without his conſent or knowledge. He thought it beſt to ſend ſome to him whom he could truſt, with Letters ſo worded, as if poſſible, to aſſwage his Indignation. Theſe Letters, Humble, and yet Stout enough (if Ammianus word them not for him (as often Hiſtorians make bold with Letters and Speeches) expreſſed in the firſt place, what great Labours and Dangers he had undergone in that hard Service he had thruſt him upon, wherein he was the firſt that went on, and the laſt that came off. That what had lately happened, the Souldiers had partly done, in reference to his Deſerts, and eſpecially Enraged at the thought of Quitting their Country and Families, and being forced into ſo Remote Parts. That, as for him, he had Reſiſted them in what they went about, with his utmoſt Will and Power, and ſo long, till they Threatned him with Death; and when he did yield, it was not without a Conflict within himſelf, and an Apprehenſion, that had he Died in his Reſolution, the Honour might have been put upon ſome other, who Gladly would have received it. Then he prayes him to pardon him, and accept this Excuſe in good part, promiſing by his Demeanour to ſhew himſelf not Ingrateful. He tells him he will find Curule Spaniſh Horſes, alſo ſome Choiſe young men, born of Barbarians on this ſide the Rhine, or elſe of ſuch as had yielded up themſelves, to mix amongſt the Gentiles and Scutarii. For his Officers, he would receive ſuch Præfecti Prætorio as were known to be Honeſt and Able, as he ſhould direct; but as for the Ordinary Judges, or Magiſtrates, Commanders in the Army, and his Guard, he thought it reaſonable, that he himſelf ſhould make choice of them, ſeeing they were to be truſted ſo near about him. He adds, that out of Gall there were no thoughts of having any Supply for Diſtant Places, that Countrey had ſo much work within it ſelf; neither was it at all convenient to ſend any Natives of it, at this time, againſt the Perſians, when it was ſo Haraſſed by continual Diſorders, that it ſtood in need of Aſſiſtance from other Provinces. And concludes with putting him in mind, how great Advantages Concord and good Underſtanding betwixt Princes have procured. This was the Tenor of the Letters, he openly owned; but Ammianus tells us, that together with them, he ſent others more ſecret, privily to be preſented to him, which contained chiding and biting Language; the Contents whereof it was, neither lawful for him to Inquire after, nor decent to make Publick. Out of reſpect to whom? I am afraid, not to Conſtantius (we find no ſuch ſqueamiſhneſs when he talks of him, but over and over a Rehearſal of every minute particular almoſt, that can make againſt him) but to Julian himſelf. For this Employment certain Grave Perſons were made choice of, viz. Pentadius, his Magiſter Officiorum, and Eutherius, the Præpoſitus Cubiculi, who, after the delivery of the Letters, were to tell what they themſelves with their own Eyes had ſeen, in reference to his late Preferment; and were of Underſtanding how to carry themſelves ſo, as might moſt ſute his Intereſt.

Conſtantius rages thereat.

96. But they went upon an unacceptable Errand. It hapned the worſe, that Florentius, the Præfect of Gall, was gone away before; who, upon hearing that the Forces were ſent for, out of Apprehenſion of ſome Diſturbance thence likely to ariſe, went to Vienna under Pretence of Purveyance for the Army. But it was indeed out of Fear of Julian, whom he had diſobliged; and when he had the News of his being ſaluted Emperour; deſpairing of Life, he left his Family, and got him away to Conſtantius, to whom, that he might excuſe himſelf, he accuſed him as a Traytor in an high Meaſure. Yet Julian, after his Departure, did not at all moleſt his Relations; but on the contrary, allowed them the Uſe of the Curſus Publicus, for removal of themſelves in Safety into the Eaſt. The Ambaſſadours after a tedious Journey through Italy and Illyricum, at length got over the Boſphorus, and found Conſtantius at Cæſarea in Cappadocia, formerly known by the Name of Mazaca, a famous City conveniently ſeated at the Foot of the Mountain Argæus. Being admitted to Audience, the Emperour, upon peruſal of the Letters, fell into a very great Paſſion, and with a menacing Countenance, which ſeemed to threaten no leſs than Death, commanded them to be gone out of his Preſence, refuſing to hear any more of the Buſineſs they came about. And now did he fluctuate much in his Thoughts, whether he ſhould proceed in his Journey againſt the Perſians, or turn back to Chaſtiſe his ambitious Kinſman, as he eſteemed him; but the Advice of the Wiſer ſort prevailed, and he gave out Orders for the Expedition into the Eaſt. Upon further Conſideration he preſently diſmiſſed the Meſſengers, and ſent away Leonas his Quæſtor, into Gall, with Letters to Julian, wherein he Signified, that he had preferred him as one, who he thought would not make any Innovation; and

he

But, upon further Conſideration, adviſes him to content himſelf with the Dignity of Cæſar.

he adviſed him, if he had a regard to his own Security, and that of his Friends, to humble himſelf, and be content with his former Dignity of Cæſar, to which he had in a Legal manner attained. And to ſtrike the more Awe into him, and to let him ſee his Power and Reſolution, he promoted Nebridius, who was Quæſtor to Julian, into the Place of Florentius, the Præfect of Gall, Fœlix the Notary to be Magiſter Officiorum, and ſome others he named to other Places; having, before any thing was known of Cæſar's Innovation, nominated Gumoharius the Succeſſour of Lupicinus, to be Magiſter Militum. Leonas coming to Paris was well received, as an Honourable, and Prudent Perſon, and the day following Julian went to the Camp, where he had cauſed to be aſſembled all the Souldiers, and a great Multitude of the Place. There, ſtanding upon his Tribunal, he commanded the Emperour's Letters to be read, and when thoſe words came to be Rehearſed; that Conſtantius diſapproving of all that had paſſed, thought it was very fair for him to content himſelf with the Dignity of Cæſar; they all cried out, with a terrible Noiſe; Julian Auguſtus, as both the Countryman and Souldier, and the Authority of the Commonwealth hath decreed, which hath indeed been relieved; but ſtill apprehends the Danger of new Invaſions to be made by the Barbarians. With a Report hereof, and other Letters from Julian importing the ſame was Leonas ſent back (and in Safety too Ammianus tells you) and of all thoſe nominated by Conſtantius, Nebridius was alone admitted to the Place of Præfect, according as Julian had formerly written, that he would receive ſuch as he ſhould recommend into that Office. But he had already ordained Anatolius to be Magiſter Officiorum, from being his Libellorum Magiſter; and others he advanced, as he thought it moſt conducing to his own Safety, and Intereſt. And whereas he ſtood in Fear of Lupicinus, though now abſent here in Britain, being a man haughty, and Stomachful: ſo that if he came to know any thing that had paſſed, in Probability he would raiſe Commotions in the Iſland, where he might have Opportunity enough to Levy men. He ſent a certain Notary to Bononia or Bulloigne, with Orders to look carefully, that none paſſed the Sea; whereby it came to paſs, that he had not the leaſt word of any Alteration, till he went back into Gall, and could make no Diſturbance; and ſo all Danger from his Authority and Intereſt was prevented.

The Army will have him retain his Title, and he writes back accordingly.

Callidè excuſat factum Juliani, qui Lupicinum ex Britannia reverſum comprehendi juſſit, & in Libera cuſtodia habuit cum aliquot aliis, quod Conſtantius objiciebat Juliano. Vide Valeſium in locum.

97. So did Julian carry himſelf in Relation to this new Honour, which was forced upon him, ſore againſt his Will; at leaſt, as he pretended, according to the Relation given us by Ammianus Marcellinus, who living in thoſe Times, being himſelf employed in Buſineſs, and a great Friend to him, as any may eaſily perceive, ſcarcely can be thought to paſs by any thing material, eſpecially what would make for his Reputation. With him agrees fully, in things of this Nature, Zoſimus, of whom we have ſo much ſpoken, and much more muſt. He having told the ſame Story concerning the Envy of Conſtantius toward Julian; and how he ſent away for the Souldiers out of Gall, adds further, that Julian having herein obeyed him, he was not content with the Numbers he firſt wrote for, but required four Regiments more to be ſent. Then relating, how hereupon the Souldiers Mutinied, and how he was made Emperour by them againſt his will; whereas Ammianus, from his very Letters Acquaints us, how he deſired only to be Excuſed for accepting the Title of Auguſtus, as put upon him againſt his Conſent; but ſtill that with his good Leave, he might retain it. He tells us another Tale, that he, of his own Accord, offered to (a) Quit it, and Content himſelf with that of CÆSAR: and though Ammianus ſayes, that Conſtantius, writing back, Adviſed him to ſatisfie himſelf with the Dignity of Cæſar; Zoſimus tells us, far another Story, as that he Commanded him to Quit (b) that of Emperour and Cæſar too; and being ſatisfied with a Private Life, Reſign himſelf wholly to his Diſpoſal; if he regarded his Safety. Hereupon, Julian openly Declared his Opinion, as to Religion, in the hearing of all; affirming, that he would rather truſt the Gods with his Life, than rely upon the Words of Conſtantius. And Conſtantius now made Preparations for a Civil War, but as for Julian, he was much troubled to think that he ſhould Fight againſt him who had raiſed him to the Dignity of Cæſar, and thereby, with many, incurr the Cenſure of an Ingrateful man. A Probable Matter! that Ammianus, who was, as it were an Eye-witneſs, ſhould not better underſtand the Affairs of thoſe Times, and of the greateſt Concernment, than Zoſimus, who was ſcarcely born many years after. Julian wrote two ſorts of Letters to Conſtantius, when he Excuſed himſelf; the one Publickly owned, and the other Secret. Of thoſe known, Ammianus gives us the Draught, and therefore might and durſt pry into them, though not into the other. And can we believe Zoſimus got a ſight of the Secret ones? or can any man imagine, if he had, that in them which Ammianus affirms to have been Objurgatory and Biting, he would Zoſimus his falſe Relation about this matter.

(a) ἕτοιμος ἔφασκεν εἶναι τὴν τοῦ Καίσαρος ἔχειν ἀξίαν ἀποθέμενος τὸ διάδημα. (b) ἀποθέσθαι πρὸς τῇ Βασιλείᾳ καὶ τὸ τοῦ Καίσαρος σχῆμα καταστάντα δὲ ἰδιώτην ἑαυτὸν τῇ προαιρέσει τοῦ βασιλέως ἐκδοῦναι.

would more compliment with the Emperour, and gratifie him therein, with an Offer to lay down that Title of Auguſtus, which in the other, that were neither objurgatory, nor biting, he endeavoured to have his Conſent, that he might Retain. But this Man, whom they would have ſo perfect in Vertue, he endeavours to clear of Ambition; not only in that he was unwilling to have admitted the Honour, being merely paſſive in it; but alſo that he was content to have laid it down again, ſo idely improbable, that he himſelf confutes it, allowing Julian's Principles, and him to have been ſo diſcreet as they will have him. For, conſidering the inconſtant and perfidious Humour of Conſtantius, as Zoſimus paints it out, it would have no way been ſafe for him to do it; for very few eſcape with their Lives, when reduced to a Private Condition, who have once acted the part of a Sovereign.

98. And partly upon this Account, what they talk ſo much of, his Unwillingneſs to Accept the Title of Emperour, I muſt confeſs ſomething ſticks with me, though there be other Arguments ſtill againſt it. For, Conſtantius, being a man ſo Jealous and Severe as they make him, Julian had a very great Temptation to admit gladly of ſuch an opportunity of Securing himſelf againſt the Practices which the malicious Whiſperings and Inſinuations of his Courtiers had procured againſt ſo many other Perſons. His Brother Gallus had, though Criminal enough, Miſcarried under the weight of this Suſpitious Humour: and though his Carriage and Demeanour was quite of another ſort; yet, if Conſtantius was made to believe otherwiſe, and that he Diſſembled, could there be any Fence againſt his Fear; who had taken out of the way, moved by that Paſſion, all his other Relations? And doth not the whole carriage of Julian towards the Army much inforce this Belief? What would have been ſaid to him at Rome, had he lived there, and ſo careſſed the People, when the Tribuni Plebis were ſo Quick-ſighted? Verily he would hardly have eſcaped the Tarpeian Rock; but been eſteemed as guilty, as thoſe who for their ſeeking after Popularity, by courting the Rabble, were condemned, as evidently affecting Sovereign Power. Did ever any Tyrant in Greece, by a more fawning or endearing Carriage, wind himſelf into the Supreme Authority, than he uſed that very Night before he was declared Emperour by the Souldiers? Firſt they muſt take Paris in their way, where he Quartered; at what time they were to go for the Eaſt. But we are told this was at the Suggeſtion of Decentius, the Tribune-Notary, who had been ſent by Conſtantius to fetch them: be it ſo, though perhaps one leſs ſuſpitious than Conſtantius, would hardly believe it (weighing all Circumſtances) yet a Perſon, who was utterly unwilling to accept of the Title; and who had it once, by the Bye, partly offered him before, upon the Borders of Gall, as Ammianus writes he had, would ſcarcely have admitted that Suggeſtion: for he could not but imagine, how unwilling they would be to quit their own Country (which in his Letters he ſo much inculcated to have ſtood in need of their Preſence) how thereupon they might be prone to Mutiny; and having formerly had an Inclination to put upon him that unwelcome Honour, would now by Indignation and Diſdain againſt Conſtantius, and Love toward himſelf (which longer Knowledge, and fighting together had confirmed) be hurried into a firm Reſolution of doing it. But ſo far was he from having them march another way, and being afraid of the Temptation; that as if Fearful they ſhould take another Road than that leading to the Place where he lay; whereas he might have made many Excuſes, he goes out to meet them, and as his Cuſtom was, falls on praiſing ſuch of them as he knew, and putting them in mind of their former brave Atchievments; and with gentle Words exhorts them to go, and receive their Rewards from the Emperour. After this he invites their Officers to Supper; and not only kindly entertains them with Meat and Drink, but will needs know what he can do for them. Good Meat and Drink, when ſauced, eſpecially with fair Words and Promiſes, have their Operation, as well as good Medicines. This it ſeems wrought upon them. Ammianus tells you, that being ſo nobly entertain'd they went away; ſurely Frolick and Merry, after ſo much good Chear; no; very ſad, and in Suſpenſe. Why? Upon a double Account; not only becauſe they were to be ſent out of their own Country, but have the Ill Fortune alſo to be deprived of ſo gentle a Commander; and burthened with this Grief, they went away to their Quarters. Now Grief muſt have vent, or worſe will come of it. In ſuch pain they were, to return one good Turn for another, as well as to ſecure their own Concernments, that they could not ſtay till next morning; but this very Night, nay at the beginning of the Night, they mutiny, and as Zoſimus tells us, with the very Cups in their hands, having by Papers diſperſed, irritated the Common Souldiers; therein telling them, that Cæſar, who by his Stratagems had pro-

Reaſons why it is not to be credited.

Qui liberaliter ità ſuſcepti, dolore duplici ſuſpenſi diſceſſerunt & mæſti, quòd eos Fortuna quædam inclemens & moderato Rectore, & Terris Genitalibus diſpararet.

procured to them in a manner all the Victories they had got againſt the Barbarians, and who in Fight could not be diſtinguiſhed from an ordinary Souldier, was now brought into a dangerous Condition; the Emperour by Degrees ſtealing away all his Forces, except they all would agree to hinder their Going. Hereupon, with the Cups ſtill in their Hands, they ran to the Palace, and taking him up upon a Target, made him Emperour.

99. Theſe Paſſages vehemently inſinuate how great a Deſire he had, either to obtain or eſcape the Honour; the one of them; but let the Reader himſelf Judge which of the two. And this he will the more eaſily do when he conſiders, yet other Circumſtances. Had the Honour been a Burthen to him, and he had ſo unwillingly admitted it; then indeed, as Zoſimus fables, he would probably have been content to lay it down; but now, beſides what his Letters ſignified concerning his Care and Endeavour this way; ſee how he labours to induce the Souldier to give way to it. Do not you expect he ſhould fall into a Rapture, in Commendation of his dear Philoſophy, from which he had been ſo unwillingly divorced, and of the Satisfaction of a ſtudious and retired Life? On the other hand recount the Toil, and Danger, to which he ſhould be expoſed by admitting of their Kindneſs; and above all the Ingratitude, which he having both the Repute and Conſcience of a vertuous man, could not but abhor (as Zoſimus tells us it troubled him above all things) of which he ſhould be at leaſt thought Guilty, by accepting of the Title without his Conſent, who only could legally Beſtow it, and who had advanced him to that Degree already, which had been the Step or Stair to mount to this? No; the very next Morning (and poſſibly ſeaſonable it was, leſt that Averſeneſs and Chagrin he had ſhewed, ſhould make any Impreſſion upon the Souldier) he calls his Patrons together; and inſtead of excuſing himſelf by Diſability, falls into a Panegyrick of himſelf, of his own glorious Atchievments, than which no flattering Orator of thoſe times, his Libanius, or any other could have ſaid more. He praiſed himſelf contrary to the Rule; for his Friends were not ſlow. He rubbs up their Memories in telling them, that ſince his Preferment to be Cæſar, he never was diverted from a purpoſe of doing well: How at the Deſtruction of Cities, and Slaughter of Enemies in the Field, he ever was preſent; and when Arrows flew the thickeſt, at the Battel of Argentoratum: And this, he ſays, its neither Fit nor Juſt, that he ſhould ſay nothing of it. Now whither tends all this, and the Inculcating ſo much, that they had ſo Fought, and ventured their Lives together? By theſe Endearments, and by this Love, which ſuch Common Labours and Dangers had procured, to oblige them to grant him the Favour, that they would permit him to diveſt himſelf of that Purple which ſate ſo uneaſie upon his Shoulders? Indeed he makes Uſe of this to preſs them to ſomething, by which they ſhould get Immortal Fame, in ſhewing Kindneſs to their General: But how? Even by fully Defending him, whom they had lately Adorned with an higher Degree of Majeſty, by their Valour and Gravity, if any adverſe thing ſhould happen. Now ſurely this was not, that in Caſe Conſtantius would not permit him to quit the Title of Emperour, that they would Compell him ſo to do. Then it follows, that he promiſed them for their Encouragement, to be careful of beſtowing Preferments, and with Hope hence conceived, the ordinary Souldier was much animated; having before experienced little as to Preferments or Rewards. And, what confirms all this, and Demonſtrates how willing he was to part with the Title of Emperour (as Zoſimus belies him) is the Anſwer he returned to Conſtantius, upon his bidding him ſatisfie himſelf with his former Condition. Had be been ſo averſe to the Preferment, he would certainly have quitted his troubleſom Army, and never have let them known, how much the Emperour's welcome Advice cloſed with his Inclination. But he calls them together, cauſeth the Letters to be read to them, and returns for Anſwer what they expreſſed concerning his Holding the Honour they had conferred upon him, with ſo much Stoutneſs and Indignation.

Poſt quæ opinor tanta & talia nec Poſteritatem tacituram de veſtris in Remp. Meritis in Gentibus cunctis, ſi plenè quem altiore faſtigio Majeſtatis ornaſtis, virtute gravitateque, ſi quid adverſum ingruerit, defendatis.

100. But enough, and too much of this Subject; concerning which, thou wilt, I ſuppoſe, Reader, receive more Satisfaction one way or other, before we have done with Julian. I have no Prejudice againſt him, but am bound and provoked to diſcover the Partiality of Zoſimus, who to cry up him, becauſe a Pagan, and to beſpatter other Princes upon the Account of Chriſtianity, generally runs croſs to other Hiſtorians, both of his own Perſwaſion, and ſuch as having been Eye-Witneſſes, or as Good, relate Matters with all Circumſtances in ſuch manner, as Ammianus doth theſe: ſo as they cannot but gain Belief. We have ſeen from this Writer what things Conſtantius did againſt the Sarmatæ, and the Northern Nations, inhabiting beyond the Danube, or Iſter, (for theſe two are the ſame River, though farther off called Iſter, and near to the Sea, Danubius) how he Conquered them, made many of their Kings ſubmit, and receive Conditions; cauſed them to remove into other places; And a man of ordinary Underſtanding would think and ſay, that for ſeveral years thus Haraſſing their Countrey, and lying ſo long in Pannonia, at Sirmium, or other Places to watch them, it was He that Curbed them, and the Awe of Him that Reſtrained them, and kept them within their Bounds; ſo as he was the more Encouraged to undertake an Expedition againſt the Perſians. No; Zoſimus will better inform you. It was Julian, even Julian, that they were afraid of. Why? was he near them? No. But theſe Barbarians inhabiting beyond Iſter, out of Fear that he ſhould preſs through Gall, and come over the River, and ſet upon them, contained themſelves within the Bounds of Modeſty. Upon this Account he tells you it was, that all Italy, nay Illyricum it ſelf, ſo nigh to Conſtantius his Quarters were out of Danger. Thus muſt we argue if we admit of the Opinion, Chronologie, and Order of things given us by Zoſimus; who tels us alſo further News, viz. of Julian's rare Succeſs, not only amongſt the Celtæ but the Spaniards too, and how herewith Conſtantius was netled, and caſt in his mind how to pull him down. And News this is indeed, for in that Account we have from Ammianus, he tels us all the Journeys of Julian, to what Places he ſtill marched; where he fought, and where he quartered in Winter; whereby it's evident that he could not, ſince the time of his being Cæſar, ſtep into Spain, except Spain leapt over the Pyrenæans into Gall, and the River Iberus ran through the Ocean into the Rhine, near to which his Buſineſs chiefly lay againſt the Germans. But it was almoſt as eaſie for this Hiſtorian, by his Magical Geography, to tranſport Spain into Gall, as he doth the City of Paris into Germany. And who ever would have thought, that what he wrote could have travelled ſo far Weſtward? He wrote about Conſtantinople of things far diſtant, both in Place and Time. Then, and there it was Manners to believe him; and though in reſpect of Time and Place both, by comparing other Writers, he might come to be diſcovered, yet few would be at the Trouble; however, as to the Places, there was Hope they would rather believe him, than go and ſee.

Καὶ Ἰταλία πᾶσα, καὶ Ἰλλυριοὶ κίνδυνον εἶχον οὐδένα τῶν ὑπὲρ τὸν Ἴςρον Βαρβάρων δέει τοῦ μὴ διὰ Γαλατίας τὸν Καίσαρα διαβάντα τὸν Ἴςρον αὐτοῖς ἐπελθεῖν σωφρονούντων.

Τῇ δὲ τῶν ἐν Κελτοῖς τε καὶ Ἴβηρσι πραγμάτων εὐημερίᾳ δακνόμενος.

Other Extravagancies in Zoſimus his Hiſtory.

101. But that we may betake our ſelves to our beſt Guide Ammianus Marcellinus again, and follow Julian in his Atchievements. Being now more encouraged by his Advancement, and the Truſt he repoſed in his Army; leſt he ſhould cool in his Spirit, or be cenſured as Remiſs, and lazy thereupon; after the ſending away of the Ambaſſadours to Conſtantius, he marched away to the Borders of Germania Secunda, and having paſſed the Rhine, ſuddenly fell upon the Franks, call'd Atthuarii; a Reſtleſs People, that had lately waſted the Limits of Gall. He ſurprized them little thinking of any ſuch Matter; and truſting to the Country they inhabited, which was ſo difficult of Acceſs, that they had not remembred any Prince to have reached ſo far as their Villages; but ſurprized at this Diſadvantage he eaſily maſter'd them; and having kill'd and taken many, conſtrain'd the reſt to ſubmit to ſuch Conditions as he himſelf pleaſed to Impoſe. Hereby he concluded he had provided ſufficiently for the Quiet of their Neighbours within the Roman Pale; and then paſſing the River with as much Speed, as he came over, he reinforced the Garriſons upon the Borders; and having ſettled Matters in them as he thought convenient, came to the Rauraci, where he recovered ſome Places formerly got by the Enemy, and having fortified them ſufficiently; by the way of Beſantio went to Vienna, there to Winter. While he ſo cautiouſly and proſperouſly ordered his Matters in Gall; Conſtantius had Notice how the Perſian King laboured to withdraw Arſaces, King of Armenia, from his Alliance with the Romans; neither omitting any Threats, nor other Means he thought would conduce to his End. Therefore he moſt kindly Treated Arſaces, being come to his Preſence, and laboured to perſuade him to entertain no Overtures, which ſhould be made in any kind, tending to the Breach of that good Underſtanding which hitherto had been betwixt them two. He in return, by many Oathes affirmed, he would rather loſe his Life than falſifie his Word, and returned with great Gifts into his Kingdom, where he kept his Promiſe, being indeed obliged to Conſtantius upon ſeveral Accounts, and particularly, ſo he thought himſelf, for his having given him in Marriage Olympias, the Daughter of Ablabius, once Præfectus Prætorio, a Lady that had been eſpouſed to his Brother Conſtans. Arſaces being gone, the Emperour departed out of Cappadocia, and by the way of Melitina, a City of Armenia the leſs, by Laeotena and Samoſata, came to Euphrates, and paſſing that River, at length to Edeſſa; where he ſtaid a long time, expecting his Forces and Proviſions for the Army, and not till after the Autumnal Æquinoctial, departed for Amida.

Julian falls upon the Franks call'd Atthuarii.

Reduces, with them, the Rauraci into order.

Conſtantius courts Arſaces King of Armenia.

Marches Eaſtward.

102. Be-

Sect. 4.

A. D. 360.

Layes Siege to Bezabde.

102. Being come near the Walls, and beholding the great quantity of Aſhes that lay about them, he both Sighed and Wept; conſidering what Slaughter of men had been made before, and in that City. And it hapned that Urſulus, who at this time had Charge of the Treaſury, being preſent, fell into a Great Exclamation, though upon another Account. Behold, ſaith he, how Courageouſly Cities are Defended by the Souldier, whom the Wealth of the whole Empire is ſcarcely able to pay his Wages. Which Speech being afterwards remembred by theſe Forces at Chalcedon, it coſt him his Life. Thence did Conſtantius with a great Army march to Bezabde; before which, having encamped himſelf, he underſtood that the place was much more Fortified than it had been in times paſt. He ſent and offered to the Gariſon, either free leave to depart to their own Countreys, or elſe to Accept of kind Entertainment in the Empire; but they looked upon themſelves as too high born, and eſteemed it unworthy of their Quality to accept of his Offers, and addreſſed themſelves to a vigorous Reſiſtance; which they performed with that height of Reſolution and Conſtancy, that after ſeveral Attempts made to no Purpoſe, the beſiegers deſpaired of Succeſs, and were much dejected. On the tenth day of the Siege, a greater Ram than ordinary was moved to the Walls, which ſtruck Terror into thoſe that were within; but they ſo much Diſabled it, partly by caſting down Pitch upon them that wrought at it, and by ſeveral Sallies they made; that though they were forced ſtill in again, yet did they burn at length all the reſt, that endangered the Wall, and this great one was ſaved, and drawn off, ſo as it was half conſumed. This made the Beſiegers betake themſelves to the Mounts they had raiſed at more diſtance, on each of which were planted two Baliſtæ: and now they brought their Scaling Ladders, and all other Materials, for the moſt effectual Attacque that could be made: The Defendants perceived they were now in the greateſt danger their condition could caſt them into; and therefore, not regarding Life, out they iſſue at a Poſtern; ſome with their Swords, and others following them, carrying Fire, who with it did ſuch Execution, and ſo Pertinacious they continued, that it much diſturbed Conſtantius, not knowing what courſe to take. For, on the one ſide, it grieved him to think of Quitting this Place, both for his own Reputation, and for that it lay ſo convenient for the Perſians, for Annoying of the Adjacent Countrey: but on the other ſide, Winter came on, and his men were utterly diſcouraged; which Inconveniences ſeemed greateſt in his opinion, and moved him to break up his Siege, and return to Antioch, after having ſpent the Summer with ſo much Detriment to his Affairs. But this Perſian War was ever Fatal to him, when he Managed it in Perſon, which cauſed him, now and then, to proſecute it by his Captains, and that, ſometimes, with no ill Succeſs.

Is conſtrained to raiſe his Siege, and returns to Antioch.

103. By it the Empire was not only Exhauſted of Men, but the Provinces burthened with the payment of the Luſtralis Collatio, which was added to the Publick or Military payment, by reaſon of the extraordinary Charge, which the neceſſity of the Times required, without the Fault of the Emperour, who made no other Defence than what he was bound to make, for the Preſervation of his Territories againſt the Inſolence of the Perſians; and when in the Field, omitted not what was Incumbent upon him in relation to his Place. For the Souldiers fought under his Eye, as Ammianus tells us, though ſcantly enough any thing tending to the Reputation of his Maſter, to whom he belonged as Domeſtick Protector. When the Army came to be Diſperſed into its Winter-Quarters, it ſeems the number of the Sick, or Maimed Souldiers, was ſo great, that the Curſus Publicus was much burthened with the Conveyance of them. And therefore, when they took too great liberty in Preſſing the Waggons, he Directed an Edict to Helpidius, Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, Dated on the Sixteenth of November, in the fourth Indiction, whereby he Prohibits any one to make Uſe of above two Waggons (called Angariæ and Clabulæ) in his way home, and each of which was to be drawn by four Oxen only, and this, but in caſe of his being ſick. Now although in this Law there be no expreſs mention of Souldiers, yet muſt I take leave to Diſſent ſo far from Gothofred, as to think Them Principally Concerned in it; however, I deny not, but the Uſe of Waggons was granted to others beſides Them. But if we conſider the Time, and the Circumſtances thereof, when there muſt neceſſarily be, after ſo Dangerous an Expedition, ſo Tedious a Journey, and in that Seaſon of the Year, ſo many Sick and Wounded Men amongſt ſo Numerous Forces, how can we imagine, but there muſt be very great need of Carriages, for Removal of them; not to ſpeak of that Hurry which muſt neceſſarily follow the Separating of an Army, the Conveyance of Arms and Baggage? Therefore, as Hiſtory brings the greateſt Light to Laws, and Laws afford the greateſt Certainty to Hiſtory; we cannot but

L. 11. de Luſtrali Collatione, Accepta 6 Id. Junii Carthagine. Conſtantio A. 10. & Jul. Cæſ. 3. Coſſ. A. D. 360.

L. 11. de Curſu Publico. Dat. 16 Kal. Decemb. Indictione 4. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

He publiſhes Edicts in reference to the Curſus Publicus.

Conclude this Edict to have been occaſioned by the Removal of Souldiers, and not to be underſtood concerning thoſe, who having Diſcharged the Employment call'd Munia Caſtrenſia, within the Palace, returned home after their time of Attendance was Expired, as Gothofred underſtands it. And to this we cannot but Adhere; although afterwards, by another Law of Valentinian, it appears, that theſe Perſons, without the Solemn Licenſe (called Evectio, and Tractoria) otherwiſe required, might, by ſhewing the Prince his Dimiſſory Letters alone, make Uſe of the Curſus Clabularis, for Removal of themſelves and Families, for which it was proper, being drawn by a Teme of four Oxen, and carrying fifteen hundred pound weight. Here, in the Date of this Law, is the firſt mention made of Indictions in this Code; this was the fourth, the beginning of which is to be fetch'd from the latter end of this Year.

Ammianus lib. 21.

104. While Conſtantius was engaged beyond Euphrates againſt the Perſians, Julian ſtill lying at Vienne in Gall, beat his Head, Night and Day, with conſidering what he ſhould do, whether by all means poſſible to try, if he could bring him to admit and own him, as his Colleague; or by open Force to wreſt a Compliance, and begin firſt; that he might carry the more Terror along with him. And on both ſides he found himſelf preſſed with Doubts. For how to truſt him as a Friend, he knew not; and when an Enemy, he was wont to be Succeſsful againſt ſuch as ſet up for themſelves; and eſpecially, the Fortune of his Brother Gallus afflicted him, and made him hang in Suſpenſe; when he remembred, how he periſhed partly through his own Neglect and Sloth, and partly, through the Frauds and Perjuries of thoſe about the Emperour. But at length he reſolved, it would be more ſafe to ſtand upon his Guard, and bid Defiance to him; his Humour being much more elevated, upon his Preferment. Therefore had he no Regard to any other nominated to Places, except Nebridius. He celebrated his Quinquennalia, or Games for his fifth year; and now put on his Head a ſtately Diadem gliſtering with Gems, whereas hitherto he had worn an ordinary Fillet, like to a Maſter of a wreſtling School, clad in Purple. Having ſent the Body of (a) Helena, his Wife to Rome, to be buried in the Suburb of the Via Nomentana, where Conſtantina, the Wife of Gallus had been interr'd, he ſet himſelf more firmly to march againſt Conſtantius, whom by the Art of Divining, wherein he was well skill'd, and by Dreams, he conjectured to be near his End. He laboured to make ſuitable Preparations, but without any Noiſe, that he might not be diſcovered: and to curry Favour with all ſorts of men, he pretended ſtill to adhere to the Chriſtian Religion, from which he had ſecretly apoſtatiz'd; applying himſelf to the Aruſpicina and Auguria diligently, and other Ceremonies alwayes obſerved by Idolaters. But to colour this, he went to Church, particularly on the Feaſt of Epiphany, and there ſolemnly did his Devotions. Thus much we are told by Ammianus, who not only affirms him ſtill, at this time, to have made an open Profeſſion of Chriſtianity; but inſtances in the very Day, whereon he was preſent at the publick Worſhip; viz. the Epiphany celebrated, as he ſaith, truly, by Chriſtians, in the Moneth of January. Yet doth Zoſimus tell us a Tale, that before this he had declared his Judgement openly for Paganiſm, when he received the Meſſage from Conſtantius; affirming in the Hearing of all; that he would rather truſt the Gods, than commit himſelf, and his Life into the Hands of Conſtantius.

Julian doubting what Courſe to take, at length reſolves to ſtand upon his Guard, and bid Defiance to him.

Ita ipſe Julianus ad Julianum Avunculum ſcribens: Dii ita juſſerant, ut ei bellum inferrem; ſalutem quidem polliciti, ſi parerem, cunctanti verò perniciem.

(a) Alii eam in Puerperii doloribus interiiſſe in Palatio Juliani; alii Expulſam è Palatio ſcripſere; fuerunt & quidam, qui Veneno à Juliano necatam eſſe dicerent, ut docet Libanius. Vide Valeſium.

Ταῦτα ἀκηκοὼς Ἰουλιανὸς παρὰ τῶν Πρέσβεων, εἰς τὸ ἐμφανὲς ἔδειξεν ἣν εἶχε περὶ τὸ θεῖον προαίρεσιν.

105. But while he pleaſed himſelf with the Hopes of good Succeſs, and the Fruits he ſhould reap by this Diſſimulation and Cunning; his Thoughts were again diſcompoſed by News he received from the Borders, when Spring was at hand, how the Almans from the Quarter of Vadomarius (which was not in the leaſt apprehended, becauſe of the League) waſted the Countries adjoyning to Rhætia; and that with ſuch Violence, that they left nothing in their way, but what was Pillaged and Defaced, and that far and wide. Julian, to prevent greater Miſchiefs, which might ariſe from ſuch a Beginning, ſent away one Libino, a Comes, with the Celtæ and Petulantes, which wintered with him, to take order for repreſſing them, as ſhould be moſt convenient; who ſetting unadviſedly upon them, was killed in the beginning of the Engagement; and his men overpower'd by Numbers were put to the Rout. Here Ammianus tells a Story, upon Hearſay, how Conſtantius having made a Peace with the two Kings and Brothers Vadomarius and Gundomadus, after the Death of the latter, ſent to Vadomarius under Hand, and willed him, as one he eſteemed faithful to him, to waſt the Borders; that Julian intangled with Cares of defending them, might thereby be kept in Gall; which he readily obeyed, being from his Youth, very expert in the Craft of Diſſimulation; as afterward he abundantly ſhewed, when he Commanded as Dux in Phœnicia. But being diſcovered, he

The Almans waſte the Borders.

Si Famæ ſolius admittenda eſt Fides.

he left off this Trade; for the Notary, he had ſent back to Conſtantius, was ſeized by the Stationary Souldiers; and being ſearched, a Letter was found about him, wherein this was expreſſed amongſt many other things; that his Cæſar had no Diſcipline; although continually in the Diſpatches he ſent to Julian, he gave him the Title of Lord, of Auguſtus, and of God. Julian concluding with himſelf, that great Miſchief would enſue, if he was not by ſome means or other taken off, at length reſolved upon this Courſe to effect it. He made Choice of one Philagrius, at preſent a Notary, but afterwards preferred to be Comes of the Eaſt; of whoſe great Prudence he had had good Experience; and amongſt other Inſtructions gave him a ſealed Paper, which he commanded him not to open, till he ſhould ſee Vadomarius on this ſide the Rhine. He departed to the Borders, and purſuing what elſe he had in Command, Vadomarius came over the River, pretending to be in firm Friendſhip with the Romans, and utter Ignorance of the late Breach of Peace; to work a Belief of which, he promiſed to take a Meal with him that there commanded in Chief, to which Philagrius alſo was invited. When he came there, and ſaw the King, he preſently remembred his Paper; and pretending ſome earneſt Buſineſs, went to his Lodging, and breaking it open, after he had peruſed it, returned, and ſate down amongſt the reſt. After Dinner he laid Hands upon Vadomarius, and committed him to the Cuſtody of the Commander, to be ſafely kept at the Court of Guard; whence being afterwards ſent to Julian, and made to know, how his Underhand-dealing with Conſtantius was brought to Light, he was conveyed away into Spain, leſt he ſhould make Diſturbance in theſe Provinces, when Julian was gone into the Eaſt. For, very much elevated by ſo unexpected a ſurprizal of this King, he reſolved now to break out into an open Revolt from Conſtantius; and that he might leave all in Security behind him, with Secrecy paſſing the Rhine, ſo unexpectedly fell upon the Barbarians; that he conſtrained them to ask Pardon, reſtore the Booty they had lately taken, and promiſe all dutiful Behaviour for the time to come.

Profeſſâ palàm Defectione ſe tutiorem fore; exiſtimavit.

Julian chaſtiſes them.

And reſolves to march againſt Conſtantius.

106. Now reſolving to uſe all Expedition imaginable,as that which would moſt conduce to his Deſign; and being encouraged by ſome Dreams,which he thought portended the imminent Death of the Emperour, for a better and more lucky Beginning, he ſacrificed to Bellona. Then called he the Army together; and from his Tribunal with more open Confidence than formerly harangu'd to them. After a flattering and ſelf-commending Entrance; he fell into a more large Commendation of himſelf, relating his “ Exploits againſt the Germans, to them that knew them already: how he had reſtrained “ their Invaſions; made the Rhine paſſable to the Roman Armies,ſtanding immoveable “ againſt the Excurſions of thoſe Powerful Nations: and truſting to the “ conſtant Valour of them, his Great Fellow-Souldiers. And the Provinces of Gall,he “ Magni Commilitones.
ſaid, being Eye-witneſſes of theſe vaſt Labours, and refreſhed after ſuch Slaughters “ of their Inhabitants, ſuch continual and heavy Loſſes; would tranſmit them “ to Poſterity, through Swarms of Ages. Now being compelled by the Authority “ Per Ætatum Examina. of their Judgement, and the Neceſſity of Affairs, thereunto; for that he was exalted “ to the height of Majeſty, by the help of God, and their Aſſiſtance, if Fortune “ but favoured him, he would attempt higher and greater things ſtill; for that “ he would pretend ſo far, as to have approv'd himſelf to that Army, the Æquity “ and Valour whereof was Great and Famous; he being both moderate and Peaceable “ at Home, and in thoſe frequent Wars he had waged, Conſiderate and Wary. “ After this Encomium; he told them it was his Opinion, and Advice, that they “ ſhould make Haſt, while yet the Provinces of Illyricum were not fenced by Garriſons, “ to ſeize upon the Limits of Dacia, and afterwards govern themſelves, as “ Opportunity ſhould direct. And ſeeing, he ſaid, it was the Cuſtom, though of “ confiding Captains; he deſired them to confirm their Concord and Fidelity by a “ Military Oath. For his Part, he would, as hitherto he had behaved himſelf, be “ very Diligent, and watch that nothing ſhould be done Raſhly or Lazily; and be “ able, if any ſhould pry into his Actions, to diſcharge a good Conſcience; attempting “ nothing willingly, but what ſhould be for the common Good. And in the “ laſt Place, He beſought them to take heed they injur'd no private Men, nor “ thereby blemiſhed the Fame they had got by preſerving the Provinces from Rapine, “ as well as by innumerable Slaughters of their Enemies. The Multitude was “ moved with this Speech, not otherwiſe than if it had proceeded from ſome Oracle; and being greedy of Innovation unanimouſly approved of what he ſaid, by the horrible Noiſe they made, both by their Acclamations, and beating their Targets; calling him a Great and Famous Captain; and as they found by Experience, a Fortunate Conquerour of Nations and Kings. For indeed there were many Nations and

To which purpoſe, he courts the Army after his uſual manner.

Kings upon the Borders of Germany, where all theſe Exploits, his and theirs, were done. Then were they all commanded to take the Oath of Fidelity to him; which they did, putting their Swords to their Necks, in words conceived with direful Execrations, thereby engaging to endure all Extremities for him, if need ſhould be, even to Death it ſelf. And this was followed by all the Officers, except Nebridius, whom, being prefer'd to be Præfectus Prætorio by Conſtantius, he had admitted to the Diſcharge of that Employment. He alone refuſed, both ſtoutly and conſtantly; affirming, that he could not have the Conſcience to bind himſelf by any Oath againſt the Emperour, to whom he was obliged by many Kindneſſes. The Souldiers perceiving this, would have killed him; but Julian, conſcious poſſibly of the gallant Fidelity and Reſolution of the man, was ſo Juſt, as by caſting over him his Coat, to protect him from their Violence. And afterward, when in the Palace, as he came by, he lay proſtrate, and deſired him to give him his hand, as a Pledge of his Security; he asked him what he ſhould reſerve for his Friends, if he ſuffered him to touch it; but bid him go in Safety whither he pleaſed. Whereupon he went away to his own Houſe in Tuſcia, and Julian gave the Signal for marching into Pannonia, raſhly committing himſelf to doubtful Fortune, as his Friend Ammianus makes bold to ſay.

And gives the Signal for marching.

107. But let us ſee how Conſtantius, this Winter, behaves himſelf at Antioch, whether he have reaſon to ſay ſo much of his own Prudence and other Vertues. It's to be fear'd, he neither was Guilty of ſo Famous Exploits, nor ſo Wiſe, if he had done any thing (as perhaps he could ſay ſome little he had performed againſt the Sarmatians) as to make it ſo Evident and known by his Rhetorick. He had not been ſo great a Proficient in Study, nor ſo long worn the Pallium, as to ſay, What's our Power, except Men know it? And Knowledge what? unleſs we ſhow it. Yet he had, at this time, the Hap to ſtumble upon ſomething, which Ammianus cannot Reprehend. Though he was no Famous Captain, nor Conquerour of Nations and Kings, (for indeed upon the Borders of the Rhine, within Germany, there appears, within a little ſpace, to have been more Kings, and conſequently more Nations than beyond the Danube: all the Sons of Kings being Kings, as ſhould ſeem by Vadomarius and his Brother, as at this day, with them all the Sons of Princes are Princes, and all the Sons of Dukes are Dukes, though not all the Sons of Emperours are Emperours) yet amongſt many very Honourable Perſons, ſeveral Tribunes came to Adore him, at his Return out of Meſopotamia. There was alſo Amphilochius, who had formerly that Command, and therein ſerving Conſtans, was more than Suſpected to have made Miſchief betwixt the two Brothers. He crowded in to be admitted to Kiſs the Robe amongſt the reſt; but being known, was rejected and put by. Hereat the Company cried out, that he ought not any longer to Live, for that he was an obſtinate Traytor; to which Conſtantius replied, (being milder, Ammianus tells you, than he was wont) Do not ſo preſs upon a man, whom I believe to be Guilty, but not manifeſtly Convicted; but if he be, take notice, that under mine obſervation he ſhall be puniſhed by the Doom of his own Conſcience, which he will no way be able to deceive; and ſo the Matter ended. The day after, were celebrated the Circenſian Games, and this ſame Amphilochius, as well as others, became a Spectator, juſt oppoſite to the Emperour, at a Raile, which upon a great ſhout, when the Company preſſed forward to gaze, brake down, and with the fall, though the reſt were only ſlightly hurt, yet he was found dead, with the Rim of his Belly burſten; whereupon Conſtantius as having ſkill alſo in Predictions, much rejoyced. About this time he buried his Wife Euſebia, a Lady very beautiful; and humble, conſidering her high Quality. Ammianus tells us ſhe excelled, both in the Beauty of her Body, and Manners; in that ſhe reſcued Julian by her moſt juſt Favour, out of Danger, and procured him to be declared Cæſar, as he had before related, who I am afraid had forgot what elſe where he has written concerning her procuring Julian's Child to be made away, by the Nurſe, and tampering with his Wiſe to make her miſcarry. Now did he take care of Florentius, who upon Julian's Uſurpation had fled out of Gall, preferring him to be Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, in the Place of Anatolius lately dead. And with Taurus, who at the ſame time executed this great Office of Præfect in Italy, he entred upon the Conſulſhip for the enſuing year.

Ammianus obſerves one mild action of Conſtantius.

His Wiſe Euſebia dies.

Cumque Tauro itidem Præfecto Prætorio per Italiam, Ampliſſimi ſuſcepit Inſignia Magiſtratus.

108. Neither was Conſtantius behind hand in Preparations, both againſt a Foreign, and Domeſtick Enemy. To this End a Supply was added, both to the Legions, and the Cavalry, out of the men newly raiſed throughout the Provinces; and all ſorts of Perſons were burthened by the finding, not only of Men, but of Money, Clothes, Arms, Victuals, Carriage-Beaſts and Engines, as our Writer tells us, which is ſtrange, that the Provinces ſhould furniſh all theſe things in kind; as to which we

He makes great Preparations againſt the Perſians.

we muſt crave leave here to conſult our Law-Books, wherein we find ſeveral of theſe Neceſſaries impoſed upon the Countries, but others never ſo much as mention'd, but only as they were ſupplied out of the publick Fabricks. And whereas the Perſian King could hardly be kept beyond Tigris, in the Extremities of Winter; it was imagin'd, as ſoon as the Weather gave leave he would again make bold with Meſopotamia, or the adjoyning Provinces. Therefore were Ambaſſadours ſent away to the Kings and Princes, beyond that River, with great Gifts; eſpecially to Arſaces and Meribanes, Kings of Armenia and Iberia, who were careſſed with more than ordinary Preſents, that they might not give any Aſſiſtance to the Perſian. During theſe Diſturbances Hermogenes died, and Helpidius was made Præfect in his Room; a Paphlagonian by Birth, of a mean Aſpect, and proportionable Elocution; but ſimple of Diſpoſition, and without any Touch of Cruelty in ſo high a Degree; ſo that when Conſtantius commanded him once to put an innocent Perſon to the Rack, he gently deſired him to take away his Power, and brought him to conſent, that things of this Nature ſhould be done by other Perſons. Now was Conſtantius in a very great Strait, not knowing whether he ſhould go to chaſtiſe Julian, or march againſt the Perſians, who were expected on this ſide Euphrates: but after ſerious Debate with his Friends, he was adviſed to put a Period firſt, either by a League or Victory to the War near at hand, and then march againſt Julian, whom they and he both concluded they ſhould conquer with as much Eaſe, as any Hunter what he is in chaſe of. Yet he endeavoured to ſtrike an univerſal Terror, where ever he might have Occaſion to move his Arms, and in Particular, leſt Africk ſhould be tumultuous, which, upon all occaſions afforded great Conveniences to Princes, he ſent thither Gaudentius the Notary, who had been formerly the Spy upon Julian in Gall, and who upon the account of Enmity to the Adverſe Party, would, he knew, do what he could; as well as to Approve himſelf to the Emperour, who, as all Men concluded, would prove Victorious. Being Arrived there, and having communicated ſome of his Inſtructions to Cretio the Comes, and the reſt of the Commanders; he made Levies of the beſt men he could raiſe out of the two Mauritania's, and therewith Defended ſtoutly the Coaſts lying over againſt Gall, and the Parts of Aquitain. And herein Conſtantius was not miſtaken; for ſo long as he lived, none of his Enemies touched that Countrey, although Forces lay about the Promontory of Lilybæum, to paſs over thither, upon occaſion. Taking Order for theſe and other Matters, he received Advice from his Officers in the Eaſt, that the Forces of the Perſians were United, and their King in the Head of them, drew near to the River Tigris, it being utterly uncertain, what Courſe he would take. Alarm'd with the News, he quitted his Winter-Quarters; and taking along the Horſe and the Foot, which he could truſt to, by a Bridge of Boats he paſſed Euphrates, and went to Edeſſa, a City well fortified, and abounding with Neceſſaries, where he ſtaid till by his Scouts, he could diſcover which way the Enemy moved.

